START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT
CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

APRIL 1994

Camera Operator:
Kathy Wilder

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER:
BSO-56-022

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library
(August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO
	Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO
	Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO
	Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO
	Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO
	Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO
	Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO
	Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO
	Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO
	Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO
	Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO
	Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO
	Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO
	Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO
	Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO
	Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO
	Pops	1924
46	BSO
	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO
	Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements
	Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO
	Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO
	Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO
	Pops
	U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO
	Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO
	Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copyright law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: [✓ IA] IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 12X

FILM STOCK:

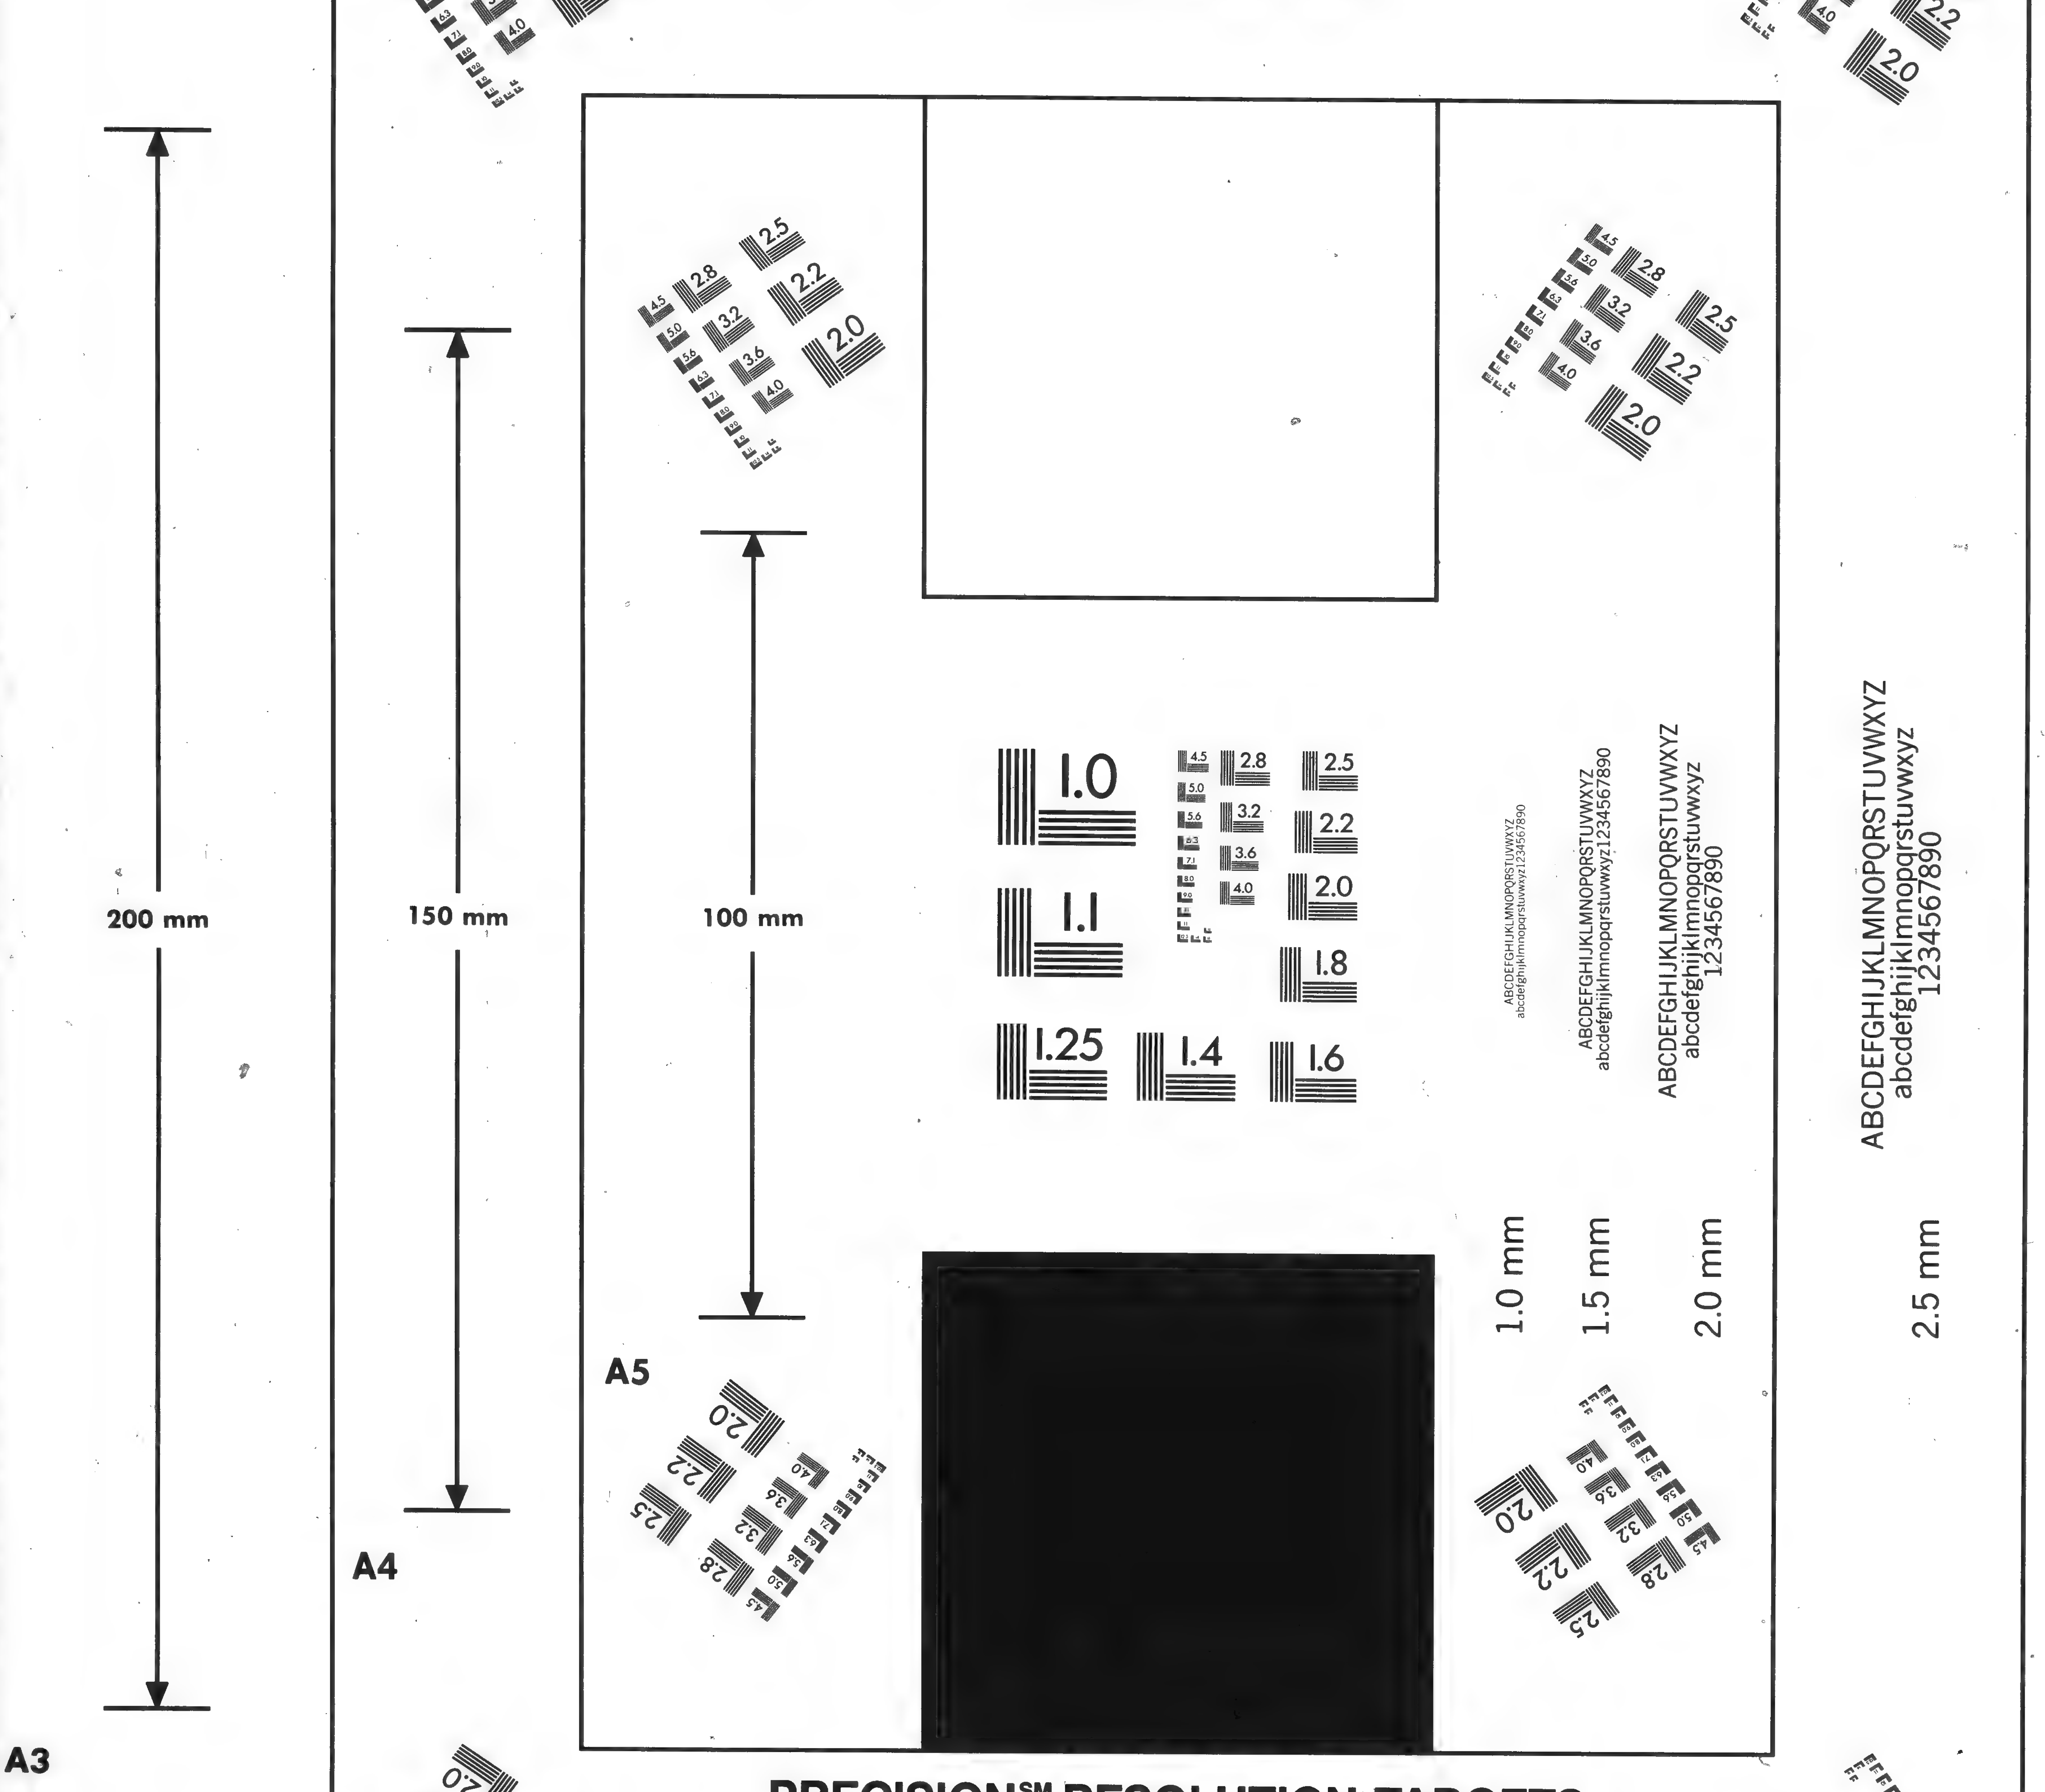
Kodak
IMAGELINK™ HQ
MICROFILM
35mm x 30.5m · 100ft
Sp 425
DEVELOP BEFORE 08/1995
1461-0322-036-05
CAT 840 3594
12-13

REEL 22

Volume 44

BSO
Pops
1922-1924

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 44

BSO
Pops

1922 - 1924

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

REDUCTION

RATIO

15x

2.5 mm

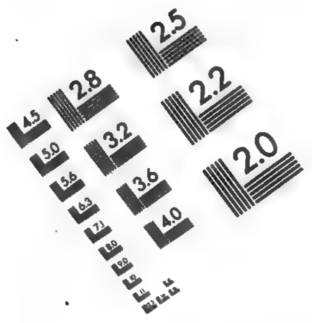
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

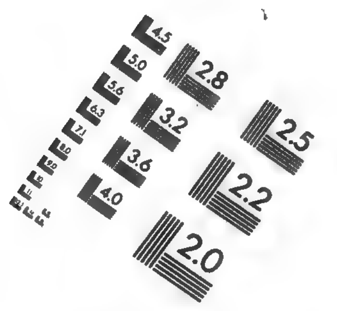
2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

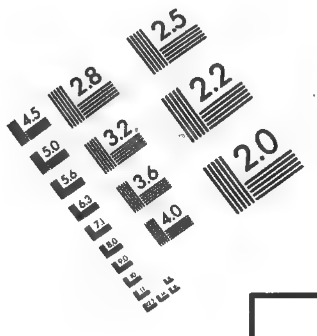
1.5 mm

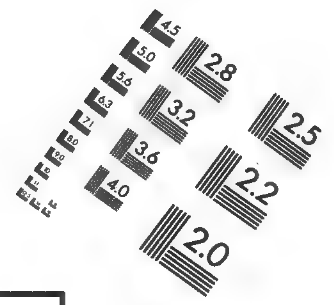
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

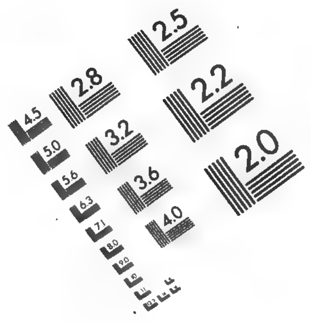


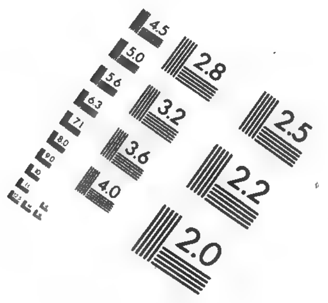


PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





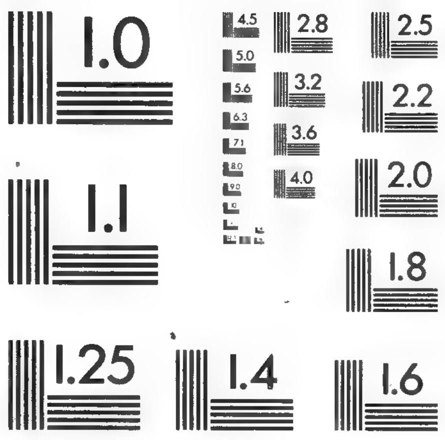




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



1.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

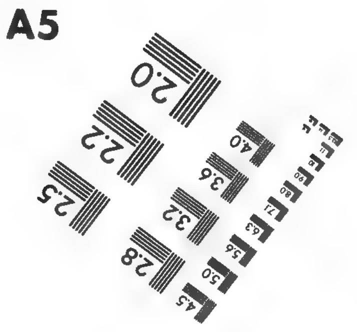
2.0 mm

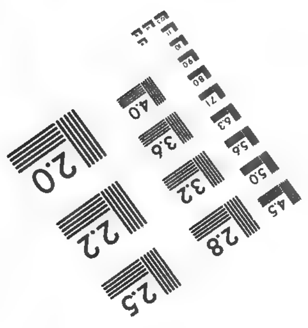
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

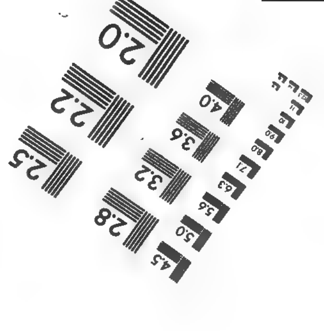
A5

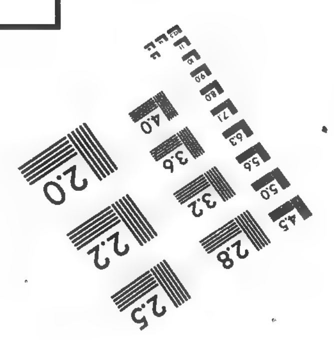




A4

A3



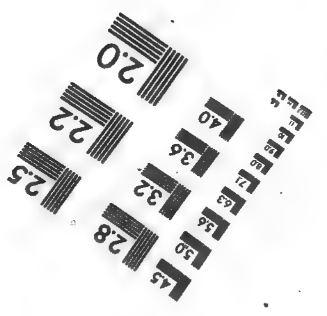


PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm



ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm

From
HERALD AUG 6 1922
Boston, Mass.

MONTEUX PROMISES MUSIC LOVERS PLENTY OF NOVELTY

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Brings Back Many Surprises from European Studios—Says Boston Will Hear the Best There Is in New Music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian—Sunday Herald Reporter Pays Early Call at Northport Home of Musician and Is Entertained by Mlle. Denise

By JOE TOYE

Boston is to have plenty of novelty during the next Symphony season.

"But only as incidental to the classics," Conductor Pierre Monteux told a Sunday Herald reporter a few days ago when the reporter called on the orchestra leader at Mr. Monteux's home at Northport, Me.

Mr. Monteux returned recently from a trip to London and Paris, where he visited the studios of a number of composers, some of whose work he is to present at Symphony concerts during the coming season.

"Just who are they and what is the nature of their work?" the reporter asked.

Mr. Monteux smiled.

"That," he parried, "is a question I would like to answer, but I do not dare. Many of the composers with whom I talked are still at work on their compositions. Until I hear the final result I cannot say definitely that I am to present any one of them."

Boston to Hear Best of New Music

"But there must be some definite statement you can make regarding your plans for next season," the reporter persisted.

"O, yes," brightly, "I can say that I heard much excellent music of the newer school. I can say that Boston will hear the best there is of the new music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian. And," he added, "German. There will be plenty of novelty, but (and please emphasize this) the new music will come second. The classic first, always first."

Musicians are expected to be temperamental.

Two weary newspaper persons, a reporter and a photographer, trudged stolidly up a rocky road leading from the wharf at Northport to the summer home of Pierre Monteux—a delightful big white house, well-kept, located on a hilltop overlooking the bluest water this side of the Mediterranean.

By their watches it was half past eight—in the morning. They didn't know that Northport uses Eastern standard time. Hence it must be concluded that the time in the Monteux household was 7:30—still in the morning.

And musicians are expected to be temperamental.

A French servant came to the door.

Having pleasantly bon joured the reporter and photographer, she announced, with regret, the monsieur was asleep, that he was accustomed to breakfasting at 9 o'clock and now it was only 7:30. Would the gentlemen wait or would they return later. There was no place to go in Northport so the gentlemen decided they would wait there on the veranda while the maestro snored symphonically.

At that moment a lovable little girl with black curly hair appeared in the doorway.

"I shall tell my daddy you will wait," she announced.

And upstairs she scampered to tell daddy. She was back quickly.

"Won't you wait, please?" she invited.

DENISE BORN HOSTESS

Then she disappeared, returning a minute later, tugging at a big piazza chair.

"For you," she said to one of the visitors.

Soon she appeared with another chair, which was taken from her, for it was too big a chair for even a big little girl to carry.

"What is your name, dear?"

"Denise," she answered, "and I have a baby brother," she added proudly.

"Will you write your name and your brother's name in this book? And will you write down your ages, too?"

"Yes, sir."

So Denise took the notebook and pencil, leaned against the piazza rail, put one bare foot against one bare knee and placing the book on the other knee wrote:

Denise Monteux, age 9.
Claude Monteux, aged 1½.

"Come," she commanded, "I'll show you Claude. He is on the veranda."

She ran to the front lawn, looked upward, and cooed at the baby, which we couldn't see.

"Come!" commanded Curly-Locks.

But the two newspaper persons, realizing how absurd they would look staring up at a house a quarter of eight in the morning, stayed put. The baby could be heard, crowing gloriously at Denise.

Now, Curly-Locks is a born hostess. Failing to attract our notice to her prize exhibit, Claude, she disappeared into the house and returned with a ferocious lion about a foot long. I know he was ferocious because—well, you will see why.

Denise inserted a clock key in the lion's right hip, aft. She wound diligently and then set the wild beast on the piazza floor, facing us, about four feet away.

The lion's head started to swing from side to side, his eyes glinting in the morning light.

"Fine," we applauded.

Denise's face assumed an expression of "You ain't seen nawthin' yet," but she remained silent, content, apparently, to allow the lion to conduct the performance. It did.

The head continued to sway. Then, suddenly, the lion rose on his hind legs and leaped, right at us. He landed on all four paws. His head continued to sway and he leaped again. Then his insides needed re-winding.

A moment later a guest of the house appeared, a very good looking young girl—a Miss Marshall of Brookline—and we talked of golf and dancing and tennis and other sub-deb interests and, as Chaucer so pertinently remarked, a good time was had by all.

At this point Mr. Monteux appeared, far ahead of schedule.

Was he incensed because we had roused him from sleep at an early hour? Did he leap in the air, click his heels together and tear out large handfuls of hair? Did he, to make it swift and snappy, set the dog on Jimmie Jones and me?

Answer, by the chorus:
He did not!

TALKED OF PLANS

For I would have you know that Pierre Monteux is a charming gentleman. Better than that, he is a delightful human being. He apologized to us for keeping us waiting. And did we have our breakfast? No, I'm wrong. What he said was:

"You'll have breakfast with me."

But we had breakfasted on the boat, so Mr. Monteux postponed his breakfast that we might talk, take our photographs and silently steal away, like the well-known Arab. The only difference between the Arab and us was that the Arab stole away on a camel and we bounced away in a Ford.

So we talked music and Mr. Monteux told me the things outlined in the opening paragraphs of this narrative.

"Is there any one man whose new work you know you will have next season?" I asked.

"Well, yes," he told me. "There is Maurice Avel; I talked with him in Paris."

"What is your opinion of this new Russian school of music?" I asked.

"I like it," he enthused.

"What is back of it all?" was my next question. "Is it some sort of manifestation of a national state of mind?"

"Not at all," he corected me. "It is not national at all. It is not local to Russia. You will find it in England, France, Italy, Germany—here in America."

MUSICIAN'S SHARE LOSES

"Then it is international?"

"International, yes," he agreed. "But it is more than that. It is epochal; it is here."

"Will it flourish?"

"Who can tell?" He shrugged his shoulders and smiled.

"By the way," he went on, "I found that almost everything is being published in London. Everybody is sending his work there; even from Italy."

"Did you find Europe supporting music and musicians?" I asked.

"Yes, indeed!" he answered.

"Opera?"

"Yes, the Opera Comique is run at a profit, and, you see, too, opera in France has a government subsidy. Here the expense is guaranteed by individuals."

"Is the Paris Symphony subsidized?"

"No, there the players share in the profits and share in the losses. If there is no profit, they get no money. So, sometimes, to live, they must have outside work."

"Here," he continued, "our musicians are paid regardless of profit or loss."

"Has that an effect on music?"

BOSTON KNOWS MUSIC

"A very great effect," emphatically. "For instance, the Paris Symphony cannot give its audience anything but the tried music except on rare occasions. They cannot afford to spend a lot of time in rehearsal The result is Paris does not hear many a great work that comes to Boston and is presented to the public.

"With us," he explained, "it is different. I can have many rehearsals. Our musicians are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are on the regular payroll. If tomorrow morning I wish a rehearsal I say 'Rehearsal tomorrow morning,' and we have it. And so we here in America hear the best of all music."

"Do we here in America really know music, understand its message, or is it just a pose with us?" I asked. "Do we go to concerts because it is the thing that is being done?"

"Americans," said Mr. Monteux, with sincerity, and particularly Bostonians, understand music, they have had it so long. It is not a pose. You cannot give them poor music. They demand the best and recognize it and support it."

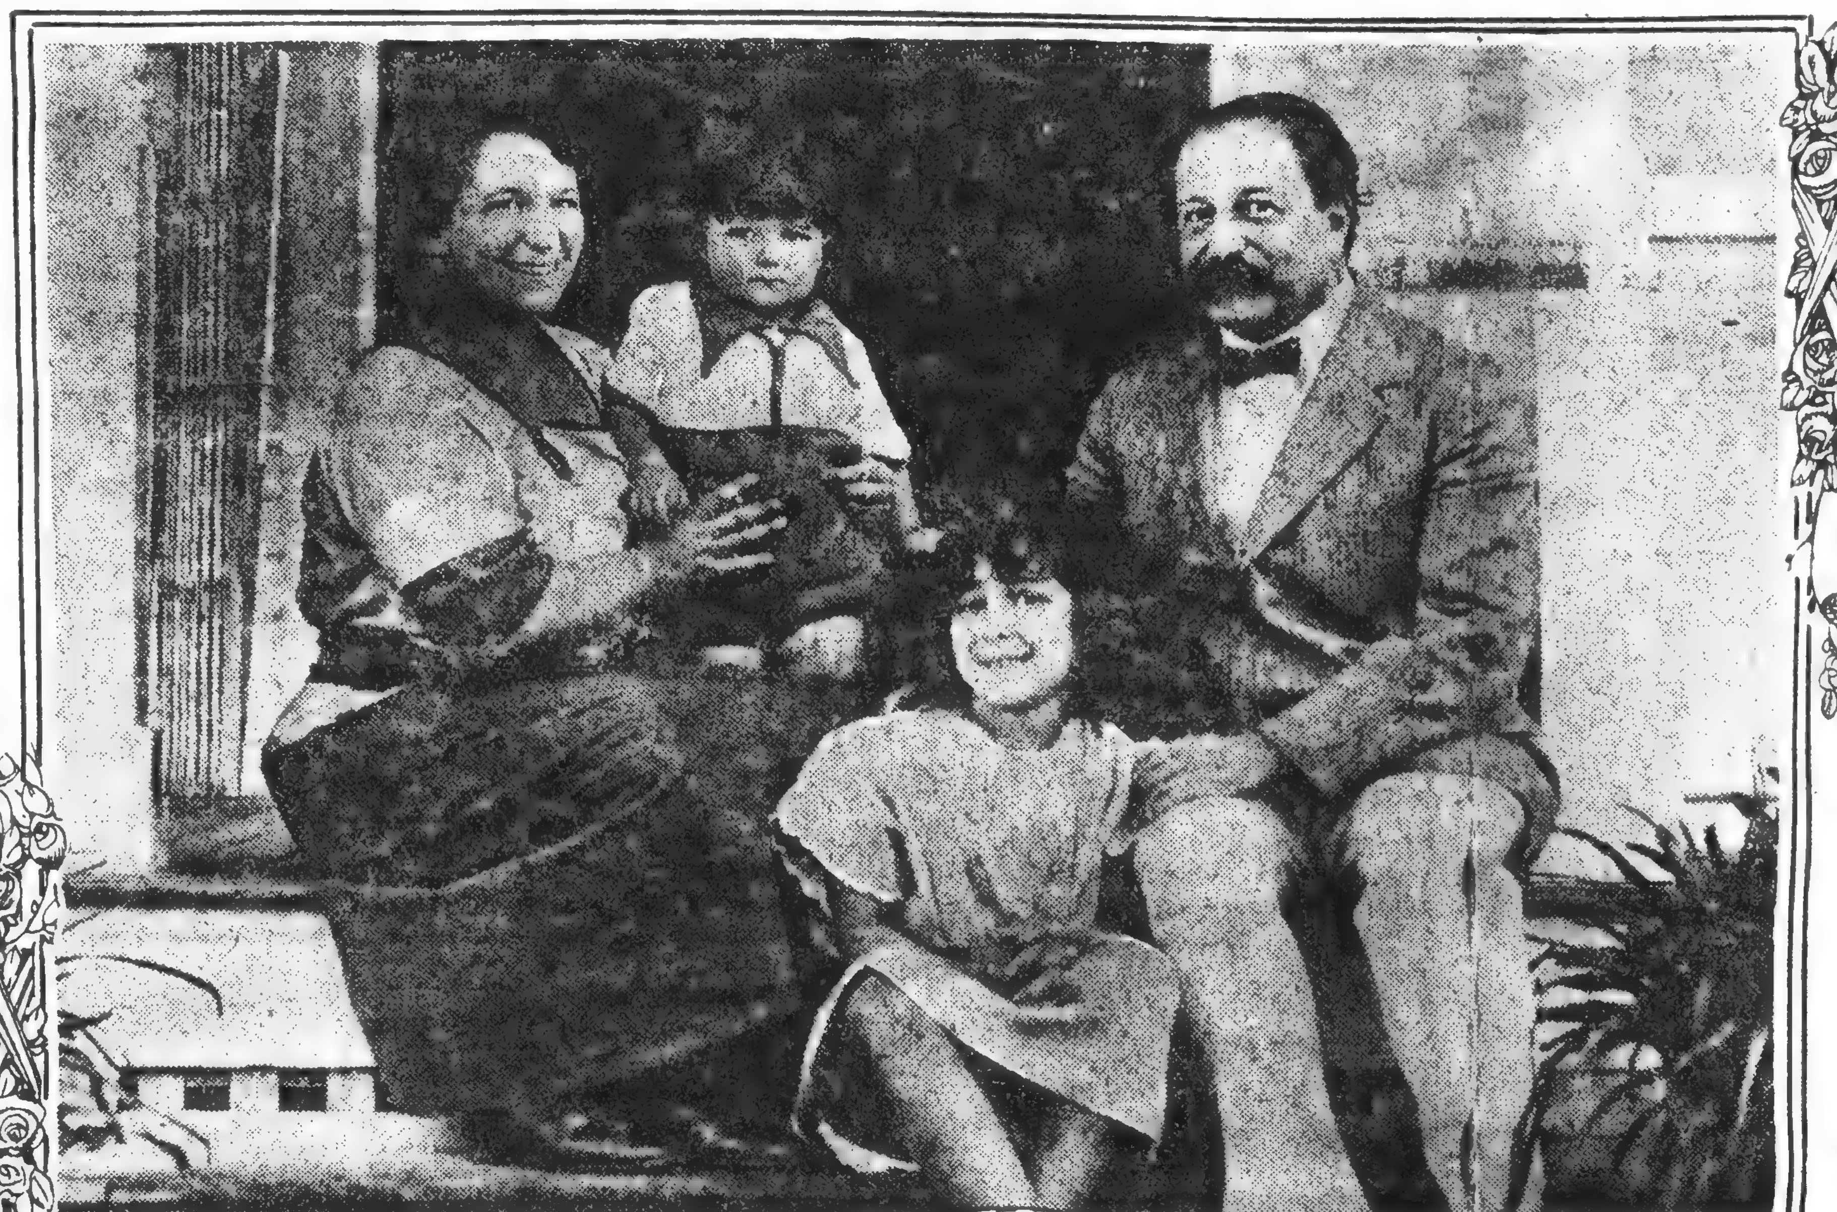
At which juncture a shrill whoop of glee shattered the atmosphere.

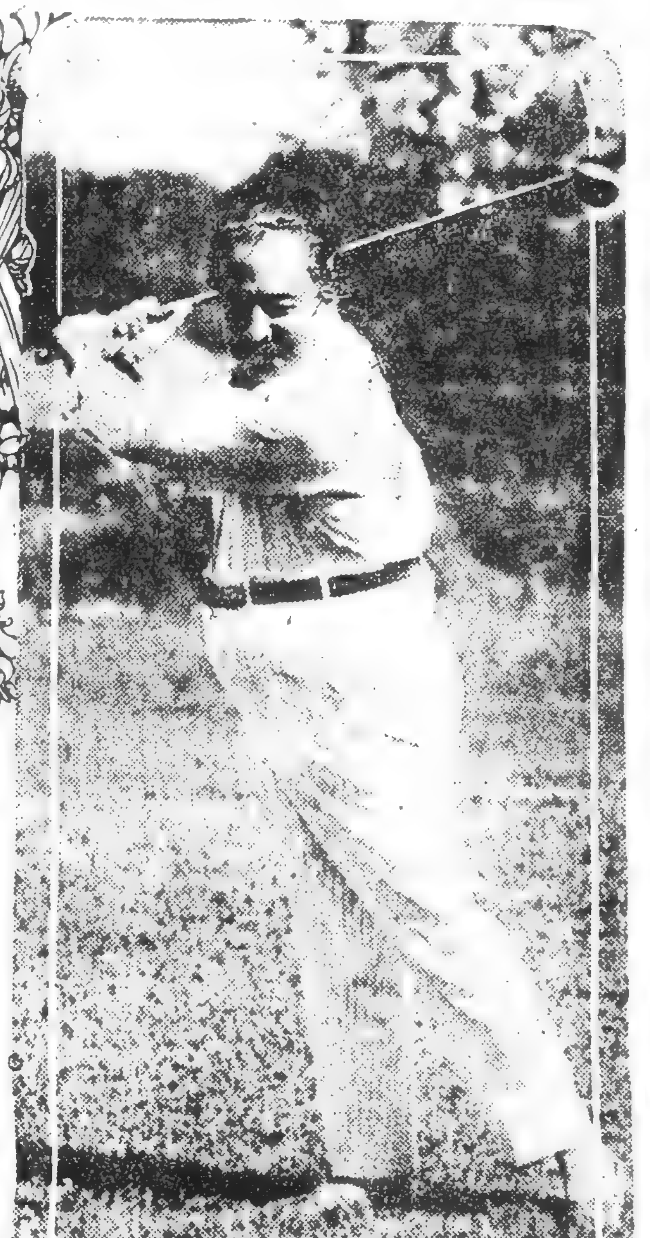
Claude Monteux, age 1½, appeared on the scene, an adorable youngster. Behind him, smiling a welcome, was Mme. Monteux.

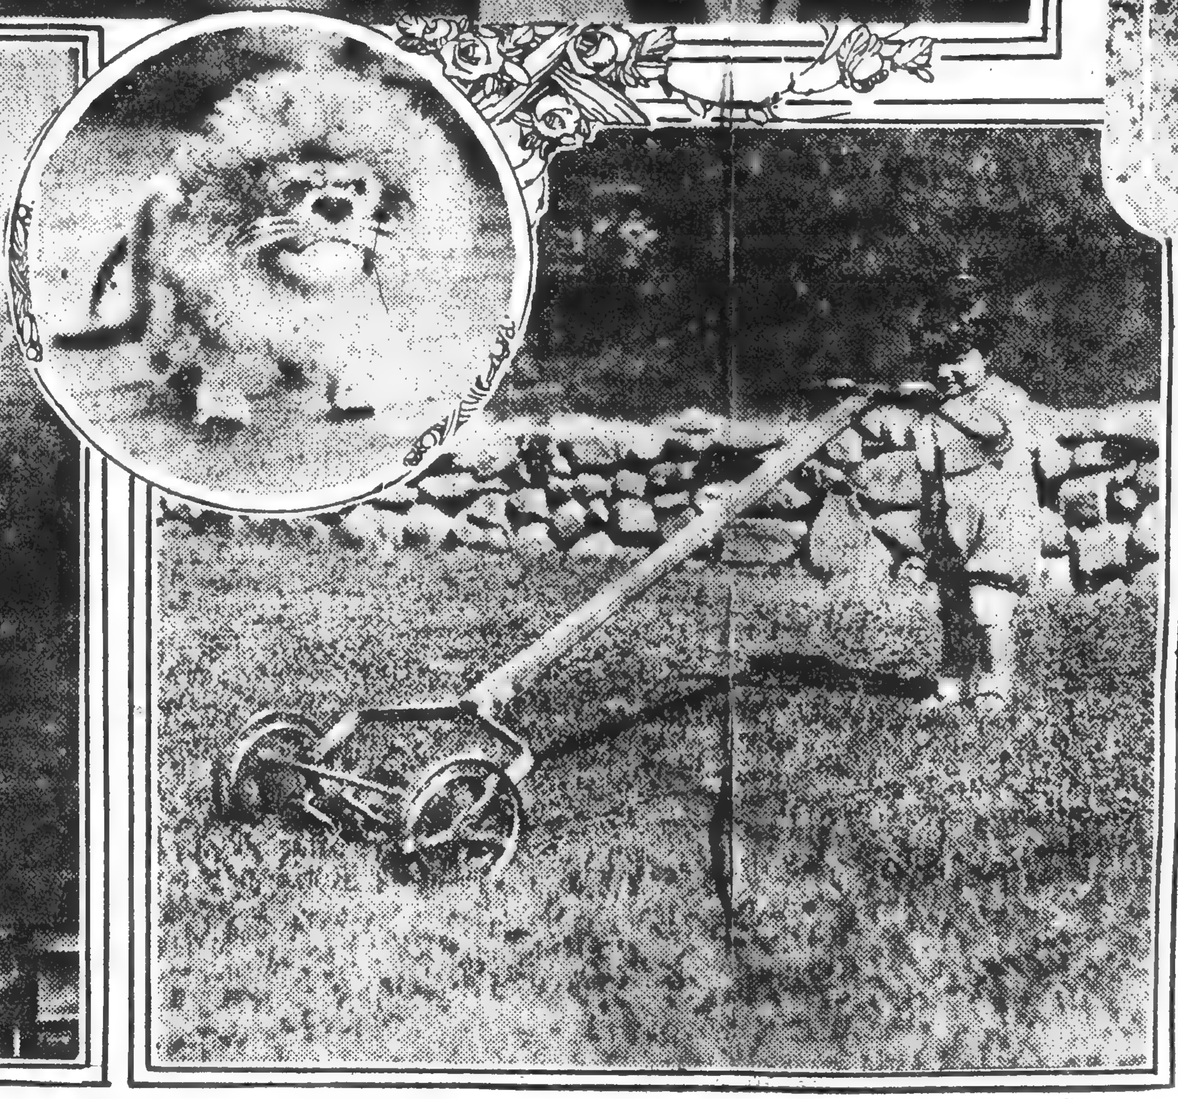
Good nature and hospitality run in the family. All the nice things I have writen about Mr. Monteux and Denise apply to Mme. Monteux.

But Claude just completely "busted up" the interview.

Ten minutes later Jimmie Jones and I, unlike the Arab, folded our legs in the back of a flivver and noisily bumped away.







(All Pictures by Jimmie Jones, Staff Photographer)

PERE PIERRE AND MME. MONTEUX, TOGETHER WITH DENISE AND CLAUDE—NOT TO FORGET THE FEROCIOUS LION

Soloists With Boston Symphony

FRANCES ALDA, ONE OF THE SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD THIS SEASON WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A splendid list of soloists is now announced for appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall, which is to begin on Oct. 13 and 14. One of several signs that this coming 42d season of the orchestra is to be one of the largest of them all is seen in the great demand for seats by subscription, which even exceeds that of last year. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts, all seats were re-engaged early last spring. For the 24 Saturday evening concerts, a very few are to be had.

Pierre Monteux is entering upon his fourth season as the conductor.

The singers to be heard are Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer, famous stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frieda Hempel, recently of the same organization.

The pianists will be Alfred Cortot, named as the greatest pianist France has produced; Benno Moiseiwitsch, the splendid Russian artist; Olga Samaroff, Arthur Schnabel and John Powell, the American composer and pianist.

There will be three other composers of note who are also virtuosos — Alfredo Casella, the young revolutionary Italian; Georges Enesco, composer of the Roumanian Rhapsody, and Marcel Dupre, the young French artist, known and praised alike as a composer and as an organist. Besides Enesco, there will be two violinists at these concerts, Albert Spalding, the American virtuoso, and Toscha Seidel.

TRAV-SEPT-9

[4]

From
HERALD
Boston, Mass.
AUG 6 1922

MONTEUX PROMISES MUSIC LOVERS PLENTY OF NOVELTY

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Brings Back Many Surprises from European Studios—Says Boston Will Hear the Best There Is in New Music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian—Sunday Herald Reporter Pays Early Call at Northport Home of Musician and Is Entertained by Mlle. Denise

By JOE TOYE

Boston is to have plenty of novelty during the next Symphony season.

"But only as incidental to the classics," Conductor Pierre Monteux told a Sunday Herald reporter a few days ago when the reporter called on the orchestra leader at Mr. Monteux's home at Northport, Me.

Mr. Monteux returned recently from a trip to London and Paris, where he visited the studios of a number of composers, some of whose work he is to present at Symphony concerts during the coming season.

"Just who are they and what is the nature of their work?" the reporter asked.

Mr. Monteux smiled.

"That," he parried, "is a question I would like to answer, but I do not dare. Many of the composers with whom I talked are still at work on their compositions. Until I hear the final result I cannot say definitely that I am to present any one of them."

Boston to Hear Best of New Music

"But there must be some definite statement you can make regarding your plans for next season," the reporter persisted.

"O, yes," brightly, "I can say that I heard much excellent music of the newer school. I can say that Boston will hear the best there is of the new music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian. And," he added, "German. There will be plenty of novelty, but (and please emphasize this) the new music will come second. The classic first, always first."

Musicians are expected to be temperamental.

Two weary newspaper persons, a reporter and a photographer, trudged stolidly up a rocky road leading from the wharf at Northport to the summer home of Pierre Monteux—a delightful big white house, well-kept, located on a hilltop overlooking the bluest water this side of the Mediterranean.

By their watches it was half past eight—in the morning. They didn't know that Northport uses Eastern standard time. Hence it must be concluded that the time in the Monteux household was 7:30—still in the morning.

And musicians are expected to be temperamental.

A French servant came to the door. Having pleasantly bonjoured the reporter and photographer, she announced, with regret, the monsieur was asleep, that he was accustomed to breakfasting at 9 o'clock and now it was only 7:30. Would the gentlemen wait or would they return later. There was no place to go in Northport so the gentlemen decided they would wait there on the veranda while the maestro snored symphonically.

At that moment a lovable little girl with black curly hair appeared in the doorway.

"I shall tell my daddy you will wait," she announced.

And upstairs she scampered to tell daddy. She was back quickly.

"Won't you wait, please?" she invited.

DENISE BORN HOSTESS

Then she disappeared, returning a minute later, tugging at a big piazza chair.

"For you," she said to one of the visitors.

Soon she appeared with another chair, which was taken from her, for it was too big a chair for even a big little girl to carry.

"What is your name, dear?"

"Denise," she answered, "and I have a baby brother," she added proudly.

"Will you write your name and your brother's name in this book? And will you write down your ages, too?"

"Yes, sir."

So Denise took the notebook and pencil, leaned against the piazza rail, put one bare foot against one bare knee and placing the book on the other knee wrote:

Denise Monteux, age 9.
Claude Monteux, aged 1½.

"Come," she commanded, "I'll show you Claude. He is on the veranda."

She ran to the front lawn, looked upward, and cooed at the baby, which we couldn't see.

"Come!" commanded Curly-Locks.

But the two newspaper persons, realizing how absurd they would look staring up at a house a quarter of eight in the morning, stayed put. The baby could be heard, crowing gloriously at Denise.

Now, Curly-Locks is a born hostess. Failing to attract our notice to her prize exhibit, Claude, she disappeared into the house and returned with a ferocious lion about a foot long. I know he was ferocious because—well, you will see why.

Denise inserted a clock key in the lion's right hip, aft. She wound diligently and then set the wild beast on the piazza floor, facing us, about four feet away.

The lion's head started to swing from side to side, his eyes glinting in the morning light.

"Fine," we applauded.

Denise's face assumed an expression of "You ain't seen nawthin' yet," but she remained s[illegible] cont[illegible] to allow the [illegible] man[illegible].

[illegible]

A [illegible] appea[illegible] girl [illegible] Miss M[illegible] and we [illegible] tennis and other [illegible] and, as Chaucer so pertinently remarked, a good time was had by all.

At this point Mr. Monteux appeared, far ahead of schedule.

Was he incensed because we had roused him from sleep [illegible]? Did he [illegible] together [illegible] hair? Did he, to make it swift and snappy, set the dog on Jimmie Jones and me?

Answer, by the chorus:

He did not!

TALKED OF PLANS

For I would have you know that Pierre Monteux is a charming gentleman. Better than that, he is a delightful human being. He apologized to us for keeping us waiting. And did we have our breakfast? No, I'm wrong. What he said was:

"You'll have breakfast with me."

But we had breakfasted on the boat, so Mr. Monteux postponed his breakfast that we might talk, take our photographs and silently steal away, like the well-known Arab. The only difference between the Arab and us was that the Arab stole away on a camel and we bounced away in a Ford.

So we talked music and Mr. Monteux told me the things outlined in the opening paragraphs of this narrative.

"Is there any one man whose new work you know you will have next season?" I asked.

"Well, yes," he told me. "There is Maurice Ravel; I talked with him in Paris."

"What is your opinion of this new Russian school of music?" I asked.

"I love it," he enthused.

"What is back of it all?" was my next question. "Is it some sort of manifestation of a national state of mind?"

"Not at all," he corrected me. "It is [illegible] at all. It is not local to [illegible]. You will feel it in England, [illegible] Italy, Germany—here in America."

MUSICIAN'S SHARE LOSES

"[illegible]?"

"[illegible] yes," he agreed. "But it is more than that. It is epochal; it is [illegible]."

"Will it flourish?"

"[illegible]" He shrugged his shoulders and smiled.

"By the way," he went on, "I found that almost everything is being published in London. Everybody is sending his work there, even from Italy."

"[illegible] Europe supporting [illegible] and musicians?" I asked.

"[illegible] indeed!" he answered.

"[illegible]?"

"Yes, the Opera Comique is run at a profit, and, you see, too, opera in France has a government subsidy. Here the expense is guaranteed by individuals."

"Is the Paris Symphony subsidized?"

"No, there the players share in the profits and share in the losses. If there is no profit, they get no money. So, sometimes, to live, they must have outside work."

"Here," he continued, "our musicians [illegible] regardless of profit or loss."

"Has [illegible] on music?"

BOSTON KNOWS MUSIC

"[illegible] great effect," emphatically. "[illegible] the Paris Symphony cannot [illegible] anything but the [illegible] music except on rare occasions. [illegible] to spend a lot of [illegible] rehearsal. The result is Paris [illegible] hear many a great work that [illegible] Boston and is presented to the [illegible]."

"With us," he explained, "it is different. [illegible] have many rehearsals. [illegible] are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are on [illegible]. If tomorrow morning I wish a rehearsal I say 'Rehearsal [illegible] morning' and we have it. [illegible] in America hear the best of all music."

"[illegible] America really know music and [illegible] its message, or is it just a pose with [illegible]?" I asked. "Do we [illegible] it is the thing that is being done?"

"Americans," said Mr. Monteux, "with [illegible] and particularly Boston[illegible] understand music. They have had it so long. It is not a pose. You cannot give them poor music. They demand the best and recognize it and support it."

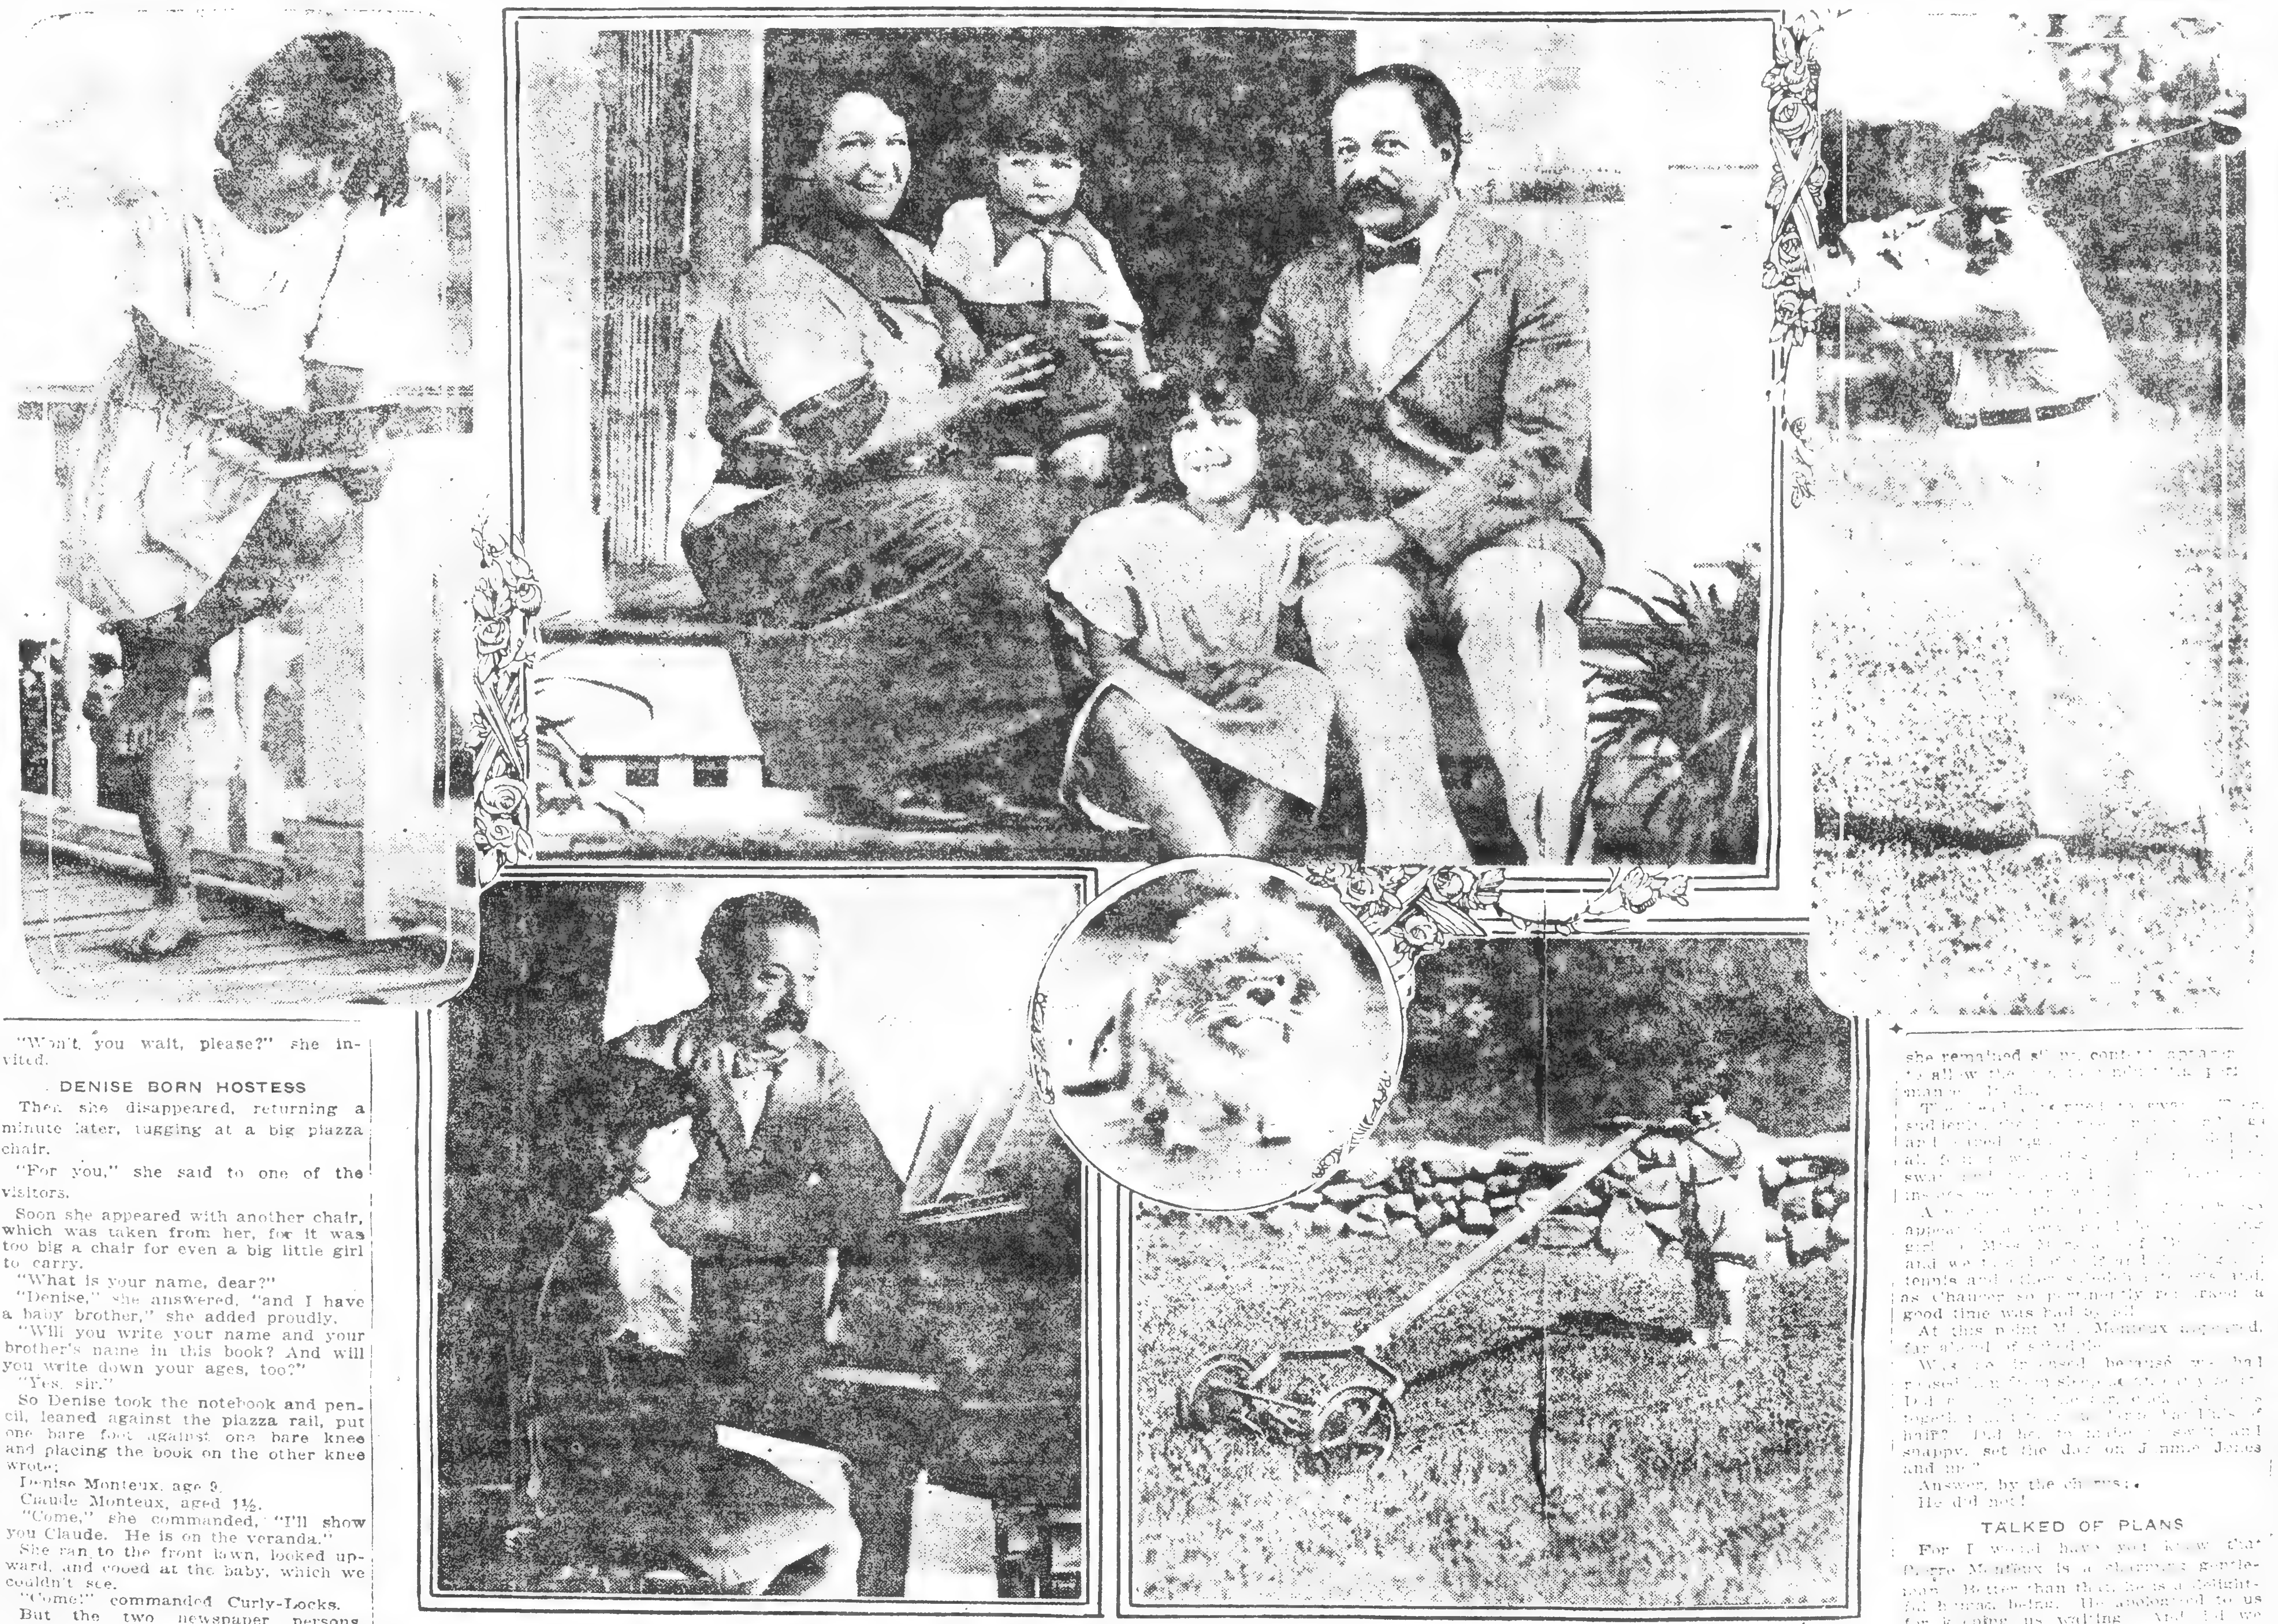
At which juncture a shrill whoop of glee shattered the atmosphere.

Claude Monteux, age 1½, appeared on the scene, an adorable youngster. Behind him, smiling a welcome, was Mme. Monteux.

Good nature and hospitality run in the family. All the nice things I have writen about Mr. Monteux and Denise apply to Mme. Monteux.

But Claude just completely "busted up" the interview.

Ten minutes later Jimmie Jones and I, unlike the Arab, folded our legs in the back of a flivver and noisily bumped away.



(All Pictures by Jimmie Jones, Staff Photographer)

PERE PIERRE AND MME. MONTEUX, TOGETHER WITH DENISE AND CLAUDE—NOT TO FORGET THE FEROCIOUS LION

Soloists With Boston Symphony

FRANCES ALDA, ONE OF THE SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD THIS SEASON WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A splendid list of soloists is now announced for appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall, which is to begin on Oct. 13 and 14. One of several signs that this coming 42d season of the orchestra is to be one of the largest of them all is seen in the great demand for seats by subscription, which even exceeds that of last year. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts, all seats were re-engaged early last spring. For the 24 Saturday evening concerts, a very few are to be had.

Pierre Monteux is entering upon his fourth season as the conductor.

The singers to be heard are Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer, famous stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frieda Hempel, recently of the same organization.

The pianists will be Alfred Cortot, named as the greatest pianist France has produced; Benno Moiseiwitsch, the splendid Russian artist; Olga Samaroff, Arthur Schnabel and John Powell, the American composer and pianist.

There will be three other composers of note who are also virtuosos — Alfredo Casella, the young revolutionary Italian; Georges Enesco, composer of the Roumanian Rhapsody, and Marcel Dupre, the young French artist, known and praised alike as a composer and as an organist. Besides Enesco, there will be two violinists at these concerts, Albert Spalding, the American virtuoso, and Toscha Seidel.

TRAV-SEPT-9

[4]

REDUCTION RATIO
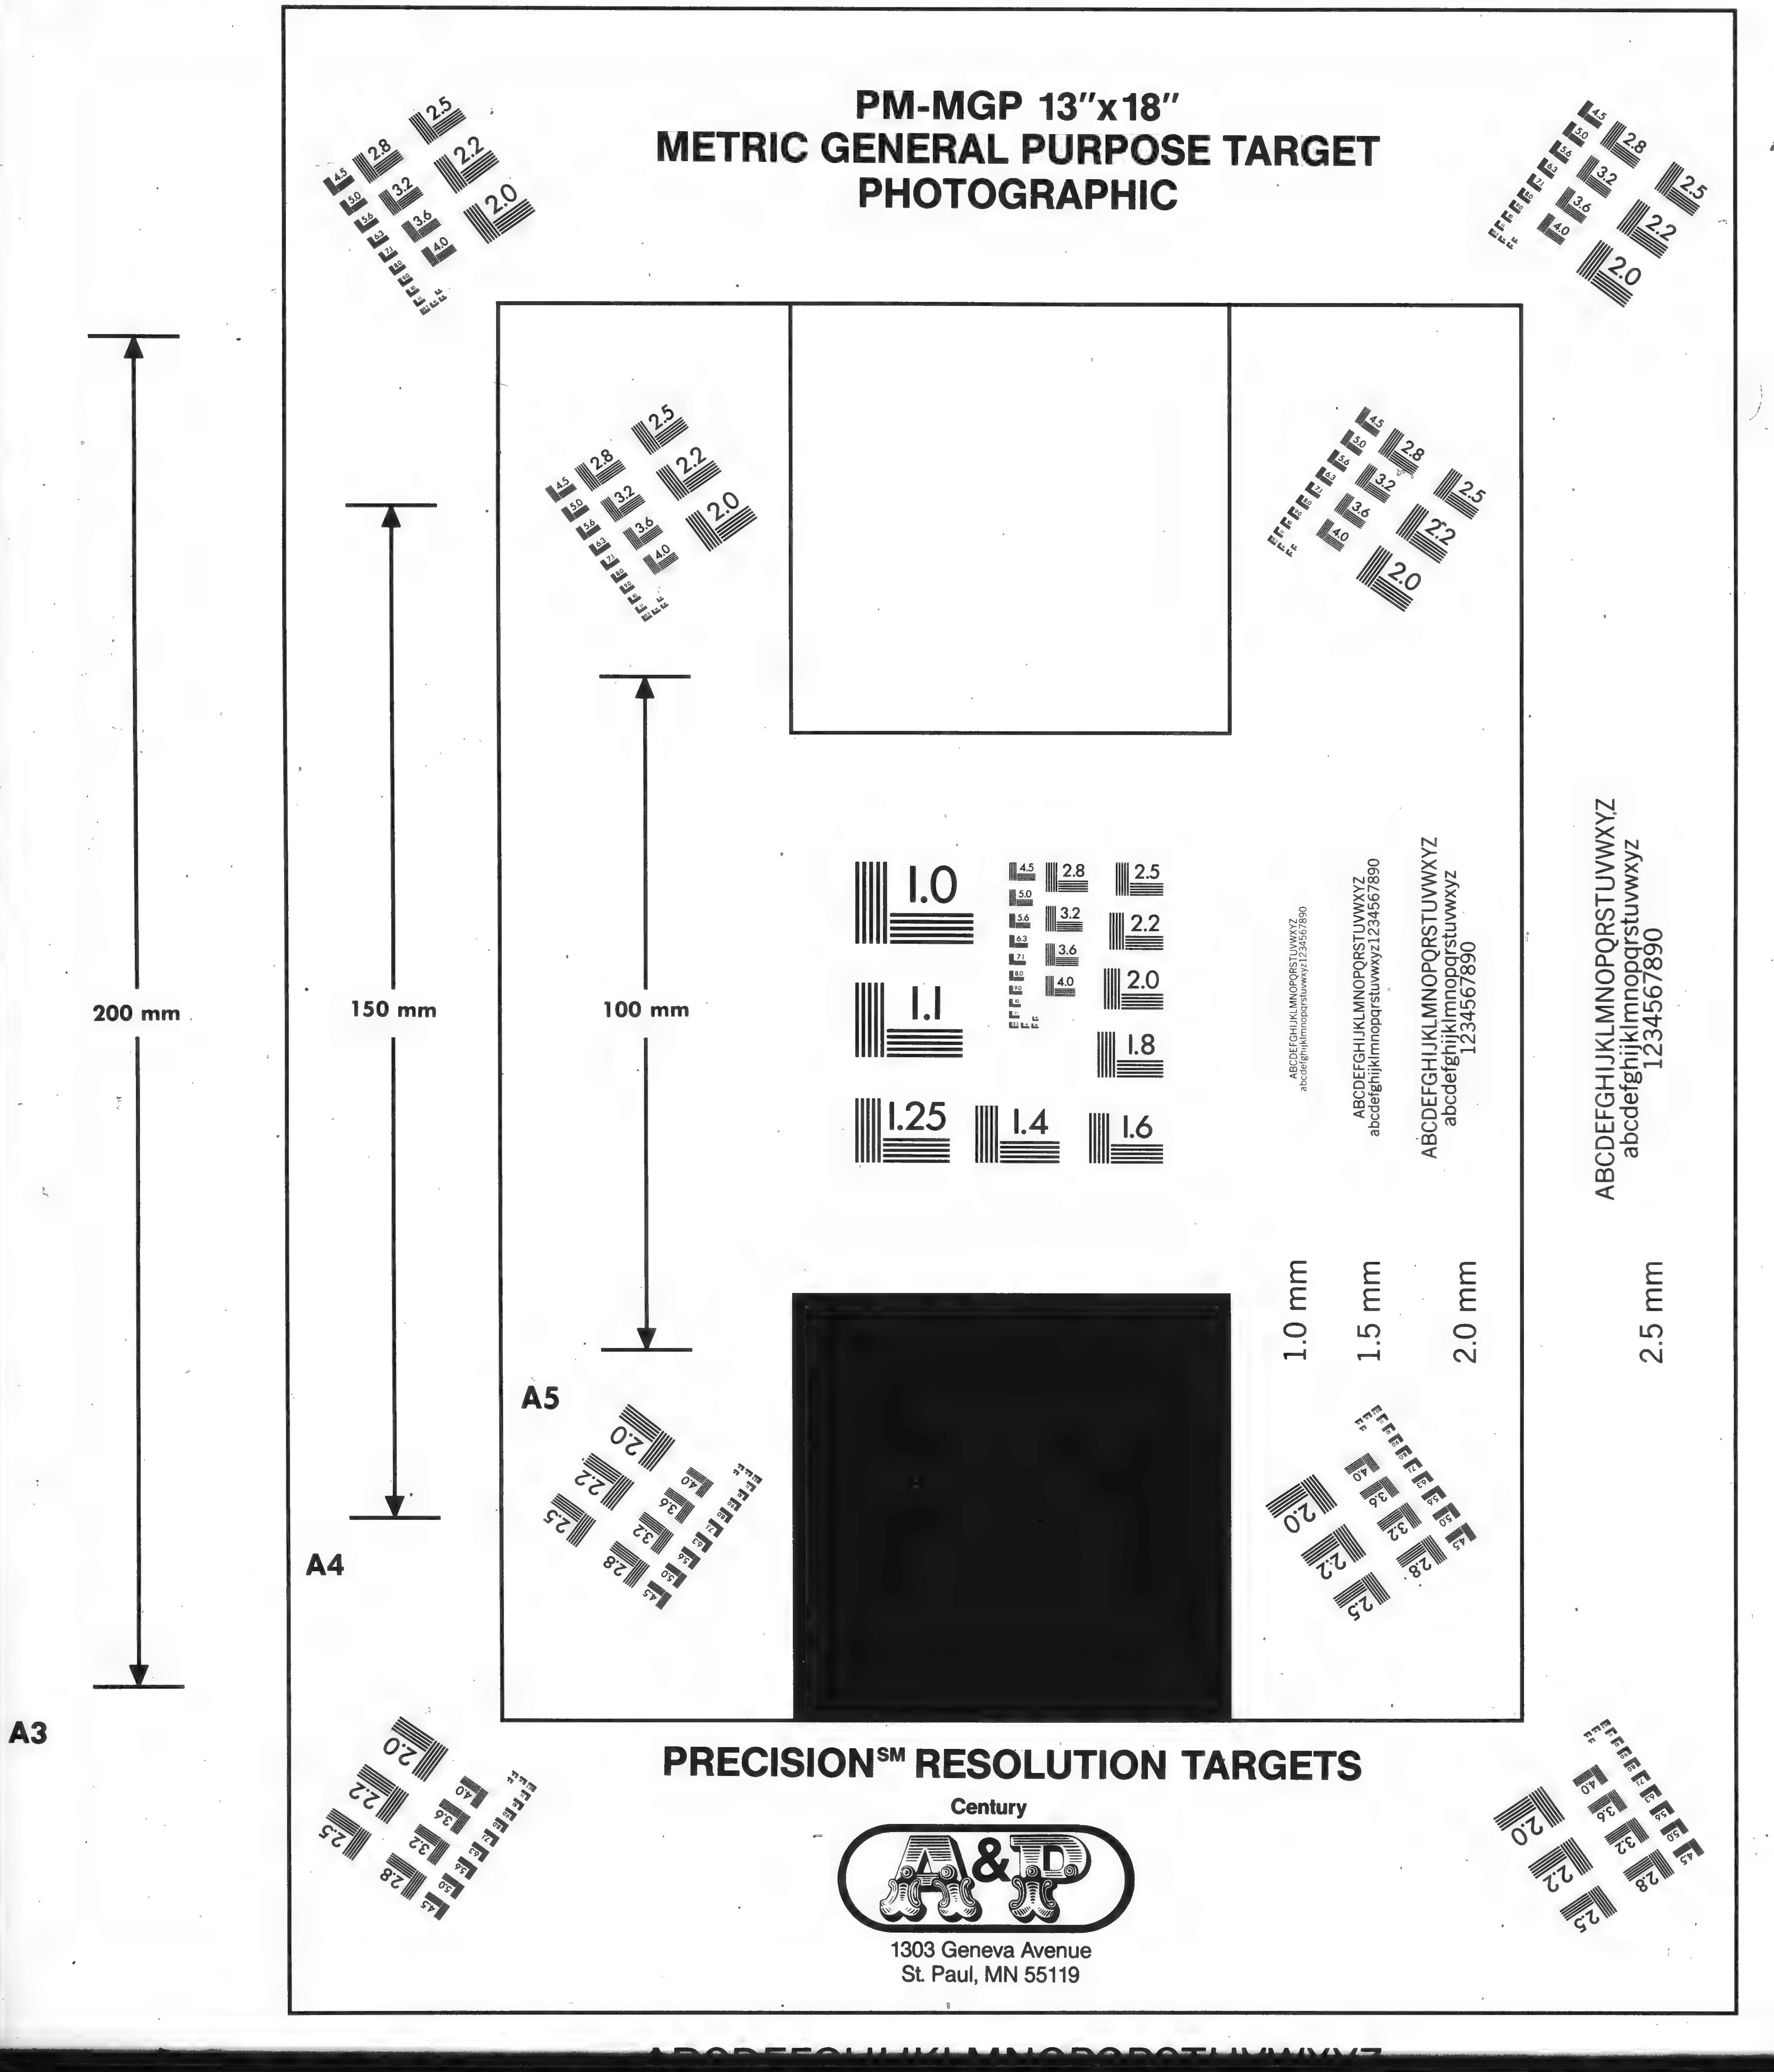
12x

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

From AUG 6 1922
HERALD
Boston, Mass.

MONTEUX PROMISES MUSIC LOVERS PLENTY

Conductor of Symphony Orchestra Brings Back Many Surprises from European Studios—Sund Best There Is in New Music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian—Sund Pays Early Call at Northport Home of Musician and Is Entertained by M

By JOE TOYE

Boston is to have plenty of novelty during the next Symphony season.

"But only as incidental to the classics," Conductor Pierre Monteux told a Sunday Herald reporter a few days ago when the reporter called on the orchestra leader at Mr. Monteux's home at Northport, Me.

Mr. Monteux returned recently from a trip to London and Paris, where he visited the studios of a number of composers, some of whose work he is to present at Symphony concerts during the coming season.

"Just who are they and what is the nature of their work?" the reporter asked.

Mr. Monteux smiled.

"That," he parried, "is a question I would like to answer, but I do not dare. Many of the composers with whom I talked are still at work on their compositions. Until I hear the final result I cannot say definitely that I am to present any one of them."

Boston to Hear Best of New Music

"But there must be some definite statement you can make regarding your plans for next season," the reporter persisted.

"O, yes," brightly, "I can say that I heard much excellent music of the newer school. I can say that Boston will hear the best there is of the new music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian. And," he added, "German. There will be plenty of novelty, but (and please emphasize this) the new music will come second. The classic first, always first."

Musicians are expected to be temperamental.

Two weary newspaper persons, a reporter and a photographer, trudged stolidly up a rocky road leading from the wharf at Northport to the summer home of Pierre Monteux—a delightful big white house, well-kept, located on a hilltop overlooking the bluest water this side of the Mediterranean.

By their watches it was half past eight—in the morning. They didn't know that Northport uses Eastern standard time. Hence it must be concluded that the time in the Monteux household was 7:30—still in the morning.

And musicians are expected to be temperamental.

A French servant came to the door.

Having pleasantly bon joured the reporter and photographer, she announced, with regret, the monsieur was asleep, that he was accustomed to breakfasting at 9 o'clock and now it was only 7:30. Would the gentlemen wait or would they return later. There was no place to go in Northport so the gentlemen decided they would wait there on the veranda while the maestro snored symphonically.

At that moment a lovable little girl with black curly hair appeared in the doorway.

"I shall tell my daddy you will wait," she announced.

And upstairs she scampered to tell daddy. She was back quickly.

"Won't you wait, please?" she invited.

DENISE BORN HOSTESS

Then she disappeared, returning a minute later, tugging at a big piazza chair.

"For you," she said to one of the visitors.

Soon she appeared with another chair, which was taken from her, for it was too big a chair for even a big little girl to carry.

"What is your name, dear?"

"Denise," she answered, "and I have a baby brother," she added proudly.

"Will you write your name and your brother's name in this book? And will you write down your ages, too?"

"Yes, sir."

So Denise took the notebook and pencil, leaned against the piazza rail, put one bare foot against one bare knee and placing the book on the other knee wrote:

Denise Monteux, age 9.
Claude Monteux, aged 1½.

"Come," she commanded, "I'll show you Claude. He is on the veranda."

She ran to the front lawn, looked upward, and cooed at the baby, which we couldn't see.

"Come!" commanded Curly-Locks.

But the two newspaper persons, realizing how absurd they would look staring up at a house a quarter of eight in the morning, stayed put. The baby could be heard, crowing gloriously at Denise.

Now, Curly-Locks is a born hostess. Failing to attract our notice to her prize exhibit, Claude, she disappeared into the house and returned with a ferocious lion about a foot long. I know he was ferocious because—well, you will see why.

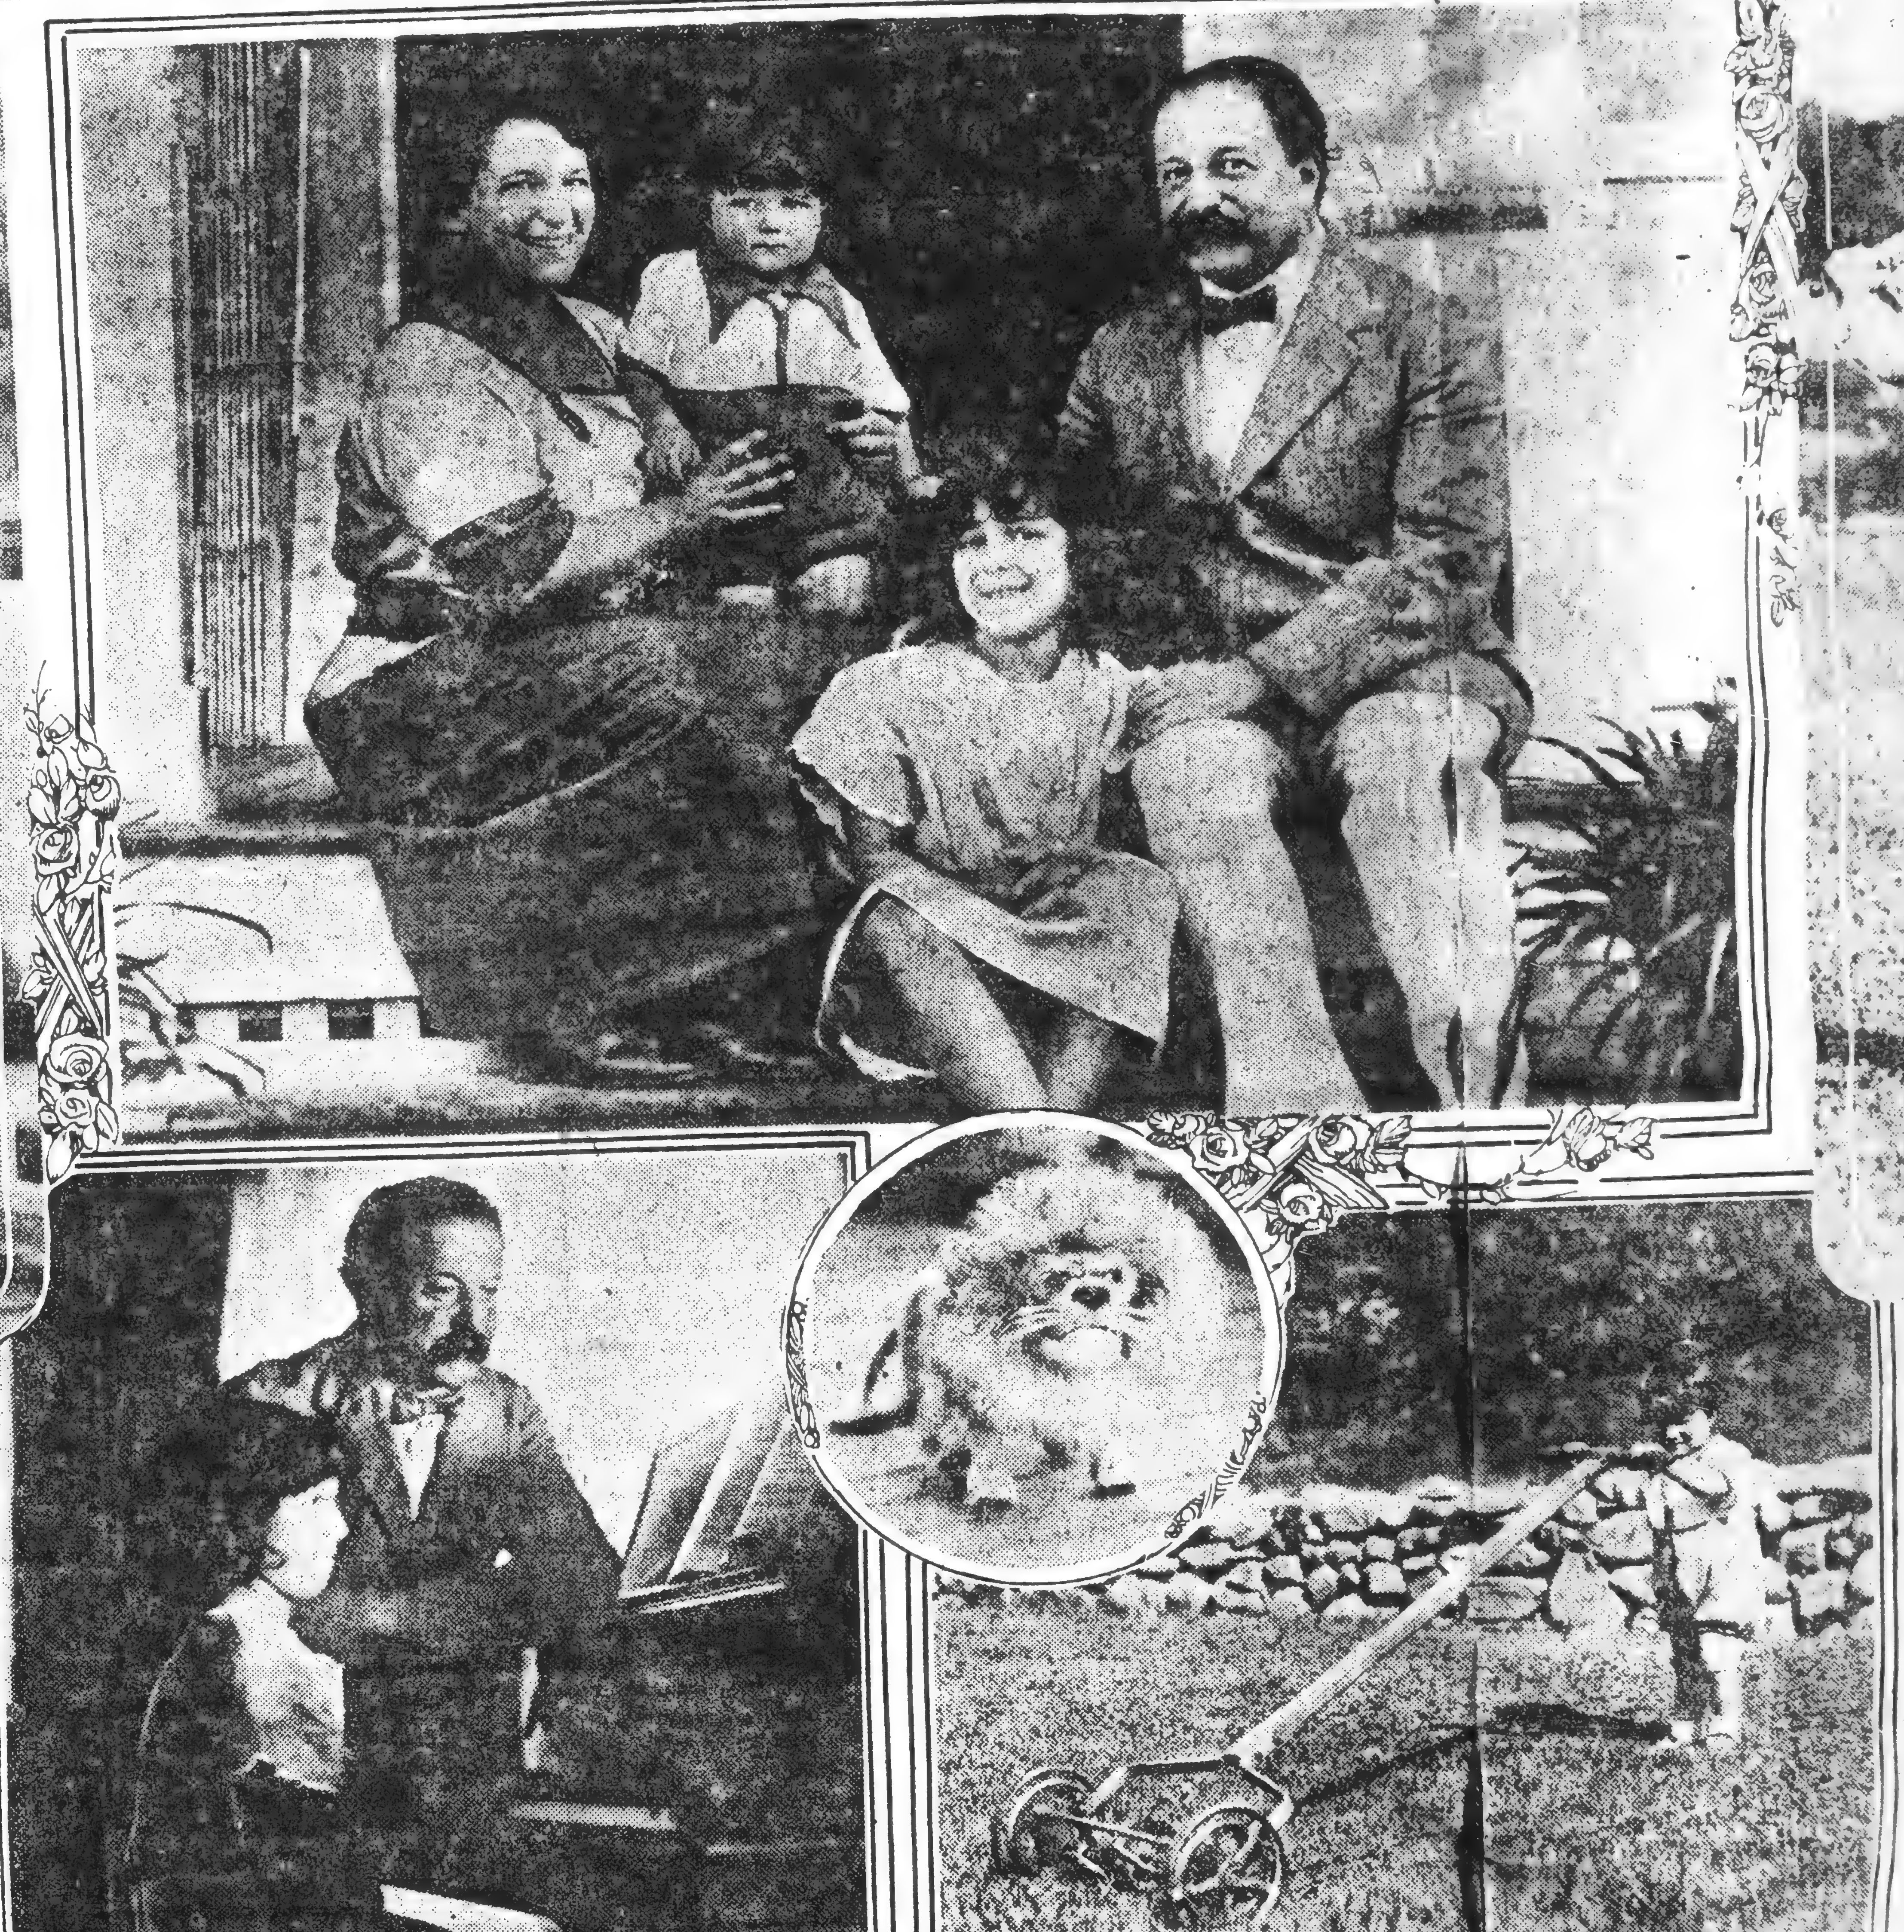
Denise inserted a clock key in the lion's right hip, aft. She wound diligently and then set the wild beast on the piazza floor, facing us, about four feet away.

The lion's head started to swing from side to side, his eyes glinting in the morning light.

Fine," we applauded.

Denise's face assumed an express

"You ain't seen nawthin' y



(All Pictures by Jimmie Jones, Staff Photographer)

PERE PIERRE AND MME. MONTEUX, TOGETHER WITH DENISE AND CLAUDE—NOT TO FORGET THE FEROCIOUS LION

Soloists With Boston Symphony

FRANCES ALDA, ONE OF THE SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD THIS SEASON WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A splendid list of soloists is now announced for appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall, which is to begin on Oct. 13 and 14. One of several signs that this coming 42d season of the orchestra is to be one of the largest of them all is seen in the great demand for seats by subscription, which even exceeds that of last year. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts, all seats were re-engaged early last spring. For the 24 Saturday evening concerts, a very few are to be had.

Pierre Monteux is entering upon his fourth season as the conductor.

The singers to be heard are Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer, famous stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frieda Hempel, recently of the same organization.

The pianists will be Alfred Cortot, named as the greatest pianist France has produced; Benno Moiseiwitsch, the splendid Russian artist; Olga Samaroff, Arthur Schnabel and John Powell, the American composer and pianist.

There will be three other composers of note who are also virtuosos—Alfredo Casella, the young revolutionary Italian; Georges Enesco, composer of the Roumanian Rhapsody, and Marcel Dupre, the young French artist, known and praised alike as a composer and as an organist. Besides Enesco, there will be two violinists at these concerts, Albert Spalding, the American virtuoso, and Toscha Seidel.

TRAV-SEPT-9

OMISES MUSIC LOVERS PLENTY OF NOVELTY

rchestra Brings Back Many Surprises from European Studios—Says Boston Will Hear the v Music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian—Sunday Herald Reporter Call at Northport Home of Musician and Is Entertained by Mlle. Denise

(All Pictures by Jimmie Jones, Staff Photographer)

PERE PIERRE AND MME. MONTEUX, TOGETHER WITH DENISE AND CLAUDE—NOT TO FORGET THE FEROCIOUS LION

she in-ss rning a g piazza of the her chair, r it was little girl nd I have proudly.

and your
And will
?"

k and pena rail, put bare knee ther knee

"I'll show randa."
looked up-
, which we y-Locks. persons, would look quarter of l put. The wing glori-rn hostess.

lice to her prize exhibit, Claude, she disappeared into the house and returned with a ferocious lion about a foot long. I know he was ferocious because—well, you will see why.

Denise inserted a clock key in the lion's right hip, aft. She wound diligently and then set the wild beast on the piazza floor, facing us, about four feet away.

The lion's head started to swing from side to side, his eyes glinting in the morning light.

"Fine," we applauded.

Denise's face assumed an expression of "You ain't seen nawthin' yet," but she remained silent, content, apparently, to allow the lion to conduct the performance. It did.

The head continued to sway. Then, suddenly, the lion rose on his hind legs and leaped, right at us. He landed on all four paws. His head continued to sway and he leaped again. Then his insides needed re-winding.

A moment later a guest of the house appeared, a very good looking young girl—a Miss Marshall of Brookline—and we talked of golf and dancing and tennis and other sub-deb interests and, as Chaucer so pertinently remarked, a good time was had by all.

At this point Mr. Monteux appeared, far ahead of schedule.

Was he incensed because we had roused him from sleep at an early hour? Did he leap in the air, click his heels together and tear out large handfuls of hair? Did he, to make it swift and snappy, set the dog on Jimmie Jones and me?

Answer, by the chorus:
He did not!

TALKED OF PLANS

For I would have you know that Pierre Monteux is a charming gentleman. Better than that, he is a delightful humam being. He apologized to us for keeping us waiting. And did we have our breakfast? No, I'm wrong. What he said was:

"You'll have breakfast with me."

But we had breakfasted on the boat, so Mr. Monteux postponed his breakfast that we might talk, take our photographs and silently steal away, like the well-known Arab. The only difference between the Arab and us was that the Arab stole away on a camel and we bounced away in a Ford.

So we talked music and Mr. Monteux told me the things outlined in the opening paragraphs of this narrative.

"Is there any one man whose new work you know you will have next season?" I asked.

"Well, yes," he told me. "There is Maurice Avel; I talked with him in Paris."

"What is your opinion of this new Russian school of music?" I asked.

"I like it," he enthused.

"What is back of it all?" was my next question. "Is it some sort of manifestation of a national state of mind?"

"Not at all," he corected me. "It is not national at all. It is not local to Russia. You will find it in England, France, Italy, Germany—here in America."

MUSICIAN'S SHARE LOSES

"Then it is international?"

"International, yes," he agreed. "But it is more than that. It is epochal; it is here."

"Will it flourish?"

"Who can tell?" He shrugged his shoulders and smiled.

"By the way," he went on, "I found that almost everything is being published in London. Everybody is sending his work there; even from Italy."

"Did you find Europe supporting music and musicians?" I asked.

"Yes, indeed!" he answered.

"Opera?"

"Yes, the Opera Comique is run at a profit, and, you see, too, opera in France has a government subsidy. Here the expense is guaranteed by individuals."

"Is the Paris Symphony subsidized?"

"No, there the players share in the profits and share in the losses. If there is no profit, they get no money. So, sometimes, to live, they must have outside work."

"Here," he continued, "our musicians are paid regardless of profit or loss."

"Has that an effect on music?"

BOSTON KNOWS MUSIC

"A very great effect," emphatically. "For instance, the Paris Symphony cannot give its audience anything but the tried music except on rare occasions. They cannot afford to spend a lot of time in rehearsal. The result is Paris does not hear many a great work that comes to Boston and is presented to the public.

"With us," he explained, "it is different. I can have many rehearsals. Our musicians are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are on the regular payroll. If tomorrow morning I wish a rehearsal I say 'Rehearsal tomorrow morning,' and we have it. And so we here in America hear the best of all music."

"Do we here in America really know music, understand its message, or is it just a pose with us?" I asked. "Do we go to concerts because it is the thing that is being done?"

"Americans," said Mr. Monteux, with sincerity, and particularly Bostonians, understand music, they have had it so long. It is not a pose. You cannot give them poor music. They demand the best and recognize it and support it."

At which juncture a shrill whoop of glee shattered the atmosphere.

Claude Monteux, age 1½, appeared on the scene, an adorable youngster. Behind him, smiling a welcome, was Mme. Monteux.

Good nature and hospitality run in the family. All the nice things I have writen about Mr. Monteux and Denise apply to Mme. Monteux.

But Claude just completely "busted up" the interview.

Ten minutes later Jimmie Jones and I, unlike the Arab, folded our legs in the back of a flivver and noisily bumped away.

FRANCES ALDA, ONE OF THE SOLOISTS TO BE HEARD THIS SEASON WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A splendid list of soloists is now announced for appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall, which is to begin on Oct. 13 and 14. One of several signs that this coming 42d season of the orchestra is to be one of the largest of them all is seen in the great demand for seats by subscription, which even exceeds that of last year. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts, all seats were re-engaged early last spring. For the 24 Saturday evening concerts, a very few are to be had.

Pierre Monteux is entering upon his fourth season as the conductor.

The singers to be heard are Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer, famous stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frieda Hempel, recently of the same organization.

The pianists will be Alfred Cortot, named as the greatest pianist France has produced; Benno Moiseiwitsch, the splendid Russian artist; Olga Samaroff, Arthur Schnabel and John Powell, the American composer and pianist.

There will be three other composers of note who are also virtuosos — Alfredo Casella, the young revolutionary Italian; Georges Enesco, composer of the Roumanian Rhapsody, and Marcel Dupre, the young French artist, known and praised alike as a composer and as an organist. Besides Enesco, there will be two violinists at these concerts, Albert Spalding, the American virtuoso, and Toscha Seidel.

TRAV-SEPT. 9

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 13 1922

IERRE MONTEUX, back from a flying trip to Paris and London, was with his family in a cottage Northport, Me., when found last ek by a Boston Herald reporter seeks news of his plans for the Boston mphony. The guest was received by -year-old Denise Monteux, who wrote in the reporter's notebook her name age, with those of her brother, aude, aged 1½. Soon her father apred. Mr. Monteux said that while oad he visited the studios of a numf composers whose works he hoped present in America.

"Just who are they and what is the ature of their work?" the reporter ed. Mr. Monteux smiled.

"That," he parried, "is a question I would like to answer, but I do not care. Many of the composers with whom I talked are still at work on their compositions. Until I hear the final result I cannot say definitely that I to present any one of them.

"I can say that I heard much excellent music of the newer school. I can say that Boston will hear the best there is of the new music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian—and (he added) German. There will be plenty of novelty, but (and please emphasize this) the new music will come second, the classic first."

"Is there any one man whose new work you know you will have next season?" he was asked.

"Well, yes," the conductor replied. "There is Maurice Ravel; I talked with him in Paris."

"What is your opinion of this new Russian school of music? Is it some sort of manifestation of a national state of mind?"

"Not at all," he corrected. "It is not national at all. It is not local to Russia. You will find it in England, France, Italy, Germany—here in America. International, yes. But it is more than that. It is epochal; it is here."

"Will it flourish?"

"Who can tell?" He shrugged his shoulders and smiled.

"By the way," he went on, "I found almost everything is being published in London. Everybody is sending work there; even from Italy."

"Did you find Europe supporting music and musicians?"

"Yes, indeed!" he answered.

"Opera?"

"Yes, the Opera Comique is run at profit, and you see, too, opera in ance has a Government subsidy. Here expense is guaranteed by individuals."

"Is the Paris Symphony subsidized?"

"No; there the players share in the profits and share in the losses. If there no profit, they get no money. So, sometimes, to live they must have outde work. Here our musicians are paid regardless of profit or loss."

"Has that an effect on music?"

"A very great effect"—emphatically. "For instance, the Paris Symphony cannot give its audience anything but the tried music except on rare occasions. They cannot afford to spend a lot of time in rehearsal. The result is Paris does not hear many a great work that comes to Boston and is presented to the public."

"With us," he explained, "it is different. I can have many rehearsals. Our musicians are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are on the regular payroll. If tomorrow morning I wish a rehearsal I say 'Rehearsal tomorrow morning,' and we have it. And so we here in America hear the best of all music."

"Do we here in America really know music, understand its message, or is it just a pose with us?" the caller asked. "Do we go to concerts because it is the thing that is being done?"

"Americans," said Mr. Monteux, with sincerity, "and particularly Bostonians, understand music, they have had it so long. It is not a pose. You cannot give them poor music. They demand the best and recognize it and support it."

At which juncture a shrill whoop of glee shattered the atmosphere.

Claude Monteux, age 1½, appeared on the scene, an adorable youngster. Behind him, smiling a welcome, was Mme. Monteux. All the nice things the reporter had written about Mr. Monteux and Denise he proceeded to apply to Mme. Monteux. But Claude just completely "busted up" the interview.

Ten minutes later the interviewer and his chauffeur, Jimmie Jones, unlike the folded their legs in the back of a and noisily bumped away.

ROM AUG 25 1922
VENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

PRIVATE FORTUNES SPENT ON ORCHESTRAS

Leila Chevalier, in August Arts and Decoration

It was about 1810 when Gottlieb Braupner, an oboe player, encouraged by a Russian Consul, Alexi Eustaphilve, organized an orchestra in Boston composed of ten or twelve individuals. It was known as "The Philharmonic Society," and devoted itself to such compositions as the new obsolete symphonies of Gyrowitz, with an occasional effort at Haydn. The organization lasted presumably about twelve years, and is believed to be the first in this country devoted primarily to symphonic works. The Euterpean Society, however, which gave a concert and ball once a year in New York, was founded earlier, in 1799. It had little prestige, despite its thirty years' existence, with infrequent appearances at Lowell's Hotel on Broadway. In 1880 the Boston Academic Orchestra was founded, and in 1842 the Philharmonic Society of New York, which has remained as one of the foremost organizations. Its beginning is traced to Uriah C. Hill, an obscure violinist, who had studied with Louis Spohr. The orchestra had fifty-three pieces, augmented at times to sixty. The New York Symphony was organized by Dr. Leopold Damrosch in 1878, the Boston Symphony by Major Henry Lee Higginson in 1881 and the Chicago Orchestra in 1890.

The fortunes of these famous orchestras have been musically glorious larly as the change of seasons, and of recent years the deficits of American orchestras have averaged $75,000 a season. Edward W. Bok, of Philadelphia, is said to have given $250,000 to the Stokowski organization during a period of four years.

The New York Symphony deficit has lately been met by Harry Harkness Flagler, who makes a yearly contribution not in excess of $100,000. A like sum is also placed at the disposal of the Los Angeles Philharmonic by W. A. Clark, Jr. The endowment of the Philharmonic Society of New York being inadequate a guarantee fund is necessary to meet the invariable loss each season. The Boston Symphony, upon the death of Major Higginson, who had sustained it for many years, found itself penniless. Thanks to public spirit and universal pride in this organization, voluntary subscriptions were made to a group of trustees, thus enabling the management to meet its expenses.

N. Y.
HERALD

AUG 27 1922

Kneisel Hall at Blue Hill, Me., is Opened for Music

Students to Have Advantage of School in Ideal Settings of Down East Coast.

Special Dispatch to THE NEW YORK HERALD.

BLUE HILL, Me., Aug. 26.—The formal opening of Kneisel Hall at Blue Hill Me., was a notable occasion. Kneisel Hall is the gift of a music lover, who, to the great regret of all, was unable to be present at its opening. The dimensions of the building are 82x44 feet. The music room, occupying 62 feet of the length and all the width, has a seating capacity of about 300. There is a library, a study, kitchenette and bath. A spacious veranda commands a wonderful view of the Blue Hill Harbor, Blue Hill Mountain and the valley with its lovely village.

Within one sees beyond the array of music stands and the grand piano, a stone chimney, with its big fireplace, now fragrant with pine boughs. Over it, on the mantel, are portrait photographs of Horatio Parker, Frank Damrosch and Mr. Krehbiel. Upon the walls of the hall are hung a most interesting array of pictures. Rare old Italian prints alternate with scenes from Vienna, that mecca of musical art. There are two portraits of Beethoven, one realistic, the other idealized; also autographed likenesses of Tschaikowsky, Brahms and others. Not least in interest is a picture of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Nikisch with Mr. Kneisel as concertmaster, and about him the "old guard," all of whom have since made great names for themselves. The program for the dedication follows:

Boston Symphony Soloists

The forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be opened Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and Saturday evening, Oct. 14, with Pierre Monteux as conductor for the fourth season. The personnel is practically unchanged. Among the soloists announced are two noted composers who have not previously visited Boston. They are Alfredo Casella, who appears among the pianists, and Georges Enesco, violinist, who will make his first visit to the United States this year. The other soloists will be Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda and Margarete Matzenauer, singers; Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff, John Powell and Arthur Schnabel, pianists; Albert Spalding and Toscha Seidel, violinists, and Marcel Dupré, organist.

MONTR - SEPT-9.

ORCHESTRA SOLOISTS NAMED

A splendid list of soloists is now announced for appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the coming regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall which is to begin on Octoger 13 and 14. One of the several signs that this coming forty-second season of the orchestra is to be one of the largest of them all is seen in the great demand for seats by subscription.

Pierre Monteux is entering upon his fourth season as the conductor of the orchestra.

The singers to be heard are Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer, the famous stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frieda Hempel, recently of the same organization.

The pianists will be Alfred Cortot, named as the greatest pianist France has produced; Benno Moiseiwitsch, named as the most prominent woman pianist living; Arthur Schnabel, as yet unknown to Boston but of the highest standing in New York and Europe and John Powell, the American composer and pianist.

There will be three other composers of note, who are also virtuosso Alfred Casella, the young revolutionary Italian, particularly known by his Rhapsody "Italia" and his "Couvent sur l'eau," played at these concerts. Georges Enesco, composer of the Roumanian Rhapsody, is renowned throughout Europe as a master of the violin. Marcel Dupre, the young French artist, is known and praised alike as a composer and as an organist. Besides Enesco there will be two violinists at these concerts—Albert Spalding, the American virtuoso, and Toscha Seidel, of rival fame.

AMER-SEPT-9.

SOLOISTS OF COMING SYMPHONY SEASON

Singers and Players of High Repute Will Be Heard With the Boston Orchestra

An unusually fine list of soloists is announced for the 42d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Oct 13 and 14.

This season will be, by many signs, one of the most popular the orchestra has ever had. One of these signs is the great demand for seats by subscription for the regular series. All the seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts were engaged last Spring, and only a few are now to be had for the 24 Saturday evening concerts.

This will be Pierre Monteux' fourth season as conductor of the orchestra. He will make the masterpieces of the standard symphonic repertory the basis of his programs. He also promises to keep abreast with musical progress by presenting works of genius of the present day composers. It was partly in search of new scores that he spent part of last Summer in Europe.

Among the pianists announced are Alfred Cortot, Bennö Moiseiwitsch and Olga Samaroff, all of whom are soloists of past standing. Before he first came to this country in 1918, Cortot held a high European reputation, not only as pianist but as an operatic conductor. By virtue of his tours in this country through successive seasons he has easily won a reputation as a foremost pianist of France.

Moiseiwitsch, the Russian virtuoso, who likewise is ranked, both here and abroad, as one of the very finest, followed great London success with acclaim equally high in New York and other cities during the last two seasons. Mme Samaroff's coming appearance will be particularly welcomed by her many admirers who were disappointed in the postponement of her engagement last year.

Another American pianist, likewise of high standing, is John Powell. As piano virtuoso and as the composer of the "Negro Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra and other works, he has recently spread his renown into Europe.

Known as yet only by name in Boston is Arthur Schnabel. Schnabel is a Letchetitzky pupil and a virtuoso of long and high fame in Europe. He came to this country last season, when he was immediately placed among the first.

The three singers engaged for the concerts are present or recent stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company—Frances Aida, Frieda Hempel and Margaret Matzenauer. Of these, the first two have not before sung at these concerts, while the reappearance of Margaret Matzenauer will be looked forward to with lively interest.

Three composers of eminent standing, who are also virtuosos, are to be soloists in the coming series. Alfredo Casella, the daring young Ialian composer, has been famed as a pianist throughout his career, although he is as yet personally unknown to Boston. He is heralded by the enthusiasm for his Rhapsody "Italia" and his Suite "Couvent sur l'Eau," which was played and repeated by the Symphony Orchestra last season. His "Alta Notte" for pianoforte and orchestra met with a mixed reception in New York last year on account of its radical tendencies, but the beauty of the composer's execution at the piano was generally praised.

Georges Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody" is known wherever symphonic music is heard. His Orchestra Suite and Symphony in E flat, which was played at the Symphony concerts last year, are likewise admired by many. In Europe he is esteemed far and wide as a brilliant violinist. Therefore his pending first visit to America is eagerly looked forward to. Marcel Dupre, the young French composer of rising renown, both for his creative achievements and for his attainments as an organist, is likewise of highest standing both here and abroad. He will appear as organ soloist at one of the concerts.

Two violinists, besides Enesco, are to be heard, Albert Spalding and Toscha Seidel. Albert Spalding, an American artist, has been soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on two former occasions. He has in recent seasons, by concerts in Europe and America, taken a high place among the finest violinists of whatver nationality. Toscha Seidel, although familiar to concert-goers, has never appeared with the orchestra.

GLOBE SEPT-10.

Fine Array of Soloists Ready for Coming Orchestral Season

A splendid array of soloists is now announced to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season of regular symphony concerts in Symphony Hall.

The season's opening will take place on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 13 and 14. One evidence that this season will be one of the most popular in the whole history of the orchestra is seen in the demand for seats by subscription, which is even greater than that of last year. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts the seats were already engaged last spring, while for the 24 Saturday evening concerts a very few are to be had.

Pierre Monteux, continuing at the helm, is about to enter upon his fourth season as the conductor of the orchestra. The splendid personnel remains as it was last season, with no noteworthy change. The conductor will, as usual, base his programmes upon the master works of the standard symphonic repertory. He will also give a just place to the creative genius of today and tomorrow, presenting scores from various countries which he has obtained during his recent sojourn in Europe.

Soloists of Long Standing

Of the soloists engaged to appear during the coming season who are to return by virtue of their success in past appearances are Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff, and Albert Spalding. Madame Matzenauer, the famous Wagnerian contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will surely be welcomed in that she is so well remembered from the splendid concerts in which she formerly appeared here.

Before he first came to this country in 1918, Cortot held a high European reputation, not only as pianist, but as an operatic conductor and as an organizer and conductor of splendid choral concerts. To our public he is known only as the master of his chosen instrument. By virtue of his tours in this country through successive seasons he has easily won a reputation as the foremost pianist of France. Moiseiwitsch, the Russian virtuoso, who likewise is ranked, both here and abroad, as one of the very finest living, followed London success with acclaim equally high in New York and other cities during the last two seasons. The coming of Olga Samaroff will be good news to those who were disappointed in the postponement of her engagement last season. The brilliant Texas pianist is ranked by many as the peer of any woman pianist here or abroad.

Albert Spalding, likewise an American artist, has been soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on two former occasions. He has in recent seasons, by concerts in Europe and America, taken a high place among the finest violinists of whatever nationality.

Famous Artists New to These Concerts

It is a curious fact that Freida Hempel, the great coloratura soprano, has never before appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The events was sure to happen sooner or later. Much the same may be said of Frances Alda, the prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company. John Powell, the illustrious American pianist, has in the last two seasons considerably heightened a fame already enviable, not only by the beauty of his playing but by the evident originality and interest of his Negro Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra, and other compositions.

Another virtuoso who, although familiar to concertgoers, has never before appeared with the orchestra, is Toscha Seidel. He is numbered among the handful of Auer pupils, who have made Russia to be looked upon as the country of great violinists.

Soloists New to Boston

Two virtuosos, who are also compoers of high standing, are to appear as soloists at these concerts—Alfred Casella and Georges Enesco. Enesco is known wherever symphony concerts are given by his Roumanian Rhapsody, and is known to many by his Orchestral suite and his Symphony in E flat, which was played at these concerts last season. In Europe he is likewise famed far and wide as a master of the violin, and his imminent visit to America is keenly anticipated. Casella, the revolutionary young Italian composer, is known by his Rhapsody "Italia" and his "Convent sur Leau," which was played and repeated by the Symphony Orchestra last season. In New York last year the performance of his daring "Alta Notte" for piano and orchestra met with condemnation and praise, which resolved into unanimous enthusiasm for the brilliant executive powers of the composer. Arthur Schnabel first came to this country last year from Europe, where he is venerated in each of the larger capitals for his wondrous mastery of the piano. This Letchetitzky pupil was met in New York with immediate acclaim.

Marcel Dupre, the young French organist and composer, whose coming to Boston is so eagerly anticipated, will likewise appear as organ soloist with the orchestra. Reports of the brilliance of his creative and executive genius come to us from many quarters to ensure a remarkable performance at the pair of concerts in which he is to appear.

POST-SEPT-10

Sept-7-1922

"AMERICANS DEMAND BEST MUSIC," SAYS MONTEUX

French Conductor Promises Boston Interesting Season—Vannini's Symphony Ensemble to Tour—More Praise for John Peirce

Boston, Mass., August 30.—That Boston is to have an interesting symphony season is indicated in an interview recently given by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to Joe Toye, the well known correspondent of the Boston Sunday Herald. Mr. Monteux returned to his summer home at Northport, Me., recently from a trip to London and Paris in search of new music. The French conductor was apparently unwilling to reveal the specific novelties which he plans to introduce during the coming season. He did say, however, that he had heard much excellent music of the younger school and that Boston will hear the best there is of the new music—French, English, German, Italian, Spanish and Russian. "There will be plenty of novelty," he added, "but (and please emphasize this) the new music will come second. The classics first, always first."

The interview was then continued as follows:

"'Is there any one man whose new work you know you will have next season?' I asked.

"'Well, yes,' he told me. 'There is Maurice Ravel; I talked with him in Paris.'

"'What is your opinion of this new Russian school of music?' I asked.

"'I like it,' he enthused.

"'What is back of it all?' was my next question. 'Is it some sort of manifestation of a national state of mind?'

"'Not at all,' he corrected me. 'It is not national at all. It is not local to Russia. You will find it in England, France, Italy, Germany—here in America.'

"'Then it is international?'

"'International, yes,' he agreed. 'But it is more than that. It is epochal; it is here.'

"'Will it flourish?'

"'Who can tell?' He shrugged his shoulders and smiled.

"'By the way,' he went on, 'I found that almost everything is being published in London. Everybody is sending his work there; even from Italy.'

"'Did you find Europe supporting music and musicians?' I asked.

"'Yes, indeed!' he answered.

"'Opera?'

"'Yes, the Opera Comique is run at a profit, and, you see, too, opera in France has a government subsidy. Here the expense is guaranteed by individuals.'

"'Is the Paris Symphony subsidized?'

"'No, there the players share in the profits and share in the losses. If there is no profit, they get no money. So, sometimes, to live, they must have outside work.'

"'Here,' he continued, 'our musicians are paid regardless of profit or loss.'

"'Has that an effect on music?'

"'A very great effect,' emphatically. 'For instance, the Paris Symphony cannot give its audience anything but the tried music except on rare occasions. They cannot afford to spend a lot of time in rehearsal. The result is Paris does not hear many a great work that comes to Boston and is presented to the public.'

"'With us,' he explained, 'it is different. I can have many rehearsals. Our musicians are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are on the regular payroll. If tomorrow morning I wish a rehearsal I say, "Rehearsal tomorrow morning," and we have it. And so we here in America hear the best of all music.'

"'Do we here in America really know music, understand its message, or is it just a pose with us?' I asked. 'Do we go to concerts because it is the thing that is being done?'

"'Americans,' said Mr. Monteux, with sincerity, 'and particularly Bostonians, understand music, they have had it so long. It is not a pose. You cannot give them poor music. They demand the best and recognize it and support it.'"

J. C.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TIMES

AUG 13 1922

PIERRE MONTEUX, back from a flying trip to Paris and London, was with his family in a cottage at Northport, Me., when found last week by a Boston Herald reporter seeking news of his plans for the Boston Symphony. The guest was received by 9-year-old Denise Monteux, who wrote in the reporter's notebook her name and age, with those of her brother, Claude, aged 1½. Soon her father appeared. Mr. Monteux said that while abroad he visited the studios of a number of composers whose works he hoped to present in America.

"Just who are they and what is the nature of their work?" the reporter asked. Mr. Monteux smiled.

"That," he parried, "is a question I would like to answer, but I do not dare. Many of the composers with whom I talked are still at work on their compositions. Until I hear the final result I cannot say definitely that I am to present any one of them.

"I can say that I heard much excellent music of the newer school. I can say that Boston will hear the best there is of the new music, French, English, Italian, Spanish and Russian—and (he added) German. There will be plenty of novelty, but (and please emphasize this) the new music will come second, the classic first."

"Is there any one man whose new work you know you will have next season?" he was asked.

"Well, yes," the conductor replied. "There is Maurice Ravel; I talked with him in Paris."

"What is your opinion of this new Russian school of music? Is it some sort of manifestation of a national state of mind?"

"Not at all," he corrected. "It is not national at all. It is not local to Russia. You will find it in England, France, Italy, Germany—here in America. International, yes. But it is more than that. It is epochal; it is here."

"Will it flourish?"

"Who can tell?" He shrugged his shoulders and smiled.

"By the way," he went on, "I found that almost everything is being published in London. Everybody is sending his work there; even from Italy."

"Did you find Europe supporting music and musicians?"

"Yes, indeed!" he answered.

"Opera?"

"Yes, the Opéra Comique is run at a profit, and, you see, too, opera in France has a Government subsidy. Here the expense is guaranteed by individuals."

"Is the Paris Symphony subsidized?"

"No; there the players share in the profits and share in the losses. If there is no profit, they get no money. So, sometimes, to live they must have outside work. Here our musicians are paid regardless of profit or loss."

"Has that an effect on music?"

"A very great effect"—emphatically. "For instance, the Paris Symphony cannot give its audience anything but the tried music except on rare occasions. They cannot afford to spend a lot of time in rehearsal. The result is Paris does not hear many a great work that comes to Boston and is presented to the public.

"With us," he explained, "it is different. I can have many rehearsals. Our musicians are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. They are on the regular payroll. If tomorrow morning I wish a rehearsal I say 'Rehearsal tomorrow morning,' and we have it. And so we here in America hear the best of all music."

"Do we here in America really know music, understand its message, or is it just a pose with us?" the caller asked. "Do we go to concerts because it is the thing that is being done?"

"Americans," said Mr. Monteux, with sincerity, "and particularly Bostonians, understand music, they have had it so long. It is not a pose. You cannot give them poor music. They demand the best and recognize it and support it."

At which juncture a shrill whoop of glee shattered the atmosphere.

Claude Monteux, age 1½, appeared on the scene, an adorable youngster. Behind him, smiling a welcome, was Mme. Monteux. All the nice things the reporter had written about Mr. Monteux and Denise he proceeded to apply to Mme. Monteux. But Claude just completely "busted up" the interview.

Ten minutes later the interviewer and his chauffeur, Jimmie Jones, unlike the Arab, folded their legs in the back of a flivver and noisily bumped away.

ROM AUG 25
VENING SUN,
Baltimore, Md.

PRIVATE FORTUNES SPENT ON ORCHESTRAS

Leila Chevalier, in August Arts and Decoration

It was about 1810 when Gottlieb Braupner, an oboe player, encouraged by a Russian Consul, Alexi Eustaphilve, organized an orchestra in Boston composed of ten or twelve individuals. It was known as "The Philharmonic Society," and devoted itself to such compositions as the now obsolete symphonies of Gyrowitz, with an occasional effort at Haydn. The organization lasted presumably about twelve years, and is believed to be the first in this country devoted primarily to symphonic works. The Euterpean Society, however, which gave a concert and ball once a year in New York, was founded earlier, in 1799. It had little prestige, despite its thirty years' existence, with infrequent appearances at Lowell's Hotel on Broadway. In 1880 the Boston Academic Orchestra was founded, and in 1842 the Philharmonic Society of New York, which has remained as one of the foremost organizations. Its beginning is traced to Uriah C. Hill, an obscure violinist, who had studied with Louis Spohr. The orchestra had fifty-three pieces, augmented at times to sixty. The New York Symphony was organized by Dr. Leopold Damrosch in 1878, the Boston Symphony by Major Henry Lee Higginson in 1881 and the Chicago Orchestra in 1890.

The fortunes of these famous orchestras have been musically glorious and financially dismal. The annual loss larly as the change of seasons, and of recent years the deficits of American orchestras have averaged $75,000 a season. Edward W. Bok, of Philadelphia, is said to have given $250,000 to the Stokowski organization during a period of four years.

The New York Symphony deficit has lately been met by Harry Harkness Flagler, who makes a yearly contribution not in excess of $100,000. A like sum is also placed at the disposal of the Los Angeles Philharmonic by W. A. Clark, Jr. The endowment of the Philharmonic Society of New York being inadequate a guarantee fund is necessary to meet the invariable loss each season. The Boston Symphony, upon the death of Major Higginson, who had sustained it for many years, found itself penniless. Thanks to public spirit and universal pride in this organization, voluntary subscriptions were made to a group of trustees, thus enabling the management to meet its expenses.

N. Y.
HERALD

Aug 7 '22

Kneisel Hall at Blue Hill, Me., is Opened for Music

Students to Have Advantage of School in Ideal Settings of Down East Coast.

Special Dispatch to THE NEW YORK HERALD

BLUE HILL, Me., Aug. 26.—The formal opening of Kneisel Hall at Blue Hill Me., was a notable occasion. Kneisel Hall is the gift of a music lover, who, to the great regret of all, was unable to be present at its opening. The dimensions of the building are 82x44 feet. The music room, occupying 62 feet of the length and all the width, has a seating capacity of about 300. There is a library, a study, kitchenette and bath. A spacious veranda commands a wonderful view of the Blue Hill Harbor, Blue Hill Mountain and the valley with its lovely village.

Within one sees beyond the array of music stands and the grand piano, a stone chimney, with its big fireplace, now fragrant with pine boughs. Over it, on the mantel, are portrait photographs of Horatio Parker, Frank Damrosch and Mr. Krehbiel. Upon the walls of the hall are hung a most interesting array of pictures. Rare old Italian prints alternate with scenes from Vienna, that mecca of musical art. There are two portraits of Beethoven, one realistic, the other idealized; also autographed likenesses of Tschaikowsky, Brahms and others. Not least in interest is a picture of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Nikisch, with Mr. Kneisel as concertmaster, and about him the "old guard," all of whom have since made great names for themselves. The program for the dedication follows:

Boston Symphony Soloists

The forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be opened Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and Saturday evening, Oct. 14, with Pierre Monteux as conductor for the fourth season. The personnel is practically unchanged. Among the soloists announced are two noted composers who have not previously visited Boston. They are Alfredo Casella, who appears among the pianists, and Georges Enesco, violinist, who will make his first visit to the United States this year. The other soloists will be Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda and Margarete Matzenauer, singers; Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff, John Powell and Arthur Schnabel, pianists; Albert Spalding and Toscha Seidel, violinists, and Marcel Dupré, organist.

MONTR - SEPT-9.

ORCHESTRA SOLOISTS NAMED

A splendid list of soloists is now announced for appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the coming regular season of concerts at Symphony Hall which is to begin on Octoger 13 and 14. One of the several signs that this coming forty-second season of the orchestra is to be one of the largest of them all is seen in the great demand for seats by subscription.

Pierre Monteux is entering upon his fourth season as the conductor of the orchestra.

The singers to be heard are Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer, the famous stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Frieda Hempel, recently of the same organization.

The pianists will be Alfred Cortot, named as the greatest pianist France has produced; Benno Moiseiwitsch, splendid Russian artist, Samaroff, named as the most brilliant woman pianist living; Arthur Schnabel, as yet unknown to Boston but of the highest standing in New York and Europe and John Powell, the American composer and pianist.

There will be three other composers of note, who are also virtuosso Alfred Casella, the young revolutionary Italian, particularly known by his Rhapsody "Italia" and his "Couvent sur l' eau," played at these concerts. Georges Enesco, composer of the Roumanian Rhapsody, is renowned throughout Europe as a master of the violin. Marcel Dupre, the young French artist, is known and praised alike as a composer and as an organist. Besides Enesco there will be two violinists at these concerts—Albert Spalding, the American virtuoso, and Toscha Seidel, of rival fame.

AMER-SEPT-9.

SOLOISTS OF COMING SYMPHONY SEASON

Singers and Players of High Repute Will Be Heard With the Boston Orchestra

An unusually fine list of soloists is announced for the 42d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will begin in Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday, Oct 13 and 14.

This season will be, by many signs, one of the most popular the orchestra has ever had. One of these signs is the great demand for seats by subscription for the regular series. All the seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts were engaged last Spring, and only a few are now to be had for the 24 Saturday evening concerts.

This will be Pierre Monteux' fourth season as conductor of the orchestra. He will make the masterpieces of the standard symphonic repertory the basis of his programs. He also promises to keep abreast with musical progress by presenting works of genius of the present day composers. It was partly in search of new scores that he spent part of last Summer in Europe.

Among the pianists announced are Alfred Cortot, Bennó Moiseiwitsch and Olga Samaroff, all of whom are soloists of past standing. Before he first came to this country in 1918, Cortot held a high European reputation, not only as pianist but as an operatic conductor. By virtue of his tours in this country through successive seasons he has easily won a reputation as a foremost pianist of France.

Moiseiwitsch, the Russian virtuoso, who likewise is ranked, both here and abroad, as one of the very finest, followed great London success with acclaim equally high in New York and other cities during the last two seasons. Mme Samaroff's coming appearance will be particularly welcomed by her many admirers who were disappointed in the postponement of her engagement last year.

Another American pianist, likewise of high standing, is John Powell. As piano virtuoso and as the composer of the "Negro Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra and other works, he has spread his renown into Europe.

Known as yet only by name in Boston is Arthur Schnabel. Schnabel is a Letchetitzky pupil and a virtuoso of long and high fame in Europe. He came to this country last season, when he was immediately placed among the first.

The three singers engaged for the concerts are present or recent stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company—Frances Aida, Frieda Hempel and Margaret Matzenauer. Of these, the first two have not before sung at these concerts, while the reappearance of Margaret Matzenauer will be looked forward to with lively interest.

Three composers of eminent standing, who are also virtuosos, are to be soloists in the coming series. Alfredo Casella, the daring young Ialian composer, has been famed as a pianist throughout his career, although he is as yet personally unknown to Boston. He is heralded by the enthusiasm for his Rhapsody "Italia" and his Suite "Couvent sur l'Eau," which was played and repeated by the Symphony Orchestra last season. His "Alta Notte" for pianoforte and orchestra met with a mixed reception in New York last year on account of its radical tendencies, but the beauty of the composer's execution at the piano was generally praised.

Georges Enesco's "Rumanian Rhapsody" is known wherever symphonic music is heard. His Orchestra Suite and Symphony in E flat, which was played at the Symphony concerts last year, are likewise admired by many. In Europe he is esteemed far and wide as a brilliant violinist. Therefore his pending first visit to America is eagerly looked forward to. Marcel Dupre, the young French composer of rising renown, both for his creative achievements and for his attainments as an organist, is likewise of highest standing both here and abroad. He will appear as organ soloist at one of the concerts.

Two violinists, besides Enesco, are to be heard, Albert Spalding and Toscha Seidel. Albert Spalding, an American artist, has been soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on two former occasions. He has in recent seasons, by concerts in Europe and America, taken a high place among the finest violinists of whatver nationality. Toscha Seidel, although familiar to concert-goers, has never appeared with the orchestra.

GLOBE SEPT-10.

Fine Array of Soloists Ready for Coming Orchestral Season

A splendid array of soloists is now announced to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season of regular symphony concerts in Symphony Hall.

The season's opening will take place on Friday and Saturday, Oct. 13 and 14. One evidence that this season will be one of the most popular in the whole history of the orchestra is seen in the demand for seats by subscription, which is even greater than that of last year. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts the seats were already engaged last spring, while for the 24 Saturday evening concerts a very few are to be had.

Pierre Monteux, continuing at the helm, is about to enter upon his fourth season as the conductor of the orchestra. The splendid personnel remains as it was last season, with no noteworthy change. The conductor will, as usual, base his programmes upon the master works of the standard symphonic repertory. He will also give a just place to the creative genius of today and tomorrow, presenting scores from various countries which he has obtained during his recent sojourn in Europe.

Soloists of Long Standing

Of the soloists engaged to appear during the coming season who are to return by virtue of their success in past appearances are Margaret Matzenauer, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff, and Albert Spalding. Madame Matzenauer, the famous Wagnerian contralto of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will surely be welcomed in that she is so well remembered from the splendid concerts in which she formerly appeared here.

Before he first came to this country in 1918, Cortot held a high European reputation, not only as pianist, but as an operatic conductor and as an organizer and conductor of splendid choral concerts. To our public he is known only as the master of his chosen instrument. By virtue of his tours in this country through successive seasons he has easily won a reputation as the foremost pianist of France. Moiseiwitsch, the Russian virtuoso, who likewise is ranked, both here and abroad, as one of the very finest living, followed London success with acclaim equally high in New York and other cities during the last two seasons. The coming of Olga Samaroff will be good news to those who were disappointed in the postponement of her engagement last season. The brilliant Texas pianist is ranked by many as the peer of any woman pianist here or abroad.

Albert Spalding, likewise an American artist, has been soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra on two former occasions. He has in recent seasons, by concerts in Europe and America, taken a high place among the finest violinists of whatever nationality.

Famous Artists New to These Concerts

It is a curious fact that Freida Hempel, the great coloratura soprano, has never before appeared as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The events was sure to happen sooner or later. Much the same may be said of Frances Alda, the prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company. John Powell, the illustrious American pianist, has in the last two seasons considerably heightened a fame already enviable, not only by the beauty of his playing but by the evident originality and interest of his Negro Rhapsody for Piano and Orchestra, and other compositions.

Another virtuoso who, although familiar to concertgoers, has never before appeared with the orchestra, is Toscha Seidel. He is numbered among the handful of Auer pupils, who have made Russia to be looked upon as the country of great violinists.

Soloists New to Boston

Two virtuosos, who are also compoers of high standing, are to appear as soloists at these concerts—Alfred Casella and Georges Enesco. Enesco is known wherever symphony concerts are given by his Roumanian Rhapsody, and is known to many by his Orchestral Suite and his Symphony in E flat, which was played at these concerts last season. In Europe he is likewise famed far and wide as a master of the violin, and his imminent visit to America is keenly anticipated. Casella, the revolutionary young Italian composer, is known by his Rhapsody "Italia" and his "Convent sur 5eau," which was played and repeated by the Symphony Orchestra last season. In New York last year the performance of his daring "Alta Notte" for piano and orchestra, met with condemnation and praise, which resolved into unanimous enthusiasm for the brilliant executive powers of the composer. Arthur Schnabel first came to this country last year from Europe, where he is venerated in each of the larger capitals for his wondrous mastery of the piano. This Letchetitzky pupil was met in New York with immediate acclaim.

Marcel Dupre, the young French organist and composer, whose coming to Boston is so eagerly anticipated, will likewise appear as organ soloist with the orchestra. Reports of the brilliance of his creative and executive genius come to us from many quarters to ensure a remarkable performance at the pair of concerts in which he is to appear.

POST - SEPT-10

Jl 7- 1922

"AMERICANS DEMAND BEST MUSIC," SAYS MONTEUX

French Conductor Promises Boston Interesting Season—Vannini's Symphony Ensemble to Tour—More Praise for John Peirce

Boston, Mass., August 30.—That Boston is to have an interesting symphony season is indicated in an interview recently given by Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to Joe Toye, the well known correspondent of the Boston Sunday Herald. Mr. Monteux returned to his summer home at Northport, Me., recently from a trip to London and Paris in search of new music. The French conductor was apparently unwilling to reveal the specific novelties which he plans to introduce during the coming season. He did say, however, that he had heard much excellent music of the younger school and that Boston will hear the best there is of the new music—French, English, German, Italian, Spanish and Russian. "There will be plenty of novelty," he added, "but, (and please emphasize this) the new music will come second. The classics first, always first."

The interview was then continued as follows:

"'Is there any one man whose new work you know you will have next season?' I asked.

"'Well, yes,' he told me. 'There is Maurice Ravel; I talked with him in Paris.'

"'What is your opinion of this new Russian school of music?' I asked.

"'I like it,' he enthused.

"'What is back of it all?' was my next question. 'Is it some sort of manifestation of a national state of mind?'

"'Not at all,' he corrected me. 'It is not national at all. It is not local to Russia. You will find it in England, France, Italy, Germany—here in America.'

"'Then it is international?'

"'International, yes,' he agreed. 'But it is more than that. It is epochal; it is here.'

"'Will it flourish?'

"'Who can tell?' He shrugged his shoulders and smiled.

"'By the way,' he went on, 'I found that almost everything is being published in London. Everybody is sending his work there; even from Italy.'

"'Did you find Europe supporting music and musicians?' I asked.

"'Yes, indeed!' he answered.

"'Opera?'

"'Yes, the Opera Comique is run at a profit, and, you see, too, opera in France has a government subsidy. Here the expense is guaranteed by individuals.'

"'Is the Paris Symphony subsidized?'

"'No, there the players share in the profits and share in the losses. If there is no profit, they get no money. So, sometimes, to live, they must have outside work.'

"'Here,' he continued, our musicians are paid regardless of profit or loss.'

"'Has that an effect music?"

"'A very great effec emphatically. 'For instance, the Paris Symphony cannot ive its audience anything but the tried music except on occasions. They cannot afford to spend a lot of time rehearsal. The result is Paris does not hear many a gr ork that comes Boston and is presented to the public "'With us,' he expla ed, 'it is different. I can have many rehearsals. Our sicians are members of the Boston Symphony Orche They are on the regular payroll. If tomorrow mor g I wish a rehearsal I say, "Rehearsal tomorrow m g," and we have it. And so we here in America hear the best of all music.'

"'Do we here in ca really know music, understand its message, or is it just pose with us?' I asked. 'Do we go to concerts because s the thing that is being done?'

"'Americans,' said M Monteux, with sincerity, 'and particularly Bostonians erstand music, they have had it so long. It is not se. You cannot give them poor music. They dema best and recognize it and support it.'"

J. C.

[5]

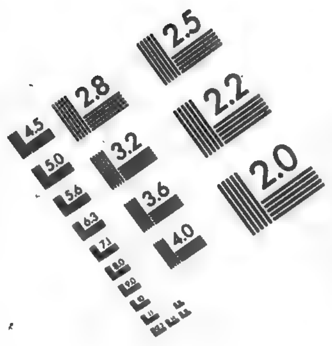
REDUCTION RATIO

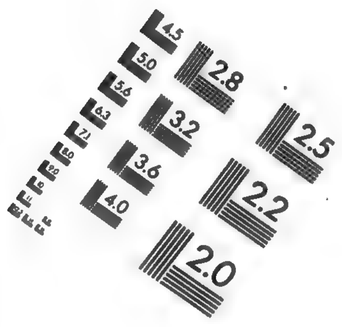
14x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

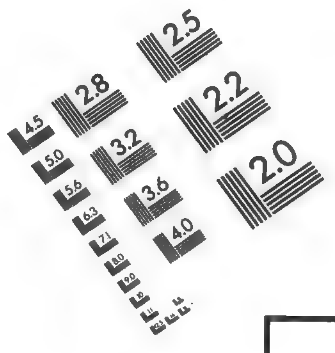
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

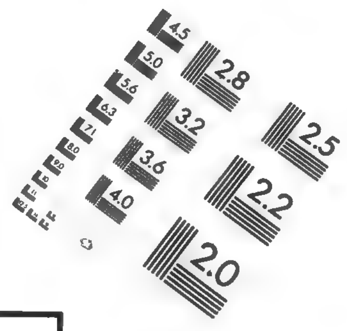
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

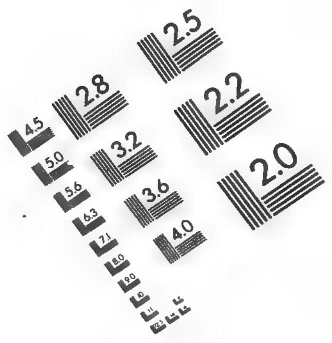


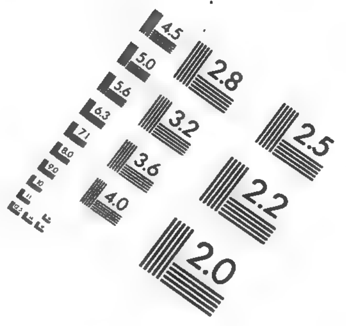


PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC





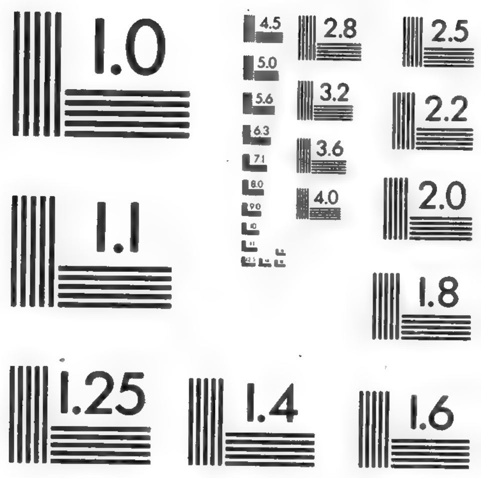




200 mm

150 mm

100 mm



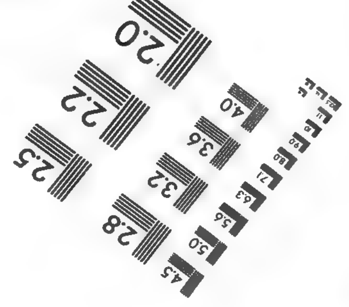
1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

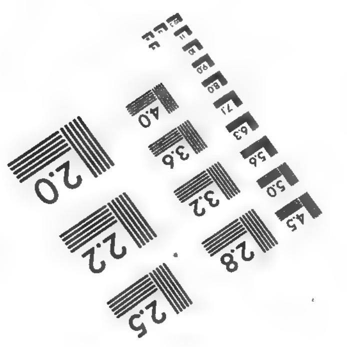
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

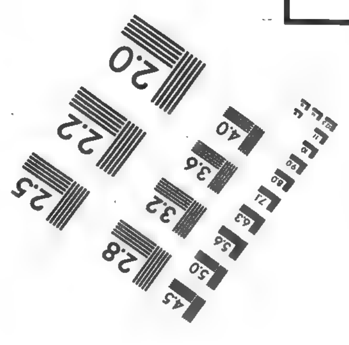
A5

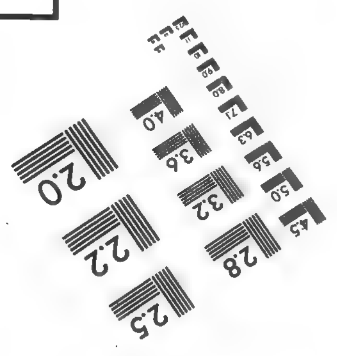




A4

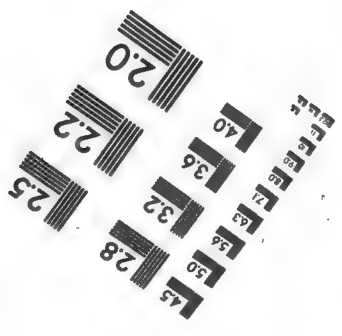
A3

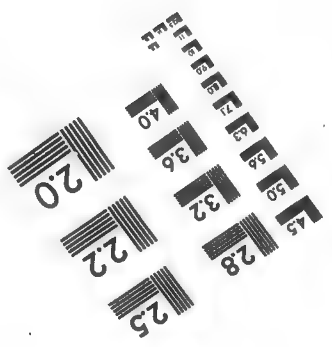




PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119





4.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

3.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

3.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

FIRST PICTURES. OF SEASON'S ARTISTS COMING TO BOSTON

The Reason Olga Samaroff Left the Concert Stage

Madame Samaroff, in private life the wife of Conductor Stokowski of the Philadelphia Orchestra, will make good her promise to give a piano concert in Boston this winter, which Baby Stokowski prevented her from keeping last year.

A Brilliant Concert Season Promised

Many favorite artists will appear in Boston this season, beginning Oct. 13. Besides these, two new and "radical" composers will [illegible] their works—Alfred Casella, pianist, and George Enesco, violinist.

At right, latest portrait of Madame Matzenauer and her daughter Adrienne.

At Left—Frances Alda

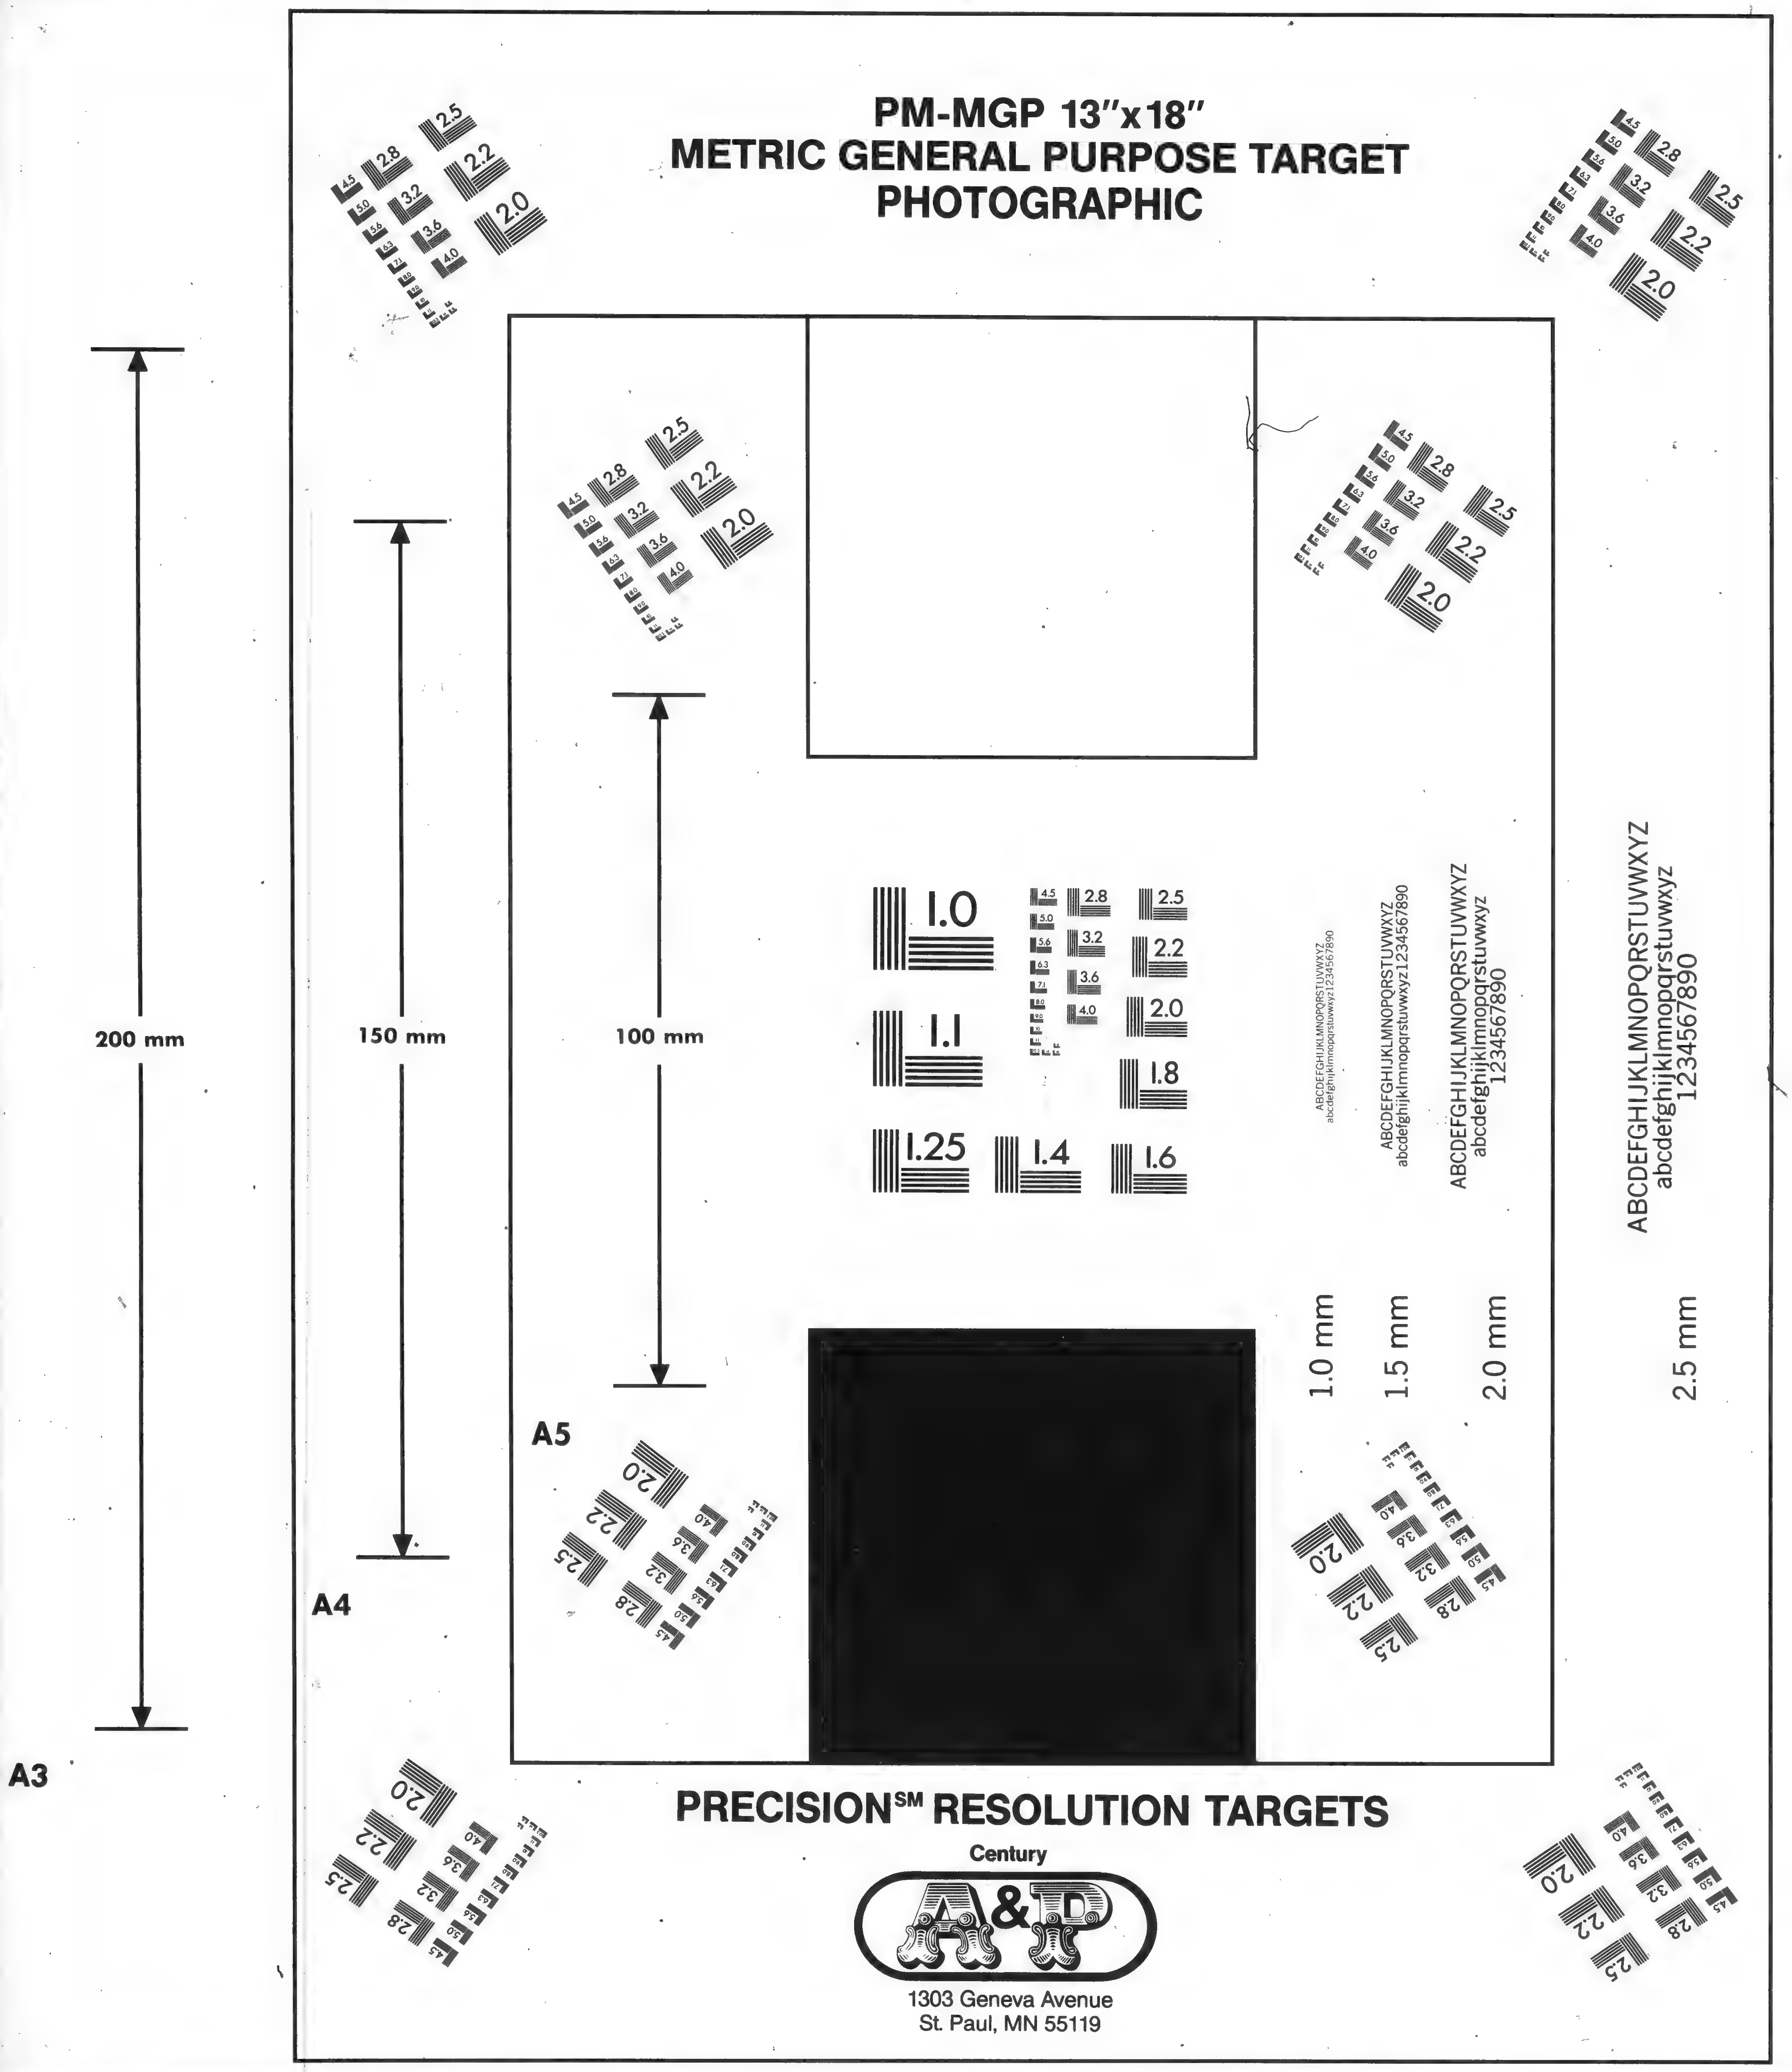
Frances Alda will probably open the artists' concert season in Boston. She is a prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera company, of which her husband, Giulio Gatti-Casazza, is general manager.

Below—Frieda Hempel

After the style of a Gainsborough portrait is this newest photo of Frieda Hempel with Pitti, the most travelled dog in the world. Hempel's concert in Boston will mark the first time she has sung with the Symphony Orchestra.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MUSIC

OLGA SAMAROFF
© HUBEY-REMBRANDT STUDIOS PHIL.

TOSCHA SEIDEL
© MISHKIN, N.Y.

FRANCES ALDA
© MISHKIN N.Y.

FRIEDA HEMPEL

[illegible] performance next winter of "Horace Vainqueur" ("Horatius Triumphant")—Honegger's piece accounted the ablest most significant music yet written by any of the Parisian "Six." It runs for orchestra with incidental chorus and the "Horace" of the French title and Corneille's tragedy is also the Horatius (at the bridge) of old Roman legend and Macaulay's ballad. Mr. Monteux must surely have seen the score, heard of the high fortune of the piece in Paris and London and taken thought of it for Boston.

TRANS-SEPT-14.

MONTEUX PREPARES FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

Opening Concerts Set for Oct. 13 and 14—Rehearsal to Begin

Pierre Monteux, who is soon to enter upon his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Sympony Orchestra, has arrived in Boston from his summer home in Northport, Me., to prepare for the 42d season of Boston Symphony concerts. He will assemble the orchestra to start rehearsing about Oct. 1 for the opening concerts on the 13th and 14th of the same month.

Of the new music to be presented from time to time, works of the four composers who are to be soloists with the orchestra will probably comprise an important part. These are the pianists Alfredo Casella [illegible] John Powell, the organist Marcel [illegible]e, and the violinist Georges [illegible] the Roumanian musician, who [illegible]tly to visit this country for th[illegible]ime.

The other vi[illegible] will be Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding and Richard Burgin. The singers will be Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda, and Margaret Matzenauer. Besides the two piano soloists already mentioned, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff and Arthur Schnabel will appear, while the single 'cello soloist will be Jean Bedetti. A few subscription seats for the Saturday evening series are still left.

HERALD-SEPT 17.

ADVT. SEPT-10.

Famous Artists as Symphony Soloists

A SPLENDID array of soloists is announced to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season, opening Friday, October 13.

This season will be one of the most popular in the history of the orchestra. The Friday afternoon concert seats were all engaged last Spring, while for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts only a small number are to be had.

Pierre Monteux is about to enter his fourth season as conductor. The splendid personnel remains as it was last season.

Among the soloists engaged to appear this season are Margaret Matzenauer, Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff, Albert Spalding, Toscha Seidel, Georges Enesco and Alfredo Casella.

Mme. Hempel, the great coloratura soprano, has never before appeared as Symphony soloist, although she has often sung here. It is the same with Mme. Alda, prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Toscha Seidel, the noted violinist.

Two virtuosos who are also composers of high standing are Casella and Enesco. Enesco is known wherever symphony concerts are given by his "Roumanian Rhapsody." In Europe he is likewise famed far and wide as a master of the violin. Casella, the revolutionary young Italian composer, is a brilliant pianist. His symphonic works are much admired here.

Arthur Schnabel, a famous European pianist, and Arthur Powell, American pianist and composer, are also in the list of soloists.

Marcel Dupre, young French organist and composer, will likewise appear with the orchestra.

ADVT-SEPT 16.

Visiting Conductors and a Policy of the Boston Orchestra—A Requiem Without Religion—Skriabin Versus Beethoven—Words for Music

THE list of "assisting artists" fo the impending Symphony Concerts printed in this place last Saturday was promising to read. Since all deserving visitors from Europe and all their compeers resident in America could not be included—unless there were, say, three "soloists" to each pair of concerts—selection there must be. In the nature of men and things, such choices will not always agree; but, in anticipation at least, there are no grave sins of omission or of commission to lay upon the managerial head. Yet in one respect, this Bostonian list differs from many another schedule announced by symphony orchestras up and down America. Among their "assisting artists" they number at least one visiting conductor—say Mr. Walter from Munich and Vienna, who is to make something like an American tour; or Mr. Coates coming again from London to Mr. Damrosch's band; or Glazunov, the Russian composer, if his present whereabouts can be discovered in time to ship him hither; or Mr. Mengelberg, diligent and dramatizing Dutchman. Visiting conductors may be rather a fashion of the hour in American concert-halls; yet for long they have been applauded there. None the less, through forty years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its regular concerts, has entertained but one—Mr. d'Indy, composer as well. Twice he came; twice he went; and last December left behind none too vivid impression.

By this token, the policy of the Symphony Concerts, under the new régime as with the old, is to bid no visiting conductor—or next to none—to the sacred podium of Symphony Hall. Eminent conductors may traverse other cities in America; may there stir all and sundry; but Boston may not hear them, unless they bring an orchestra with them—Crœsus-like adventure between railroad-fares and hotel-bills in these half-deflated days. Yet it is hard to discover any valid reason for such a policy of exclusion. Strauss overlooked last season; Mengelberg, brought to Boston last March by another management; the tested Mr. Coates, the approaching Walter possess the abilities, enjoy the prestige, proper to the Symphony Concerts. They are keen to try their hands upon an orchestra of such quality as ours and make no secret of their keenness. Whatever the music in which they are heard, they interest hearers. In particular pieces they have been known to impress audiences deeply. Their incidental presence gives a fillip to a long series of concerts before a single public. They are the hors d'oeuvre; the resident conductor the regular menu; the wise take and judge either in the appropriate quality. An open-minded, catholic-spirited conductor welcomes such visitors. Mr. Monteux, for example, sought Strauss; applauded d'Indy; is not the man to deny hospitality to other worthy comers. If they cost too much for the treasury of the Boston orchestra to bear well, then is there valid reason for this neglect of them. Otherwise no one but dull Mr. Precedent and complacent Madame Custom seems to croak objection.

H. T. P.

ACCORDING to his managers, Mr. Casella, the visiting Italian pianist an composer, has already chosen th pieces that he will play next winter wit the Symphony Orchestras of Boston an Chicago. One is a "Spanish Rhapsody" b Albeñiz, hitherto unheard in America; an other is his own "Heroic Elegy," whil the third is an arrangement of his sportiv trifle for two pianos, "Puppazzi." Here i Boston, more than once, Messrs. Maier an Pattison have played "Puppazzi" in th original form.

TRANS-SEPT-11.

Monteux Prepares Symphony Season

Pierre Monteux, who is soon to enter upon his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will arrive in Boston tomorrow morning from his summer residence in Northport, Me., in order to prepare for the 42d season of Boston Symphony Concerts. Mr. Monteux will assemble the orchestra (which retains the splendid personnel of last season) to start rehearsing about the first of October for the opening pair of concerts on the 13th and 14th of the same month.

Of the new music to be presented from time to time, works of the four composers who are to be soloists with the orchestra will probably comprise an important part. These are the pianists Alfredo Casella and John Powell, the organist; Marcel Dupre, and the violinist, Georges Enesco.

The other violinist will be Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding and Richard Burgin. The singers will be Freida Hempel, Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer. Besides the two piano soloists already mentioned, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff and Arthur Schnabel will appear, while the single 'cello soloist will be Jean Bedetti.

TRAV-SEPT-16

Soloists for Symphony Season Include Some Noted Musicians

OLGA SAMAROFF

FRANCES ALDA

FRIEDA HEMPEL

A splendid list of soloists is now announced for appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming regular season of concerts at Symphony hall, which is to begin on Oct. 13 and 14. One of several signs that this coming 42d season of the orchestra is to be one of the largest of them all, is seen in the great demand for seats by subscription, which even exceeds that of last year, a record season in itself. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts all seats were re-engaged early last spring. For the 24 Saturday evening concerts a very few are to be had.

Pierre Monteux is entering upon his fourth season as the conductor of he orchestra, with virtually the ame illustrious personnel to do his idding.

The singers to be heard are Fran es Alda and Margaret Matzenauer, he famous stars of the Metropolitan pera company, and Frieda Hem el, recently of the same organiza on.

The pianists will be Alfred Cortot, named as the greatest pianist France has produced; Benno Moiseiwitsch, the splendid Russian artist, who has taken his place at the very forefront of fame; Olga Samaroff,, named as the most brilliant woman pianist living; Arthur Schnabel, as yet unknown to Boston, but of the highest standing in New York and in Europe, and John Powell, the American composer and pianist, who in each capacity has repeated his long existent native reputation by a tour of Europe.

There will be three other composers of note, who are also virtuosos: Alfred Casella, the young revolutionary Italian, particularly known by his rhapsody "Italia" and his "Couvent Sur L'eau," played at these concerts. Casella has been highly admired as a pianist wherever he has been heard. Georges Enesco, composer of the Roumanian rhapsody, is renowned throughout Europe as a master of the violin, and his advent to this country is keenly looked forward to. Marcel Dupre, the young French artist, is known and praised alike as a composcer and as an organist. Besides Enesco there will be two violinists at these concerts—Albert Spaulding, the American virtuoso, and Toscha Seidel, of rival fame, who belongs to the distinguished handful of Auer pupils who have made the Russian famous as the country which produces wonder violinists.

TELE-SEPT-13

PREPARING FOR THE SYMPHONY SEASON

Pierre Monteux, who is soon to enter upon his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrives in Boston tomorrow from his summer residence in Northport, Maine, in order to prepare for the 42d season of Boston Symphony concerts. Mr. Monteux will assemble the orchestra (which retains the splendid personnel of last season) to start rehearsing about the first of October for the opening pair of concerts on the 13th and 14th of the same month.

Of the new music to be presented from time to time, works of the four composers who are to be soloists with the orchestra will probably comprise an important part. These are the pianists Alfredo Casella and John Powell, the organist, Marcel Dupre, and the violinist Georges Enesco, which distinguished Roumanian musician is shortly to visit this country for the first time.

The other violinists will be Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding and Richard Burgin. The singers will be Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer. Besides the two piano soloists already mentioned, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff and Arthur Schnabel will appear, while the single 'cello soloist will be Jean Bedetti. A few subscription seats for the Saturday evening series are still left.

TELE-SEPT-16.

MONTEUX HERE FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston today to prepare for the forty-second season of the orchestra. The opening concerts will take place October 13 and October 14.

Of the new music to be presented works of four composers who are to be soloists will comprise an important part. These are the pianists, Alfredo Casella and John Powell; the organist, Marcel Dupre, and the violinist, Georges Enesco. Other violinists will be Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding and Richard Burgin. The singers will be Mmse. Hempel, Alda and Matzenauer. Cortot, Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff and Arthur Schnabel will complete the pianists. The only 'cello soloist will be Jean Bedetti. A few subscription seats for Saturday night are still left.

ADVTSR-SEPT17.

[7]

SYMPHONY CONCERT STARS

MUSIC

OLGA SAMAROFF © HUSEY-REMBRANDT STUDIOS PHIL.

TOSCHA SEIDEL © MISHKIN, N.Y.

FRIEDA HEMPEL

FRANCES ALDA © MISHKIN N.Y.

ADVT. SEPT 10.

[illegible], as conductor of the Sym-[illegible]chestra of St. Louis, is first in [illegible]erican field with announcement of a [illegible]erformance next winter of "Horace Vainqueur" ("Horatius Triumphant")—Honegger's piece accounted the ablest most significant music yet written by any of the Parisian "Six." It runs for orchestra with incidental chorus and the "Horace" of the French title and Corneille's tragedy is also the Horatius (at the bridge) of old Roman legend and Macaulay's ballad. Mr. Monteux must surely have seen the score, heard of the high fortune of the piece in Paris and London and taken thought of it for Boston.

TRANS-SEPT-14.

MONTEUX PREPARES FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

Opening Concerts Set for Oct. 13 and 14—Rehearsal to Begin

Pierre Monteux, who is soon to enter upon his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Sympony Orchestra, has arrived in Boston from his summer home in Northport, Me., to prepare for the 42d season of Boston Symphony concerts. He will assemble the orchestra to start rehearsing about Oct. 1 for the opening concerts on the 13th and 14th of the same month.

Of the new music to be presented from time to time, works of the four composers who are to be soloists with the orchestra will probably comprise an important part. These are the pianists Alfredo Casella [illegible] John Powell, the organist Marcel [illegible]e, and the violinist Georges [illegible] the Roumanian musician, who [illegible]tly to visit this country for th[illegible]ime.

The other vi[illegible] will be Toscha Seidel, Albert [illegible]alding and Richard Burgin. The singers will be Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer. Besides the two piano soloists already mentioned, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiselwitsch, Olga Samaroff and Arthur Schnabel will appear, while the single 'cello soloist will be Jean Bedetti. A few subscription seats for the Saturday evening series are still left.

HERALD-SEPT 17.

Famous Artists as Symphony Soloists

A SPLENDID array of soloists is announced to appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the coming season, opening Friday, October 13.

This season will be one of the most popular in the history of the orchestra. The Friday afternoon concert seats were all engaged last Spring, while for the twenty-four Saturday evening concerts only a small number are to be had.

Pierre Monteux is about to enter his fourth season as conductor. The splendid personnel remains as it was last season.

Among the soloists engaged to appear this season are Margaret Matzenauer, Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiselwitsch, Olga Samaroff, Albert Spalding, Torcha Seidel, Georges Enesco and Alfreda Casella.

Mme. Hempel, the great coloratura soprano, has never before appeared as Symphony soloist, although she has often sung here. It is the same with Mme. Alda, prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, and Toscha Seidel, the noted violinist.

Two virtuosos who are also composers of high standing are Casella and Enesco. Enesco is known wherever symphony concerts are given by his "Roumanian Rhapsody." In Europe he is likewise famed far and wide as a master of the violin. Casella, the revolutionary young Italian composer, is a brilliant pianist. His symphonic works are much admired here.

Arthur Schnabel, a famous European pianist, and Arthur Powell, American pianist and composer, are also in the list of soloists.

Marcel Dupre, young French organist and composer, will likewise appear with the orchestra.

ADVT-SEPT 16

Visiting Conductors and a Policy of the Boston Orchestra—A Requiem Without Religion—Skriabin Versus Beethoven—Words for Music

THE list of "assisting artists" for the impending Symphony Concerts printed in this place last Saturday was promising to read. Since all deserving visitors from Europe and all their compeers resident in America could not be included—unless there were, say, three "soloists" to each pair of concerts—selection there must be. In the nature of men and things, such choices will not always agree; but, in anticipation at least, there are no grave sins of omission or of commission to lay upon the managerial head. Yet in one respect, this Bostonian list differs from many another schedule announced by symphony orchestras up and down America. Among their "assisting artists" they number at least one visiting conductor—say Mr. Walter from Munich and Vienna, who is to make something like an American tour; or Mr. Coates, coming again from London to Mr. Damrosch's band; or Glazunov, the Russian composer, if his present whereabouts can be discovered in time to ship him hither; or Mr. Mengelberg, diligent and dramatizing Dutchman. Visiting conductors may be rather a fashion of the hour in American concert-halls; yet for long they have been applauded there. None the less, through forty years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at its regular concerts, has entertained but one—Mr. d'Indy, composer as well. Twice he came; twice he went; and last December left behind none too vivid impression.

By this token, the policy of the Symphony Concerts, under the new régime as with the old, is to bid no visiting conductor—or next to none—to the sacred podium of Symphony Hall. Eminent conductors may traverse other cities in America; may there stir all and sundry; but Boston may not hear them, unless they bring an orchestra with them—Crœsus-like adventure between railroad-fares and hotel-bills in these half-deflated days. Yet it is hard to discover any valid reason for such a policy of exclusion. Strauss overlooked last season; Mengelberg, brought to Boston last March by another management; the tested Mr. Coates, the approaching Walter possess the abilities, enjoy the prestige, proper to the Symphony Concerts. They are keen to try their hands upon an orchestra of such quality as ours and make no secret of their keenness. Whatever the music in which they are heard, they interest hearers. In particular pieces they have been known to impress audiences deeply. Their incidental presence gives a fillip to a long series of concerts before a single public. They are the hors d'oeuvre; the resident conductor the regular menu; the wise take and judge either in the appropriate quality. An open-minded, catholic-spirited conductor welcomes such visitors. Mr. Monteux, for example, sought Strauss; applauded d'Indy; is not the man to deny hospitality to other worthy comers. If they cost too much for the treasury of the Boston orchestra to bear well, then is there valid reason for this neglect of them. Otherwise no one but dull Mr. Precedent and complacent Madame Custom seems to croak objection.

H. T. P.

ACCORDING to his managers, Mr. Casella, the visiting Italian pianist and composer, has already chosen the pieces that he will play next winter with the Symphony Orchestras of Boston and Chicago. One is a "Spanish Rhapsody" by Albeñiz, hitherto unheard in America; another is his own "Heroic Elegy," while the third is an arrangement of his sportive trifle for two pianos, "Puppazzi." Here in Boston, more than once, Messrs. Maier and Pattison have played "Puppazzi" in the original form.

TRANS-SEPT-11.

Monteux Prepares Symphony Season

Pierre Monteux, who is soon to enter upon his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will arrive in Boston tomorrow morning from his summer residence in Northport, Me., in order to prepare for the 42d season of Boston Symphony Concerts. Mr. Monteux will assemble the orchestra (which retains the splendid personnel of last season) to start rehearsing about the first of October for the opening pair of concerts on the 13th and 14th of the same month.

Of the new music to be presented from time to time, works of the four composers who are to be soloists with the orchestra will probably comprise an important part. These are the pianists Alfredo Casella and John Powell, the organist; Marcel Dupre, and the violinist, Georges Enesco.

The other violinist will be Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding and Richard Burgin. The singers will be Freida Hempel, Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer. Besides the two piano soloists already mentioned, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiselwitsch, Olga Samaroff and Arthur Schnabel will appear, while the single 'cello soloist will be Jean Bedetti.

TRAV-SEPT-16

Soloists for Symphony Season Include Some Noted Musicians

OLGA SAMAROFF

FRANCES ALDA

FRIEDA HEMPEL

A splendid list of soloists is now announced for appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the coming regular season of concerts at Symphony hall, which is to begin on Oct. 13 and 14. One of several signs that this coming 42d season of the orchestra is to be one of the largest of them all, is seen in the great demand for seats by subscription, which even exceeds that of last year, a record season in itself. For the 24 Friday afternoon concerts all seats were re-engaged early last spring. For the 24 Saturday evening concerts a very few are to be had.

Pierre Monteux is entering upon his fourth season as the conductor of the orchestra, with virtually the same illustrious personnel to do his bidding.

The singers to be heard are Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer, the famous stars of the Metropolitan Opera company, and Frieda Hempel, recently of the same organization.

The pianists will be Alfred Cortot, named as the greatest pianist France has produced; Benno Moiseiwitsch, the splendid Russian artist, who has taken his place at the very forefront of fame; Olga Samaroff,, named as the most brilliant woman pianist living: Arthur Schnabel, as yet unknown to Boston, but of the highest standing in New York and in Europe, and John Powell, the American composer and pianist, who in each capacity has repeated his long existent native reputation by a tour of Europe.

There will be three other composers of note, who are also virtuosos: Alfred Casella, the young revolutionary Italian, particularly known by his rhapsody "Italia" and his "Couvent Sur L'eau," played at these concerts. Casella has been highly admired as a pianist wherever he has been heard. Georges Enesco, composer of the Roumanian rhapsody, is renowned throughout Europe as a master of the violin, and his advent to this country is keenly looked forward to. Marcel Dupre, the young French artist, is known and praised alike as a composcer and as an organist. Besides Enesco there will be two violinists at these concerts—Albert Spaulding, the American virtuoso, and Toscha Seidel, of rival fame, who belongs to the distinguished handful of Auer pupils who have made the Russian famous as the country which produces wonder violinists.

TELE-SEPT 13

PREPARING FOR THE SYMPHONY SEASON

Pierre Monteux, who is soon to enter upon his fourth season as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, arrives in Boston tomorrow from his summer residence in Northport, Maine, in order to prepare for the 42d season of Boston Symphony concerts. Mr. Monteux will assemble the orchestra (which retains the splendid personnel of last season) to start rehearsing about the first of October for the opening pair of concerts on the 13th and 14th of the same month.

Of the new music to be presented from time to time, works of the four composers who are to be soloists with the orchestra will probably comprise an important part. These are the pianists Alfredo Casella and John Powell, the organist, Marcel Dupre, and the violinist Georges Enesco, which distinguished Roumanian musician is shortly to visit this country for the first time.

The other violinists will be Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding and Richard Burgin. The singers will be Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer. Besides the two piano soloists already mentioned, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff and Arthur Schnabel will appear, while the single 'cello soloist will be Jean Bedetti. A few subscription seats for the Saturday evening series are still left.

[7] TELE-SEPT-16.

MONTEUX HERE FOR SYMPHONY SEASON

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, arrived in Boston today to prepare for the forty-second season of the orchestra. The opening concerts will take place October 13 and October 14.

Of the new music to be presented works of four composers who are to be soloists will comprise an important part. These are the pianists, Alfredo Casella and John Powell; the organist, Marcel Dupre, and the violinist, Georges Enesco. Other violinists will be Toscha Seidel, Albert Spalding and Richard Burgin. The singers will be Mmse. Hempel, Alda and Matzenauer. Cortot, Moiseiwitsch, Olga Samaroff and Arthur Schnabel will complete the pianists. The only 'cello soloist will be Jean Bedetti. A few subscription seats for Saturday night are still left.

ADVTSR-SEPT 17.

SYMPHONY

MARGARET MATZENAUER, GEORGES ENESCO, FRANCES ALDA, ARTUR SCHNABEL, FRIEDA HEMPEL, ALFRED CORTOT.

The demand for subscription seats for the coming season of Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall is even greater than that of last season, which was one of the most popular the orchestra has had. The opening concerts will take place on Friday, Oct. 13, and Saturday, Oct. 14. The seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts were engaged early last spring, while for the 24 Saturday evening concerts very few are to be had.

Mr. Monteux is already preparing for this, the 42d season of the orchestra, his fourth season as its conductor. The splendid personnel remains with no noteworthy change. The conductor will make the masterpieces of the standard symphonic repertory the basis of his programs and will keep abreast with musical progress by presenting important works by modern composers. It was partly in search of new scores that he spent some weeks last summer in Europe.

An unusually fine list of soloists is announced. The three singers are present or recent stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company: Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer. The first two have never sung at these concerts. The former appearances with the orchestra of Mme. Matzenauer, the great Wagnerian singer, speak eloquently for her return.

Of the pianists, three are soloists of standing at these concerts: Mr. Cortot, Mr. Moiseiwitsch and Mme. Samaroff. Before he first came to this country in 1918, Mr. Cortot held a high European reputation, not only as pianist but as an operatic conductor and as an organizer and conductor of choral concerts. To our public he is known only as the master of his chosen instrument. By virtue of his tours in this country through successive seasons he has easily won a reputation as the foremost pianist of France.

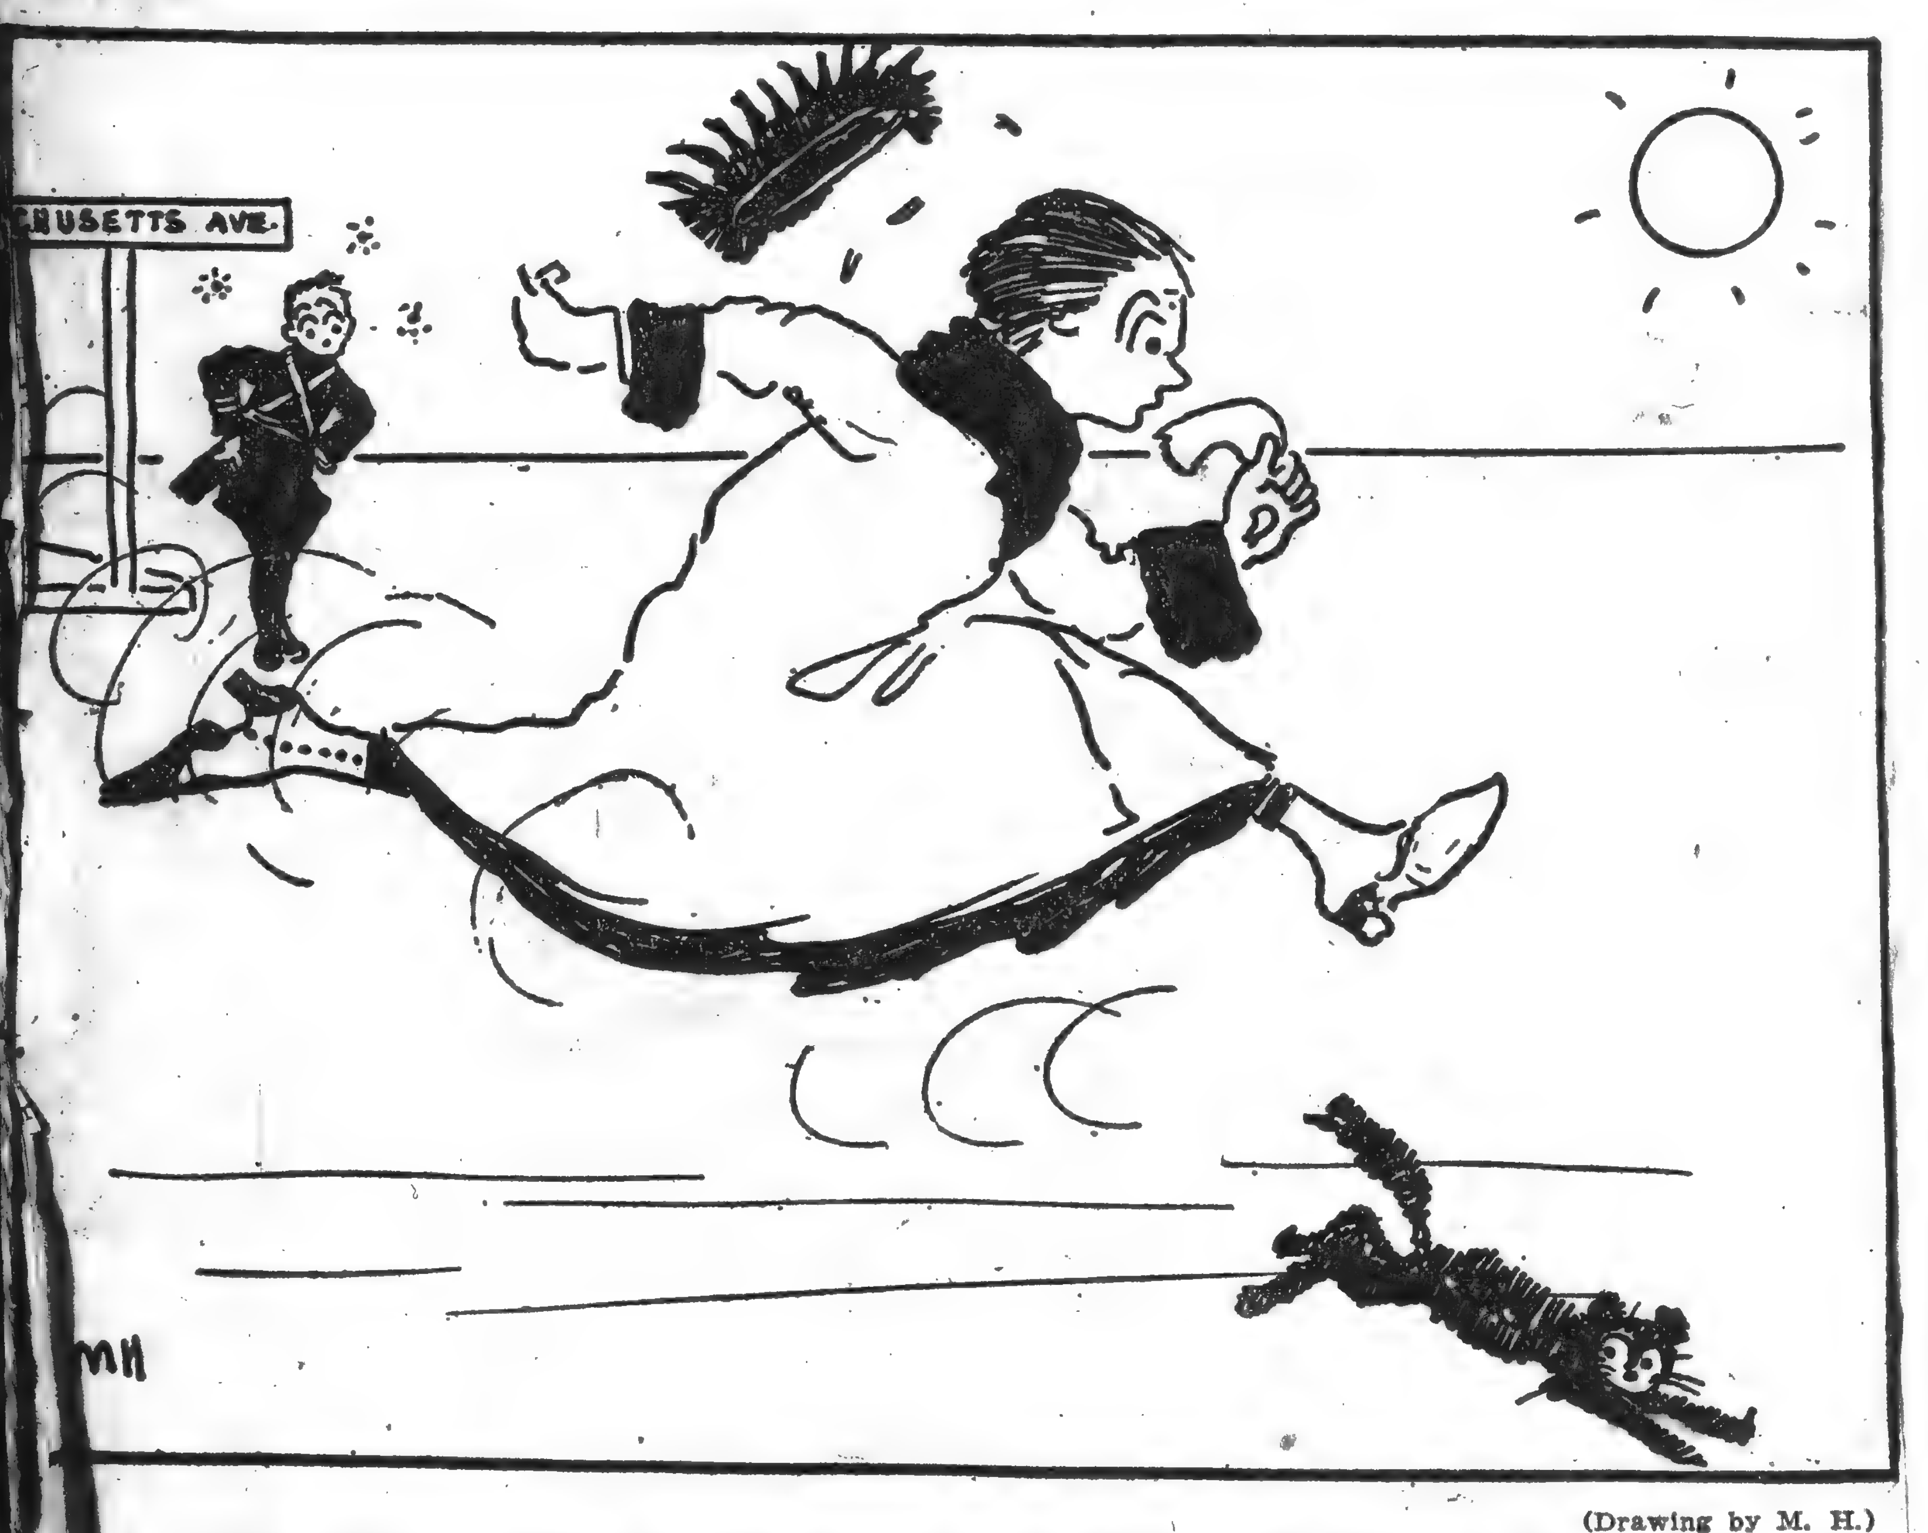
Mr. Moiseiwitsch is ranked, both here and abroad, as one of the finest living pianists. Mme. Samaroff's appearance will be welcomed by her admirers who were disappointed in the postponement of her engagement last year. Another American pianist, likewise of high standing, is Mr. Powell. As piano virtuoso and as the composer of the "Negro Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra, and other works, he has recently spread his renown into Europe. Known as yet only by name in Boston is Arthur Schnabel, a Letchetitzky pupil and a virtuoso of high fame in Europe. He came to this country last season. Another newcomer will be Alfredo Casella, the revolutionary young Italian composer and pianist whose "Italia" is familiar and whose "Couvent sur l'eau" was played and repeated at these concerts last season. He came, too, to America last season.

Another distinguished composer is the Roumanian, Georges Enesco, who will cross the ocean for the first time. He is known to many by his Orchestral Suite and his Symphony in E flat, played at these concerts. He is further known far and wide in Europe as a brilliant master of the violin. Albert Spalding will be heard once more. Mr. Seidel, already favorably known here, has also been engaged.

Marcel Dupre, the brilliant young French organist and composer, whose coming to Boston is eagerly anticipated, will likewise appear as organ soloist with the orchestra. Reports of the brilliance of his creative and executive genius come to us from many quarters.

HERALD - SEPT - 10.

Predicaments of the Concert-Hall



(Drawing by M. H.)

She Who Gets Belated Remembers Her Subscription to the Symphony Concerts

TRANS - SEPT - 18.

WHY NOT HERE ALSO?

Mme. Alda of the Metropolitan is among the soloists announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its home season at Symphony Hall. Among those assisting the orchestra on its visits to New York will be Mme. Emma Calvé. [The New York Times.

H. T. P.

ONCE more Musical America hears that the controlling powers of the Boston Orchestra are negotiating with Mr. Toscanini as successor to Mr. Monteux in the conductorship at the autumn of 1924. In spite of the many virtues of our trustees, it is hard to believe them so forehanded. Moreover, Musical America and other trade-journals have heard this tale—and also printed it—so many times. The new gloss affirms that the Philharmonic Society of New York is also seeking Mr. Toscanini's services, presumably vice Mengelberg. "Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die?"

TRANS - SEPT - 18.

MR. MONTEUX'S PROJECTS FOR THE YEAR

Old and New, Novel and Familiar, Music at the Symphony Concerts — Holst's "Planets," Stravinsky's "Rite of the Spring," Skriabin's "Divine Poem"—Mahler, Reger and, Probably, Bruckner Again—Vaughan Williams and Sibelius, Honegger and Berners — Once More a Catholic and Balanced List

THESE are good days for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, about to begin a forty-second series of concerts. Of course, there is a subscriber for every available seat at the concerts of Friday afternoon. There always has been—in the longest memory of the most devoted spinster. For as long, however, the audience at the concerts of Saturday evening has fluctuated in numbers and thereby been index for the regard in which a public, assembled by the music alone, holds conductor, band, "assisting artists," programmes. By night, even a Muck in the days of his amplest vogue, did not always fill every place; while during the war and for a year or two after it attendance on Saturday evenings appreciably diminished. Then, slowly but surely, Mr. Monteux re-gathered and increased these audiences. Now, on this score, his good works and the responsive disposition of the public stand clear. Not in years have the seats for Saturday [illegible] so eagerly and generally [illegible] part of the hall. By [illegible] others, the Symphony Orchestra is breeding a perpetuating public.

As with the listener, so with the givers of these concerts. They are of calm, cheerful, eager, ambitious minds. For the management almost "every prospect pleases." Even New York seems a little repentant of its chilly scrutiny of Mr. Monteux; its rather stupid indifference to the new quality of his band. It may even perceive that the conductor has ripened under three years of freedom, progress, zest; that his orchestra, quality for quality, rather excels sundry others with which Carnegie or Aeolian Hall weekly resound. Soit—be it so and hopefully so, as laconic Frenchmen sometimes say. Elsewhere abroad, from Toronto to Richmond, from the college at Hanover to the university at Ithaca, the occasional concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra keep vogue undiminished.

In turn, Mr. Monteux looks with satisfaction upon a band that he has re-constituted and re-made; that returns to him and to audiences, this autumn, virtually unchanged in personnel save by the addition of two horns. If composers of these days will write for eights horns, whereas four sufficed their fathers and two their grandfathers, then must they be gratified. Horn-players, moreover, like other craftsmen in less exacting employments, are disposed to a division of labor and two-horn-quartets are none too many for a symphony orchestra undertaking a hundred concerts in a season. With the temper as well as the permanence of his orchestra, Mr. Monteux may also be content. In just measure, it now mingles eagerness and experience. It has become both understanding and responsive instrument to his will. Its beauty or its power of tone ripens. It would be as plastic as he would have it.

[illegible] confidence, then, alike in his or[illegible] public and his [illegible] of memoranda that he likes to pencil lie upon his study-table. In his music-rack or upon his piano stand chosen scores—not a few evidence that the art of music-engraving, rudely coarsened, like most else, through the late war, has regained fineness. In Europe, through May and June, in the leisure of July and August at his summer-house in Maine, Mr. Monteux has made his discoveries, assorted his classics and his moderns, shaped his programmes, well knowing, like the rest of us, that the best intentions in autumn become not always the fulfilled accomplishment of winter and spring.

First of all, as with most other open-minded conductors, the rising and the risen Englishmen have engaged the conductor. On his table and in the library of Symphony Hall, lie at last the full score and parts of Holst's Symphonic Suite, "The Planets," accounted, with the symphonies of Vaughan Williams, the full flower, as yet, of this new British music. In the course of the autumn, he and the orchestra will play "The Planets"—every measure of the lengthy piece even as Holst intended. For in Mr. Monteux's and many another's view, no less are the deserts of the music. As yet the new "Pastoral Symphony" of Vaughan Williams is unpublished, and for it we must probably wait until another season. Instead, however, we shall receive a repetition of Williams's "London Symphony" and the first performances in America of the composer's "Variations for Two String Orchestras upon a Theme of Tallis." Tallis was an Elizabethan composer; from him Williams has borrowed a motiv and made it fructify in manifold beauty. At last, also, the tone-poem of Bax, "November Woods," is in Mr. Monteux's hands and not a few in England set it high. Into the enigmatic, even the eccentric, pages of Lord Berners, the conductor has also looked and found them amusing, interesting; and before the season is done, we shall hear the much-mocked "Spanish Rhapsody." From Bridge, too, comes a promising Symphonic Suite; while a piece by the relatively unknown Collingwood has been warmly commended. Thick also upon the study-table lie the submitted scores of American composers. Upon none, except Griffes's tone-poem of "The White Peacock," is there yet decision.

The new generation of the Continent has yielded less ample harvest. At every turn, in Mr. Monteux's wanderings, the curious about new men and novel music, spoke much of the masterful and singular Hungarians, Barktok and Kodály. Relatively little, however, has either written for orchestra outside the theatre and as yet the conductor has come by none of their scores. Meanwhile he waits upon his German agents. Nor have the younger Frenchmen been as diligent as they might. From Honegger, however, comes "Horace Victorieux," the "mimed symphony," (as the composer labels the music) accounted the culmination, thus far, in the labors of the innovating "Six." Russel, too little known in American concert-halls, has handed Mr. Monteux a tone-poem of the spring; while the heirs of Chausson have given him a posthumous and little known tone-picture, "Summer Evening." It will be as pendant to Chausson's one symphony, likewise upon the conductor's list.

Elder, established composers avert any fall in our stream of Parisian music. With one in particular Mr. Monteux has taken his courage in his hand. Whatever the response of the public, it is to hear at last Stravinsky's mimo-drama of primeval Russia, "The Rite of the Spring"—not all but as much of the pounding, savage music as will bear transfer from theatre to concert-hall. On Mr. Monteux's table also stand the two suites drawn by Stravinsky from his music (after Pergolese) to Mr. Dyaghilev's Neapolitan ballet, "Pulcinella." Nearby is Saint-Saëns's jeu d'esprit in tones, "The Carnival of Animals," from donkeys and tortoises to elephants and pianists—humor and wit in music that through his life-time he singularly chose to keep concealed. For the second pair of concerts Mr. Monteux has set the piece—with the relatively small orchestra, two pianos included, for which the composer designed it. From Debussy, likewise, the conductor [illegible] revivals [illegible] over-neglected [illegible] tone- [illegible] poetry or music none the less. From [illegible], his abiding masterpiece, the second symphony. From Lalo, for centennial honor, the light and lovely ballet-music of "Namouna." There is Franck also, born Dec. 11, 1822, for similar commemoration.

Like the "new" Frenchmen, the "new" Italians have not much swelled Mr. Monteux's store. The faithful, the prolific Malipiero waits with a "Dityrambo Tragico" and a second set of "Nature-Pictures," to supplement the similar Suite of two seasons ago. Respighi, Alfano, Pizzetti and other of Mr. Toscanini's darlings, afforded nothing to tempt the Bostonian conductor; but from Tommasini, less known in America, came a promising tone-poem. A Spaniard, however, will help to fill this breach in the Latin rampart of music—Turina with a set of fantastical pieces. Like Tommasini or Davico, from whom Mr. Monteux has received engaging pages, our eyes barely recognized the name, if our ears may anticipate the music. Again an elder composer, Bossi, with a fanciful, skilful set of variations, helps to fill the gap.

Besides, there are always the Russians—with a symphony, say, of Glazunov; another from Kallinikov, the pleasing; Rimsky-Korsakov's early "May Night," suite from an opera; and most stimulating of all, one, if not two, symphonies of Skriabin. Twice and twice only, far back in Mr. Fiedler's time, has he been played—in the "Poem of Ecstasy"—at the Symphony Concerts. Yet deep and wide is his influence upon the younger composers and the younger audiences of Europe. Last summer Mr. Monteux read many of his pages. For outcome, "The Divine Poem" will be heard next winter, and, possibly, the preceding Symphony, Number Two. Over the Russian border, moreover, is Sibelius, another discovery in whom Mr. Monteux rejoices. Accordingly, the Finn's Fifth Symphony, first played in Boston last spring, will be repeated this autumn; with, later onward, revivals of one and another of his shorter tone-poems.

Always, too, there are the Germans; while in particular to the Germans of the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, Mr. Monteux last summer brought inquiring ear and eye. He has opened Mahler's lengthy and abounding scores and from them chosen for revival that Fifth Symphony, which in Mr. Gericke's and Dr. Muck's day, made no small stir in these parts. Even Bruckner, he of the celestial slow movements and the terrestrial scherzi, he who could hear tonal visions better than he could shape tonal structures—this Teuton of Teutons—also is tempting Mr. Monteux. Before the season is done, the Seventh Symphony may bring him back. Upon Reger also the conductor would bestow an inning—for one of his later orchestral pieces, the Variations and Fugue upon a Theme from Mozart. As many say, they excel the applauded, remembered "Hiller Variations."

To Strauss also, Mr. Monteux holds firm—with "Zarathustra" for certainty; the "Sinfonia Domestica," if score and parts are attainable; and almost surely, the dance in "Salome," which he rightly regards as a piercingly sensuous music. Schreker, too, mindful of Bostonian good will to his "Prelude" of last winter, has lately sent to Symphony Hall a "Chamber Symphony" for small but intricately taxed orchestra. Back to Liszt for the "Faust Symphony" with the Harvard Glee Club as assisting chorus; back to Beethoven for the three orchestral movements of the Ninth Symphony, too long unheard here, as though the Choral Finale were indispensable—and Mr. Monteux's memoranda decline into the familiar overtures and symphonies of the "standard repertory." His whole public knows how wisely and justly he chooses from it. Through forty years no such master of programme-making has served the Symphony Concerts.

H. T. P.

TRANS - SEPT

[9]

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S [illegible] SEASON

MARGARET MATZENAUER, GEORGES ENESCO, FRANCES ALDA, ARTUR SCHNABEL, FRIEDA HEMPEL, ALFRED CORTOT.

The demand for subscription seats for the coming season of Boston Symphony concerts at Symphony Hall is even greater than that of last season, which was one of the most popular the orchestra has had. The opening concerts will take place on Friday, Oct. 13, and Saturday, Oct. 14. The seats for the 24 Friday afternoon concerts were engaged early last spring, while for the 24 Saturday evening concerts very few are to be had.

Mr. Monteux is already preparing for this, the 42d season of the orchestra, his fourth season as its conductor. The splendid personnel remains with no noteworthy change. The conductor will make the masterpieces of the standard symphonic repertory the basis of his programs and will keep abreast with musical progress by presenting important works by modern composers. It was partly in search of new scores that he spent some weeks last summer in Europe.

An unusually fine list of soloists is announced. The three singers are present or recent stars of the Metropolitan Opera Company: Frieda Hempel, Frances Alda and Margaret Matzenauer. The first two have never sung at these concerts. The former appearances with the orchestra of Mme. Matzenauer, the great Wagnerian singer, speak eloquently for her return.

Of the pianists, three are soloists of standing at these concerts: Mr. Cortot, Mr. Moiseiwitsch and Mme. Samaroff. Before he first came to this country in 1918, Mr. Cortot held a high European reputation, not only as pianist but as an operatic conductor and as an organizer and conductor of choral concerts. To our public he is known only as the master of his chosen instrument. By virtue of his tours in this country through successive seasons he has easily won a reputation as the foremost pianist of France.

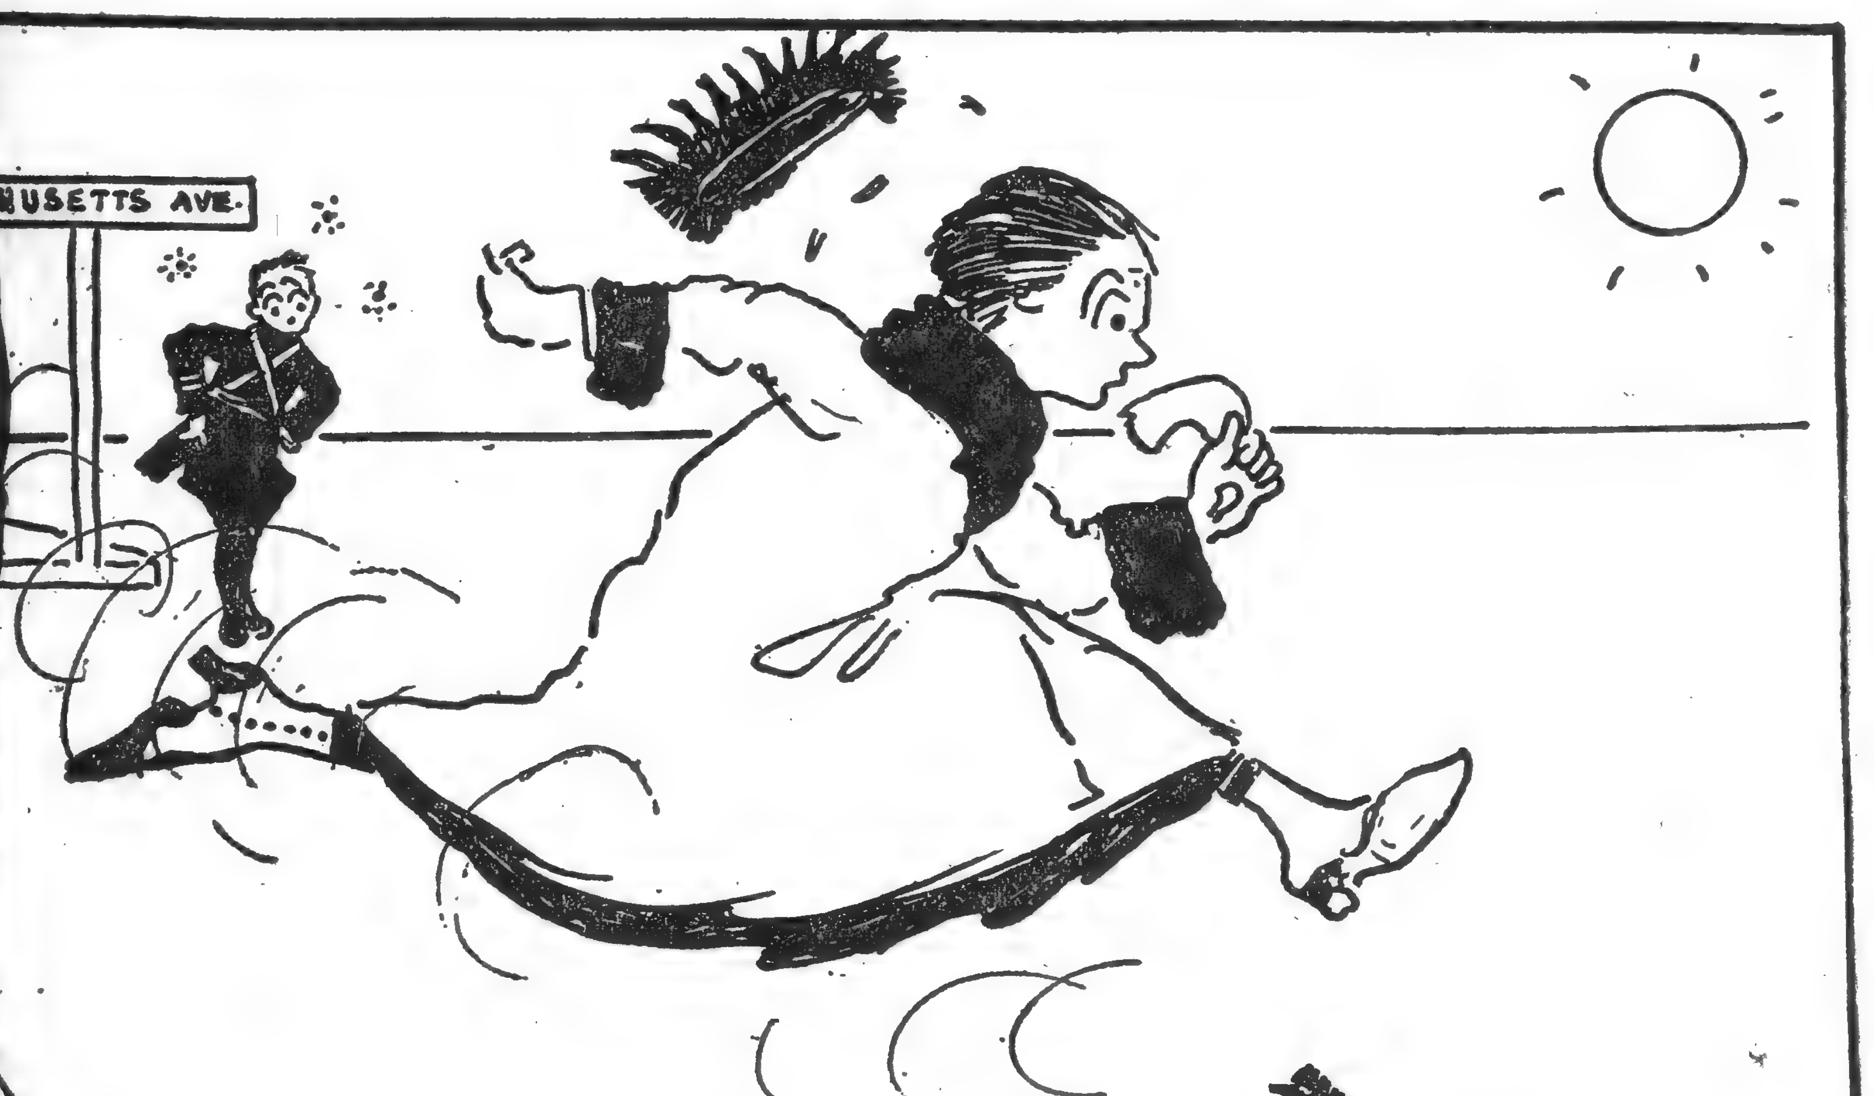
Mr. Moiseiwitsch is ranked, both here and abroad, as one of the finest living pianists. Mme. Samaroff's appearance will be welcomed by her admirers who were disappointed in the postponement of her engagement last year. Another American pianist, likewise of high standing, is Mr. Powell. As piano virtuoso and as the composer of the "Negro Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra, and other works, he has recently spread his renown into Europe. Known as yet only by name in Boston is Arthur Schnabel, a Letchetitzky pupil and a virtuoso of high fame in Europe. He came to this country last season. Another newcomer will be Alfredo Casella, the revolutionary young Italian composer and pianist whose "Italia" is familiar and whose "Couvent sur l'eau" was played and repeated at these concerts last season. He came, too, to America last season.

Another distinguished composer is the Roumanian, Georges Enesco, who will cross the ocean for the first time. He is known to many by his Orchestral Suite and his Symphony in E flat, played at these concerts. He is further known far and wide in Europe as a brilliant master of the violin. Albert Spalding will be heard once more. Mr. Seidel, already favorably known here, has also been engaged.

Marcel Dupre, the brilliant young French organist and composer, whose coming to Boston is eagerly anticipated, will likewise appear as organ soloist with the orchestra. Reports of the brilliance of his creative and executive genius come to us from many quarters.

HERALD - SEPT - 10.

Predicaments of the Concert-Hall



(Drawing by M. H.)

She Who Gets Belated Remembers Her Subscription to the Symphony Concerts

TRANS - SEPT - 18.

Why Not Here Also?

Mme. Alda of the Metropolitan is among the soloists announced by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its home season at Symphony Hall. Among those assisting the orchestra on its visits to New York will be Mme. Emma Calvé. [The New York Times.

H. T. P.

ONCE more Musical America hears that the controlling powers of the Boston Orchestra are negotiating with Mr. Toscanini as successor to Mr. Monteux in the conductorship at the autumn of 1924. In spite of the many virtues of our trustees, it is hard to believe them so forehanded. Moreover, Musical America and other trade-journals have heard this tale—and also printed it—so many times. The new gloss affirms that the Philharmonic Society of New York is also seeking Mr. Toscanini's services, presumably vice Mengelberg. "Under which king, Bezonian? Speak or die?"

TRANS - SEPT - 18.

MR. MONTEUX'S PROJECTS FOR THE YEAR

Old and New, Novel and Familiar, Music at the Symphony Concerts — Holst's "Planets," Stravinsky's "Rite of the Spring," Skriabin's "Divine Poem"—Mahler, Reger and, Probably, Bruckner Again—Vaughan Williams and Sibelius, Honegger and Berners — Once More a Catholic and Balanced List

THESE are good days for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, about to begin a forty-second series of concerts. Of course, there is a subscriber for every available seat at the concerts of Friday afternoon. There always has been—in the longest memory of the most devoted spinster. For as long, however, the audience at the concerts of Saturday evening has fluctuated in numbers and thereby been index for the regard in which a public, assembled by the music alone, holds conductor, band, "assisting artists," programmes. By night, even a Muck in the days of his amplest vogue, did not always fill every place; while during the war and for a year or two after it attendance on Saturday evenings appreciably diminished. Then, slowly but surely, Mr. Monteux re-gathered and increased these audiences. Now, on this score, his good works and the responsive disposition of the public stand clear. Not in years have the seats for Saturday evening been so eagerly and generally taken in every part of the hall. By this sign, [illegible] others, the Symphony Orchestra is breeding a perpetuating public.

As with the listener, so with the givers of these concerts. They are of calm, cheerful, eager, ambitious minds. For the management almost "every prospect pleases." Even New York seems a little repentant of its chilly scrutiny of Mr. Monteux; its rather stupid indifference to the new quality of his band. It may even perceive that the conductor has ripened under three years of freedom, progress, zest; that his orchestra, quality for quality, rather excels sundry others with which Carnegie or Aeolian Hall weekly resound. Soit—be it so and hopefully so, as laconic Frenchmen sometimes say. Elsewhere abroad, from Toronto to Richmond, from the college at Hanover to the university at Ithaca, the occasional concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra keep vogue undiminished.

In turn, Mr. Monteux looks with satisfaction upon a band that he has re-constituted and re-made; that returns to him and to audiences, this autumn, virtually unchanged in personnel save by the addition of two horns. If composers of these days will write for eights horns, whereas four sufficed their fathers and two their grandfathers, then must they be gratified. Horn-players, moreover, like other craftsmen in less exacting employments, are disposed to a division of labor and two-horn-quartets are none too many for a symphony orchestra undertaking a hundred concerts in a season. With the temper as well as the permanence of his orchestra, Mr. Monteux may also be content. In just measure, it now mingles eagerness and experience. It has become both understanding and responsive instrument to his will. Its beauty or its power of tone ripens. It would be as plastic as he would have it.

With confidence, then, alike in his orchestra, his public, and his co-workers, the conductor has set about his choice of [illegible] or memoranda that he likes to pencil lie upon his study-table. In his music-rack or upon his piano stand chosen scores—not a few evidence that the art of music-engraving, rudely coarsened, like most else, through the late war, has regained fineness. In Europe, through May and June, in the leisure of July and August at his summer-house in Maine, Mr. Monteux has made his discoveries, assorted his classics and his moderns, shaped his programmes, well knowing, like the rest of us, that the best intentions in autumn become not always the fulfilled accomplishment of winter and spring.

First of all, as with most other open-minded conductors, the rising and the risen Englishmen have engaged the conductor. On his table and in the library of Symphony Hall, lie at last the full score and parts of Holst's Symphonic Suite, "The Planets," accounted, with the symphonies of Vaughan Williams, the full flower, as yet, of this new British music. In the course of the autumn, he and the orchestra will play "The Planets"—every measure of the lengthy piece even as Holst intended. For in Mr. Monteux's and many another's view, no less are the deserts of the music. As yet the new "Pastoral Symphony" of Vaughan Williams is unpublished, and for it we must probably wait until another season. Instead, however, we shall receive a repetition of Williams's "London Symphony" and the first performances in America of the composer's "Variations for Two String Orchestras upon a Theme of Tallis." Tallis was an Elizabethan composer; from him Williams has borrowed a motiv and made it fructify in manifold beauty. At last, also, the tone-poem of Bax, "November Woods," is in Mr. Monteux's hands and not a few in England set it high. Into the enigmatic, even the eccentric, pages of Lord Berners, the conductor has also looked and found them amusing, interesting; and before the season is done, we shall hear the much-mocked "Spanish Rhapsody." From Bridge, too, comes a promising Symphonic Suite; while a piece by the relatively unknown Collingwood has been warmly commended. Thick also upon the study-table lie the submitted scores of American composers. Upon none, except Griffes's tone-poem of "The White Peacock," is there yet decision.

The new generation of the Continent has yielded less ample harvest. At every turn, in Mr. Monteux's wanderings, the curious about new men and novel music, spoke much of the masterful and singular Hungarians, Barktok and Kodály. Relatively little, however, has either written for orchestra outside the theatre and as yet the conductor has come by none of their scores. Meanwhile he waits upon his German agents. Nor have the younger Frenchmen been as diligent as they might. From Honegger, however, comes "Horace Victorieux," the "mimed symphony," (as the composer labels the music) accounted the culmination, thus far, in the labors of the innovating "Six." Russel, too little known in American concert-halls, has handed Mr. Monteux a tone-poem of the spring; while the heirs of Chausson have given him a posthumous and little known tone-picture, "Summer Evening." It will be as pendant to Chausson's one symphony, likewise upon the conductor's list.

Elder, established composers avert any fall in our stream of Parisian music. With one in particular Mr. Monteux has taken his courage in his hand. Whatever the response of the public, it is to hear at last Stravinsky's mimo-drama of primeval Russia, "The Rite of the Spring"—not all but as much of the pounding, savage music as will bear transfer from theatre to concert-hall. On Mr. Monteux's table also stand the two suites drawn by Stravinsky from his music (after Pergolese) to Mr. Dyaghilev's Neapolitan ballet, "Pulcinella." Nearby is Saint-Saëns's jeu d'esprit in tones, "The Carnival of Animals," from donkeys and tortoises to elephants and pianists—humor and wit in music that through his life-time he singularly chose to keep concealed. For the second pair of concerts Mr. Monteux has set the piece—with the relatively small orchestra, two pianos included, for which the composer designed it. From Debussy, likewise, the conductor purposes revivals of the over-neglected "Gigues" and "Ronde de Printemps," tone-poems in the smaller dimensions, but the poetry of music none the less. From d'Indy, his abiding masterpiece, the second symphony. From Lalo, for centennial honor, the light and lovely ballet-music of "Namouna." There is Franck also, born Dec. 11, 1822, for similar commemoration.

Like the "new" Frenchmen, the "new" Italians have not much swelled Mr. Monteux's store. The faithful, the prolific, Malipiero waits with a "Dityrambo Tragico" and a second set of "Nature-Pictures," to supplement the similar Suite of two seasons ago. Respighi, Alfano, Pizzetti and other of Mr. Toscanini's darlings, afforded nothing to tempt the Bostonian conductor; but from Tommasini, less known in America, came a promising tone-poem. A Spaniard, however, will help to fill this breach in the Latin rampart of music—Turina with a set of fantastical pieces. Like Tommasini or Davico, from whom Mr. Monteux has received engaging pages, our eyes barely recognized the name, if our ears may anticipate the music. Again an elder composer, Bossi, with a fanciful, skilful set of variations, helps to fill the gap.

Besides, there are always the Russians—with a symphony, say, of Glazunov; another from Kallinikov, the pleasing; Rimsky-Korsakov's early "May Night," suite from an opera; and most stimulating of all, one, if not two, symphonies of Skriabin. Twice and twice only, far back in Mr. Fiedler's time, has he been played—in the "Poem of Ecstasy"—at the Symphony Concerts. Yet deep and wide is his influence upon the younger composers and the younger audiences of Europe. Last summer Mr. Monteux read many of his pages. For outcome, "The Divine Poem" will be heard next winter, and, possibly, the preceding Symphony, Number Two. Over the Russian border, moreover, is Sibelius, another discovery in whom Mr. Monteux rejoices. Accordingly, the Finn's Fifth Symphony, first played in Boston last spring, will be repeated this autumn; with, later onward, revivals of one and another of his shorter tone-poems.

Always, too, there are the Germans; while in particular to the Germans of the end of the nineteenth century and the beginning of the twentieth, Mr. Monteux last summer brought inquiring ear and eye. He has opened Mahler's lengthy and abounding scores and from them chosen for revival that Fifth Symphony, which in Mr. Gericke's and Dr. Muck's day, made no small stir in these parts. Even Bruckner, he of the celestial slow movements and the terrestrial scherzi, he who could hear tonal visions better than he could shape tonal structures—this Teuton of Teutons—also is tempting Mr. Monteux. Before the season is done, the Seventh Symphony may bring him back. Upon Reger also the conductor would bestow an inning—for one of his later orchestral pieces, the Variations and Fugue upon a Theme from Mozart. As many say, they excel the applauded, remembered "Hiller Variations."

To Strauss also, Mr. Monteux holds firm—with "Zarathustra" for certainty; the "Sinfonia Domestica," if score and parts are attainable; and almost surely, the dance in "Salome," which he rightly regards as a piercingly sensuous music. Schreker, too, mindful of Bostonian good will to his "Prelude" of last winter, has lately sent to Symphony Hall a "Chamber Symphony" for small but intricately taxed orchestra. Back to Liszt for the "Faust Symphony" with the Harvard Glee Club as assisting chorus; back to Beethoven for the three orchestral movements of the Ninth Symphony, too long unheard here, as though the Choral Finale were indispensable—and Mr. Monteux's memoranda decline into the familiar overtures and symphonies of the "standard repertory." His whole public knows how wisely and justly he chooses from it. Through forty years no such master of programme-making has served the Symphony Concerts.

H. T. P.

TRANS - SEPT

[8]

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Having spent a part of the past summer in Europe in quest of new scores of interest, Pierre Monteux will perform a number of these during the coming 42d regular season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which is to open on Oct. 13.

The soloists to be heard at these concerts include, as singers, Frieda Hempel, Margaret Matzenauer and Frances Alda; as pianists, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Alfredo Casella, Arthur Schnabel, John Powell and Olga Samaroff; the violinists, Alfred Spalding, Toscha Seidel, Georges Enesco, Richard Burgin. Marcel Dupre will appear as organ soloist and Jean Bedetti as 'cello soloist.

TRAV-SEPT-23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces a number of new works of interest during the season which begins October 13, in Boston. Three French compositions will be Saint-Saëns's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fête." Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," and extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Tsar Sultan" in the form of a suite, and Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem." English composers represented will include Holst, Vaughn, Williams, and Eugene Goosens; Italians will be Tommasini and Davico, and "Turina" of Spain. German composers will also be heard. Pierre Monteux will conduct.

N.Y. POST-SEPT-23

Saturday evening, Oct. 14, in Symphony Hall, the first evening concert of the season by the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conducting.

TRANS-SEPT-23.

NEW WORKS FOUND BY MONTEUX

Having spent a part of the past Summer in Europe in quest of new scores of interest, Pierre Monteux will perform a number of these during the coming forty-second regular season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which is to open on October 13. The works to be played for the first time here will be selected from the following:

From Russia, Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, and excerpts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan" suite. There will be three French scores, which will be heard for the first time in America at these concerts—Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," the most notable production to date of the Parisian "Six," Chausson's "Soir de Fete" and Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux." This burlesque music, of which the popular "Swan" is a number, is familiar to the conductor, who took the viola part in its first performance by the Parisian society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano.

New English scores include "The Planets" of Holst, and new works by Eugene Goosens and Vaughn Williams, the composer of the London Symphony. The Spanish composer, Turina, will be represented, and the Italian composers Tomasini and Davico. There will be a number of native works which will be announced later. German music will be represented by a number of revivals notably symphonies by Bruckner and Mahler, Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and a work by Max Reger.

AMER. SEPT-23.

The 42d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin with the concert on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. The list of soloists has already been announced, but it may here be repeated.

Singers: Mmes. Alda, Hempel and Matzenauer.

Pianists: Messrs. Casella, Cortot, Moiseiwitsch, Powell, Schnabel and Mme. Samaroff.

Violinists: Messrs. Burgin, Enesco, Seidel and Spalding.

Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti.

Organist: Marcel Dupre.

There is natural curiosity concerning the programs, the new works, or works that are unfamiliar, if not ultra-modern, the works that will be revived. Program-making is an art in itself. Many excellent conductors are in this respect disappointing. Mr. Monteux has been singularly fortunate. His programs have been well contrasted; due respect has been paid the worthies of past years; he has not been afraid of acquainting the audience with compositions showing the modern and also the ultra-modern tendencies. His taste is catholic, unusually so, as may be seen by looking at the programs since he has been conductor. To him music is not confined within the boundaries of any one country. Interpreting the works of composers, ancient and modern—French, German, Italian, Spanish, English, Russian, American—he has been cosmopolitan in his intelligent and graceful sympathy. He is not a conductor of any one school or of any particular period. In other words, he is not a "specialist." The Lord be praised!

Mr. Ernest Newman, discussing in August the programs of the Promenade Concerts in London, said that the "classics" are always safe for performance. Among the "classics" he included Grieg, Franck, Debussy and Rachmaninov, yet Debussy is still to the hidebound conservatives a radical, a dangerous fellow. Some may well rub their eyes at seeing Mr. Rachmaninov named by Mr. Newman, who says: "There are a few younger moderns for whom all of us have a certain respect, if not an enthusiasm. And there is a crowd of still younger men from whom a few people—chiefly the young ladies and gentlemen themselves—expect the most wonderful things, but whom the mass of musicians and the general public regard with a skepticism tempered by hope. Nowhere in all Europe is there a composer under thirty-five upon whom any level-headed musician would care to bank. Talents are as abundant as in the case of the novel; but hardly the hint of a real genius anywhere."

Musicians, even the "level-headed" ones, especially when they are composers, are not always sane judges or inspired prophets. Read Weber's articles about Beethoven's symphonies. Recall the many geese that Schumann in his critical articles insisted were swans. Of late years Mr. Newman has been rather contemptuous in his attitude toward the younger composers. At times he has written in an astonishing manner about some of the justly respected old ones.

Mr. Monteux, visiting Europe in July, met various composers with the view of bringing out in this country new or unfamiliar works by them. He also examined scores of composers no longer living; scores unknown to Boston audiences, as well as works, heard by audiences of former seasons, but new to the younger generation.

Among the compositions to be heard here for the first time will be Stravinsky's Suite from the "Pulcinella" music in the manner of Pergolese, and extracts from Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," a ballet considered by some as this Russian's supreme work. When Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance of this extraordinary score in Paris, there were such scenes that the police intervened. Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" has been performed here more than once. Mr. Monteux purposes to perform an earlier work, "The Divine Poem," by Scriabin, whose talent is called genius by his ardent admirers. There is also promise of the Suite derived from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar-Saltan."

The English school will be represented by Holst, whose series of symphonic poems, "The Planets," has been characterized by the fastidious Mr. Newman, as one of the most significant English compositions; by Vaughan Williams, already and favorably known here by "On Wenlock Edge," brought out at one of Mr. Longy's concerts, and the "London" Symphony performed at Symphony concerts; by Eugene Goossens, whose music, hardly known in Boston, has been enthusiastically applauded in London and in cities of the European continent.

Compositions by Honegger, Chausson and Saint-Saens will be new to the symphony audience. Honegger will be represented by his "Horatius Triumphant," which has to do with the fight of the Horatii and the Curiatti, Roman and Alban brethren respectively. The surviving Horatius returning home slew his sister who was mourning the death of her betrothed, one of the Alban brothers—the subject of Corneille's tragedy, "Horace." Honegger, a Swiss by birth, a voluminous composer, is of the Parisian band of composers known as "The Six." Chausson's "Soir d'Ete" will be played. The symphony, symphonic poem "Vivian," chamber music, choral works and songs, with the "Poem" for violin of this composer, who died too soon, are justly esteemed here. Saint-Saens's "Carnival of Animals," a humorous score, was first performed in Paris at a concert of a quasi-private society, "La Trompette," when Saint-Saens was the pianist and Mr. Monteux played a viola in one of the double quartets of strings. This "Carnival" was recently revived in Paris. One of the numbers, "The Swan," has long been a favorite piece with violoncellists. Mme. Pavlowa dances to it.

Italians will be represented by Tommasini of Rome—the Kneisel quartet played a quartet by him in Boston—and Davico. Music by the Spaniard Turina will also be heard. He was first made known here by piano pieces played by George Copeland. An orchestral "Procession" has also been performed here, but not at a symphony concert.

There will be revivals of symphonies by Bruckner and Mahler, music by Max Reger and Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

As in the past Mr. Monteux will give marked attention to works by American composers; marked, we say, not careless, perfunctory attention.

The 24 programs will of course include the orthodox masterpieces of the established repertory.

HERALD-SEPT-24

Many Novelties for Symphony Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

The announcements of the new compositions to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, this winter will be for many as interesting if not even more interesting than the list of soloists engaged. If there is any form of musical performance in which the personality of an artist is lost sight of in the shadow of the greatness of music itself it is at the concerts given by this organization. There the composer rather than the performer is supreme, and, however gifted the virtuoso, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will surpass him in the wonder of its performances.

Mr. Monteux has girded his loins and will dare greatly in performing for the first time here excerpts from Strawinsky's ballet, "The Rites of Spring."

This extraordinary score, built about symbolical dances of primitive people who worship nature and the sun which is awakening the earth to new life, aroused a riot in the theatre in Paris where Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance some years ago. Then the audience divided itself into two factions, pro and anti, which sprang at each other and relieved their feelings in ways other than musical. Excerpts from this ballet and a suite from a later work of Strawinsky, "Pulcinella," will be among the most important offerings.

Other Russian music will be Scriabine's "Divine Poem" and music in the form of an orchestral suite taken from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Tsar Saltan."

There are three works by French composers which will arouse intense curiosity in advance of the performance. One of these is "Horace Victorieux," by Honenger. Honegger is one of "the Six," the group of modern French composers, inspired largely by the example of Eric Satie, who in earlier years was rated a madman, but whose madness, genuine or apparent, has born fruit in the works of singularly gifted disciples. These men show highly radical tendencies. Their works have aroused hot discussion in Paris and in the musical centres of America.

An unknown work by Chausson, the composer of exquisite and poetic music, who died an untimely death in the '90s, is called "Soir de Fete." Finally there will be a performance of Saint-Saens' suite, "Carnival des Animaux," a work of the youth of the late famous composer, in which he gayly imitates the cries and noises of different animals.

One piece from this suite, the beautiful melody known as "The Swan," suggestive of the grave beauty of the swan as it floats on the waters, has become known and loved the western world over. Never before has the entire suite been played in America. Mr. Monteux himself played viola in one of the double quartets called for by the score, at a private performance at a meeting of that remarkable society of musicians known as "La Trompette," and led by Saint-Saens himself.

The time has happily come when Germany may be represented fully on the Boston Symphony programmes without calling up the hatreds and resentments for which Germany was primarily responsible in the late war. It is good to know that Mr. Monteux will play what some consider the greatest work Richard Strauss ever penned, his symphonic poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," after Nietzsche. Brucker and Mahler will also be represented on the programmes.

Modern Italian composers who have written music to be played for the first time here are Tommasini and Davico. The Spanish composer Turina will be represented, and a number of compositions by Americans are to be announced. The list of soloists includes the singers Frieda Hempel, Margarot Matzenauer, Frances Alda; the pianists Alfred Cortot, Berno Moisiewitsch, Alfredo Casella, Arthur Schnabel, John Powell, Olga Samaroff; the violinists Alfred Spalding, Toscha Siedel, Georges Enesco, Richard Burgin, with the brilliant young French organist, Marcel Dupre, and Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, as solo 'cellist.

POST-SEPT-24.

NEW WORKS ON SYMPHONY LIST

As a result of Pierre Monteaux's sojourn in Europe last July, many new works are to be performed in the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to begin on October 13-14.

There are to be three French works, Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chauson's "Soir de Fete" and Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux.' Russia will be represented by Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite, and excerpts from "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's third symphony and Rimsky-Karsakoff's "The Tale of the Tsar Sultan" suite.

Three English composers on the list are Vaughn Williams, Holst and Eugene Goosens. There will also be works by native composers.

The Spanish composer, Turina, is to be represented and the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico. There will be several revivals of German scores.

ADVTSR-SEPT-24.

M. Pierre Monteux will open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston October 13. Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts—Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fete."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poet" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers Holst, Vaughn Williams and Eugene Goosens will be represented, the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico and the Spanish composer "Turina."

N.Y. HERALD-SEPT-24

Meanwhile word comes from Boston that Pierre Monteux, who is soon to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its native city on October 13, acquired a number of novelties during his recent stay abroad. These include Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," also selected for performance by Mr. Damrosch; Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fête." Mr. Monteux, it appears, is particularly familiar with Saint-Saens's burlesque, for at an early performance by the double string quartet of the Parisian Societe Privee he played the viola part, while the composer was the pianist of the occasion.

Russian music to be played by the Boston orchestra during the season will include Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite, after Pergolese, excerpts from the same composer's "Rites of Spring," Scriabine's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Tsar Saltan." Holst, Vaughan Williams and Eugene Goosens will represent England; Tommasini and Davico, Italy, and Turina, Spain. Mr. Monteux will also give special revivals of works by Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss.

N.Y. TRIBUNE-SEPT 24

SEP 23 1922

FROM EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

The Boston Orchestra, again under the direction of Pierre Monteux will have its customary ten concerts, in Thursday and Saturday pairs, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Monteux has also brought back from Europe a number of new works. He, too, will play the Saint-Saens "Carnaval" suite, whilst other novelties he has secured are: Arthur Honegger's "Horace victorieux" (Honegger is one of the Paris "Six), Chausson's "Soir de fete," Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite, after Pergolesi, and a part of his "Le sacre de printempe" and music by the Englishmen, Gustav Holst, Eugene Goossens and Vaughn Williams.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
SEP 24 1922

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces a number of new works for the forty second season of his organization, the list including three French scores—Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." The burlesque of Saint-Saens is particular familiar to the conductor who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double-string quartette of the Parisian private society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano. Honneger's score has been called, both in Paris and in London, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams and Eugene Goosens, will be represented, the Italian composers, Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer, "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra." Naturally the masterpieces of the established repertory will comprise the greater part of the Boston Symphony programs, to which the works mentioned above will yield first consideration.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
SEP 24 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

Famous Soloists to Appear With Orchestra in Brooklyn.

The series of five concerts to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Friday evenings of Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6 will be a part of what promises to be one of the busiest and most successful seasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had. Pierre Monteux has returned from Europe and is now preparing for the seasons opening in Boston on Oct. 13. This will be the forty-second season of the orchestra, and the fourth under his leadership. The splendid personnel of last year remains without any notable change.

The soloists engaged to appear at the five Brooklyn concerts are among the very greatest of the day. Formerly pre-eminent in opera, Frieda Hempel, since confining her career to the concert stage, has taken an equally high place as a mistress of song. Emma Calve, the great singing actress of France, with whom the role of Carmen is always associated, proved anew the vividly stirring dramatic qualities of her voice when she returned to this country last spring. Olga Samaroff, the Texan pianist, is among the foremost of her sex. Pablo Casals is the greatest 'cellist living; his playing is a revelation of unsuspected beauties in his chosen instrument. Georges Enesco, the noted composer of the "Roumanian Rhapsody, will be the most distinguished newcomer of the musical season in America. In Europe he has long been famous as a brilliant violinist.

[9]

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
SEP 24 1922

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned from Europe and is now making preparations for the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 13. The usual series of five Friday evening concerts will be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 18 and April 6. Mr. Monteux will assemble the orchestra for rehearsal about the first of the month. The splendid personnel of last year remains, with no noteworthy change. A more distinguished list of soloists than those appearing at the Brooklyn series could scarcely be found. The two singers, Frieda Hempel and Emma Calve, are each pre-eminent in their particular fields. The pianists among the soloists will be Olga Samaroff, whose coming appearance will be particularly welcome to her many admirers, who were disappointed in the postponement of her engagements last season. Georges Enesco is known by his Roumanian Rhapsody wherever symphony music is heard, and is also admired for his Orchestral Suite. Pablo Casals is universally accepted as the greatest 'cellist in the world.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
SEP 25 1922

Pierre Monteux is now preparing to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Oct. 13. Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts — Saint-Saëns's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fête." The burlesque of Saint-Saëns is particularly familiar to the conductor who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double string quartet of the Parisian private society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano.

Honneger's score has been called, both in London and in Paris, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six." Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers Holst, Vaughn Williams, and Eugene Goosens, will be represented, the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger, and Strauss's "Zarathustra."

NEW YORK
N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
ISSUE OF
SEP 25 1922

Boston Symphony's Season of Novelties

Pierre Monteux, who is preparing the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to open in Boston on Oct. 13, announces a number of new works.

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts—Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux," Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." Russia music will include Stravinsky's suite from "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams, and Eugene Goossens, will be represented; the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer "Turina." There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra."

Slips of memory were inevitable in the compilation of the list of pieces that Mr. Monteux has in hand for the impending series of Symphony Concerts. Three such it is now possible to repair. The conductor purposes a repetition of Mr. Henry Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions"—the singular, exotic music of the Far East that made no small impression last spring. He has further discovered a little-known Canon of Schumann, arranged for orchestra by the Parisian, Dubois. To the chosen numbers from rising British composers should be added Eugene Goossens's tone-poem, "The Eternal Rhythm," his first symphonic piece to be heard in Boston.

TRANS-SEPT-25.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Having spent a part of the past summer in Europe in quest of new scores of interest, Pierre Monteux will perform a number of these during the coming 42d regular season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which is to open on Oct. 13.

The soloists to be heard at these concerts include, as singers, Frieda Hempel, Margaret Matzenauer and Frances Alda; as pianists, Alfred Cortot, Benno Moiseiwitsch, Alfredo Casella, Arthur Schnabel, John Powell and Olga Samaroff; the violinists, Alfred Spalding, Toscha Seidel, Georges Enesco, Richard Burgin. Marcel Dupre will appear as organ soloist and Jean Bedetti as 'cello soloist.

TRAV-SEPT-23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra announces a number of new works of interest during the season which begins October 13, in Boston. Three French compositions will be Saint-Saëns's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fête." Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," and extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Rimsky-Korsakov's "The Tsar Sultan" in the form of a suite, and Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem." English composers represented will include Holst, Vaughn, Williams, and Eugene Goosens; Italians will be Tommasini and Davico, and "Turina" of Spain. German composers will also be heard. Pierre Monteux will conduct.

N.Y. POST-SEPT 23

Saturday evening, Oct. 14, in Symphony Hall, the first evening concert of the season by the Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conducting.

TRANS-SEPT-23

NEW WORKS FOUND BY MONTEUX

Having spent a part of the past Summer in Europe in quest of new scores of interest, Pierre Monteux will perform a number of these during the coming forty-second regular season of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, which is to open on October 13. The works to be played for the first time here will be selected from the following:

From Russia, Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, and excerpts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Tsar Saltan" suite. There will be three French scores, which will be heard for the first time in America at these concerts—Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," the most notable production to date of the Parisian "Six," Chausson's "Soir de Fete" and Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux." This burlesque music, of which the popular "Swan" is a number, is familiar to the conductor, who took the viola part in its first performance by the Parisian society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano.

New English scores include "The Planets" of Holst, and new works by Eugene Goosens and Vaughn Williams, the composer of the London Symphony. The Spanish composer, Turina, will be represented, and the Italian composers Tomasini and Davico. There will be a number of native works which will be announced later. German music will be represented by a number of revivals notably symphonies by Bruckner and Mahler, Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and a work by Max Reger.

AMER. SEPT-23.

The 42d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin with the concert on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. The list of soloists has already been announced, but it may here be repeated.

Singers: Mmes. Alda, Hempel and Matzenauer.

Pianists: Messrs. Casella, Cortot, Moiseiwitsch, Powell, Schnabel and Mme. Samaroff.

Violinists: Messrs. Burgin, Enesco, Seidel and Spalding.

Violoncellist: Mr. Bedetti.

Organist: Marcel Dupre.

There is natural curiosity concerning the programs, the new works, or works that are unfamiliar, if not ultra-modern, the works that will be revived. Program-making is an art in itself. Many excellent conductors are in this respect disappointing. Mr. Monteux has been singularly fortunate. His programs have been well contrasted; due respect has been paid the worthies of past years; he has not been afraid of acquainting the audience with compositions showing the modern and also the ultra-modern tendencies. His taste is catholic, unusually so, as may be seen by looking at the programs since he has been conductor. To him music is not confined within the boundaries of any one country. Interpreting the works of composers, ancient and modern—French, German, Italian, Spanish, English, Russian, American—he has been cosmopolitan in his intelligent and forceful sympathy. He is not a conductor of any one school or of any particular period. In other words, he is not a "specialist." The Lord be praised!

Mr. Ernest Newman, discussing in August the programs of the Promenade Concerts in London, said that the "classics" are always safe for performance. Among the "classics" he included Grieg, Franck, Debussy and Rachmaninov, yet Debussy is still to the hidebound conservatives a radical, a dangerous fellow. Some may well rub their eyes at seeing Mr. Rachmaninov named by Mr. Newman, who says: "There are a few younger moderns for whom all of us have a certain respect, if not an enthusiasm. And there is a crowd of still younger men from whom a few people—chiefly the young ladies and gentlemen themselves—expect the most wonderful things, but whom the mass of musicians and the general public regard with a skepticism tempered by hope. Nowhere in all Europe is there a composer under thirty-five upon whom any level-headed musician would care to bank. Talents are as abundant as in the case of the novel; but hardly the hint of a real genius anywhere."

Musicians, even the "level-headed" ones, especially when they are composers, are not always sane judges or inspired prophets. Read Weber's articles about Beethoven's symphonies. Recall the many geese that Schumann in his critical articles insisted were swans. Of late years Mr. Newman has been rather contemptuous in his attitude toward the younger composers. At times he has written in an astonishing manner about some of the justly respected old ones.

Mr. Monteux, visiting Europe in July, met various composers with the view of bringing out in this country new or unfamiliar works by them. He also examined scores of composers no longer living; scores unknown to Boston audiences, as well as works, heard by audiences of former seasons, but new to the younger generation.

Among the compositions to be heard here for the first time will be Stravinsky's Suite from the "Pulcinella" music in the manner of Pergolese, and extracts from Stravinsky's "Sacre du Printemps," a ballet considered by some as this Russian's supreme work. When Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance of this extraordinary score in Paris, there were such scenes that the police intervened. Scriabin's "Poem of Ecstasy" has been performed here more than once. Mr. Monteux purposes to perform an earlier work, "The Divine Poem," by Scriabin, whose talent is called genius by his ardent admirers. There is also promise of the Suite derived from Rimsky-Korsakov's "Tsar-Saltan."

The English school will be represented by Holst, whose series of symphonic poems, "The Planets," has been characterized by the fastidious Mr. Newman, as one of the most significant English compositions; by Vaughan Williams, already and favorably known here by "On Wenlock Edge," brought out at one of Mr. Longy's concerts, and the "London" Symphony performed at Symphony concerts; by Eugene Goossens, whose music, hardly known in Boston, has been enthusiastically applauded in London and in cities of the European continent.

Compositions by Honegger, Chausson and Saint-Saens will be new to the symphony audience. Honegger will be represented by his "Horatius Triumphant," which has to do with the fight of the Horatii and the Curiatti, Roman and Alban brethren respectively. The surviving Horatius returning home slew his sister who was mourning the death of her betrothed, one of the Alban brothers—the subject of Corneille's tragedy, "Horace." Honegger, a Swiss by birth, a voluminous composer, is of the Parisian band of composers known as "The Six." Chausson's "Soir d'Ete" will be played. The symphony, symphonic poem "Vivian," chamber music, choral works and songs, with the "Poem" for violin of this composer, who died too soon, are justly esteemed here. Saint-Saens's "Carnival of Animals," a humorous score, was first performed in Paris at a concert of a quasi-private society, "La Trompette," when Saint-Saens was the pianist and Mr. Monteux played a viola in one of the double quartets of strings. This "Carnival" was recently revived in Paris. One of the numbers, "The Swan," has long been a favorite piece with violoncellists. Mme. Pavlowa dances to it.

Italians will be represented by Tommasini of Rome—the Kneisel quartet played a quartet by him in Boston—and Davico. Music by the Spaniard Turina will also be heard. He was first made known here by piano pieces played by George Copeland. An orchestral "Procession" has also been performed here, but not at a symphony concert.

There will be revivals of symphonies by Bruckner and Mahler, music by Max Reger and Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

As in the past Mr. Monteux will give marked attention to works by American composers; marked, we say, not careless, perfunctory attention.

The 24 programs will of course include the orthodox masterpieces of the established repertory.

HERALD-SEPT-24

Many Novelties for Symphony Season

BY OLIN DOWNES

The announcements of the new compositions to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, this winter will be for many as interesting if not even more interesting than the list of soloists engaged. If there is any form of musical performance in which the personality of an artist is lost sight of in the shadow of the greatness of music itself it is at the concerts given by this organization. There the composer rather than the performer is supreme, and, however gifted the virtuoso, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will surpass him in the wonder of its performances.

Mr. Monteux has girded his loins and will dare greatly in performing for the first time here excerpts from Strawinsky's ballet, "The Rites of Spring." This extraordinary score, built about symbolical dances of primitive people who worship nature and the sun which is awakening the earth to new life, aroused a riot in the theatre in Paris where Mr. Monteux conducted the first performance some years ago. Then the audience divided itself into two factions, pro and anti, which sprang at each other and relieved their feelings in ways other than musical. Excerpts from this ballet and a suite from a later work of Strawinsky, "Pulcinella," will be among the most important offerings.

Other Russian music will be Scriabine's "Divine Poem" and music in the form of an orchestral suite taken from Rimsky-Korsakoff's opera, "Tsar Saltan."

There are three works by French composers which will arouse intense curiosity in advance of the performance. One of these is "Horace Victorieux," by Honengger. Honegger is one of "the Six," the group of modern French composers, inspired largely by the example of Eric Satie, who in earlier years was rated a madman, but whose madness, genuine or apparent, has born fruit in the works of singularly gifted disciples. These men show highly radical tendencies. Their works have aroused hot discussion in Paris and in the musical centres of America.

An unknown work by Chausson, the composer of exquisite and poetic music, who died an untimely death in the '90s, is called "Soir de Fete." Finally there will be a performance of Saint-Saens' suite, "Carnival des Animaux," a work of the youth of the late famous composer, in which he gayly imitates the cries and noises of different animals.

One piece from this suite, the beautiful melody known as "The Swan," suggestive of the grave beauty of the swan as it floats on the waters, has become known and loved the western world over. Never before has the entire suite been played in America. Mr. Monteux himself played viola in one of the double quartets called for by the score, at a private performance at a meeting of that remarkable society of musicians known as "La Trompette," and led by Saint-Saens himself.

The time has happily come when Germany may be represented fully on the Boston Symphony programmes without calling up the hatreds and resentments for which Germany was primarily responsible in the late war. It is good to know that Mr. Monteux will play what some consider the greatest work Richard Strauss ever penned, his symphonic poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," after Nietzsche. Brucker and Mahler will also be represented on the programmes.

Modern Italian composers who have written music to be played for the first time here are Tommasini and Davico. The Spanish composer Turina will be represented, and a number of compositions by Americans are to be announced. The list of soloists includes the singers Frieda Hempel, Margarot Matzenauer, Frances Alda; the pianists Alfred Cortot, Berno Moisiewitsch, Alfredo Casella, Arthur Schnabel, John Powell, Olga Samaroff; the violinists Alfred Spalding, Toscha Siedel, Georges Enesco, Richard Burgin, with the brilliant young French organist, Marcel Dupre, and Jean Bedetti, first 'cellist of the Boston Symphony, as solo 'cellist.

SEPT. 24.

NEW WORKS ON SYMPHONY LIST

As a result of Pierre Monteaux's sojourn in Europe last July, many new works are to be performed in the coming season of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which is to begin on October 13-14.

There are to be three French works, Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chauson's "Soir de Fete" and Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux.' Russia will be represented by Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite, and excerpts from "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's third symphony and Rimsky-Karsakoff's "The Tale of the Tsar Sultan" suite.

Three English composers on the list are Vaughn Williams, Holst and Eugene Goosens. There will also be works by native composers.

The Spanish composer, Turina, is to be represented and the Italian composers, Tommasini and Davico. There will be several revivals of German scores.

ADVTSR-SEPT-24.

M. Pierre Monteux will open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston October 13. Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts—Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fete."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poet" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers Holst, Vaughn Williams and Eugene Goosens will be represented, the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico and the Spanish composer "Turina."

NY. HERALD-SEPT-24

Meanwhile word comes from Boston that Pierre Monteux, who is soon to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its native city on October 13, acquired a number of novelties during his recent stay abroad. These include Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," also selected for performance by Mr. Damrosch; Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fête." Mr. Monteux, it appears, is particularly familiar with Saint-Saens's burlesque, for at an early performance by the double string quartet of the Parisian Societe Privee he played the viola part, while the composer was the pianist of the occasion.

Russian music to be played by the Boston orchestra during the season will include Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite, after Pergolese, excerpts from the same composer's "Rites of Spring," Scriabine's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite "Tsar Saltan." Holst, Vaughan Williams and Eugene Goosens will represent England; Tommasini and Davico, Italy, and Turina, Spain. Mr. Monteux will also give special revivals of works by Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss.

N.Y. TRIBUNE SEPT-24

FROM
EVENING JOURNAL,
New York City

The Boston Orchestra, again under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will have its customary ten concerts, in Thursday and Saturday pairs, at Carnegie Hall. Mr. Monteux has also brought back from Europe a number of new works. He, too, will play the Saint-Saens "Carnaval" suite, whilst other novelties he has secured are: Arthur Honegger's "Horace victorieux" (Honegger is one of the Paris "Six), Chausson's "Soir de fete," Stravinsky's "Pulcinella" suite, after Pergolesi, and a part of his "Le sacre de printempe" and music by the Englishmen, Gustav Holst, Eugene Goossens and Vaughn Williams.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
SEP 24 1922

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, announces a number of new works for the forty second season of his organization, the list including three French scores—Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." The burlesque of Saint-Saens is particular familiar to the conductor who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double-string quartette of the Parisian private society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano. Honneger's score has been called, both in Paris and in London, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams and Eugene Goosens, will be represented, the Italian composers, Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer, "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra." Naturally the masterpieces of the established repertory will comprise the greater part of the Boston Symphony programs, to which the works mentioned above will yield first consideration.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
SEP 24 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

Famous Soloists to Appear With Orchestra in Brooklyn.

The series of five concerts to be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the Friday evenings of Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6 will be a part of what promises to be one of the busiest and most successful seasons the Boston Symphony Orchestra has ever had. Pierre Monteux has returned from Europe and is now preparing for the seasons opening in Boston on Oct. 13. This will be the forty-second season of the orchestra, and the fourth under his leadership. The splendid personnel of last year remains without any notable change.

The soloists engaged to appear at the five Brooklyn concerts are among the very greatest of the day. Formerly pre-eminent in opera, Frieda Hempel, since confining her career to the concert stage, has taken an equally high place as a mistress of song. Emma Calve, the great singing actress of France, with whom the role of Carmen is always associated, proved anew the vividly stirring dramatic qualities of her voice when she returned to this country last spring. Olga Samaroff, the Texan pianist, is among the foremost of her sex. Pablo Casals is the greatest 'cellist living; his playing is a revelation of unsuspected beauties in his chosen instrument. Georges Enesco, the noted composer of the "Roumanian Rhapsody," will be the most distinguished newcomer of the musical season in America. In Europe he has long been famous as a brilliant violinist.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
SEP 24 1922

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, has returned from Europe and is now making preparations for the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to open in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Oct. 13. The usual series of five Friday evening concerts will be given in the Brooklyn Academy of Music on Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 18 and April 6. Mr. Monteux will assemble the orchestra for rehearsal about the first of the month. The splendid personnel of last year remains, with no noteworthy change. A more distinguished list of soloists than those appearing at the Brooklyn series could scarcely be found. The two singers, Frieda Hempel and Emma Calve, are each pre-eminent in their particular fields. The pianists among the soloists will be Olga Samaroff, whose coming appearance will be particularly welcome to her many admirers, who were disappointed in the postponement of her engagements last season. Georges Enesco is known by his Roumanian Rhapsody wherever symphony music is heard, and is also admired for his Orchestral Suite. Pablo Casals is universally accepted as the greatest 'cellist in the world.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
SEP 25 1922

Pierre Monteux is now preparing to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on Oct. 13. Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts—Saint-Saëns's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fête." The burlesque of Saint-Saëns is particularly familiar to the conductor who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double string quartet of the Parisian private society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano.

Honneger's score has been called, both in London and in Paris, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six." Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers Holst, Vaughn Williams, and Eugene Goosens, will be represented, the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger, and Strauss's "Zarathustra."

NEW YORK
N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
ISSUE OF

Boston Symphony's Season of Novelties

Pierre Monteux, who is preparing the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to open in Boston on Oct. 13, announces a number of new works.

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts—Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." Russia music will include Stravinsky's suite from "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams, and Eugene Goosens, will be represented; the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer "Turina." There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra."

Slips of memory were inevitable in the compilation of the list of pieces that Mr. Monteux has in hand for the impending series of Symphony Concerts. These slips it is now possible to repair. The conductor purposes a repetition of Mr. Henry Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions"—the singular, exotic music of the Far East that made no small impression last spring. He has further discovered a little-known Canon of Schumann, arranged for orchestra by the Parisian, Dubois. To the chosen numbers from rising British composers should be added Eugene Goossens's tone-poem, "The Eternal Rhythm," his first symphonic piece to be heard in Boston.

TRANS-SEPT-25

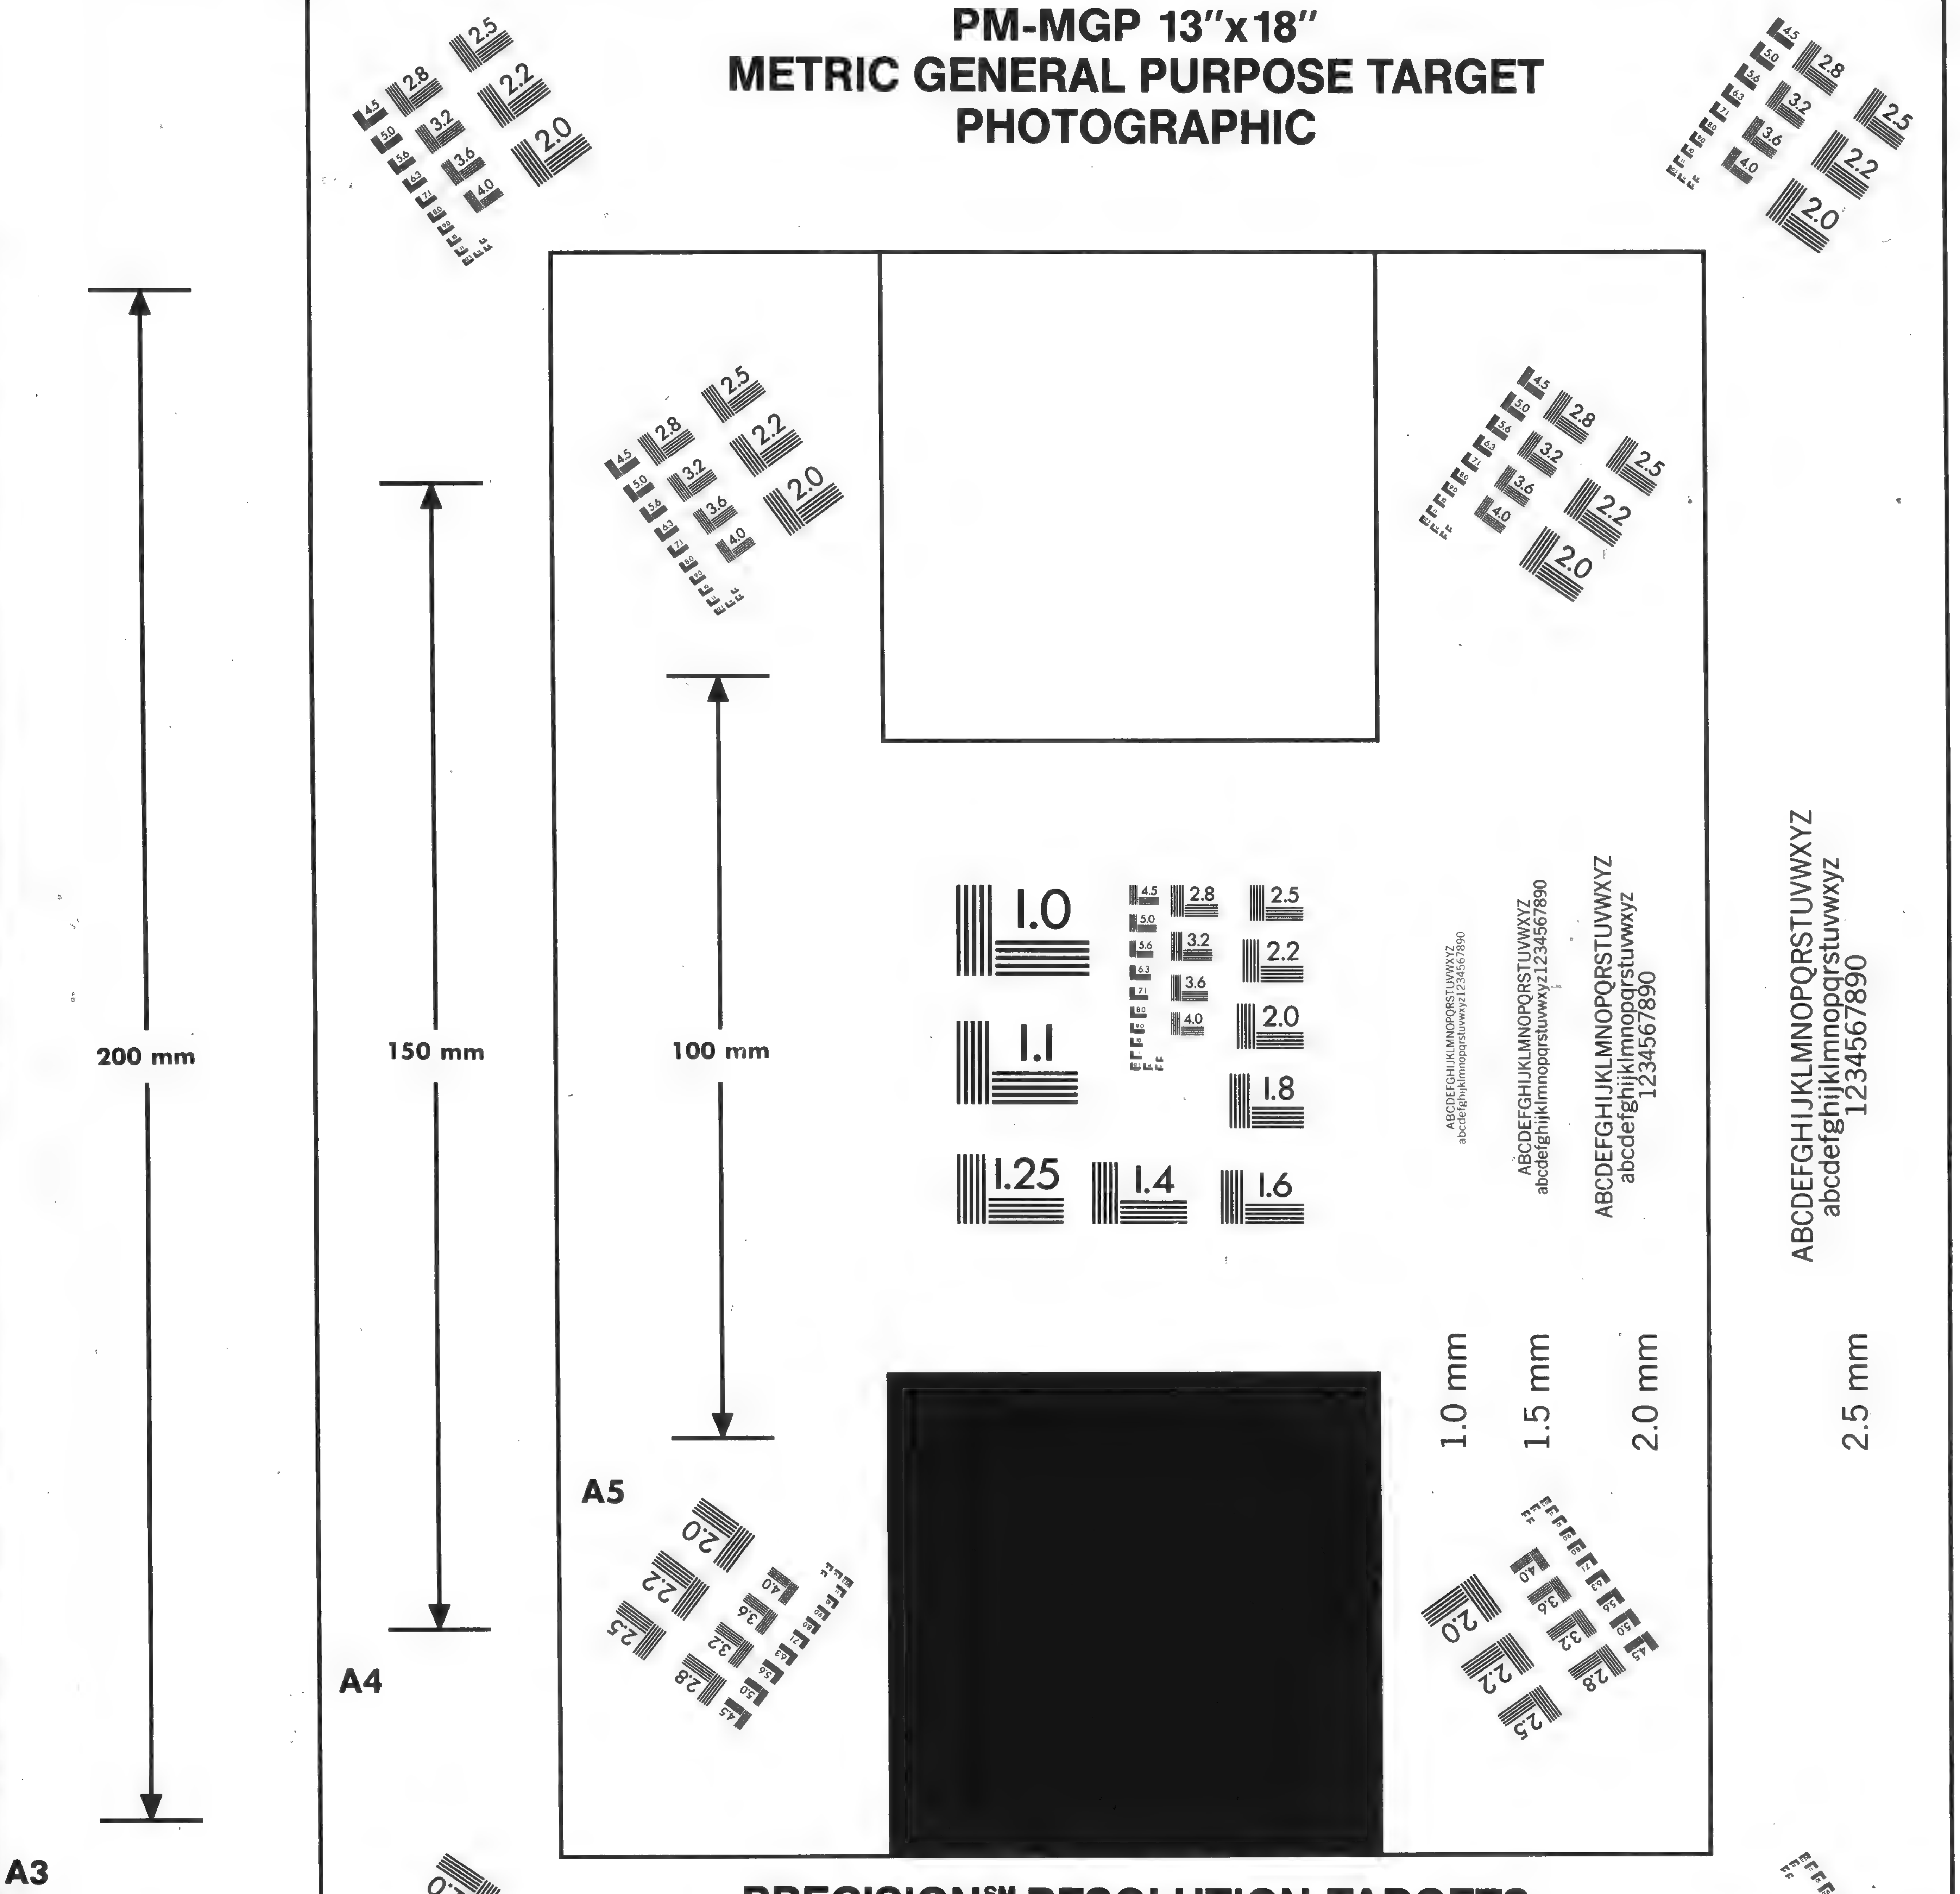
[9]

REDUCTION

RATIO

13x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
5.6
2.0
6.3
3.6
7.1
8.0
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm
A5
A4
A3

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

The Soloists for the Season of 1922-1923 Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening Concerts Which Begin October 13-14

OLGA SAMAROFF
Pianist.

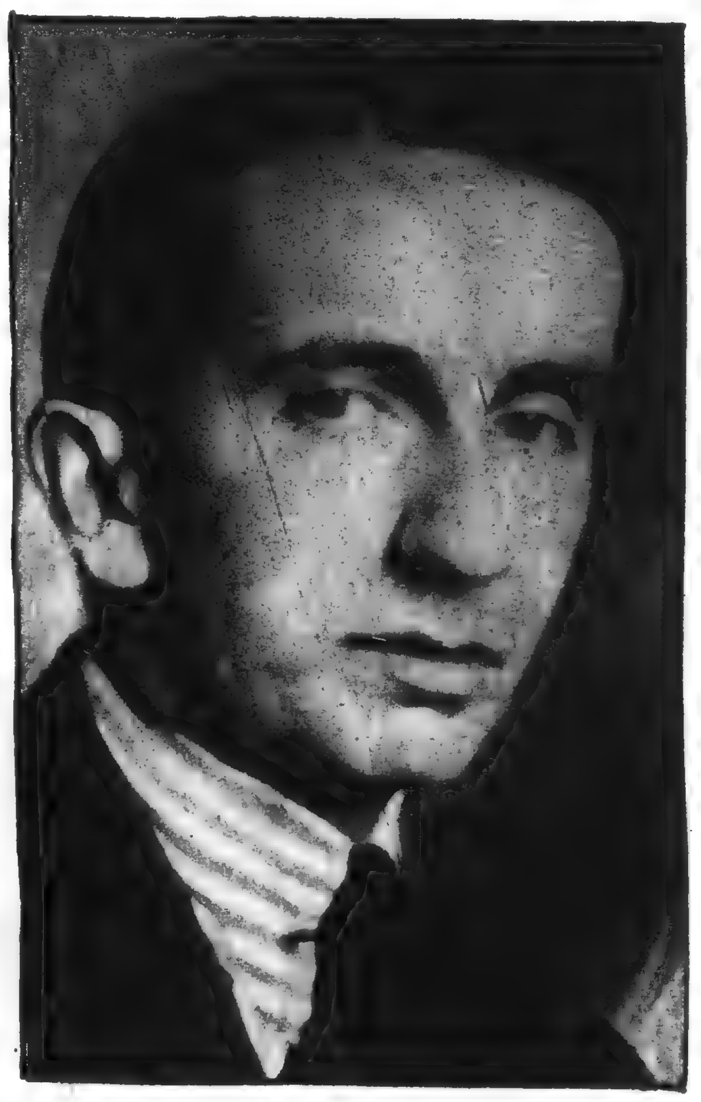
ALFRED CORTOT
French Pianist.

JOHN POWELL
Pianist.

FRIEDA HEMPEL
Soprano.
(Copyright, Ira L. Hill, New York)

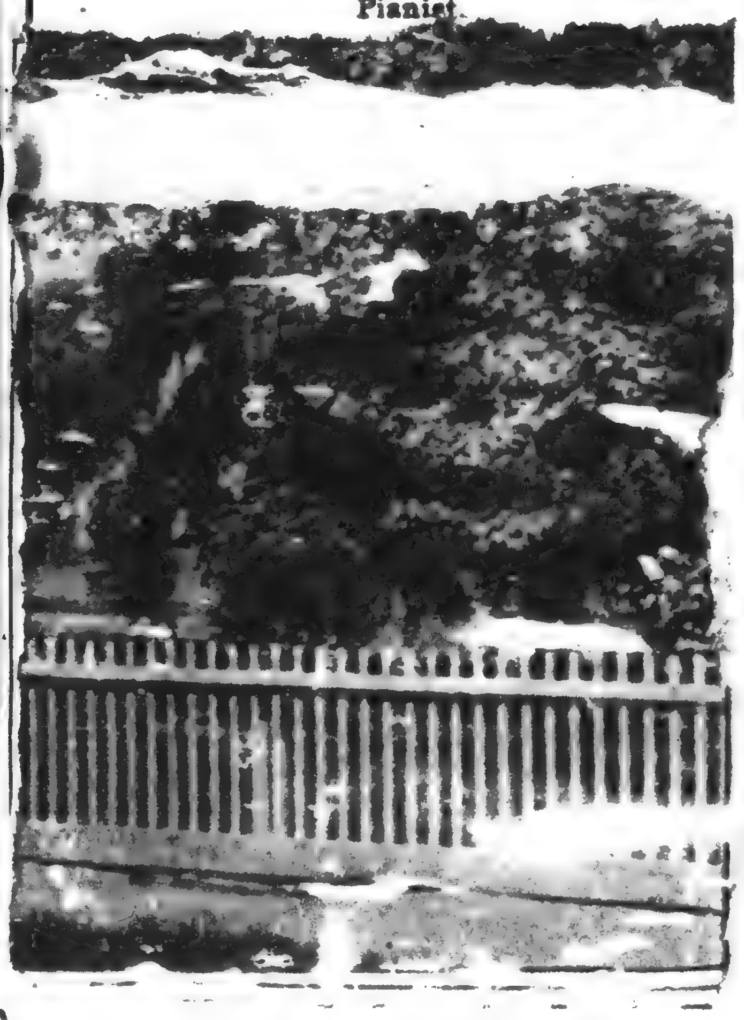
MARGARETE MATZENAUER
Soprano.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)

TOSCHA SEIDEL
Violinist.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)



ALFRED CASELLA
Pianist.

FRANCES ALDA
Soprano.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)



RTU S HNABEL
Pia ist.

ALBERT SPALDING
Violinist.

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH
Russian Pianist.

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux will assemble the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first rehearsal in Symphony Hall on Monday morning at 10 o'clock, in preparation for the coming season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The program for the opening pair of concerts, Oct. 13-14, will include Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," Enrico Bossi's "Theme and Variations" and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

TRAV. SEPT-30.

Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, in Symphony all, the first afternoon concert of the new ason by the Symphony Orchestra, with r. Monteux conducting. Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony;" a set of Variations by e Italian, Bossi; and Wagner's Prelude "The Mastersingers" fill the programme.

urday evening, Oct. 14, in Symphony Ha the first evening concert of the new eason by the Symphony Orchestra, with r. Monteux conducting, and the programme above noted.

TRANS- SEPT-30.

YMPHONY PROGRAM

Tomorrow morning in Symphony ha 10 o'clock, the Boston Symphony hestra will assemble for the first earsal in preparation for the comi eason, which is to include 24 Frid afternoon and 24 Saturday evening co certs, beginning Oct. 13-14. The pe sonnel of last season remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the follo ing program for the first pair of co certs: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphon will be the first number. This maste work includes the following descripti episodes: I, Dream; Passions; II, A Ba III, Scene in the Meadow; IV, March the Scaffold; V, A Witches' Sabbat "Theme and Variations" by the Itali composer, Enrico Bossi, will also b played, and the prelude to Wagner "Die Meistersinger."

HERALD Oct. 1

The first Symphony program, Oct 13 and 14, includes Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," a "Theme and Variations," by Enrico Bossi and the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." What has become of the custom of opening the season with a Beethoven symphony?

GLOBE-Oct. 1

First Symphony Programme

Tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble for the first rehearsal in preparation for the coming season, which is to include 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct. 13-14. The personnel of last season remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the following programme for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," "Theme and Variations," Enrico Bossi, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

POST-Oct. 1.

Familiar Works for Symphony Opening

TOMORROW morning the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble for the first rehearsal of the season, which begins October 13. The personnel remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the following program for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," "Theme and Variations" by Enrico Bossi and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" prelude.

ADVTSR-Oct. 1.

Beside the additional horn-players soon to join the Symphony Orchestra, two newcomers are already in their places—Mr. Allard among the bassoons and Mr. Ritter for virtuoso of the kettle-drums.

TRANS- Oct. 4.

SYMPHONY HOLDS FIRST REHEARSAL

Conductor Monteux Adds New Players to Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the musicians for the first time in Symphony Hall yesterday morning and conducted the first rehearsal of the season. The personnel is almost the same as last year, with two new members whom Mr. Monteux introduced before the playing began—Albert Ritter, timpanist, and Raymond Allard, bassoon.

In every way the coming 42d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the fourth under Pierre Monteux, promises to be particularly successful. The conductor has much music of interest and importance to put upon the programs. The subscription sale for the 24 pairs of concerts has never before been so large at this time of the year.

HERALD- Oct. 3.

First of Season's Rehearsals by Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the musicians for the first time in Symphony Hall yesterday morning and conducted the first rehearsal of the season. The splendid personnel is almost the same as last year, with two new members, whom Mr Monteux introduced before the playing began—Albert Ritter, timpanist, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. The program for the opening of the season will include Berlioz' "Fantastic"Symphony, Bossi's "Theme and Variations" and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" prelude.

In every way the coming 42d season of the orchestra, which will be the fourth under Pierre Monteux, promises to be successful. The conducter has much music of interest and importance to put upon the programs. The subscription sale has never before been so large at this time of the year.

GLOBE Oct. 3.

[10]

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The program as announced will be. Berlioz, "Symphonie Fantastique"; Bossi, Theme and Variations; Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

MONTR- Oct. 4.

Here in Boston

At the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 20 and 21, Mr. Monteux will include in his programme Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of Animals," the jeu d'esprit with lyric interludes that the composer withheld from performance in public during his life. At the Colonne Concerts in Paris last spring miscellaneous audiences heard the piece for the first time and were much amused. Privately Saint-Saëns now and then let the trifle be played; even took one of the piano-parts himself. Indeed in his days as chamber-musician Mr. Monteux himself shared in one of these performances. Hence his eagerness to make known "The Carnival" for the first times hereabouts and with the small, transparent orchestra for which Saint-Saëns designed it.

TRANS- Oct. 6.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts

Nine concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, October 19, November 16, December 7, 1922, January 11, February 8, March 1, March 22, April 12, and May 3, 1923.

The price of tickets for the series will be $10.00.

On October 4, application blanks for the purchase of season tickets will be mailed to all officers of the University living in Cambridge. After the filling of the applications of the officers, the remaining tickets will be put on public sale on Saturday, October 14, at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

HAVARD-UNIV. GZTTE. SEPT 30

The Soloists for the Season of 1922-1923 Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening Concerts Which Begin October 13-14

OLGA SAMAROFF
Pianist.

ALFRED CORTOT
French Pianist.

JOHN POWELL
Pianist.

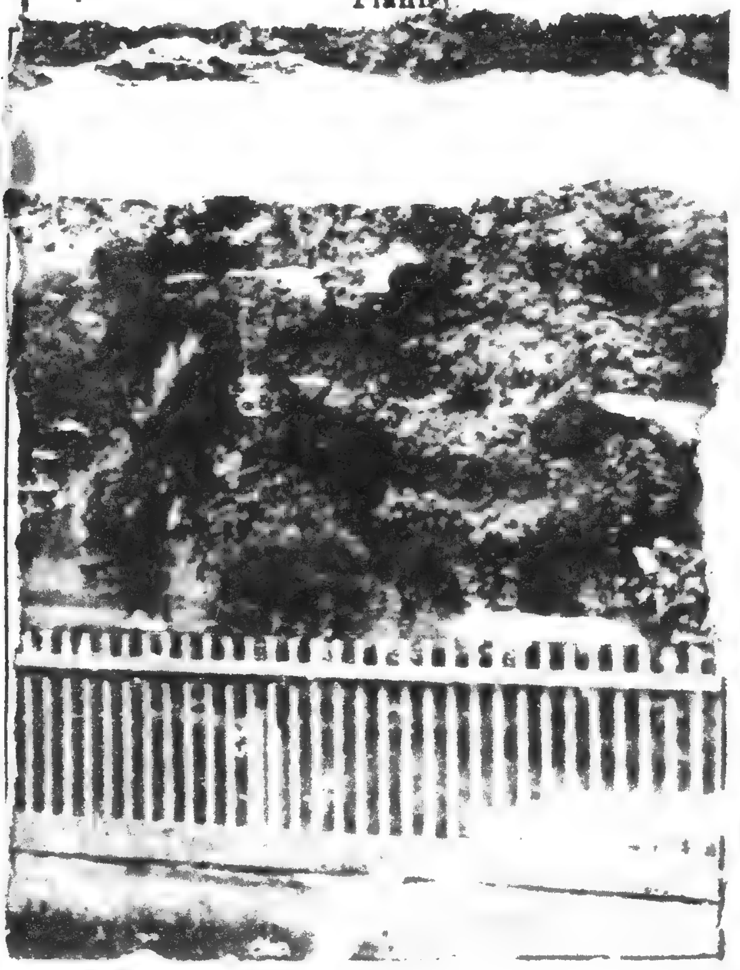
FRIEDA HEMPEL
Soprano.
(Copyright, Ira L. Hill, New York)

MARGARETE MATZENAUER
Soprano.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)

TOSCHA SEIDEL
Violinist.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)

ALFRED CASELLA
Pianist.

FRANCES ALDA
Soprano.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)



ARTUR SCHNABEL
Pianist.

ALBERT SPALDING
Violinist.

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH
Russian Pianist.

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux will assemble the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first rehearsal in Symphony Hall on Monday morning at 10 o'clock, in preparation for the coming season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The program for the opening pair of concerts, Oct. 13-14, will include Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," Enrico Bossi's "Theme and Variations" and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

TRAV. SEPT-30

Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, in Symphony all, the first afternoon concert of the new eason by the Symphony Orchestra, with r. Monteux conducting. Berlioz's "Fanstic Symphony;" a set of Variations by e Italian, Bossi; and Wagner's Prelude "The Mastersingers" fill the programme.

urday evening, Oct. 14, in Symphony all, the first evening concert of the new eason by the Symphony Orchestra, with r. Monteux conducting, and the programme above noted.

TRANS- SEPT 30

YMPHONY PROGRAM

omorrow morning in Symphony ha 10 o'clock, the Boston Symphony hestra will assemble for the first earsal in preparation for the com eason, which is to include 24 Frid afternoon and 24 Saturday evening co certs, beginning Oct. 13-14. The p sonnel of last season remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the follo ing program for the first pair of co certs: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphon will be the first number. This maste work includes the following descripti episodes: I, Dream; Passions; II, A Ba III, Scene in the Meadow; IV, March the Scaffold; V, A Witches' Sabbat "Theme and Variations" by the Italia composer, Enrico Bossi, will also b played, and the prelude to Wagner Meistersinger."

HERALD Oct. 1

The first Symphony program, Oct 13 and 14, includes Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," a "Theme and Variations," by Enrico Bossi and the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." What has become of the custom of opening the season with a Beethoven symphony?

GLOBE-Oct. 1.

First Symphony Programme

Tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble for the first rehearsal in preparation for the coming season, which is to include 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct. 13-14. The personnel of last season remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the following programme for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," "Theme and Variations," Enrico Bossi, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

POST-Oct. 1

Familiar Works for Symphony Opening

TOMORROW morning the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble for the first rehearsal of the season, which begins October 13. The personnel remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the following program for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," "Theme and Variations" by Enrico Bossi and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" prelude.

ADVTSR-Oct. 1.

Beside the additional horn-players soon to join the Symphony Orchestra, two newcomers are already in their places—Mr. Allard among the bassoons and Mr. Ritter for virtuoso of the kettle-drums.

TRANS- Oct. 4.

SYMPHONY HOLDS FIRST REHEARSAL

Conductor Monteux Adds New Players to Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the musicians for the first time in Symphony Hall yesterday morning and conducted the first rehearsal of the season. The personnel is almost the same as last year, with two new members whom Mr. Monteux introduced before the playing began—Albert Ritter, timpanist, and Raymond Allard, bassoon.

In every way the coming 42d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the fourth under Pierre Monteux, promises to be particularly successful. The conductor has much music of interest and importance to put upon the programs. The subscription sale for the 24 pairs of concerts has never before been so large at this time of the year.

HERALD- Oct. 3.

First of Season's Rehearsals by Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the musicians for the first time in Symphony Hall yesterday morning and conducted the first rehearsal of the season. The splendid personnel is almost the same as last year, with two new members, whom Mr Monteux introduced before the playing began—Albert Ritter, timpanist, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. The program for the opening of the season will include Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony, Bossi's "Theme and Variations" and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" prelude.

In every way the coming 42d season of the orchestra, which will be the fourth under Pierre Monteux, promises to be successful. The conductor has much music of interest and importance to put upon the programs. The subscription sale has never before been so large at this time of the year.

GLOBE- Oct. 3.

[10]

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be given in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The program as announced will be. Berlioz, "Symphonie Fantastique"; Bossi, Theme and Variations; Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

MONTR- Oct 4.

Here in Boston

At the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 20 and 21, Mr. Monteux will include in his programme Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of Animals," the jeu d'esprit with lyric interludes that the composer withheld from performance in public during his life. At the Colonne Concerts in Paris last spring miscellaneous audiences heard the piece for the first time and were much amused. Privately Saint-Saëns now and then let the trifle be played; even took one of the piano-parts himself. Indeed in his days as chamber-musician Mr. Monteux himself shared in one of these performances. Hence his eagerness to make known "The Carnival" for the first times hereabouts and with the small, transparent orchestra for which Saint-Saëns designed it.

TRANS- Oct 6.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts

Nine concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, October 19, November 16, December 7, 1922, January 11, February 8, March 1, March 22, April 12, and May 3, 1923.

The price of tickets for the series will be $10.00.

On October 4, application blanks for the purchase of season tickets will be mailed to all officers of the University living in Cambridge. After the filling of the applications of the officers, the remaining tickets will be put on public sale on Saturday, October 14, at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

HAVARD-UNIV. GZTTE. SEPT 30

The Soloists for the Season of 1922-1923 Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday Afternoon and Saturday Evening Concerts Which Begin October 13-14

OLGA SAMAROFF
Pianist.

ALFRED CORTOT
French Pianist.

JOHN POWELL
Pianist

FRIEDA HEMPEL
Soprano.
(Copyright, Ira L. Hill, New York)

MARGARETE MATZENAUER
Soprano.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)

TOSCHA SEIDEL
Violinist.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)

ALFRED CASELLA
Pianist.

FRANCES ALDA
Soprano.
(Copyright, Mishkin, New York)

ATU HNAEL
Pia st.

ALBERT SPALDING
Violinist.

BENNO MOISEIWITSCH
Russian Pianist.

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux will assemble the Boston Symphony orchestra for the first rehearsal in Symphony Hall on Monday morning at 10 o'clock, in preparation for the coming season of 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts.

The program for the opening pair of concerts, Oct. 13-14, will include Berlioz's, "Fantastic Symphony," Enrico Bossi's "Theme and Variations" and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

TRAV. SEPT-30

Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, in Symphony all, the first afternoon concert of the new eason by the Symphony Orchestra, with r. Monteux conducting. Berlioz's "Fanstic Symphony;" a set of Variations by e Italian, Bossi; and Wagner's Prelude "The Mastersingers" fill the programme.

turday evening, Oct. 14, in Symphony all, the first evening concert of the new eason by the Symphony Orchestra, with r. Monteux conducting, and the programme above noted.

TRANS- SEPT 30

YMPHONY PROGRAM

omorrow morning in Symphony h t 10 o'clock, the Boston Symphony hestra will assemble for the first earsal in preparation for the com eason, which is to include 24 Frid afternoon and 24 Saturday evening co certs, beginning Oct. 13-14. The p sonnel of last season remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the follo ing program for the first pair of co certs: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphon will be the first number. This maste work includes the following descripti episodes: I, Dream; Passions; II, A Ba III, Scene in the Meadow; IV, March the Scaffold; V, A Witches' Sabbat "Theme and Variations" by the Itali composer, Enrico Bossi, will also l played, and the prelude to Wagner "Die Meistersinger."

HERALD Oct. 1

The first Symphony program, Oct 13 and 14, includes Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," a "Theme and Variations," by Enrico Bossi and the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." What has become of the custom of opening the season with a Beethoven symphony?

GLOBE-Oct. 1.

First Symphony Programme

Tomorrow morning in Symphony Hall, at 10 o'clock, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble for the first rehearsal in preparation for the coming season, which is to include 24 Friday afternoon and 24 Saturday evening concerts, beginning Oct. 13. The personnel of last season remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the following programme for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," "Theme and Variations," Enrico Bossi, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

POST-Oct. 1

Familiar Works for Symphony Opening

TOMORROW morning the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble for the first rehearsal of the season, which begins October 13. The personnel remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the following program for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," "Theme and Variations" by Enrico Bossi and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" prelude.

ADVTSR-Oct. 1.

Beside the additional horn-players soon to join the Symphony Orchestra, two newcomers are already in their places—Mr. Allard among the bassoons and Mr. Ritter for virtuoso of the kettle-drums.

TRANS- Oct. 4.

SYMPHONY HOLDS FIRST REHEARSAL

Conductor Monteux Adds New Players to Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the musicians for the first time in Symphony Hall yesterday morning and conducted the first rehearsal of the season. The personnel is almost the same as last year, with two new members whom Mr. Monteux introduced before the playing began—Albert Ritter, timpanist, and Raymond Allard, bassoon.

In every way the coming 42d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be the fourth under Pierre Monteux, promises to be particularly successful. The conductor has much music of interest and importance to put upon the programs. The subscription sale for the 24 pairs of concerts has never before been so large at this time of the year.

HERALD- Oct. 3.

First of Season's Rehearsals by Symphony Orchestra

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, assembled the musicians for the first time in Symphony Hall yesterday morning and conducted the first rehearsal of the season. The splendid personnel is almost the same as last year, with two new members, whom Mr Monteux introduced before the playing began—Albert Ritter, timpanist, and Raymond Allard, bassoon. The program for the opening of the season will include Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony, Bossi's "Theme and Variations" and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" prelude.

In every way the coming 42d season of the orchestra, which will be the fourth under Pierre Monteux, promises to be successful. The conductor has much music of interest and importance to put upon the programs. The subscription sale has never before been so large at this time of the year.

GLOBE- Oct. 3.

The first pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, [illegible] in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, and Saturday evening, Oct. 14. The program announced will be, Berlioz, "Symphonie Fantastique"; Bossi, Theme and Variations; Wagner, Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

MONTR- Oct 4.

Here in Boston

At the second pair of Symphony Concerts on Oct. 20 and 21, Mr. Monteux will include in his programme Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of Animals," the jeu d'esprit with lyric interludes that the composer withheld from performance in public during his life. At the Colonne Concerts in Paris last spring miscellaneous audiences heard the piece for the first time and were much amused. Privately Saint-Saëns now and then let the trifle be played; even took one of the piano-parts himself. Indeed in his days as chamber-musician Mr. Monteux himself shared in one of these performances. Hence his eagerness to make known "The Carnival" for the first times hereabouts and with the small, transparent orchestra for which Saint-Saëns designed it.

TRANS- Oct. 6.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts

Nine concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in Sanders Theatre on Thursday evenings, October 19, November 16, December 7, 1922, January 11, February 8, March 1, March 22, April 12, and May 3, 1923.

The price of tickets for the series will be $10.00.

On October 4, application blanks for the purchase of season tickets will be mailed to all officers of the University living in Cambridge. After the filling of the applications of the officers, the remaining tickets will be put on public sale on Saturday, October 14, at the University Bookstore, Cambridge.

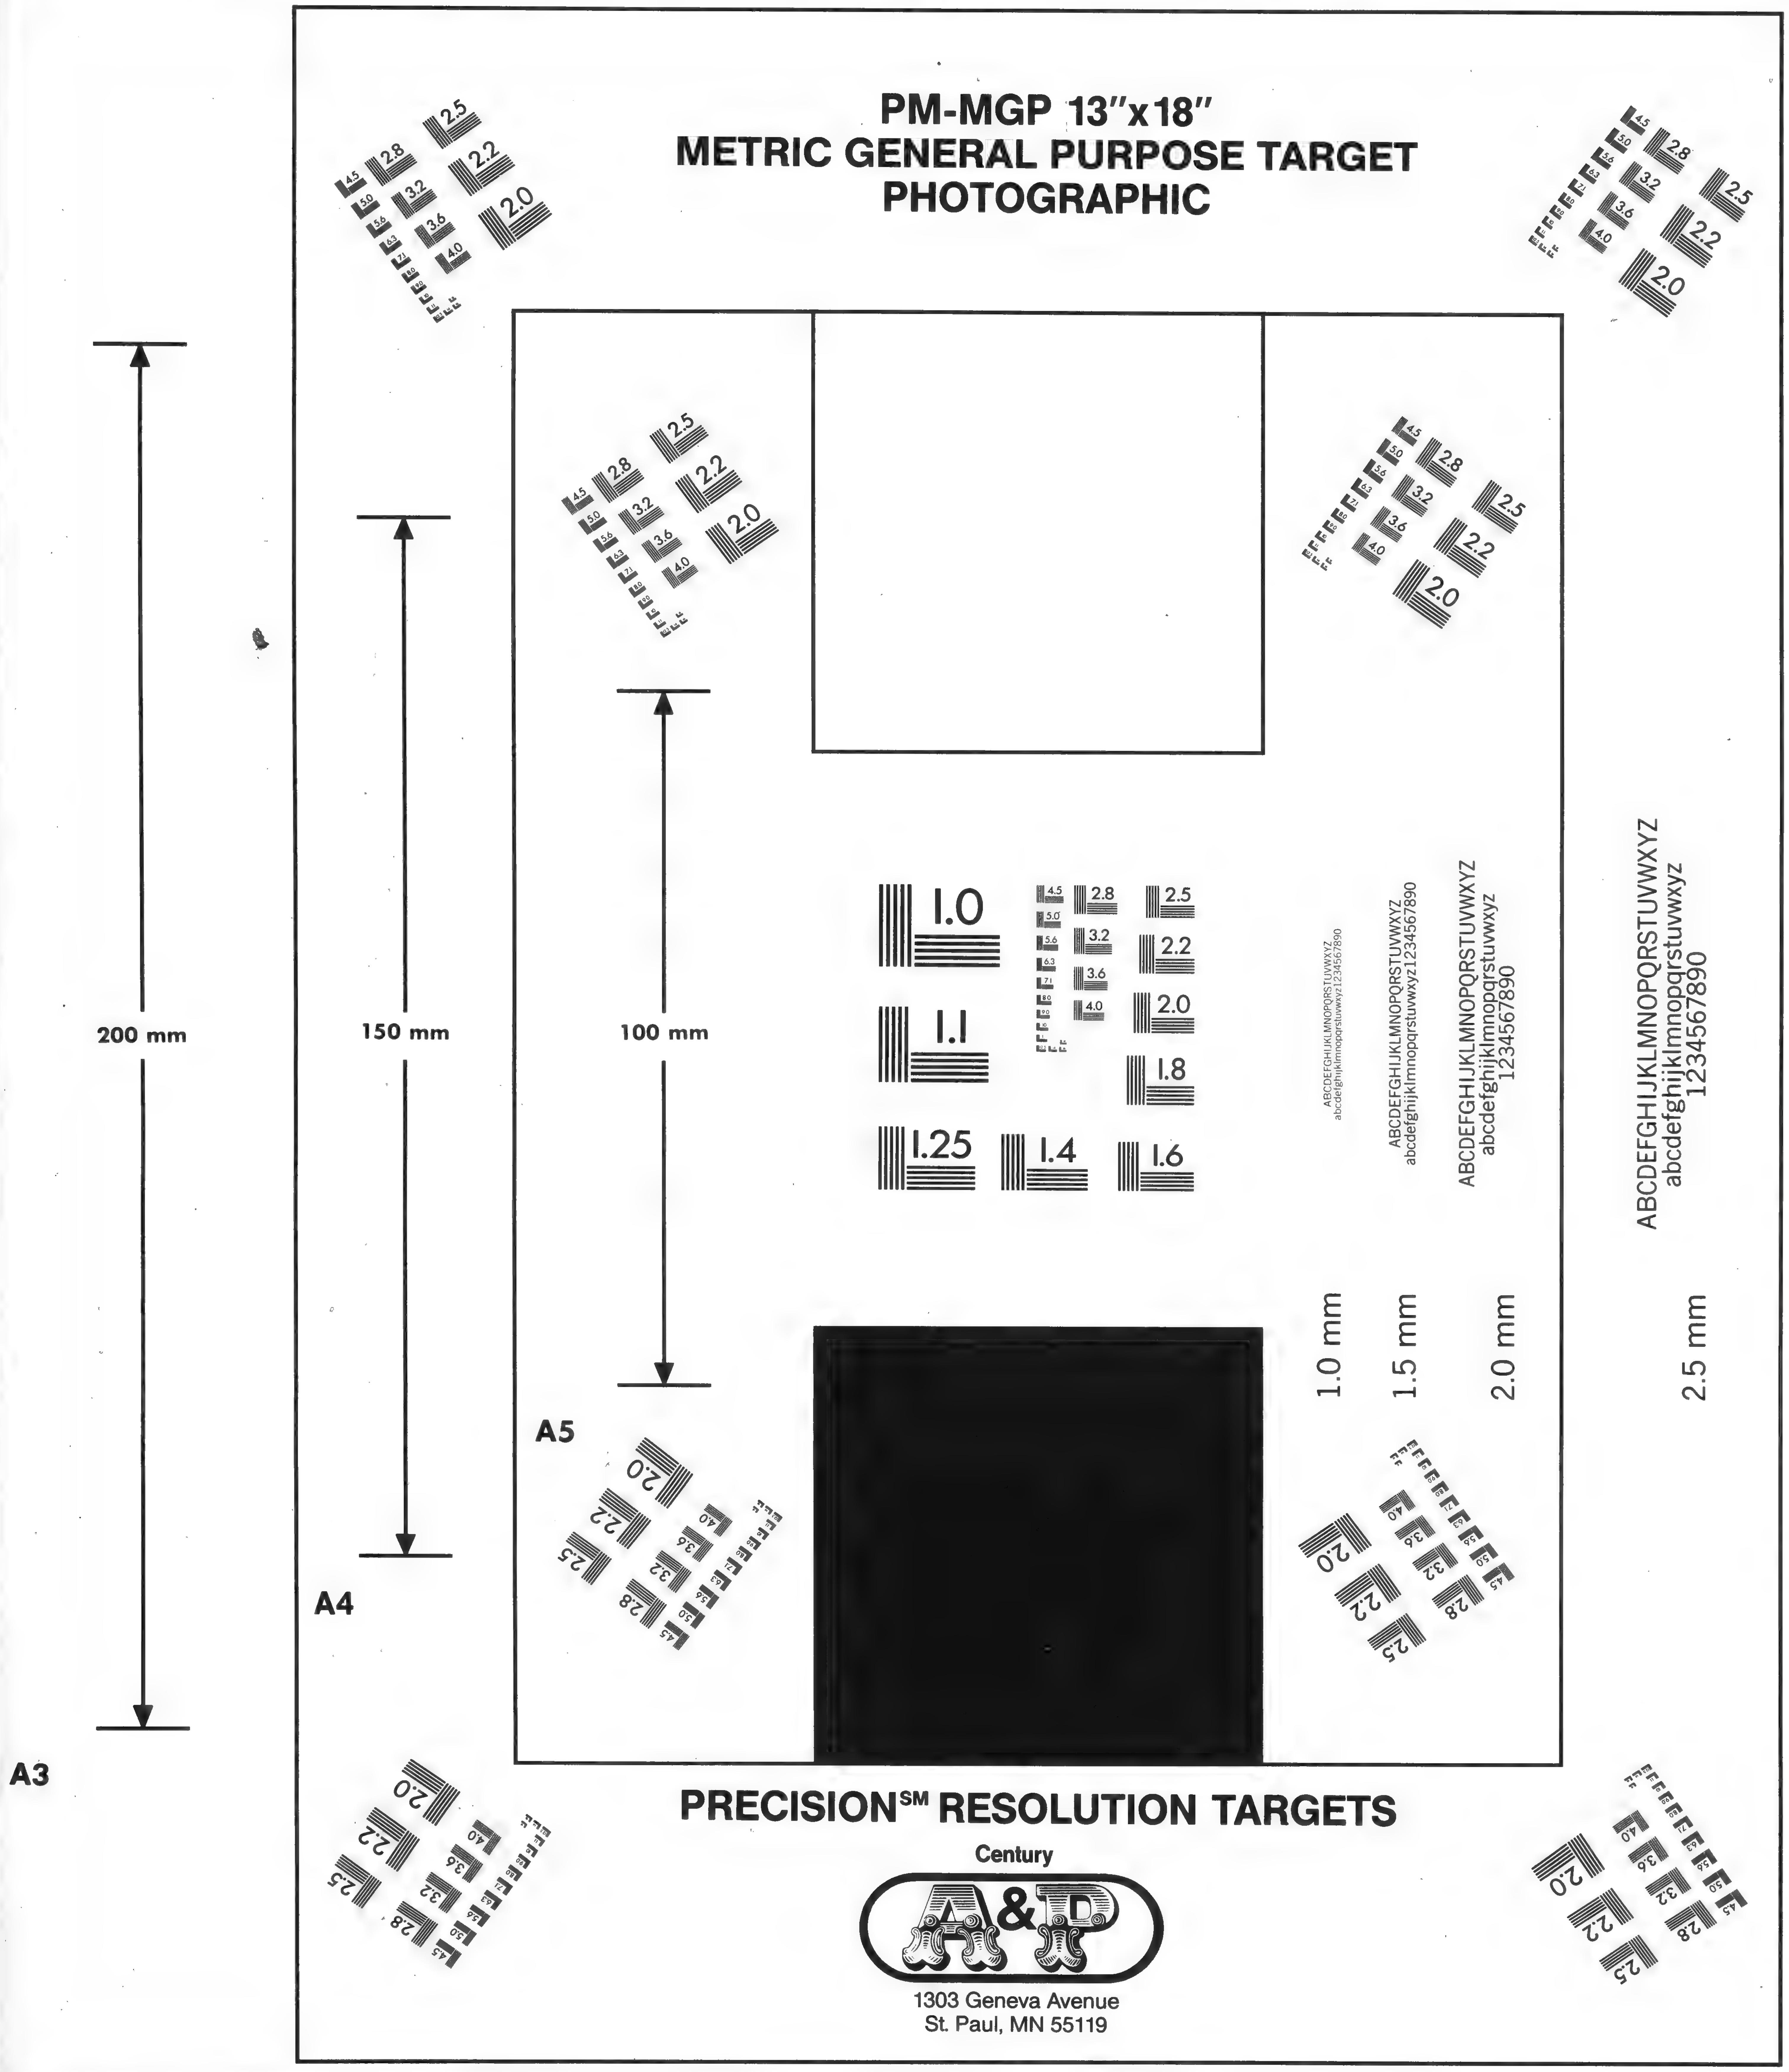
HAVARD-UNIV. GZTTE. SEPT 30

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
3.2
5.6
2.0
3.6
4.0
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
A5
A4
A3
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

From SUN

Address New York City

Date SEP 2 7 192

Boston Symphony Plans.

Having interviewed several composers during his sojourn in Europe last July, Pierre Monteux, who is now preparing to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 13, announces a number of new works of interest.

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts—Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." The burlesque of Saint-Saens is particularly familiar to the conductor who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double string quartet of the Parisian private society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano. Honneger's score has been called, both in Paris and in London, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan," in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams and Eugene Goosens, will be represented, the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer, "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra." Naturally, the master pieces of the established repertory will comprise the greater part of the Boston Symphony program, to which the works mentioned above will yield first consideration.

IN the usual place, on the usual day and hour, under the usual circumstances, the Symphony Orchestra will begin a new series of concerts—in Symphony Hall; on Friday afternoon at 2.30 and on Saturday evening at 8; with the band little changed in personnel; with Mr. Monteux entering upon the fourth year of his conductorship; with every omen auspicious for the months to come. The one departure from custom is the substitution at the opening concerts of a symphony by Berlioz ("The Fantastic") for a symphony of Beethoven. Then follow a new set of ten variations by the Italian, Bossi, oftener applauded in Germany than in his own Italy. For ending stands Wagner's masterpiece of glowing instrumental song, the prelude to "The Mastersingers." All three numbers are music in which Mr. Monteux should excel.

TRANS- Oct. 7.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY

Pierre Monteux has compiled the following program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony, a theme with ten variations by Enrico Bossi, the celebrated living Italian composer, and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The score of Bossi will be heard in Boston for the first time.

TRAV- Oct. 1.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony" will be the opening number of the symphony concert season, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall. The "Theme With Variations," by Enrico Bossi, and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude are the other numbers.

ADVTSR - Oct. 8.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony will be the opening number of the symphony concert season on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. This score, set for an enlarged orchestra, was inspired by Henrietta Smithson, the object of Berlioz's love. The love theme undergoes the following transformations: Dreams, Passions, a Ball, Scene in the Meadows, March to the Scaffold, a Witches' Sabbath—according to the composer's fancy.

A Theme with Variations, by Enrico Bossi, the famous Italian composer, will also be played. These 10 variations, which have never been heard in Boston, include Scherzo, Larghetto, Zingaresca, March, Pastorale, Recitative and Chorale. The program will close with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

HERALD- Oct. 8.

Mr. Ikswokots announces that he will conduct, for the "first time at these concerts," the "Scallic Rhapsody" ("Scallic" derived from "scales," i. e., fish scales—a "scaly" composition), by the Norseman, Suilebis. Feverish excitement ensues, while telephone orders deluge the box office.

But Hcsormad, conductor of a rival organization, is equal to the occasion. Hardly have the papers purveyed the announcement of Ikswokots that Hcsormad states that on the same date he will produce the "Psychopathic Suite," which employs six gramophones and 18 Sousaphones in the score, by Soundambad, for the first time in America. More excitement. [illegible] in the [illegible] orgies [illegible]

All this, [illegible] [illegible] insignificance when Xuetnomerriep, with Gallic sangfroid, discloses the "coup d'etat" by which he has secured, ahead of either of his rivals, the right to performance, for the first time anywhere on earth, the "Orthopedic" Sonata by Strikemstiff, a work which calls for an augmented orchestra, further increased by the addition of 12 colored candles, three fog horns, 18 different odors and jewsharp obligato. Several critics faint on receiving this information. The hall is sold out days in advance, the press froths at the mouth, the audience achieves a riot before the last note has sounded.

When Conductors Meet

In a word, diplomacy, both of the open and secret varieties, is not confined to governments. We are reminded of this by approaching performances of Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux" ("The Animals' Carnival"), which Saint-Saens, in his whimsical youth, wrote for performance before the members of that extraordinary French music society known as "La Trompette." This work, which the world is only now to hear, is issued by the publishers in two arrangements, the first the original arrangement in which it was played for "La Trompette"—an arrangement for a double string quartet and two pianos, the second an arrangement for small orchestra, including two pianos. It befell that Mr. Monteux of Boston and Mr. Damrosch of the New York Symphony both desired the honor of first performance of the music. Mr. Monteux triumphed.

By prestige or by persuasion, he obtained the privilege of playing the suite at the Boston Symphony concerts of the 20th and 21st of October, while Mr. Damrosch contented himself with the concession of the first performance in New York, to take place Oct. 29. Both parties consented to this arrangement, and declared honor satisfied.

They need not so have bestirred themselves. It develops that a first performance of the "Carnival des Animaux" was given last summer at a popular open-air concert in Ravinia Park!

A significant feature of this suite by Saint-Saens is the names of the "animals." There are, for example, "Cocks and Chickens," also "Elephants," "Turtles," "Personages with big ears," "Cuckoo in the depths of the woods," and "pianists." ("Animals" would be, in the opinion of some concert goers,

---

POST- Oct. 8.

The orchestral parts of Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of Animals" have arrived too late from Paris for Mr. Monteux to include the piece in the Symphony Concerts of Oct. 20 and 21. He has now set it on the programme for Nov. 3 and 4—the fourth pair of concerts. At the second pair, conductor and orchestra will play, instead, a symphony of Dvorák in D minor, a bright, flowing, naive piece, hitherto unheard in Boston.

TRANS- Oct. 9.

The Symphony concerts begin this afternoon. Bossi's Theme with Variations, which will be played here for the first time, was written a good many years ago. He is known in Boston by his "Goldonian Intermezzi" for orchestra, his "Paradise Lost," which was performed by the Handel and Haydn Society, and by his many pieces for the organ. The years rush by, and Bossi today is a member of the old guard; not one of the young Italians—among them Resphigi, Pizetti and Malipiero—whose music is so disquieting to the conservatives here and abroad.

The other pieces on the program are the Fantastic Symphony, by which Berlioz sought to revenge himself on the actress, Miss Smithson—he took complete revenge by marrying her later—and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

At the second Symphony concert Mme. Frances Alda will sing an air from Korngold's opera, "The Dead City," and two songs with orchestra by Joseph Marx of Graz. This will be her first appearance at a Symphony concert in Boston. A symphony, No. 3 by Dvorak, will be played for the first time in this city, and so will "Fairy Tale," by Rimsky-Korsakov, inspired by Pushkin's introduction to his "Russlan and Ludmilla." Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has not been performed here for several years, will end the concert. Those who are deeply versed in the philosophy of Nietzsche will not fail to be present.

Carmela Ippolito, the young violinist of Boston, whose talent is undisputed, will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge this season.

HERALD- Oct. 13.

WEEK-END PLEASURES BY AUTUMN RENEWED

Contrasts of Audiences Before the Symphony Orchestra — The Vanished Neumann—A Ripened Elman Plays as in Years Boston Has Not Heard Him, to Zest Adding Measure—Programme and Incidents

TO the student of audiences—and all reviewers are necessarily such—the company of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts is perennially inexplicable. Beyond peradventure, it is no less warmly disposed toward Mr. Monteux than is the assembly of Saturday evening. Yet the latter audience was twice as hearty, at the week-end, in welcome to the conductor for the beginning of a new year. Both companies, plainly and rightly, wished to include the orchestra in this greeting. On Friday afternoon [illegible] of an [illegible] back for the third time—the appointed moment to bid the band share plaudits. Therewith the house crackled with clapping. No such persistence was necessary on Saturday evening; while yet more generous was the applause for the standing men. Only a few hands warmed on Friday to Bossi's Variations; more answered to them on Saturday; yet, the pleased, among the surrounding waste of indifference, were probably as numerous on the one occasion as the other. So it goes. On Saturdays the audience at the Symphony Concerts knows its mind and manifests it. On Fridays almost never does it speak out.

Except one, changes in the personnel of the orchestra proved so few and insignificant, as to warrant little prattle. That one, however, was readily discoverable. Mr. Neumann, for long the virtuoso of the kettle-drums, visible, audible and arresting from every corner of Symphony Hall, has quit the band—for no other reason than an unquenchable desire to return to his native Germany. Mr. Ritter succeeds him—no doubt as able a tympanist, but by no means so vivid a figure. For other prattle, came both dissent and assent to the change in the hour for the beginning of the evening concerts. Mistrustful elders, after their habit, merely disliked a departure from ancient custom. As naturally a younger generation approved it.

For both, however, the chief concern, at either concert, was the eager hearing of symphonic music, after nearly six months' interval, and the re-appraisal of an orchestra, from the outset well in the vein. The more the pity, then, that Mr. Monteux should have sought on Saturday to make the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" sound even more sonorous and sweeping than it had on Friday. To that end, he goaded himself, orchestra and audience. The inevitable outcome was a performance that soon became coarse-voiced; while many a detail of beauty or significance ran blurred through such a surging smother of tone. The amends was the graphic performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." A diagrammed, blue-printed, meticulously ordained music are these "dreams, visions, passions," in spite—or because—of the romantic intensities, real as reality to Berlioz, in which he would clothe them. Thereby in these days do they sound so dry, thin, calculated, labored. Yet Mr. Monteux missed not a jot or tittle of the lengthy pages; while oftener than not, he and his virtuosi animated them.

The concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening will begin with Dvorák's Symphony in F Major, played for the first time hereabouts. It will end with the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"; while the middle piece is Mr. Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne," deservedly revived. The new singer, Miss d' Espinoy Colonne of Paris, will be heard in The Naiad's Air from Gluck's "Armida" and in two songs, "Absence" and "Villanelle," with music by Berlioz to verses of Théophile Gauthier.

The frequenters of our concert-halls have cause for pleasure in a fashion of the hour. Pinks and reds, it seems, are modish colors. Last Friday, Saturday and Sunday, they were discoverable in Symphony Hall and, out of the massed neutrality of Bostonian gowns, shone dots of brightness.

TRANS- Oct. 16.

For Cambridge

As usual Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will be heard in nine concerts in Cambridge, from October into May. As usual they will take place in Sanders Theatre at Harvard on Thursday evenings, viz.: Oct. 19, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, March 1, March 22, April 12, May 3. As usual there will be an "assisting artist" at all the concerts (but one) of the series. These singers, pianists, violinists and violoncellists will come from the orchestra itself, from the soloists engaged for its concerts in Boston, from established or rising talents for which conductor and management would open the way. Thus from the band comes on Jan. 11, Mr. Schroeder, the violoncellist, from the "assisting artists" for Boston, Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, on Dec. 7, and Mr. Casella, composer and pianist, on March 1; from proved abilities Miss Roberts, the contralto, on Feb. 8 and Mme. Ferrabini-Jacchia on March 22; from promising abilities Miss Ippolito, the violinist, on Nov. 16 and Miss Church, the pianist, on April 12; for brand newcomer, finally, Madeleine d' Espinoy Colonne, soprano singer, on Oct. 19. Hospitable are these audiences of Cambridge! As last year, subscriptions to the concerts may be renewed at the University Bookstore through Saturday, Oct. 7. New subscribers will have their turn from Oct. 14.

Trans 10/6

Monitor 10/11

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct. 13 and 14, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give the first pair of the season's concerts. The program as announced is: "Fantastic" Symphony by Berlioz, Variations for Orchestra by Bossi, and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers" of Nuremburg. Bossi's Variations will be heard for the first time in Boston.

Items and Announcements

Trans 10/11

Usually Mr. Monteux reserves his tone-poem of Strauss until the Symphony Concerts of the spring. This season, however, he prefers it on a programme of autumn and "Thus Spake Zarathustra," unheard in Boston since Dr. Muck's day, will be the major item of the concerts on Oct. 20 and 21.

[11]

Bohlmann School of Music. It promises, with the plans already projected, to be one of the largest and most important schools in the South.

Mr. Klibansy has aroused great interest among the singers of the South by his presence in Memphis, and his classes are constantly increasing. The singers are most enthusiastic over their work with him, and Mr. Bohlmann has already engaged him for another master class next

---

Boston, Mass., September 23.—Having interviewed several composers during his sojourn in Europe last July, Pierre Monteux, who is now preparing to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 13, announces a number of new works of interest.

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts: Saint-Saëns' "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fête." The burlesque of Saint-Saëns is particularly familiar to the conductor, who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double string quartet of the Parisian private society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano. Honneger's score has been called, both in Paris and in London, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams, and Eugene Goossens, will be represented, as well as the Italian composers, Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger, and Strauss' "Zarathustra." Naturally, the masterpieces of the established repertory will comprise the greater part of the Boston Symphony programs, to which the works mentioned above will yield first consideration.

MUS-COURIER- SEPT 28.

Paderewski Returns

The new music of the season will, according to announcement from Symphony Hall, be chosen from the following works not hitherto played at these concerts: 'Soir de Fete," Chausson; "Carnival des Animaux," Saint-Saens; "Horace Victorieux," Honegger; "Polichinelle," Stravinsky; "The Divine Poem," Skriabin; a suite from "Tzar Saltan," Rimsky Korsakov; "The Planets," Holst, and unspecified pieces by Vaughn-Williams, Goossens, Turina, Davico and Tommasini. Revivals of Bruckner, Mahler, Reger and of Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" are promised. The greater part of the programs as always will be filled with

---

Here in Boston

Trans 9-29

It is good to find Mr. Monteux breaking again with institutional precedent. No doubt Beethoven is the keystone of symphonic music. No doubt the playing of one or another of his symphonies is becoming rite at the beginning of a new series of Symphony Concerts. Yet, since those symphonies rise superior to time and place, need they always provide such "opening piece"? Seemingly Mr. Monteux judges not. For he will begin the first concerts of the Boston Orchestra, on Oct. 13 and 14, with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" and follow it with a set of variations by the Italian, Bossi, and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers," a gloriously festal music.

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Amer 9/30

Pierre Monteux will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first rehearsal in Symphony Hall on Monday morning at 10 o'clock, in preparation for the coming season of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts.

The program for the opening pair of concerts, October 13-14, will include Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," Enrico Bossi's "Theme and Variations," and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Items and Announcements

Trans 10/13

As already made known Strauss's "Zarathustra" will end the Symphony Concerts next week. A pretty little symphony in F major by Dvorák will begin then; in F major by Dvorák will begin then; [illegible] in Boston, will be one of Rimsky-Korsakov's fanciful orchestral exercises "Fairy Legend." Between whiles, Mme. Alda of the Metropolitan Opera House will sing Tosca's hackneyed soliloquy from her opera by Puccini and two songs by Josef Marx, little known but in some respects remarkable Viennese composer.

Trans — Oct 11

New Music by Bossi from the Symphony Orchestra This Week—Strauss's "Zarathustra" in Prospect—New York Hears the San Franciscans — Paderewski at Worcester

IN 1915, so the story goes, Dr. Muck was minded to produce at the Symphony concerts a "Theme with Variations," by Enrico Bossi, which had greatly struck his fancy. Attempt was made to procure from the German publishers of the piece a set of the orchestral parts, but war-time conditions prevented, and the projected performance was indefinitely postponed. Last summer the score, which had been gathering dust on the shelves of the Orchestra's library, came to Mr. Monteux's attention. He, too, thought well of it—well enough, in fact, to give it place on the programme for the first pair of concerts now impending.

Those who know Bossi as an orchestral composer only through the tasteful "Goldonian Intermezzi" for strings, heard here several seasons ago, will find these Variations surprising. In the Intermezzi Bossi wrote as a light-handed Latin. In the music to be heard here Friday and Saturday his technical procedure is more akin to that of the heavier-handed Teutons of the latter nineteenth century. These Variations are written for ful orchestra, with all that that term usually implies, even to an elaborate array of pulsatile instruments. Large and impressive sonorities are sought—and gained. The texture of the score is often intricate—at times to the point of turbidity. As often again it is transparent, ingeniously woven, and much of the instrumenation is charmingly colored.

The theme (in E major) from which the Variations spring is announced immediately by divided violas, flute, clarinet and bassoons, and the first portion of it arrests attention through the wide leaps in the melody and the striking sequence of diatonic seventh chords in the accompanying harmony. Incidentally the two upper and the two lower voices move in parallel fifths—the progression abhored of pedants—and much use of these same fifths is made throughout the score. Contrary to precedent the theme itself is subjected to a brief development before the variations proper begin. The latter are ten in number, and five of them bear independent titles—Idilio, Zingaresa, Alla, Marcia and Corale. As in all such pieces nowadays, the treatment of the theme is exceedingly free, but though it is made to serve as the basis for musical pictures of widely divergent character, its presence is for the most part readily detected. Bossi is one of the most prolific of living composers, and these Variations, published in 1908, bear the Opus number 131. In these times when music itself has become more complicated and elaborate, and the makers of it more prone to rigid self-criticism than their predecessors were wont to be, it is a rare composer whose publications pass the hundred mark.

W. S. S.

Amer

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14

NEW SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS

By E. F. HARKINS

PIERRE MONTEUX

Boston's most famous art institution, the Symphony Orchestra, began its 42d season yesterday, and as brilliantly as the program would permit.

Pierre Monteux, starting on his two year extension of engagement, was heartily greeted. There are fewer changes than usual in personnel. The three newcomers are V. Mariotti, first violin; R. Allard, bassoon; and A. Ritter, tympani.

The Friday afternoon performances are sold out for the whole season. The Saturday night sale has been the biggest in years. Locally, it promises to be one of the most successful seasons in the history of the orchestra.

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," a melodramatic relic of the middle 18th century romantic period, opens this week's program, which will be repeated tonight. The audience waited patiently for the last two movements, "March to the Scaffold," of which Berlioz was very proud, and "Witches' Sabbath," written to shock a lady then treating Berlioz coolly. Theatrical music! Marco Enrico Bossi's "Theme and Variations," played here for the first time, is scholarly, imaginative, very modern, at times agreeable and soothing.

The best number, Wagner's "Mastersingers" prelude came last, and the performance of this polyphonic marvel was well worth waiting for.

From SUN

Address New York City

Date SEP 27 192

Boston Symphony Plans.

Having interviewed several composers during his sojourn in Europe last July, Pierre Monteux, who is now preparing to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 13, announces a number of new works of interest.

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts—Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." The burlesque of Saint-Saens is particularly familiar to the conductor who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double string quartet of the Parisian private society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano. Honneger's score has been called, both in Paris and in London, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan," in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams and Eugene Goosens, will be represented, the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer, "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra." Naturally, the master pieces of the established repertory will comprise the greater part of the Boston Symphony program, to which the works mentioned above will yield first consideration.

IN the usual place, on the usual day and hour, under the usual circumstances, the Symphony Orchestra will begin a new series of concerts—in Symphony Hall; on Friday afternoon at 2.30 and on Saturday evening at 8; with the band little changed in personnel; with Mr Monteux entering upon the fourth year of his conductorship; with every omen auspicious for the months to come. The one departure from custom is the substitution at the opening concerts of a symphony by Berlioz ("The Fantastic") for a symphony of Beethoven. Then follow a new set of ten variations by the Italian, Bossi, oftener applauded in Germany than in his own Italy. For ending stands Wagner's masterpiece of glowing instrumental song, the prelude to "The Mastersingers." All three numbers are music in which Mr. Monteux should excel.

TRANS- Oct. 7.

FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT FRIDAY

Pierre Monteux has compiled the following program for the opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening—Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony, a theme with ten variations by Enrico Bossi, the celebrated living Italian composer, and Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The score of Bossi will be heard in Boston for the first time.

TRAV- Oct. 1

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony" will be the opening number of the symphony concert season, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall. The "Theme With Variations," by Enrico Bossi, and Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude are the other numbers.

ADVTSR- Oct. 8

SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony will be the opening number of the symphony concert season on next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. This score, set for an enlarged orchestra, was inspired by Henrietta Smithson, the object of Berlioz's love. The love theme undergoes the following transformations: Dreams, Passions, a Ball, Scene in the Meadows, March to the Scaffold, a Witches' Sabbath—according to the composer's fancy.

A Theme with Variations, by Enrico Bossi, the famous Italian composer, will also be played. These 10 variations, which have never been heard in Boston, include Scherzo, Larghetto, Zingaresca, March, Pastorale, Recitative and Chorale. The program will close with Wagner's Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

HERALD- Oct. 8.

Mr. Ikswokots announces that he will conduct, for the "first time at these concerts," the "Scallic Rhapsody" ("Scallic" derived from "scales," i. e., fish scales—a "scaly" composition), by the Norseman, Suilebis. Feverish excitement ensues, while telephone orders deluge the box office.

But Hcsormad, conductor of a rival organization, is equal to the occasion. Hardly have the papers purveyed the announcement of Ikswokots that Hcsormad states that on the same date he will produce the "Psychopathic Suite," which employs six gramophones and 18 Sousaphones in the score, by Soundambad, for the first time in America. More excitement. Columns in the press, orgies by lecturers and thematic analysts.

All this, however, sinks into insignificance when Xuetnomerriep, with Gallic sangfroid, discloses the "coup d'etat" by which he has secured, ahead of either of his rivals, the right to performance, for the first time anywhere on earth, the "Orthopedic" Sonata by Strikemstiff, a work which calls for an augmented orchestra, further increased by the addition of 12 colored candles, three fog horns, 18 different odors and jewsharp obligato. Several critics faint on receiving this information. The hall is sold out days in advance, the press froths at the mouth, the audience achieves a riot before the last note has sounded.

When Conductors Meet

In a word, diplomacy, both of the open and secret varieties, is not confined to governments. We are reminded of this by approaching performances of Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux" ("The Animals' Carnival"), which Saint-Saens, in his whimsical youth, wrote for performance before the members of that extraordinary French music society known as "La Trompette." This work, which the world is only now to hear, is issued by the publishers in two arrangements, the first the original arrangement in which it was played for "La Trompette"—an arrangement for a double string quartet and two pianos, the second an arrangement for small orchestra, including two pianos. It befell that Mr. Monteux of Boston and Mr. Damrosch of the New York Symphony both desired the honor of first performance of the music. Mr. Monteux triumphed.

By prestige or by persuasion, he obtained the privilege of playing the suite at the Boston Symphony concerts of the 20th and 21st of October, while Mr. Damrosch contented himself with the concession of the first performance in New York, to take place Oct. 29. Both parties consented to this arrangement, and declared honor satisfied.

They need not so have bestirred themselves. It develops that a first performance of the "Carnival des Animaux" was given last summer at a popular open-air concert in Ravinia Park!

A significant feature of this suite by Saint-Saens is the names of the "animals." There are, for example, "Cocks and Chickens," also "Elephants," "Turtles," "Personages with big ears," "Cuckoo in the depths of the woods," and "pianists." ("Animals" would be, in the opinion of some concert goers,

POST- Oct. 8

The orchestral parts of Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of Animals" have arrived too late from Paris for Mr. Monteux to include the piece in the Symphony Concerts of Oct. 20 and 21. He has now set it on the programme for Nov. 3 and 4—the fourth pair of concerts. At the second pair, conductor and orchestra will play, instead, a symphony of Dvorak in D minor, a bright, flowing, naive piece, hitherto unheard in Boston.

TRANS- Oct. 9.

The Symphony concerts begin this afternoon. Bossi's Theme with Variations, which will be played here for the first time, was written a good many years ago. He is known in Boston by his "Goldonian Infermezzi" for orchestra, his "Paradise Lost," which was performed by the Handel and Haydn Society, and by his many pieces for the organ. The years rush by, and Bossi today is a member of the old guard; not one of the young Italians—among them Resphigi, Pizetti and Malipiero—whose music is so disquieting to the conservatives here and abroad.

The other pieces on the program are the Fantastic Symphony, by which Berlioz sought to revenge himself on the actress, Miss Smithson—he took complete revenge by marrying her later—and the prelude to "The Mastersingers."

At the second Symphony concert Mme. Frances Alda will sing an air from Korngold's opera, "The Dead City," and two songs with orchestra by Joseph Marx of Graz. This will be her first appearance at a Symphony concert in Boston. A symphony, No. 3 by Dvorak, will be played for the first time in this city, and so will "Fairy Tale," by Rimsky-Korsakov, inspired by Pushkin's introduction to his "Russian and Ludmilla." Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which has not been performed here for several years, will end the concert. Those who are deeply versed in the philosophy of Nietzsche will not fail to be present.

Carmela Ippolito, the young violinist of Boston, whose talent is undisputed, will play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge this season.

HERALD- Oct. 13.

WEEK-END PLEASURES BY AUTUMN RENEWED

Contrasts of Audiences Before the Symphony Orchestra — The Vanished Neumann—A Ripened Elman Plays as in Years Boston Has Not Heard Him, to Zest Adding Measure—Programme and Incidents

TO the student of audiences—and all reviewers are necessarily such—the company of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concerts is perennially inexplicable. Beyond peradventure, it is no less warmly disposed toward Mr. Monteux than is the assembly of Saturday evening. Yet the latter audience was twice as hearty, at the week-end, in welcome to the conductor for the beginning of a new year. Both companies, plainly and rightly, wished to include the orchestra in this greeting. On Friday afternoon, however, only the effort of an insistent few, at the end of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," brought the conductor back for the third time—the appointed moment to bid the band share plaudits. Therewith the house crackled with clapping. No such persistence was necessary on Saturday evening; while yet more generous was the applause for the standing men. Only a few hands warmed on Friday to Bossi's Variations; more answered to them on Saturday; yet the pleased, among the surrounding waste of indifference, were probably as numerous on the one occasion as the other. So it goes. On Saturdays the audience at the Symphony Concerts knows its mind and manifests it. On Fridays almost never does it speak out.

Except one, changes in the personnel of the orchestra proved so few and insignificant, as to warrant little prattle. That one, however, was readily discoverable. Mr. Neumann, for long the virtuoso of the kettle-drums, visible, audible and arresting from every corner of Symphony Hall, has quit the band—for no other reason than an unquenchable desire to return to his native Germany. Mr. Ritter succeeds him—no doubt as able a tympanist, but by no means so vivid a figure. For other prattle, came both dissent and assent to the change in the hour for the beginning of the evening concerts. Mistrustful elders, after their habit, merely disliked a departure from ancient custom. As naturally a younger generation approved it.

For both, however, the chief concern, at either concert, was the eager hearing of symphonic music, after nearly six months' interval, and the re-appraisal of an orchestra, from the outset well in the vein. The more the pity, then, that Mr. Monteux should have sought on Saturday to make the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" sound even more sonorous and sweeping than it had on Friday. To that end, he goaded himself, orchestra and audience. The inevitable outcome was a performance that soon became coarse-voiced; while many a detail of beauty or significance ran blurred through such a surging smother of tone. The amends was the graphic performance of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." A diagrammed, blue-printed, meticulously ordained music are these "dreams, visions, passions," in spite—or because—of the romantic intensities, real as reality to Berlioz, in which he would clothe them. Thereby in these days do they sound so dry, thin, calculated, labored. Yet Mr. Monteux missed not a jot or tittle of the lengthy pages; while oftener than not, he and his virtuosi animated them.

The concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge on Thursday evening will begin with Dvorak's Symphony in F Major, played for the first time hereabouts. It will end with the Prelude to "The Mastersingers"; while the middle piece is Mr. Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne," deservedly revived. The new singer, Miss d' Espinoy Colonne of Paris, will be heard in The Naiad's Air from Gluck's "Armida" and in two songs, "Absence" and "Villanelle," with music by Berlioz to verses of Théophile Gauthier.

The frequenters of our concert-halls have cause for pleasure in a fashion of the hour. Pinks and reds, it seems, are modish colors. Last Friday, Saturday and Sunday, they were discoverable in Symphony Hall and, out of the massed neutrality of Bostonian gowns, shone dots of brightness.

TRANS- Oct. 16.

For Cambridge

As usual Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra will be heard in nine concerts in Cambridge, from October into May. As usual they will take place in Sanders Theatre at Harvard on Thursday evenings, viz.: Oct. 19, Nov. 16, Dec. 7, Jan. 11, Feb. 8, March 1, March 22, April 12, May 3. As usual there will be an "assisting artist" at all the concerts (but one) of the series. These singers, pianists, violinists and violoncellists will come from the orchestra itself, from the soloists engaged for its concerts in Boston, from established or rising talents for which conductor and management would open the way. Thus from the band comes on Jan. 11, Mr. Schroeder, the violoncellist, from the "assisting artists" for Boston, Mme. Samaroff, the pianist, on Dec. 7, and Mr. Casella, composer and pianist, on March 1; from proved abilities Miss Roberts, the contralto, on Feb. 8 and Mme. Ferrabini-Jacchia on March 22; from promising abilities Miss Ippolito, the violinist, on Nov. 16 and Miss Church, the pianist, on April 12; for brand newcomer, finally, Madeleine d' Espinoy Colonne, soprano singer, on Oct. 19. Hospitable are these audiences of Cambridge! As last year, subscriptions to the concerts may be renewed at the University Bookstore through Saturday, Oct. 7. New subscribers will have their turn from Oct. 14.

Monitor

On Friday afternoon and Satu evening, Oct. 13 and 14, in Symph Hall, the Boston Symphony Orches Pierre Monteux, conductor, will the first pair of the season's concerts. The program as announced is: "Fantastic" Symphony by Berlioz, Variations for Orchestra by Bossi, and the Prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers" of Nuremburg. Bossi's Variations will be heard for the first time in Boston.

Items and Announcements

Trans 10/11

Usually Mr. Monteux reserves his tone-poem of Strauss until the Symphony Concerts of the spring. This season, however, he prefers it on a programme of autumn and "Thus Spake Zarathustra," unheard in Boston since Dr. Muck's day, will be the major item of the concerts on Oct. 20 and 21.

[11]

Bohlmann School of Music. It promises, with the plans already projected, to be one of the largest and most important schools in the South.

Mr. Klibansy has aroused great interest among the singers of the South by his presence in Memphis, and his classes are constantly increasing. The singers are most enthusiastic over their work with him, and Mr. Bohlmann already re-engaged him for another master class next

---

Boston, Mass., September 23.—Having interviewed several composers during his sojourn in Europe last July, Pierre Monteux, who is now preparing to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 13, announces a number of new works of interest.

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts: Saint-Saëns' "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fête." The burlesque of Saint-Saëns is particularly familiar to the conductor, who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double string quartet of the Parisian private society, "La Trompette," while the composer sat at the piano. Honneger's score has been called, both in Paris and in London, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams, and Eugene Goossens, will be represented, as well as the Italian composers, Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger, and Strauss' "Zarathustra." Naturally, the masterpieces of the established repertory will comprise the greater part of the Boston Symphony programs, to which the works mentioned above will yield first consideration.

MUS-COURIER- SEPT 28.

Paderewski Returns

The new music of the season will, according to announcement from Symphony Hall, be chosen from the following works not hitherto played at these concerts: 'Soir de Fete," Chausson; "Carnival des Animaux," Saint-Saens; "Horace Victorieux," Honegger; "Polichinelle," Stravinsky; "The Divine Poem," Skriabin; a suite from "Tzar Saltan," Rimsky Korsakov; "The Planets," Holst, and unspecified pieces by Vaughn-Williams, Goossens, Turina, Davico and Tommasini. Revivals of Bruckner, Mahler, Reger and of Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" are promised. The greater part of the programs as always will be filled with

FIRST SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Amer 9/30

Pierre Monteux will assemble the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the first rehearsal in Symphony Hall on Monday morning at 10 o'clock, in preparation for the coming season of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts.

The program for the opening pair of concerts, October 13-14, will include Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," Enrico Bossi's "Theme and Variations," and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers."

Trans — Oct 11

New Music by Bossi from the Symphony Orchestra This Week—Strauss's "Zarathustra" in Prospect—New York Hears the San Franciscans — Paderewski at Worcester

IN 1915, so the story goes, Dr. Muck was minded to produce at the Symphony concerts a "Theme with Variations," by Enrico Bossi, which had greatly struck his fancy. Attempt was made to procure from the German publishers of the piece a set of the orchestral parts, but war-time conditions prevented, and the projected performance was indefinitely postponed. Last summer the score, which had been gathering dust on the shelves of the Orchestra's library, came to Mr. Monteux's attention. He, too, thought well of it—well enough, in fact, to give it place on the programme for the first pair of concerts now impending.

Those who know Bossi as an orchestral composer only through the tasteful "Goldonian Intermezzi" for strings, heard here several seasons ago, will find these Variations surprising. In the Intermezzi Bossi wrote as a light-handed Latin. In the music to be heard here Friday and Saturday his technical procedure is more akin to that of the heavier-handed Teutons of the latter nineteenth century. These Variations are written for ful orchestra, with all that that term usually implies, even to an elaborate array of pulsatile instruments. Large and impressive sonorities are sought—and gained. The texture of the score is often intricate—at times to the point of turbidity. As often again it is transparent, ingeniously woven, and much of the instrumenation is charmingly colored.

The theme (in E major) from which the Variations spring is announced immediately by divided violas, flute, clarinet and bassoons, and the first portion of it arrests attention through the wide leaps in the melody and the striking sequence of diatonic seventh chords in the accompanying harmony. Incidentally the two upper and the two lower voices move in parellel fifths—the progression abhored of pedants—and much use of these same fifths is made throughout the score. Contrary to precedent, the theme itself is subjected to a brief development before the variations proper begin. The latter are ten in number, and five of them bear independent titles—Idilio, Zingaresa, Alla, Marcia and Corale. As in all such pieces nowadays, the treatment of the theme is exceedingly free, but though it is made to serve as the basis for musical pictures of widely divergent character, its presence is for the most part readily detected. Bossi is one of the most prolific of living composers, and these Variations, published in 1908, bear the Opus number 131. In these times when music itself has become more complicated and elaborate, and the makers of it more prone to rigid self-criticism than their predecessors were wont to be, it is a rare composer whose publicationspass the hundred mark.

W. S. S.

Here in Boston

Trans 9-29

It is good to find Mr. Monteux breaking again with institutional precedent. No doubt Beethoven is the keystone of symphonic music. No doubt the playing of one or another of his symphonies is becoming rite at the beginning of a new series of Symphony Concerts. Yet, since those symphonies rise superior to time and place, need they always provide such "opening piece"? Seemingly Mr. Monteux judges not. For he will begin the first concerts of the Boston Orchestra, on Oct. 13 and 14, with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" and follow it with a set of variations by the Italian, Bossi, and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers," a gloriously festal music.

Items and Announcements

Trans 10/13

As already made known Strauss's "Zarathustra" will end the Symphony Concerts next week. A pretty little symphony in F major by Doorak will begin then; in F major by Dvorak will begin then; time in Boston, will be one of Rimsky-Korsakov's fanciful orchestral exercises, "Fairy Legend." Between whiles, Mme. Alda of the Metropolitan Opera House will sing Tosca's hackneyed soliloquy from her opera by Puccini and two songs by Josef Marx, little known but in some respects remarkable Viennese composer.

Amer

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14

NEW SYMPHONY SEASON OPENS

By E. F. HARKINS

Boston's most famous art institution, the Symphony Orchestra, began its 42d season yesterday, and as brilliantly as the program would permit.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Pierre Monteux, starting on his two-year extension of engagement, was heartily greeted. There are fewer changes than usual in personnel. The three newcomers are V. Mariotti, first violin; R. Allard, bassoon; and A. Ritter, tympani.

The Friday afternoon performances are sold out for the whole season. The Saturday night sale has been the biggest in years. Locally, it promises to be one of the most successful seasons in the history of the orchestra.

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," a melodramatic relic of the middle 18th century romantic period, opens this week's program, which will be repeated tonight. The audience waited patiently for the last two movements, "March to the Scaffold," of which Berlioz was very proud, and "Witches' Sabbath," written to shock a lady then treating Berlioz coolly. Theatrical music! Marco Enrico Bossi's "Theme and Variations," played here for the first time, is scholarly, imaginative, very modern, at times agreeable and soothing.

The best number, Wagner's "Mastersingers" prelude came last, and the performance of this polyphonic marvel was well worth waiting for.

NEW SEASON OF BOSTON BAND

Amer 10/14

By FRED J. McISAAC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its forty-second season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall before an audience which taxed the capacity of the building. The strength and popularity of the orchestra grows with the passing years. This season there are no rumors of strikes, dissentions or clashes among the musicians; all is peaceful and serene.

Pierre Monteux began another season as conductor. He chose for his opening program the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz, a theme with variations by Marco Enrico Bossi, and the prelude to the "Mastersingers" by Wagner.

The Berlioz music is nearly a hundred years old. It is written in the romantic style of the period and today offers little to modern audiences, except in the last two movements—the March to the Scaffold and the Witches Revel. These give extraordinary opportunities to such imaginative and gifted conductors as Muck and Weingartner. I can still recall the stunning performance of this fantastic symphony by Weingartner at the head of the New York Philharmonic in Boston some fifteen years ago. Monteux is a good musician, but stolid and not highly imaginative, incapable of getting anything out of a work which is not written down in the score. He spun out the first few movements to complete tedium and made the Witches Revel as commonplace as a jazz dance at a roadhouse.

Bossi's Variations are very modern and extraordinary striking examples of the art of tormenting a theme. Bossi is a consumate artist with the modern orchestra and his variations have the merit of very effective contrasts, brilliant color and striking rhythms. Monteux got all there was out of the set of variations, and he also gave a highly creditable performance of the Nuremburg Prelude. The playing of the orchestra was distinguished by good tone, though there was a lack of smoothness noticeable in the beginning of the Bossi Variations, due, probably, to the fact that the season is just beginning.

8.15

10/13

[illegible] change has come; yet without [illegible]nticipatng or explaining word [illegible] the silent sanctuaries of Sym[illegible]ny Hall. Only from their tickets, [illegible] they chanced to scrutinize them, [illegible]ve subscribers to the evening con[illegible]rts of the Symphony Orchestra [illegible]iscovered it. Through forty years [illegible]nd more these concerts have begun [illegible]t eight o'clock—or as soon thereafter as the conductor came to his [illegible]lace. From tomorrow evening on[illegible]ards they will begin at eight-fifteen.

So has a precedent yielded, a "tradition" passed, that, like most such [illegible]ings, could not endure open-minded [illegible]xamination under the lights of the [illegible]resent. Eight-fifteen has become [illegible]e normal, the expected, hour hereabouts for the beginning of concerts [illegible]nd most other evening entertain[illegible]ents. To the considerately prompt, [illegible]is quarter hour of grace will bring [illegible]riceless relief from haste in dress[illegible]g, dining and journeying to Sym[illegible]hony Hall; while upon the incor[illegible]igibly tardy it will set clear the [illegible]tigma of sloth and selfishness. Ex[illegible]ept ancient custom, Suburbia's [illegible]rains were the only reason assigned for the perpetuation of the outmoded, vexatious eight. Suburbia, however, is quite as likely to arrive and depart by motor car; while a little study of time-tables showed them quite indifferent to hours of beginning or of ending at Symphony Hall. It is possible, moreover, that dwellers in town, even if they be mere nondescripts, like the very rich, the very poor and single men, deserve some consideration in these things.

Whatever the process, a welcome change has come to pass in the routine of the Symphony Concerts. With the times, and not with "the tradition," the present régime at Symphony Hall keeps step. In large things and small, human experience has usually found such course the better way.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY UP TO OWN STANDARD

Opens 42d Season With Berlioz and Wagner

Post 10/14

BY OLIN DOWNES

If it is difficult for laymen to understand the importance of a conductor to an orchestra it is equally difficult for students of music who do comprehend the complexities of a conductor's task to understand how on earth he can make his players carry out his wishes with the sensitiveness and feeling shown in the performance of Berlioz' "Symphony Fantastique" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at the opening concert of the 42nd season, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

A DARING OPENING

It was an unconventional and in some particulars a greatly daring beginning. The Symphony requires not only dazzling technical brilliancy, but above all the utmost flexibility and subtlety of rhythm and shading. One did not expect, at this season of the year, and even with the excellent technical qualities of the Boston Symphony of today, such plasticity and fineness of tone quality. Even granting all this, it would not have made the effect of yesterday afternoon with a conductor who failed to show imagination.

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the first movement above would have constituted a triumph. And then—the music. This is for us the greatest part of an incredibly original work. Not only is the music wondrously beautiful—wistful, dreamy, agitated, despairing, but it is unbelievable in its complete spontaneity, freedom and completeness of self-expression.

Wrote What He Felt

There are composers, just as there are plain, ordinary men of business, or writers, or electrical engineers, who do not fully and freely give themselves out in their scores, any more than others completely give themselves out in conversation. When it comes to the impulsive humanity, the confession of weakness as well as strength, the exposure, either unintentionally or in a spirit of reckless open-handedness, of everything in the heart, this latter class either fail to find expression, or turn their backs, saying that the thing isn't done. For one reason or another, there is a veil of greater or lesser thickness between them and their hearers.

But here is the case of a composer hardly in his 30s, who had no musical education worthy of the name, who decided to write a work which no orchestra could adequately play, who fell in love with an actress, and, with a certain sublime egotism and lack of humor, simply wrote down the colossal thing that was in him.

Wrote it down frankly as a child with a child's independence if schodlasticism or of old people's fixed standards of conduct. You get a breath-taking work on genius. This music of the dreams and visions of a young poet will always be young. It will always soar, free of chains, of classic phrase patterns, of orchestral padding or conventional procedure. It is strange to think that it was ever called hectic or labored music. It appears to be music of the purest inspiration, so perfect in its beauty, so divinely spontaneous that it is only when it is gone that one realizes the inspired mastery of its workmanship.

A set of new variations by Enrico Bossi, op. 131, for full orchestra, are at times academic, once in a while lyrical or emotional, and mostly of a set of empty and brilliant show pieces for orchestra. If one compares these variations with the far more beautiful "Intermezzi Goldoniani" heard ere this at these concerts, it will be seen that Mr. Bossi, artistically speaking, has changed his clothes. He contented himself in the Intermezzi with a modest scheme of instrumentation and he wrote with poetic or gay Italian feeling. Here is a scheme of orchestration which borrows far more from Strauss than any Italian, and that is insincere and meretricious.

The concert ended with Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture, played by Mr. Monteux with contagious enthusiasm. There could hardly be a richer score—one more prethoric with melody, and it is a striking example of how much more matter means than manner in musical composition, that in spite of the prevailing thickness of the sound the stout rhythms and the winged melodies of youth and love simply carry all before them. The only pity is that younger German composers, who have absorbed the defects of Wagner's methods as well as the semblance of his creative genius, have learned only a part of the lesson, and none of the warnings of the "Meistersinger" overture.

BERLIOZ SYM[illegible] AT OPENING CONCERT

Globe 10/14

Orchestra Begins Its 42d Season With Few Changes

Conductor Monteux and Players at Their Best in "Die Meistersinger"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its 42d season yesterday afternoon. Pierre Monteux led an orchestra in which only one prominent member of other years was missing. Mr. Neumann, the extraordinarily able kettle drummer, is replaced by A. Ritter, who acquitted himself capably in the difficult tasks set by Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony." The other leading players, Mr Burgin, Mr Bedetti, Mr Longy, Mr Fourel, the veteran Alwin Schroeder and the rest were in their places and devoting familiar abilities to the common task of making the orchestra a perfect ensemble.

There were no noteworthy changes in the audience, which always seems to be of a certain age, not young, but never becoming decrepid. As usual on the opening day the chief subject of conversation in the intermission appeared to a casual stroller through the corridors to be who had changed their seats, although almost everyone had apparently kept the ones they had last season. Every seat for the Friday series has been sold since last May, but that is nothing new. The 505 rush seats in the second balcony held their quota of patient enthusiasts who had waited for places for a couple of hours. But that is also the ordinary thing.

The program furnished the only departure from the routine of previous seasons. Mr Monteux, who seems unwilling to begin as his predecessors did with a Beethoven symphony, chose this time Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," of the "idee fixe" theme, and its composer's "interminable and inextinguishable passion" for an Irish actress named Smithson.

This music is certainly original; even its worst detractors admit that much. Its clear cut and vivid orchestration atones for some rather muddy counterpoint. Its themes are tunes so unmistakably instrumental and so obviously powerless if stripped of their orchestral garments that many have denied Berloiz the gift of melody. The performance was usually accurate and occasionally eloquent. The orchestra always slips back during its vacation further than a few preliminary rehearsals can atone for. Compared with other first concerts, yesterday's performance was of average merit, and an improvement on recent seasons.

The only novelty was a rather vulgar theme, indefatigably varied by the Italian composer of organ pieces, M. Enrico Bossi. The harmonies and melodies recalled Puccini. The technique showed Brahmsian influence. The performance was conscientiously brilliant. This sort of musical gymnastics, however interesting to the technically trained musician, bores any audience, even if the composer be Beethoven or Brahms, and the developed theme intrinsically lovely.

In the middle sections and concluding passage of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Mr Monteux and the orchestra were at their best. The three themes intertwined stood out clearly as they should, the spirit of the music shone through; redeeming the afternoon from dullness.

Next week Frances Alda will sing an aria from Korngold's "Die Todte Stadt," and two songs by Josef Marx. An unfamiliar symphony of Dvorak, the Conte Feerique of Rimsky Korsakov, and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" are the other numbers announced.

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Herald 10/14

Orchestra Opens Its 42d Season—Monteux Is the Conductor

BERLIOZ WORK HEADS PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 42d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The conductor and the orchestra were warmly welcomed. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony; Bossi, Theme with Variations (first time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

At the beginning of a symphony season conductors, as a rule, pay homage to one of Buelow's "three B's"—Bach, Beethoven or Brahms. Thus do they think to "play safe" and please the conservative of all ages in the audience. Mr. Monteux yesterday considered favorably of two B's, neither one of them in Buelow's trinity. Berlioz is seated securely with the great in the temple of art. Bossi is a serious, respectable composer, if he was not in writing his Theme and Variations the white-haired boy of Apollo.

This Theme with Variations is not a recent composition. It was published 14 years ago. Published at Leipsic, it might bear the hall-mark "Made in Germany," for it has little of Italian grace, suavity or headlong dash. It is a scholarly work. The damning epithet "well-made" might be applied to it.

Themes with variations are as a rule to [illegible]

Haydn [illegible] might say [illegible] the more ent[illegible] disguise the theme, so [illegible] is on tenter-hooks in the endeavor to trace it; or when the theme is wholly unrecognizable. Bossi is more orthodox. His theme is always in evidence, a good straightforward theme, one easily forgotten if it were not for the repetitions, and then easily forgotten.

There are 10 variations. Perhaps those of genuine beauty are the contemplative one just before the one in the gypsy manner, and the Pastoral. They are euphonious and have a certain individuality. The "Zingaresca" itself makes a brave attempt to be wildly gay, but it has not the requisite abandon. One hears Signor—one is tempted to say "Herr"—Bossi saying to himself: "Good Lord, here's another variation to write. I must have something by way of contrast. Well, I guess I'll go a-gypsying."

The Fantastic Symphony is nearly 100 years old. Each time it is performed—and the performance yesterday was impressive—there is wonder at the achievement of this genius, who taught the world what might be done with orchestral instruments used daringly, for in 1830 Berlioz was regarded by most of his contemporaries as a madman; the genius whose influence affected nearly all the composers that came after him, Liszt, Wagner, the Russians, the men of today. It is impossible to think of modern orchestral music without honoring Berlioz.

Nor was he merely a master, self-taught, of instrumentation. He was a man of musical ideas, some of them gigantic. In 1830 romanticism was in the air. Byron was the poet of poets to Europeans. Hugo, the elder Dumas, Gautier, in the younger years of Berlioz, with certain painters, broke away from the accepted conventions. That Berlioz startled the hide-bound classicists, that he was mocked and derided is not surprising. His program for the Fantastic Symphony may now seem as extravagant as Hugo's "Hernani"; as Dumas's "Antony." There are pages in the symphony where the extravagance that was once exciting is now out-worn formalism. One finds in the Witches' Sabbath a straining after effect, an impotent attempt to be real devilish at the expense of the actress, Harriet Smithson; yet the Mephistopheles section in Liszt's "Faust" symphony owes much to this Finale. The Ball music seems curiously old fashioned; one wishes the Scene in the Meadows were a little shorter. But the man that wrote the first movement, so expressive of the delirious sleep-chasings and flaming passions of a half-crazed brain; the man that conceived and formed the grisly, the tremendous March to the Scaffold; he, beyond all doubt and preadventure, is among the greatest of the great.

A brilliant performance of Wagner's Prelude brought the end.

The performance will be repeated this evening. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Devorak, Symphony No. 3, F major (first time here); Puccini, "Visse d'arte" (Mme. Frances Alda); Rimsky-Korsakov, "Fairy Tale" (after Pushkin)—first time here; Marx, "Marienlied," and "If Love Hath Entered Thy Heart" (Mme. Alda); Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

ALDA SYMPHONY SOLOIST

News 10/14

Frances Alda, the prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the first soloist of the Boston Symphony season when she appears with the orchestra at its second pair of concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will be heard in the aria "Vissi d'Arte" from Puscini's La Tosca" and two songs by Josef Marx.

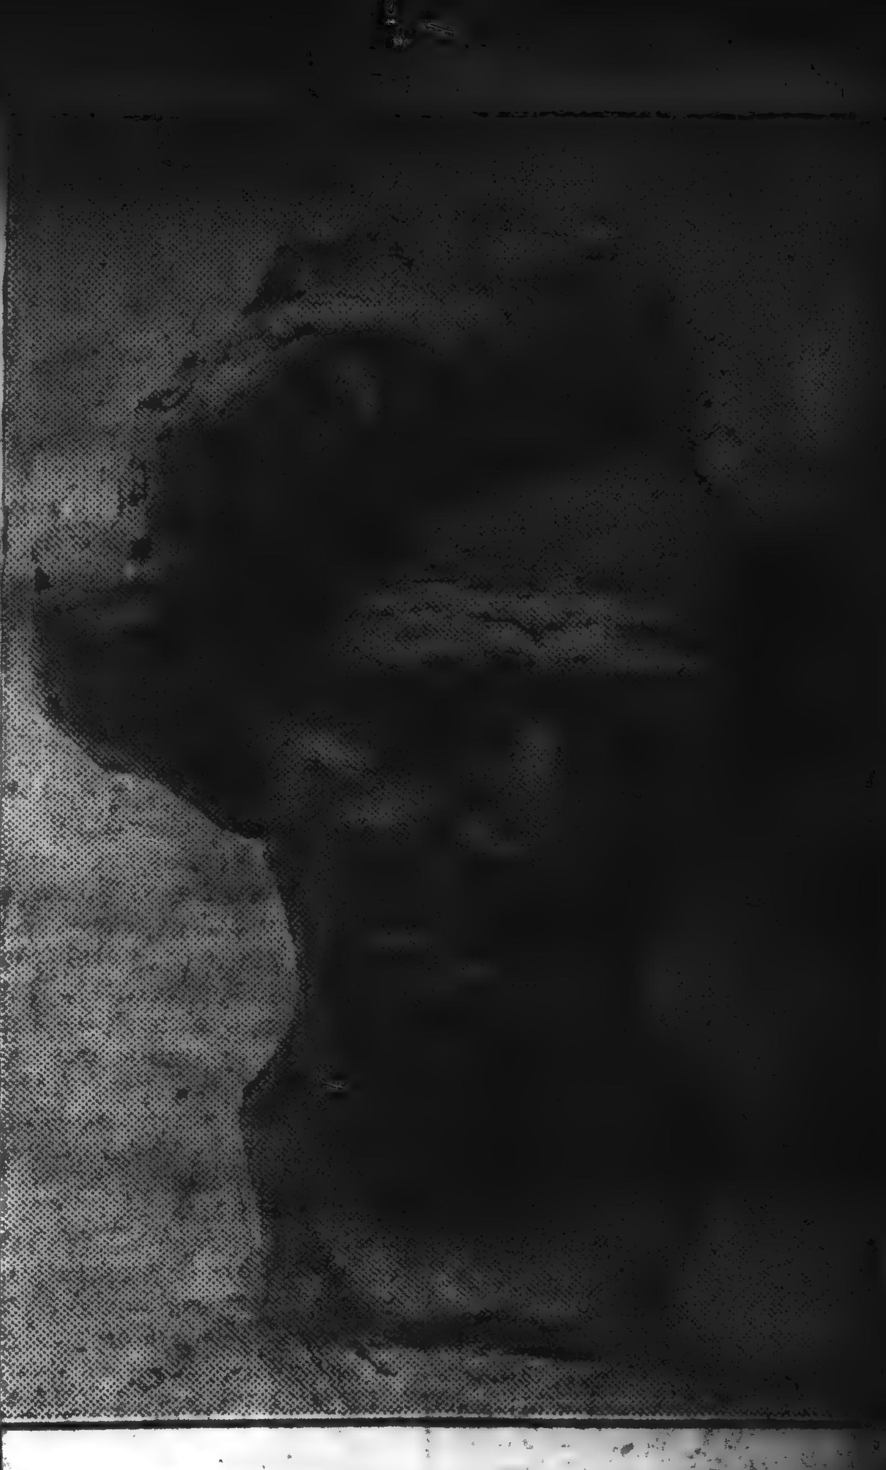
SYMPHONY CONCERT

FOR BEGINNING, BERLIOZ, BOSSI, WAGNER

Once More the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" Salutes a New Season—Bossi's Double-Faced Variations, Now Italian, Now Teutonic—After a Hundred Years the "Fantastic Symphony" — Orchestra and Conductor in Prime

THE end of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon might well have been the beginning. For the final item upon Mr. Monteux's programme, at the outset of a forty-second season, was Wagner's Prelude to his romantic comedy in song, "The Mastersingers." Festival, almost ceremonial, music it is; yet music aglow with instrumental melodies, unfolding from themselves, feeding more and more richly upon their own beauty, alight with reflected glories as side by side they march and mount. Music, too, of superlative design and structure—ever weaving and expanding an ample, ascendant web; here loosening, there tightening, the gathered strands; dividing and subdividing into silvery rivulets only to interlace in single, sweeping, golden flood—from first bar to last a paragon of development by imagination and of counterpoint become song. The ear tingles to stinging modulation, the nerves thrill to the rasp and cut of the strident strings; deep burrows every receptive faculty into the harmonic opulence, the instrumental splendor, of the whole. Once more the expected sounds both new and strange. To listen is sensuous surfeiting—for the twentieth, maybe, the thirtieth time.

Measure by measure, period after period, the Prelude unrolls the pageant of Wagner's comedy of the Nuremberg folk, homely or romantic. There in bourgeois pomp stride the cobblers, the goldsmiths, the soap-boilers, who were Mastersingers too. Here paces Sachs benign; or Beckmesser squeaks envies. Walther woos Pogner's Eva and wins a prize-song also. The appre[illegible] dance; the fête resounds. Out [illegible] humanity, the outsm[illegible]



Berlioz

From a Bust, Hitherto Unphotographed, by Na[illegible] Aronson, Russian Sculptor in Paris

er" universal and, so far, everlasting. The learned say that when the matter, the medium, the means and the manner are all as one; when creator and receiver become of a single mind, heart, faith, emotion, then do the arts do their utmost miracle. Wagner wrought it through this quarter hour as, perhaps, at no time else, not even when "Tristan" pulses highest or "Parsifal" quivers with elations of heaven and agonies of earth. And for those who love this Prelude, who still race, wet-eyed as silly children, through the excitement of it, the miracle is perpetual. Under the spell they will say unabashed that no other music is quite comparable. With reason these joyous tumults, these unfading splendors begin or end symphonic seasons . . . If Mr. Monteux and the orchestra seemed to catch for an instant at the very beginning, like a motor changing gears, they lifted—stride upon stride, sonority upon sonority—the pompous pæans of the end.

The middle piece of the day was of far different sort. In Italy sixty years ago was born Enrico Bossi, destined to be composer of music. As such, there he has dwelt and worked these thirty years; but in his own land, without too rich reward. German ears in particular, foreign ears in general, have heard him more gladly. A Bavarian conductor, Dr. Muck, opened to Bostonians Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," expert, fanciful, ornate, high-humored pieces suggested by the Venetian's comedies. To them a Parisian conductor yesterday added ten Variations upon an Original Theme, undeservedly receiving only a ruffle of applause for zeal and pains.

Bossi's orchestra—a full one—sings over his theme, amplifies, adorns it. It is long-breathed, impinging upon the ear with unusual interval and stripped sequence—a theme of clear vitality, a theme that may also melt and charm. Forthwith Bossi sets to his variations now isolating them, now linking them into quasi-symphonic movements. They are not exercises in the evolution of music by studious process nursed in abstruse reflection. Technically Bossi shapes and conducts them skilfully, resourcefully, never once losing the thematic thread of his discourse. He is quick with inventive ingenuities; alert to his medium from the highest tinkle of the celesta to the lowest throb of the double-basses. He teems with harmonic device; his instrumental palette is many-colored. He modulates boldly. His music coheres and rounds. It also sounds.

Yet, like most other moderns, when they set to variations, Bossi is bound to have them moody. He joins two together in strenuous, astringent vein, using his orchestra full-voiced. He passes to another pair, grave of tonal speech, wistful, longing. Forthwith he flings into clicking gypsy measures; sighs out a shepherd's musing, piercing tune. A choral-like variation prepares the way for a variation of sheer orchestral declamation to sharp-edged, striding unisons in the strings. A finale leaps and whirls as though a Czech had written it. Yet twice or thrice before, the ear believed it had caught clear Wagnerian notes.

Many-sided, many voiced such variations are bound to be. In them, "old" Italian, though he is, Bossi sometimes writes music as graceful, charming, apt and transparent as Respighi's in "Fountains of Rome," as deft of means, lace-like in texture, sunlit in shimmer, sensitive always. Again he is full-throated, vigorous, harsh, pounding—as turbid, sharp-edged, orotund as though he had quite half an ear for his German public. Again he is all for a manner. "Idyllic," he must muse delicately, artfully, lucidly. "Gypsy-wise," he must snap and flash. He declaims string-and-trumpet toned; and forthwith, through a crackling, leaping, whirling Finale runs a race with Smetana of the overture to "The Bartered Bride."

And the outcome? First, a music of delicate strands, lustres, modulation, progress, through the lighter or the more pensive variations. Second, through the more vigorous divisions, a music rough-coated, striding, sharp-edged, sometimes both turbulent and turbid. Natural voice Ita[illegible] [illegible] voice Teutonic, a listening [illegible] Glamorous and self-suf[illegible]

[12]

NEW SEASON OF BOSTON BAND

Amer 10/14

By FRED J. McISAAC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its forty-second season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall before an audience which taxed the capacity of the building. The strength and popularity of the orchestra grows with the passing years. This season there are no rumors of strikes, dissentions or clashes among the musicians; all is peaceful and serene.

Pierre Monteux began another season as conductor. He chose for his opening program the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz, a theme with variations by Marco Enrico Bossi, and the prelude to the "Mastersingers" by Wagner.

The Berlioz music is nearly a hundred years old. It is written in the romantic style of the period and today offers little to modern audiences, except in the last two movements—the March to the Scaffold and the Witches Revel. These give extraordinary opportunities to such imaginative and gifted conductors as Muck and Weingartner. I can still recall the stunning performance of this fantastic symphony by Weingartner at the head of the New York Philharmonic in Boston some fifteen years ago. Monteux is a good musician, but stolid and not highly imaginative, incapable of getting anything out of a work which is not written down in the score. He spun out the first few movements to complete tedium and made the Witches Revel as commonplace as a jazz dance at a roadhouse.

Bossi's Variations are very modern and extraordinary striking examples of the art of tormenting a theme. Bossi is a consumate artist with the modern orchestra and his variations have the merit of very effective contrasts, brilliant color and striking rhythms. Monteux got all there was out of the set of variations, and he also gave a highly creditable performance of the Nuremburg Prelude. The playing of the orchestra was distinguished by good tone, though there was a lack of smoothness noticeable in the beginning of the Bossi Variations, due, probably, to the fact that the season is just beginning.

8.15

10/13

[illegible] change has come; yet without [illegible]anticipatng or explaining word [illegible] the silent sanctuaries of Symphony Hall. Only from their tickets, [illegible] they chanced to scrutinize them, [illegible]ave subscribers to the evening concerts of the Symphony Orchestra discovered it. Through forty years and more these concerts have begun at eight o'clock—or as soon thereafter as the conductor came to his place. From tomorrow evening onwards they will begin at eight-fifteen.

So has a precedent yielded, a "tradition" passed, that, like most such things, could not endure open-minded examination under the lights of the present. Eight-fifteen has become the normal, the expected, hour hereabouts for the beginning of concerts and most other evening entertainments. To the considerately prompt, this quarter hour of grace will bring priceless relief from haste in dressing, dining and journeying to Symphony Hall; while upon the incorrigibly tardy it will set clear the stimga of sloth and selfishness. Except ancient custom, Suburbia's trains were the only reason assigned for the perpetuation of the outmoded, vexatious eight. Suburbia, however, is quite as likely to arrive and depart by motor car; while a little study of time-tables showed them quite indifferent to hours of beginning or of ending at Symphony Hall. It is possible, moreover, that dwellers in town, even if they be mere nondescripts, like the very rich, the very poor and single men, deserve some consideration in these things.

Whatever the process, a welcome change has come to pass in the routine of the Symphony Concerts. With the times, and not with "the tradition," the present régime at Symphony Hall keeps step. In large things and small, human experience has usually found such course the better way.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY UP TO OWN STANDARD

Opens 42d Season With Berlioz and Wagner

Post 10/14

BY OLIN DOWNES

If it is difficult for laymen to understand the importance of a conductor to an orchestra it is equally difficult for students of music who do comprehend the complexities of a conductor's task to understand how on earth he can make his players carry out his wishes with the sensitiveness and feeling shown in the performance of Berlioz' "Symphony Fantastique" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, at the opening concert of the 42nd season, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall.

A DARING OPENING

It was an unconventional and in some particulars a greatly daring beginning. The Symphony requires not only dazzling technical brilliancy, but above all the utmost flexibility and subtlety of rhythm and shading. One did not expect, at this season of the year, and even with the excellent technical qualities of the Boston Symphony of today, such plasticity and fineness of tone quality. Even granting all this, it would not have made the effect of yesterday afternoon with a conductor who failed to show imagination.

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the first movement above would have constituted a triumph. And then—the music. This is for us the greatest part of an incredibly original work. Not only is the music wondrously beautiful—wistful, dreamy, agitated, despairing, but it is unbelievable in its complete spontaneity, freedom and completeness of self-expression.

Wrote What He Felt

There are composers, just as there are plain, ordinary men of business, or writers, or electrical engineers, who do not fully and freely give themselves out in their scores, any more than others completely give themselves out in conversation. When it comes to the impulsive humanity, the confession of weakness as well as strength, the exposure, either unintentionally or in a spirit of reckless open-handedness, of everything in the heart, this latter class either fail to find expression, or turn their backs, saying that the thing isn't done. For one reason or another, there is a veil of greater or lesser thickness between them and their hearers.

But here is the case of a composer hardly in his 30s, who had no musical education worthy of the name, who decided to write a work which no orchestra could adequately play, who fell in love with an actress, and, with a certain sublime egotism and lack of humor, simply wrote down the colossal thing that was in him.

Wrote it down frankly as a child with a child's independence if schodlasticism or of old people's fixed standards of conduct. You get a breath-taking work on genius. This music of the dreams and visions of a young poet will always be young. It will always soar, free of chains, of classic phrase patterns, of orchestral padding or conventional procedure. It is strange to think that it was ever called hectic or labored music. It appears to be music of the purest inspiration, so perfect in its beauty, so divinely spontaneous that it is only when it is gone that one realizes the inspired mastery of its workmanship.

A set of new variations by Enrico Bossi, op. 131, for full orchestra, are at times academic, once in a while lyrical or emotional, and mostly of a set of empty and brilliant show pieces for orchestra. If one compares these variations with the far more beautiful "Intermezzi Goldoniani" heard ere this at these concerts, it will be seen that Mr. Bossi, artistically speaking, has changed his clothes. He contented himself in the Intermezzi with a modest scheme of instrumentation and he wrote with poetic or gay Italian feeling. Here is a scheme of orchestration which borrows far more from Strauss than any Italian, and that is insincere and meretricious.

The concert ended with Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture, played by Mr. Monteux with contagious enthusiasm. There could hardly be a richer score—one more prethoric with melody, and it is a striking example of how much more matter means than manner in musical composition, that in spite of the prevailing thickness of the sound the stout rhythms and the winged melodies of youth and love simply carry all before them. The only pity is that younger German composers, who have absorbed the defects of Wagner's methods as well as the semblance of his creative genius, have learned only a part of the lesson, and none of the warnings of the "Meistersinger" overture.

BERLIOZ' SYMPHONY AT OPENING CONCERT

Globe 10/14

Orchestra Begins Its 42d Season With Few Changes

Conductor Monteux and Players at Their Best in "Die Meistersinger"

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its 42d season yesterday afternoon. Pierre Monteux led an orchestra in which only one prominent member of other years was missing. Mr. Neumann, the extraordinarily able kettle drummer, is replaced by A. Ritter, who acquitted himself capably in the difficult tasks set by Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony." The other leading players, Mr Burgin, Mr Bedetti, Mr Longy, Mr Fourel, the veteran Alwin Schroeder and the rest were in their places and devoting familiar abilities to the common task of making the orchestra a perfect ensemble.

There were no noteworthy changes in the audience, which always seems to be of a certain age, not young, but never becoming decrepid. As usual on the opening day the chief subject of conversation in the intermission appeared to a casual stroller through the corridors to be who had changed their seats, although almost everyone had apparently kept the ones they had last season. Every seat for the Friday series has been sold since last May, but that is nothing new. The 505 rush seats in the second balcony held their quota of patient enthusiasts who had waited for places for a couple of hours. But that is also the ordinary thing.

The program furnished the only departure from the routine of previous seasons. Mr Monteux, who seems unwilling to begin as his predecessors did with a Beethoven symphony, chose this time Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," of the "idee fixe" theme, and its composer's "interminable and inextinguishable passion" for an Irish actress named Smithson.

This music is certainly original; even its worst detractors admit that much. Its clear cut and vivid orchestration atones for some rather muddy counterpoint. Its themes are tunes so unmistakably instrumental and so obviously powerless if stripped of their orchestral garments that many have denied Berloiz the gift of melody. The performance was usually accurate and occasionally eloquent. The orchestra always slips back during its vacation further than a few preliminary rehearsals can atone for. Compared with other first concerts, yesterday's performance was of average merit, and an improvement on recent seasons.

The only novelty was a rather vulgar theme, indefatigably varied by the Italian composer of organ pieces, M. Enrico Bossi. The harmonies and melodies recalled Puccini. The technique showed Brahmsian influence. The performance was conscientiously brilliant. This sort of musical gymnastics, however interesting to the technically trained musician, bores any audience, even if the composer be Beethoven or Brahms, and the developed theme intrinsically lovely.

In the middle sections and concluding passage of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Mr Monteux and the orchestra were at their best. The three themes intertwined stood out clearly as they should, the spirit of the music shone through; redeeming the afternoon from dullness.

Next week Frances Alda will sing an aria from Korngold's "Die Todte Stadt," and two songs by Josef Marx. An unfamiliar symphony of Dvorak, the Conte Feerique of Rimsky Korsakov, and Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra" are the other numbers announced.

FIRST CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Herald 10/14

Orchestra Opens Its 42d Season—Monteux Is the Conductor

BERLIOZ WORK HEADS PROGRAM

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the 42d season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The conductor and the orchestra were warmly welcomed. The program was as follows: Berlioz, Fantastic Symphony; Bossi, Theme with Variations (first time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

At the beginning of a symphony season conductors, as a rule, pay homage to one of Buelow's "three B's"—Bach, Beethoven or Brahms. Thus do they think to "play safe" and please the conservative of all ages in the audience. Mr. Monteux yesterday considered favorably of two B's, neither one of them in Buelow's trinity. Berlioz is seated securely with the great in the temple of art. Bossi is a serious, respectable composer, if he was not in writing his Theme and Variations the white-haired boy of Apollo.

This Theme with Variations is not a recent composition. It was published 14 years ago. Published at Leipsic, it might bear the hall-mark "Made in Germany," for it has little of Italian grace, suavity or headlong dash. It is a scholarly work. The damning epithet "well-made" might be applied to it.

Themes with variations are as a rule to be avoided. Some of those by [illegible] Haydn [illegible] might say [illegible] the more endurable [illegible] variations disguise the theme, so that the hearer is on tenter-hooks in the endeavor to trace it; or when the theme is wholly unrecognizable. Bossi is more orthodox. His theme is always in evidence, a good straightforward theme, one easily forgotten if it were not for the repetitions, and then easily forgotten.

There are 10 variations. Perhaps those of genuine beauty are the contemplative one just before the one in the gypsy manner, and the Pastoral. They are euphonious and have a certain individuality. The "Zingaresca" itself makes a brave attempt to be wildly gay, but it has not the requisite abandon. One hears Signor—one is tempted to say "Herr"—Bossi saying to himself: "Good Lord, here's another variation to write. I must have something by way of contrast. Well, I guess I'll go a-gypsying."

The Fantastic Symphony is nearly 100 years old. Each time it is performed—and the performance yesterday was impressive—there is wonder at the achievement of this genius, who taught the world what might be done with orchestral instruments used daringly, for in 1830 Berlioz was regarded by most of his contemporaries as a madman; the genius whose influence affected nearly all the composers that came after him, Liszt, Wagner, the Russians, the men of today. It is impossible to think of modern orchestral music without honoring Berlioz.

Nor was he merely a master, self-taught, of instrumentation. He was a man of musical ideas, some of them gigantic. In 1830 romanticism was in the air. Byron was the poet of poets to Europeans. Hugo, the elder Dumas Gautier, in the younger years of Berlioz, with certain painters, broke away from the accepted conventions. That Berlioz startled the hide-bound classicists, that he was mocked and derided is not surprising. His program for the Fantastic Symphony may now seem as extravagant as Hugo's "Hernani"; as Dumas's "Antony." There are pages in the symphony where the extravagance that was once exciting is now out-worn formalism. One finds in the Witches' Sabbath a straining after effect, an impotent attempt to be real devilish at the expense of the actress, Harriet Smithson; yet the Mephistopheles section in Liszt's "Faust" symphony owes much to this Finale. The Ball music seems curiously old fashioned; one wishes the Scene in the Meadows were a little shorter. But the man that wrote the first movement, so expressive of the delirious sleep-chasings and flaming passions of a half-crazed brain; the man that conceived and formed the grisly, the tremendous March to the Scaffold; he, beyond all doubt and preadventure, is among the greatest of the great.

A brilliant performance of Wagner's Prelude brought the end.

The performance will be repeated this evening. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Devorak, Symphony No. 3, F major (first time here); Puccini, "Visse d'arte" (Mme. Frances Alda); Rimsky-Korsakov, "Fairy Tale" (after Pushkin)—first time here; Marx, "Marienlied," and "If Love Hath Entered Thy Heart" (Mme. Alda); Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

ALDA SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Trav 10/14

Frances Alda, the prima donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will be the first soloist of the Boston Symphony season when she appears with the orchestra at its second pair of concerts to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. She will be heard in the aria "Vissi d'Arte" from Puccini's La Tosca" and two songs by Josef Marx.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

FOR BEGINNING, BERLIOZ, BOSSI, WAGNER

Once More the Prelude to "The Mastersingers" Salutes a New Season—Bossi's Double-Faced Variations, Now Italian, Now Teutonic—After a Hundred Years the "Fantastic Symphony" — Orchestra and Conductor in Prime

THE end of the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon might well have been the beginning. For the final item upon Mr. Monteux's programme, at the outset of a forty-second season, was Wagner's Prelude to his romantic comedy in song, "The Mastersingers." Festival, almost ceremonial, music it is; yet music aglow with instrumental melodies, unfolding from themselves, feeding more and more richly upon their own beauty, alight with reflected glories as side by side they march and mount. Music, too, of superlative design and structure—ever weaving and expanding an ample, ascendant web; here loosening, there tightening, the gathered strands; dividing and subdividing into silvery rivulets only to interlace in single, sweeping, golden flood—from first bar to last a paragon of development by imagination and of counterpoint become song. The ear tingles to stinging modulation, the nerves thrill to the rasp and cut of the strident strings; deep burrows every receptive faculty into the harmonic opulence, the instrumental splendor, of the whole. Once more the expected sounds both new and strange. To listen is sensuous surfeiting—for the twentieth, maybe, the thirtieth time.

Measure by measure, period after period, the Prelude unrolls the pageant of Wagner's comedy of the Nuremberg folk, homely or romantic. There in bourgeois pomp stride the cobblers, the goldsmiths, the soap-boilers, who were Mastersingers too. Here paces Sachs benign; or Beckmesser squeaks envies. Walther woos Pogner's Eva and wins a prize-song also. The apprentices dance; the fête resounds. Out of it all pour the glad humanity, the outspreading, [illegible] the flood of [illegible] er" universal and, so far, everlasting. The learned say that when the matter, the medium, the means and the manner are all as one; when creator and receiver become of a single mind, heart, faith, emotion, then do the arts do their utmost miracle. Wagner wrought it through this quarter hour as, perhaps, at no time else, not even when "Tristan" pulses highest or "Parsifal" quivers with elations of heaven and agonies of earth. And for those who love this Prelude, who still race, wet-eyed as silly children, through the excitement of it, the miracle is perpetual. Under the spell they will say unabashed that no other music is quite comparable. With reason these joyous tumults, these unfading splendors begin or end symphonic seasons . . . If Mr. Monteux and the orchestra seemed to catch for an instant at the very beginning, like a motor changing gears, they lifted—stride upon stride, sonority upon sonority—the pompous pæans of the end.

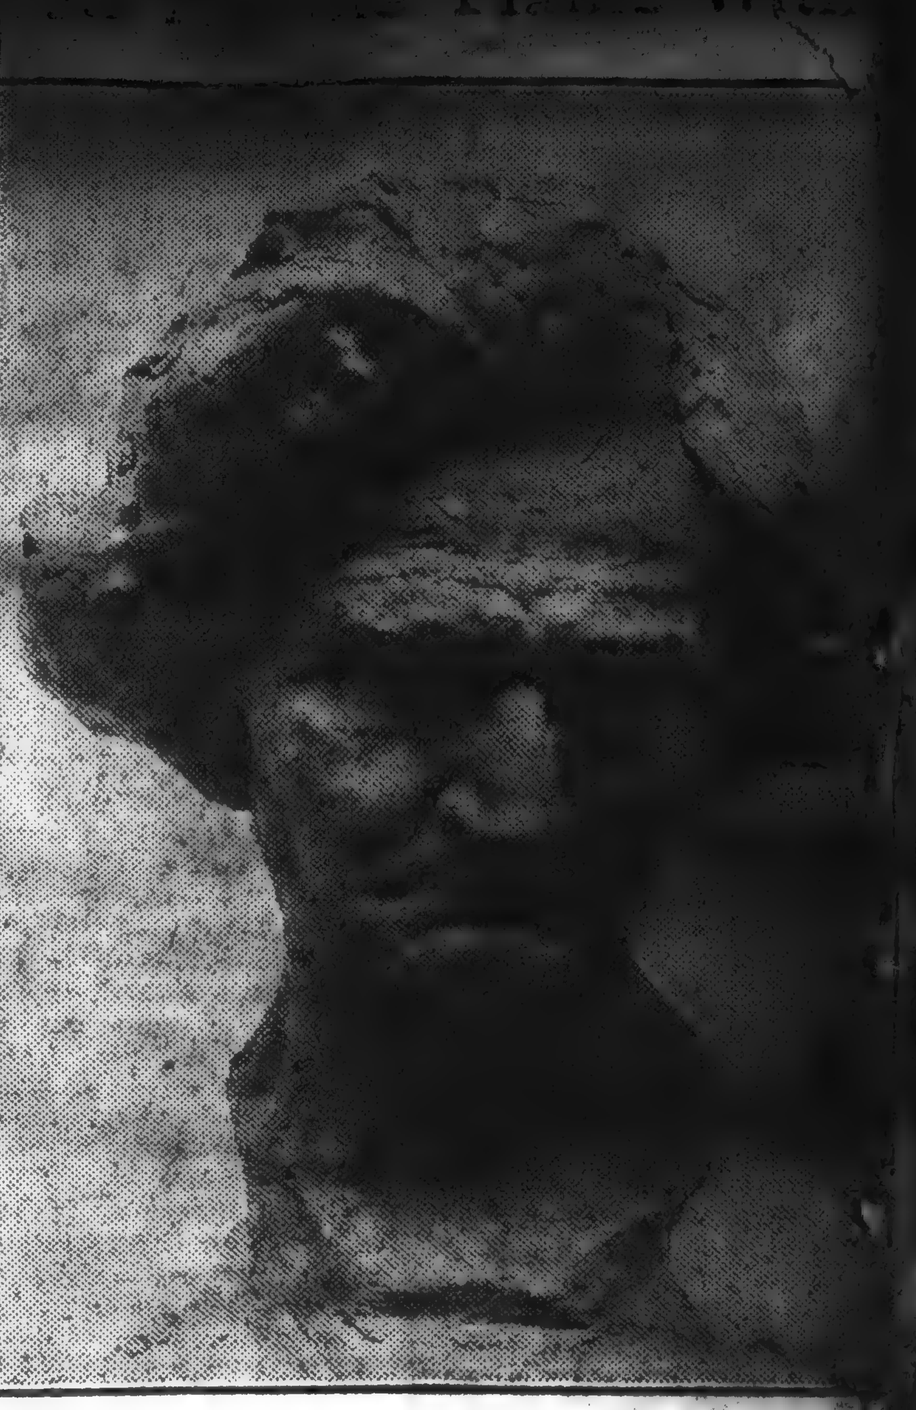
The middle piece of the day was of far different sort. In Italy sixty years ago was born Enrico Bossi, destined to be composer of music. As such, there he has dwelt and worked these thirty years; but in his own land, without too rich reward. German ears in particular, foreign ears in general, have heard him more gladly. A Bavarian conductor, Dr. Muck, opened to Bostonians Bossi's "Intermezzi Goldoniani," expert, fanciful, ornate, high-humored pieces suggested by the Venetian's comedies. To them a Parisian conductor yesterday added ten Variations upon an Original Theme, undeservedly receiving only a ruffle of applause for zeal and pains.

Bossi's orchestra—a full one—sings over his theme, amplifies, adorns it. It is long-breathed, impinging upon the ear with unusual interval and stripped sequence—a theme of clear vitality, a theme that may also melt and charm. Forthwith, Bossi sets to his variations now isolating them, now linking them into quasi-symphonic movements. They are not exercises in the evolution of music by studious process nursed in abstruse reflection. Technically Bossi shapes and conducts them skilfully, resourcefully, never once losing the thematic thread of his discourse. He is quick with inventive ingenuities; alert to his medium from the highest tinkle of the celesta to the lowest throb of the double-basses. He teems with harmonic device; his instrumental palette is many-colored. He modulates boldly. His music coheres and rounds. It also sounds.

Yet, like most other moderns, when they set to variations, Bossi is bound to have them moody. He joins two together in strenuous, astringent vein, using his orchestra full-voiced. He passes to another pair, grave of tonal speech, wistful, longing. Forthwith he flings into clicking gypsy measures; sighs out a shepherd's musing, piercing tune. A choral-like variation prepares the way for a variation of sheer orchestral declamation to sharp-edged, striding unisons in the strings. A finale leaps and whirls as though a Czech had written it. Yet twice or thrice before, the ear believed it had caught clear Wagnerian notes.

Many-sided, many voiced such variations are bound to be. In them, "old" Italian, though he is, Bossi sometimes writes music as graceful, charming, apt and transparent as Respighi's in "Fountains of Rome," as deft of means, lace-like in texture, sun-lit in shimmer, sensitive always. Again he is full-throated, vigorous, harsh, pounding—as turbid, sharp-edged, orotund as though he had quite half an ear for his German public. Again he is all for a manner. "Idyllic," he must muse delicately, artfully, lucidly. "Gypsy-wise," he must snap and flash. He declaims string-and-trumpet toned; and forthwith, through a crackling, leaping, whirling Finale runs a race with Smetana of the overture to "The Bartered Bride."

And the outcome? First, a music of delicate strands, lustres, modulation, progress, through the lighter or the more pensive variations. Second, through the more vigorous divisions, a music rough-coated, striding, sharp-edged, sometimes both turbulent and turbid. Natural voice Italian, acquired voice Teutonic, a listening cynic might say. Glamorous and soft-surfaced [illegible] near to beauty. Strident [illegible]



Berlioz

From a Bust, Hitherto Unphotographed, by Nao Aronson, Russian Sculptor in Paris strenuous he is close to power. Seldom in these Variations does he linger in the limbo of commonplace between.

Berlioz began the afternoon—Berlioz of the "Fantastic Symphony"—music quick to disclose the present quality and temper of the orchestra. His melody is clearly outlined, thin-voiced, open-meshed. Often a high, dry light plays over his harmonies. He uses instruments and groups of instruments with imaginative sense of range, quality, suggestion. There is no mistaking modulation or transformation. Berlioz would make his music so completely the expression of the mood or the impulse, the pleasure or the pang, the picture or the pageant, that he strips it to the quick. Playing it, an orchestra stands revealed Be it written, then, that the string choir of a little changed band keeps precision, pliancy, penetrating or shimmering tone; that the wood-winds remain assembled virtuosi, each conscious of the character of his instrument, each able to run the full gamut of its voice; that the horns lose not in richness; that the other brass overlays power with mellowness; that the whole band is quick to balance, euphonies, colorings, transitions, emphases, to every manifestation of the conductor's or the composer's will. As far as both may go, with them goes the orchestra, alert, intent, altogether sensitive and responsive instrument. With Mr. Monteux, it answered to Wagner's ardors; was as many voiced as Bossi and as keen; lared Berlioz's music and then vivified it. Perhaps the conductor drew out too long and too slowly the musing movements of the "Fantastic Symphony"; but everywhere else, through the afternoon, he, orchestra and composer shared a single eloquence.

In these days, Berlioz, outside an overture or two, needs every such aid. Musorgsky passioned himself to make his music of opera the very voice of character, scene, moment, mood. He would achieve in tones, not the operatic illusion of artifice but the dramatic illusion of reality. As zealously Berlioz sought through music another illusion—the illusion of romantic reality, the making of his dreams and visions as intense upon his hearers as they were within his own imagination. Sometimes his very eagerness defeats him, as in "The Witchs' Sabbath" of this "Fantastic Symphony," where a multitude of details clogs and clutters, rather than vivifies and enhances, the whole. The music stiffens because it would be so exact. This intensity denies him again selection, self-criticism. There are measures in the first movement of the "Fantastic Symphony" that sound to this day as the voice of sleep-chasings is disordered dream. Yet side by side stand passages of tumid commonplace. Romanticist to the core, with all the ardors of a century ago, Berlioz craved the spectacular, could write for it a spectacular music. Hence the alternate thuddings and thunderings of "The March to the Scaffold"; or the showy glinting waltz haunted by pale images of the beloved woman.

Nowadays only in the "Scene in the Fields" does Berlioz seem quite to gain his ends. With sound, he summons silence and solitude; his shepherds' tune pierces; amorous ecstasy throbs out of the music; am[illegible] agitation clutches it; into solitude and broken silences the scene fades again. Elsewhere music that smothers itself in excess of intensity; that generates no more than tonal spectacle; that strips to the quick and finds the quick no longer tingling. In the century since the "Fantastic Symphony" was new, romance has become more choice, exacting, reticent. Set what programme the composer may, he must also write music that shall endure by its own virtue for its own sake. Seldom [illegible] the "Fantastic Symphony" did Berlioz gain such power, assure such fortune.

TRANS - Oct

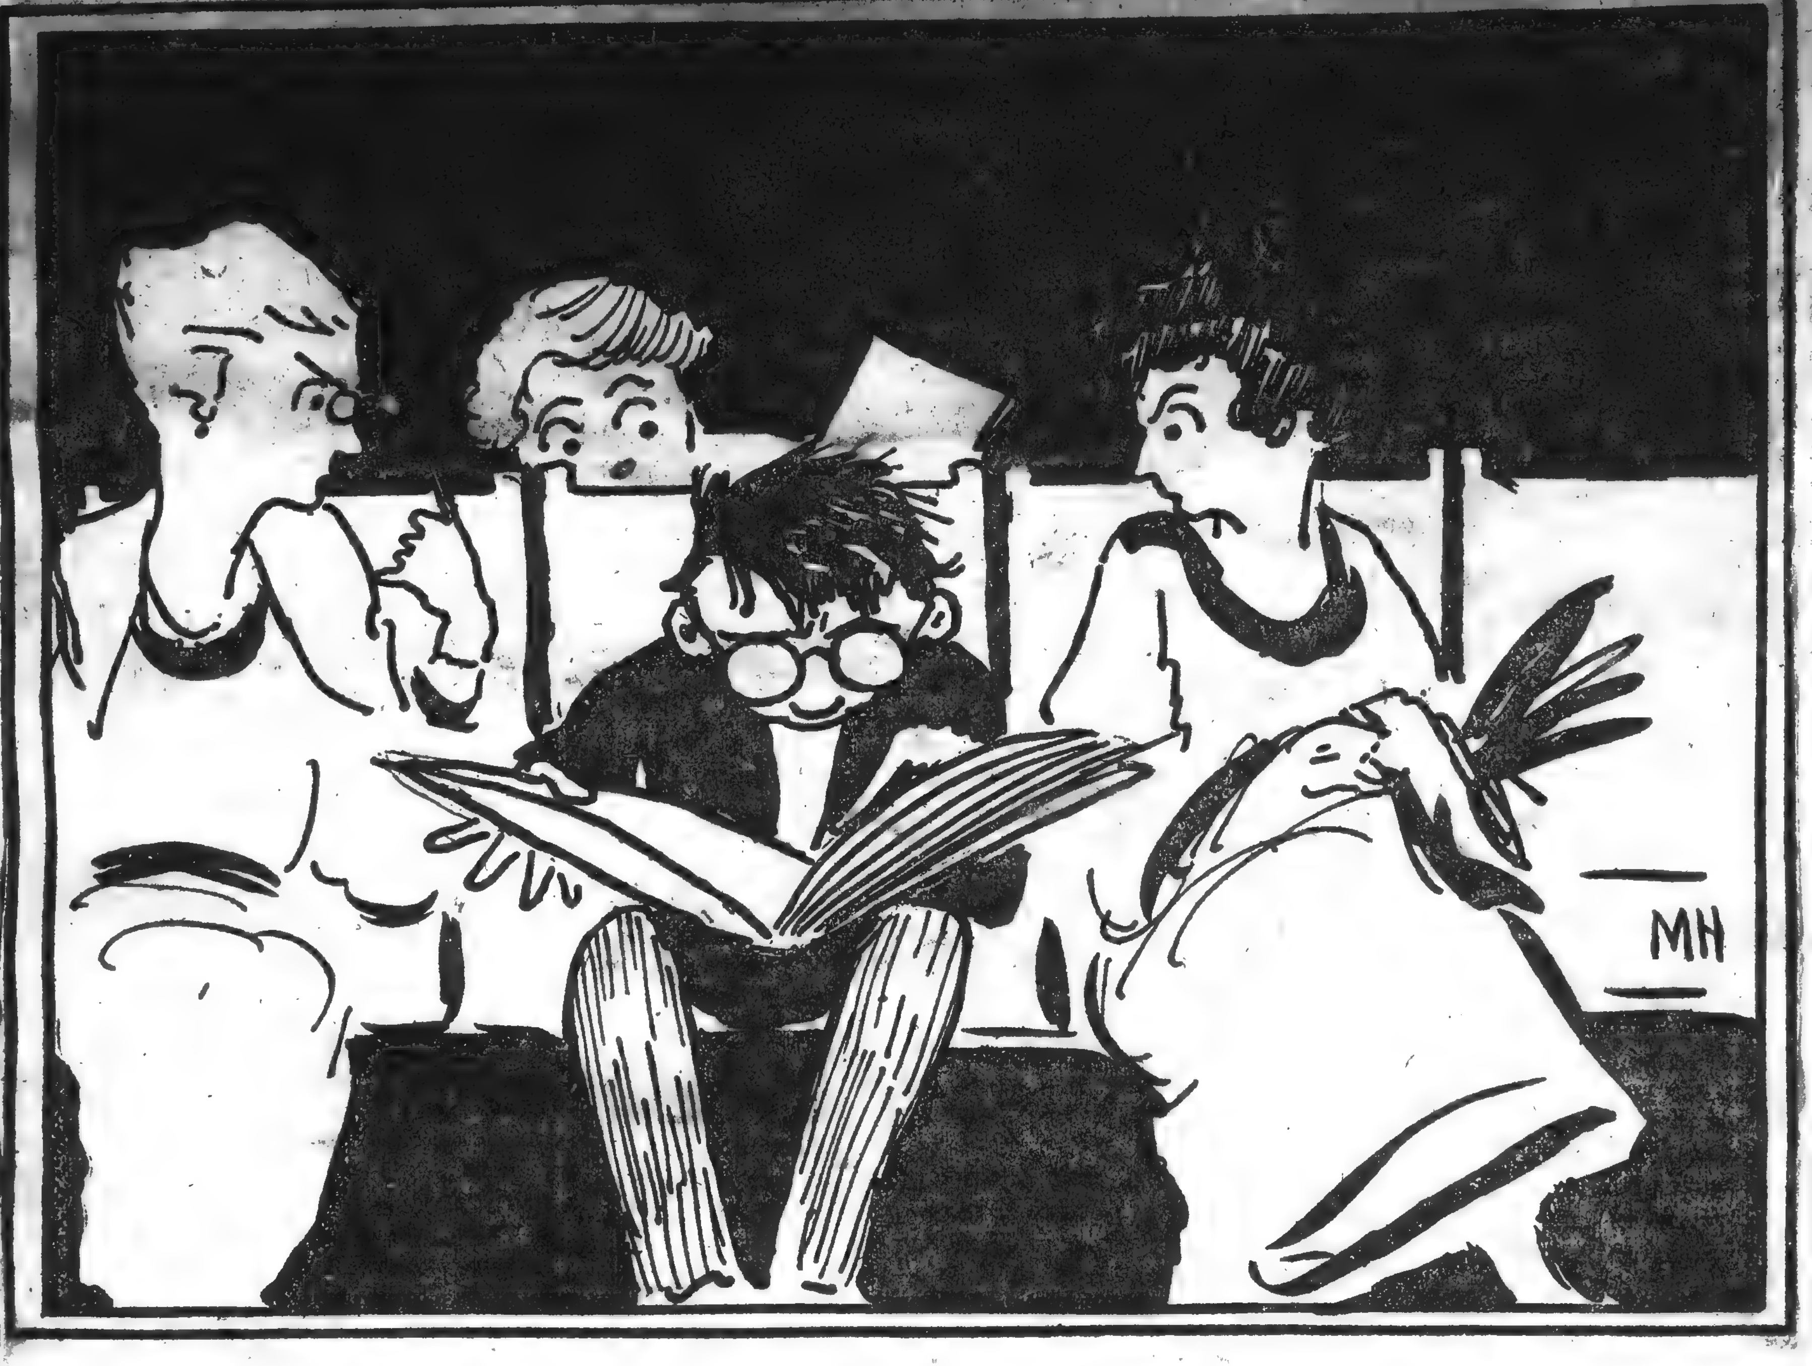
Globe 10-15

ALDA AT SYMPHONY

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux has placed the Dvorak symphony in F major. Strauss "Thus Spake Zarathustra" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Conte Feerique" on the program. The soloist will be Frances Alda, prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing the "Vissi d'Arte" aria from Puccini's "La Tosca" and two songs by Josef Marx, "Marienlied" and "Hat dich die Liebe Beruhrt."

TRANS - Oct. 15.

Predicaments of the Concert-Hall



He Who Reads the Score. Also His Neighbors

TRANS - Oct. 14.

MME. ALDA SYMPHONY SOLOIST

On the second program the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux has placed the Third Symphony of Dvorak in F major, Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" (based on Nietzsche's "Philosophy of the Superman"), and Rimsky-Korsako's "Coute Feerique," based upon Pushkin. The Symphony and the "Fairy Tale" will be heard here for the first time.

Strauss's tone poems has not been heard at these concerts since 1916.

The first soloist of the season will appear at this pair of concerts, Mme. Frances Alda of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing with the orchestra "Vissi d'Arte" from Puccini's "Tosca," and two songs by Jose Marx—"Marienlied" and "If love hath entered thy Heart."

HERALD - Oct. 15.

Friday, at 2:30, and Saturday, at 8, Boston Symphony Orchestra, second program. Third Symphony, Dvorak; "Marietta's Song" from "The Dead City," Korngold; "Marienlied" and "Hat dich die Liebe beruehrt," Josef Marx; "Also Sprach Zarathustra," Strauss; "Conte Feerique," Rimsky Korsakov. Soloist, Frances Alda.

GLOBE - Oct. 15

Alda Symphony Soloist

On the second programme of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be played at the symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux has placed the Third Symphony of Dvorak in F major, Strauss' Tone Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra" (based on Nietzsche's "Philosophy of the Superman"), and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Conte Feerique," based upon the fairy legend of Poushkin.

The first soloist of the season will appear at this pair of concerts, Frances Alda, the prima donna soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company. She will sing with the orchestra the famous aria "Vissi d'Arte" from Puccini's "La Tosca," and two songs by Josef Marx—"Marienlied" and "Hat dich die Liebe beruehrt."

POST - Oct. 15

It was said that Mme. Alda, at the Symphony concerts this week, would sing an air from Korngold's opera, "The Dead City," besides the two songs of Joseph Marx. It seems she has changed her mind. She has substituted "Vissi d'Arte," sung by Floria Tosca, while Scarpia is recovering his breath, lost by chasing her about the furniture in the living room of his palace. The symphony by Dvorak has not been performed here, strange to say, and "Fairy Tale," by Rimsky-Korsakov, will also be new to the audience. The latter, inspired by the prologue of Pushkin's "Russlan and Ludmilla," comes in the order of Rimsky's orchestral compositions between the Serbian Fantasia and the Capriccio on Spanish themes.

HERALD - Oct. 15

THREE orchestral pieces stand on Mr. Monteux's programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternooh and Saturday evening—a songful symphony in F major by Dvorak, hitherto unplayed here; Rimsky-Korsakov's music to "A Fairy Legend" in the verse of Pushkin and Strauss's renowned tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," unheard in Boston since Dr. Muck's day. Between whiles Mme. Alda, summoned for the first time to the side of the orchestra will sing Tosca's soliloquy from Puccini's like-named opera and two songs by the little-known Viennese, Josef Marx. Of him, Dvorak's symphony and of Rimsky's piece, more will be said in this place.

On Thursday evening next in Sanders Theatre at Harvard, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will begin their annual series of concerts at Cambridge before the usual expectant audience. No programme as yet comes to hand and there is only to announce that a newcomer from Paris, Mme. d'Espinoy Colonne will be the assisting singer.

TRANS. Oct. 16.

Mme. Frances Alda will sing at the Symphony concerts this week. Many remember her appearing as Marguerite in the operas of Boito and Gounod, Verdi's "Othello" and Massenet's "Manon" at the Boston Opera House. Some may recall the entertaining quarrel between her and the fair Lydia Lipkowska over the right to portray Manon. Mme. Alda is a plucky woman. When she went to Paris for lessons with Mme. Marchesi she knew no French, yet she quickly learned it so that she sang in that language acceptably when she made her debut as Manon at the Opera-Comique in 1904. Tomorrow afternoon she will sing here with this orchestra for the first time; "Vissi d'arte," from "Tosca," and two unfamiliar songs by Joseph Marx of Graz, later of Vienna.

A joyous symphony by Dvorak will be performed tomorrow for the first time in Boston, a symphony that reveals the Dvorak who played for dances in the years of his poverty, before he became unduly serious and wrote oratorios for the smug English. An unfamilar piece by our old friend, Rimsky-Korsakov, will also be played—"Fairy Tale," inspired by the introduction Pushkin wrote for his "Ruslan and Ludmilla" (1820), in which he introduces a well-informed cat telling wondrous tales, as it is attached by a golden chain to a green oak near the sea.

HERALD - Oct. 19.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

BUSY ORCHESTRAS AND BUSY SINGERS

Mme. Alda to Lead a Little Known Song-Writer Into Symphony Hall—Novel Orchestral Trifles Besides—The Harvard Glee Club Announces Three Promising Evenings — Impending Programmes — Valiant Stokovski

WRITING in the "Musical Times" of March, 1912, and in the same publication almost a year later, Ernest Newman hailed the Austrian composer, Joseph Marx, as the rising genius of the song. In view of the leagues that music has travelled since these articles were printed much of their content now seems far-fetched and extravagant—some of it even a little ridiculous. Mr. Newman had high hopes for Marx's future—he was then in his thirty-first year—but it can hardly be said that these hopes have been fulfilled. His name is not numbered among those of the notable composers of our day. Indeed, at least on this side of the Atlantic, it is hardly known at all. The latest edition of Baker's Dictionary of Music gives the number of Marx's [illegible] as eighty (he has written a few larger things besides), yet recital after recital goes by and the name of Marx may not be found upon the programme.

As it chances, however, in selecting the pieces for her appearance at this week's pair of Symphony Concerts Mme. Alda's choice fell upon two of Marx's songs with orchestral accompaniment—the "Song of Mary" and "If Love Hath Entered Thy Heart." Mr. Newman's comments on the difficulties of Marx's accompaniments and of his boldness and resourcefulness as a harmonist seem, in the face of present developments in such matters, curious enough. Yet his remarks on the songs now impending are well worth quoting. Of the "Marienlied," and two songs that he groups with it, he wrote: "Marx . . . can, it is true, write with great and effective simplicity when the occasion demands it—as in "Ein junger Dichter denkt an die Geliebte," the "Japanisches Regenlied" and the "Marienlied"; but even here, though the texture may be less compact than elsewhere, it is still rich and full flavored." Twice in the course of his initial article on the composer does Mr. Newman refer to the second of the songs that we are to hear tomorrow and Saturday. Speaking of Marx's accompaniments he declares:

> No sensible modern composer will throw away the infinite possibilities of expression afforded by the pianoforte in order to comply with some imaginary rule of song writing, and Marx certainly does not do so. His harmonic idiom is among the richest of our time. It is true that he is a little over-fond of one or two modulations and that he is apt to fall at the end of his songs into a certain uniformity of device. The climax in "Hat dich die Liebe berührt," "Maienblüten," "Frage und Antwort," "September Morgen," and other songs, is built in the same way, by a constant piling up of much the same kind of harmonic effect. But for all that he handles his harmonic masses with great freedom, power and subtlety, moving easily through the most complex mazes. It may be, perhaps, that he occasionally asks of both instrument and prayer more than they can reasonably be expected to do; but these are generous errors—perhaps of youth—and will readily be forgiven him in consideration of the riches he is pouring out.

In orchestrating the accompaniments of the two songs by which we are now to know him Marx has followed divergent methods. The "Marienlied" is simply and most effectively scored for two horns, harp and strings, while the instrumentation of the other enlists almost in its entirety the full modern orchestra. Presumably Mme. Alda will sing the songs in German. As printed in the orchestra score the English version of the "Marienlied" is as follows:

From a thousand paintings though I know thee,
Oh Mary, pictured full of grace,
Yet none of all there is to show thee
As when my soul beheld thy face.

I only know the world's loud riot
Since then seems like a dream apart
And an ineffably sweet quiet
Is ever present in my heart.

"Hat dich die Liebe berührt," a poem by Paul Heyse, is in the score fitted with a somewhat halting English translation. The following prose version may better serve:

> If love has rested upon thee, then in clouds of gold thou movest quietly through the din of the crowd, securely led by God. As if lost in dreams thou lettest thy glance wander; leaving to others their pleasures, thou hast but one desire. Drawn shyly within thyself, in vain dost thou make denial that now the crown of life shines gloriously upon thy brow.

Setting for Strauss

With the exception of Strauss's tone-poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and the aria, "Vissi d'Arte," from "Tosca," all of the pieces selected by Mr. Monteux for this week's programme are new [illegible] the Symphony Concerts. The Symphony is Dvorak's in F major, numbered three, yet the first of the five in order of composition. The piece was written in 1875—Dvorak was then in his early thirties—and in contrast with the latter symphonies it seems in the main naive and tentative. In it, however, is much that is fresh and charming, with plentiful intimations of future powers. There is also much that is mere formal, almost Mendelssohnian exercise in symphonic writing. A flavor of Bohemian folk-song pervades the whole. Music so simply and clearly made may speak for itself and calls for no anticipatory elucidation or analysis.

Between the aria and the songs of Marx stands an unfamiliar piece by Rimsky-Korsakov, a "Fairy Legend," Opus 29. This "Conte Féerique" was composed in 1880 and has for its poetic basis a passage from the Prologue of Poushkin's "Russlan and Ludmilla." This fragment is printed in Russian and French on the flyleaf of the score. Here follows a freely translated version:

> In a circular space by the edge of the sea stands a green oak; from this tree hangs a golden chain, and attached to the chain is a sagacious cat who night and day wanders round about that place; as he goes to the right he warbles a song, as he goes to the left he recounts a tale. There are prodigies there; a satyr lingers there; there a naiad is seated among the branches; there, in the tiny hidden pathways, may be found the tracks of marvellous beasts; forest and valley swarm with thousands of spectres; there at dawn the waves beat upon the sandy and deserted shore and thirty splendid horsemen in a row ride out from the crystal of the waves, followed by their mentor of the deep; there a young monarch captures by the way a terrible sovereign; there, in the darkness, before the people, a sorcerer bears a hero away across forests and seas; there in her prison a young queen weeps at having for her only servitor and companion a wolf who serves her faithfully; there walks a mortal wandering away with an old sorceress; there perished the king Kastchei, looking at his gold; there lives a Russian spirit—there all has a Russian savor.
>
> I have been there, I have drunk of Khydromel; I have seen the green oak by the sea; I have sat at its roots, and the sagacious cat has told me his tales.
>
> I remember one of them.
>
> Here it is:

The music to which this fantasy inspired Rimsky-Korsakov abounds in imaginative detail. In the instrumentation may be found the familiar characteristics of the composer—glowing and limpid coloring, titillating percussive effects, all manner of orchestral ingenuities and niceties. . . . Through such music of light charm and ready appeal is the wise, well-paved way to the splendors and the intricacies of the final [illegible]

Programmes in Prospect

New to Bostonian ears, an early piece by Vaughan Williams, the English composer, will be played at the Symphony Concerts next week—a Fantasia on a Theme from Thomas Tallis, musician of Queen Elizabeth's day. The first classical symphony of the season—Mozart's in E-flat—begins the programme; while Liszt's clanging tone-poem, "The Battle of the Huns" ends it. For soloist will come Mr. Moiseiwitsch, the Anglo-Russian pianist to play a Concerto by Cherépnin, in all probability novel in Boston.

TRANS- Oct. 20

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

MUSIC FOR CAMBRIDGE; MUSIC FOR GENTILES

Mr. Monteux Discovers an Overlooked Symphony of Dvorak—A Colonne Also Sings—Pieces from the Synagogue, the Church and the Folk from Mr. Gideon's Singers—In the Philadelphia Manner—Items as They Pass

EVIDENTLY the conductors have lingered too long over the commonplace of Dvoràk which is the "New World Symphony." By the same token they have turned too kindly ear toward the music of his later years, when his inventive faculty was spent, when he chose subject-matter that less enkindled than over-taxed his imagination. The characteristic, pleasure-giving, enduring Dvoràk is the Czech who composed his earlier symphonies because instrumental song welled in him, because, almost instinctively, he could set it sparkling in harmonies and timbres. Or else it is the Dvoràk whose Bohemian blood coursed in fire through the "Husitzka Overture"; or who set the formal measures of chamber-music astir to the rhythms of singing, dancing Czechs. Possibly, because Mr. Monteux's antecedents are French rather than German; certainly because he keeps an open, cosmopolitan mind, he approaches Dvoràk without prepossessions; fastens naturally upon this earlier music; and forthwith restores it to the concert-hall as he did with a little Symphony in Boston last winter and with another, in F major, at Cambridge last evening.

True there are measures in this fifty-year-old music of Dvoràk in his early thirties that are no more than filling to the chosen form, than deferences to the best models of a time still respecting Mendelssohn. Yet even these are written with an eagerness that exceeds mere duty. Many more are the measures in which Dvoràk is inventor and sustainer of pure instrumental song, almost Schubertian in freshness and fecundity, in the sparkle of adorning imagination while it is still dewy. The first movement, even though the formalities occasionally stiffen it, abounds in melody. The second softens the earlier vigors, deepens the earlier song, discloses Dvoràk, thus early, as music-maker of rare sensibility to the beauty and the suggestion of wood-winds and horns. Outsprings the Czech in the Scherzo, leaping, piping to the reiterated figures of folk-song and folk-dance, falling as impulsively into contrasting Czech languors. The young vigors return in the finale; ardent motives stride and shout into melody; Dvoràk is still at the age when he loves the full-throated tune reverberant through the full orchestra. Played with the glamorous tone of Mr. Monteux's wind-choir, with the keen accents and the sturdy progress of his strings, with the conductor's own keenness of pace and quick ear to color, the little Symphony in F major carried all before it in Sanders Theatre, as it will, no doubt, today and tomorrow in Symphony Hall. After all Dvoràk is still alive—and, most of all, in the youth wherein his music sang and danced, while harmonies and timbres leapt to mind and fingers. Music of the simple for the simple, if the hearer will; but music again almost Schubertian in an unthinking spontaneity—gift of the gods and maybe, therefore, divine.

Mr. Monteux courts the contrasts of programme-making. He summoned them, indeed, when in succession to this Symphony of Dvoràk, he set the tone-poem of Mr. Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne," according to verses in the half-forgotten "Faust" of the German poet, Lenau. In them, Faust, moody and despairing, wanders the forest through a night a-quiver with the bourgeoning of the spring. A pale glow waxes over the woodlands; the sound of holy song stirs through them. As in vision, Faust sees a procession of the blessed—graybeards sanctified, children already attuned to pious canticles. He sees, he weeps; emotion shakes him; yet must he wend upon his sorrowing way. Matter for music, for tone-picturing, assuredly; while with it Mr. Rabaud has done a most sedulous, a most efficient job. As it seems, he has shaped not a motiv, unfolded not a melody without thorough meditation and solicitous choice. He plies no less thought and pains upon harmonic background and instrumental color. Hardly a modulation goes unfingered; hardly a change of pace or rhythm unpondered. He picks his accents, his color, like a needlewoman assorting, contrasting yarns.

The outcome is a most faithful photograph in tones of Lenau's imagery, flawless but also lifeless—music by mental process and tonal "science" less than by enkindled spirit, moulding, heating the eager means. Mr. Rabaud indeed glows only when a certain Wagner chances to warm him. Had not Isolde lain in Tristan's arms in the shadowy garden, Faust, it is easy to believe, would have experienced fewer tonal emotions in Lenau's shadowy forest. Dvoràk, too, with all his freshness of soil and spirit, knew also this Wagner, had heard, in particular, the sharp-set strings of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." With that piece, Mr. Monteux elected to end the concert. His string choir was indeed weighty between the wooden walls of Sanders Theatre; but they flung back like mirrors every detail of Wagner's multi-woven web. Between whiles, a new singer, as is often [illegible] of these Cambridge Concerts, gave [illegible] the [illegible]—Mme [illegible] Colonne, niece to the [illegible] Parisian conductor, pupil of [illegible], now singing-teacher. Her gentle aspect pleases; her manner suggests a woman of taste and breeding. Her voice is a light, slight, sunny soprano, sensitive to clear line, quick to bright color, crystalline yet unhardened—a voice for intimate contacts with music and hearer rather than for large impression over ample spaces. Mme. Colonne deployed these tones upon the Naïd's Air from Gluck's "Armida"; upon two of the songs—"Absence" and a "Villanelle"—in which Berlioz clothed with music verses of his neighbor Théophile Gautier. The delicate brightness, the pretty suppleness of her singing suited the piece from Gluck—water-color in tones, light of line, deft of modulation and shading. Through it, upon refinement she refined. Berlioz's song of the longing of the parted, asked a larger utterance, a deeper play of feeling than Mme Colonne could quite summon; yet as far as they might, went her fine, clear warmths. In the "Villanelle," her play of light pace, rhythm, inflection, charmed. Berlioz, too, "sounded" in these songs. The dry imagery, exact emotions, spare body and keen-cut line of Gautier's verse, gave him ready impetus to like yet, often, richer speech in tones. Together the twain wrought a poetry as etched as it is penetrating. For better or for worse so goes the French way. Foreign ears variously hear and enjoy.

H. T. P.

TRANS- Oct. 20

Incidents and Announcements

Before the Symphony Concerts of the autumn have gone far, Mr Monteux will include in them Holst's celebrated Suite, "The Planets," as yet unheard in Boston. Long as the piece is, he will make no cuts, rightly believing that such a composer and such music is entitled at least once to full hearing. No pages from the younger Britons, except Vaughan Williams's "London Symphony," have [illegible] generally and [illegible] praised.

About to spend a year or more in Europe, Mr. Frederick E. Lowell has resigned his seat in the Board of Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra. Mr. E. Sohier Welch now succeeds to it.

TRANS-Oct. 20.

STRAUSS' MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

"Zarathustra" Performed Frances Alda, Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

Unfamiliar music by Dvorak and Rimsky-Korsakoff and singing by Frances Alda of the Metropolitan Opera Company were features of the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. But all this music was overwhelmed by the concluding performance of Richard Strauss' tone-poem, "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which flaming and ecstatic music overwhelmed everything that had gone before.

STRAUSS' BOLDEST VENTURE

For the writer this music is at once the tragic failure and the outstanding adventure and Pilgrim's Progress of Strauss' career. He wrote it at a time when nothing was impossible. He composed it after reading Nietzsche's poem of the man who should attain greater realizations and horizons than man had ever known. "Beyond man," sang Nietzsche, and Strauss was in a mood to follow him, to attempt what is perhaps, all said and done, the boldest thing a musician ever dreamed. And he so nearly succeeded. He so nearly entered the promised land.

There is one very weak place in this work—and the very place where weakness is most lamentable—the beginning of Zarathustra's dance of joy. The cheapness of invention here is mightily atoned if not substituted for by the pages which immediately follow—when the composer causes the dance rhythm to sweep forward as on a torrent all the motives and all the emotional phases of the music that has gone before, up to the shattering climax, with the tolling of the great bell that reverberates to the Night Wanderer's Song of Zarathustra.

Has Colossal Vision

Granted, however, that here is marble and here is clay, this music stirs one as one would be stirred by the unfinished, crumbling creation of a Michelangelo, because of its colossal vision and power, and what it leaves unsaid. If it is possible for a work of art with a weakness in its very centre to endure, when this really sublime attempt at the cosmic will be listened to and reverenced by generations.

But Strauss made for himself a second misfortune. He wrote a score that not one in a dozen of the ablest conductors alive have shown themselves able to handle. The performance yesterday, like performances of this tone poem given by Dr. Muck in this city, [illegible] nor the Nietz-[illegible] which are clearly and unmistakably in the score.

Taxes Talent of Virtuosi

The conductor who reads this music must not be too literal. Where a plain man would see a yellow canvas he must see the sunset of the worlds. And he and his orchestra—which must include a brave and audacious trumpeter, among other virtuosi who will find their talents taxed to the very utmost—must have the music technically at the finger-tips, must be thrice familiar with it, mentally as well as physically masters of its prodigious outlines and turmoils of tone, and must fling it from their instruments as if the very stars and planets had run amuck with joy.

Of Dvorak's F major symphony little need be said. It is labored, conventional—anything but the wonderful Dvorak of the songs and Slavonic dances of his native land. The Bohemian peasant has put on his Sunday best and endeavored to mingle with people of position and pretence, and under these circumstances he is a hopeless bore.

Nor, strange to say, was Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Fairy Tale," after Pushkin, any better, or even as good. It was pedantic and dull—an astonishing and incredible disappointment to those who know the Antar symphony and the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade."

Mme. Alda's Singing

Mme. Alda's singing gave great pleasure. The voice is more beautiful, the tone rounder, the phrasing more thoughtful than ever. Probably an opera singer is expected to sing such sentimental trash as the "Vissi d'arte" from "Tosca." It was well done without exaggeration. What was far better as music, and admirably interpreted, were the two songs of Joseph Marx, "Marienlied" and "Hat dich die liebe beruhrt." These songs are notable for their simplicity and for the fortunate employment of a large orchestra in a way which furnishes a colorful and sonorous background—which paints a picture, but does not overwhelm the voice. The audience applauded Mme. Alda warmly in giving deserved recognition to her consistent development as an artist.

POST-Oct. 21.

2D CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Two Novelties on Bill, Dvorak's Work in F Major, Russian Fairy Tale

MME. ALDA SINGS UNFAMILIAR SONGS

By PHILIP HALE

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Dvorak, Symphony, F major, No. 3 (first time here); Puccini, "Vissi d'arte," from "Tosca" (Mme. Alda); Rimsky-Korsakov, "Fairy Tale" (first time here); Marx, Marienlied and If Love Hath Entered Thy Heart—with orchestra (Mme. Alda); Strauss, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Dvorak's symphony in F major, composed in 1875 but not performed until 1888, is amiable music, pleasing chiefly by its simplicity and frankness. He was not ashamed of remembering Beethoven in his pastoral mood, Mendelssohn and Schubert, nor did he disdain Bohemian dance rhythms—witness the Scherzo and certain pages of the Finale. When he wrote this symphony he was unsophisticated. He composed music, as he wrote letters to publishers, with the artlessness of a child. England had not yet persuaded him that he was a genius, had not induced him to write in oratoric form. He had not been tempted by American dollars to be unhappy and homesick in New York and to endeavor to found an American school of music on negro melodies. Old formulas were not foreign to him in 1875. His chief reliance was in sharply defined rhythms and obvious melody. In this symphony there is little of the thickly laid-on color noticeable in some of his earlier works; in some of them are red, scarlet, purple, crimson patches. The young lions among the ultra-modern composers would say that the Symphony in F is thin, weak, childish; that no wonder it has been neglected, but portions of it yesterday had an agreeable, soothing sound to ears that are too often rasped or stunned.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Fairy Tale" was a grievous disappointment. It was a mistake for the composer to publish in his score the wildly fantastical introduction of Pushkin to his "Ruslan and Ludmilla," for the music falls far short of the text in imaginative thought and expression. For once Rimsky-Korsakov was academic and dull. The opening preluding, tiresome in itself, led to little of poetic interest. Even the instrumentation is not what one had a right to expect from this master. How seldom is it worth while to possess the complete works of any man—poet, novelist, essayist, musician! Yet it was a satisfaction to learn that Rimsky-Korsakov could write music of a conventional order, could be laboriously uninteresting; and there was Pushkin's Introduction, more musical than the music suggested by it, an introduction to be classed with some of Arthur Rimbaud's fantasias in prose.

Mme. Alda sang here for the first time at a Symphony concert. The unfamiliar songs by Marx are beautiful. The Marienlied is discreetly and [illegible]tively orchestrated; [illegible] over-orchestrated [illegible] so-called [illegible] Puccini's [illegible] head-and-blood [illegible] opera was calm and collected, serving to display the beauty of the singer's voice; not suggesting the anguish of Floria while Scarpia is recovering his breath from the mad pursuit of her around the furniture in his salon. One does not demand in the concert hall the passion of the stage; but one may reasonably expect emotional warmth.

Strauss's huge "machine" had not been heard at these concerts for six years. During this time it has aged. The opening measures are still stupendous. The Grave song and Night song are not without compelling beauty, but on the whole, Nietzschian philosophy and music do not dwell together in harmony. Dismiss the thought of Nietzsche; consider the music as absolute music, and there is much that is boresome and inherently cheap, if not vulgar, in spite or by reason of the bombast and pretentiousness. The performance, thoughtfully conceived, brilliant at times, lacked as a whole the melodramatic frenzy and the mad intoxication that alone give this tone-poem genuine life and carry conviction.

The performance will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major; Vaughan Williams, Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis, for double stringed orchestra (first time here); Tcherepnin, Concerto for piano (Mr. Moiseiwitsch); Liszt, "The Battle of the Huns."

HERALD - Oct. 21

VARIETY MARKS SYMPHONY BILL

By E. F. HARKINS

Something to suit every taste is on this week's Symphony program.

There's a bit of opera—the "Vissi d'Arte" aria from Puccini's "Tosca"—and a prima donna from the Metropolitan Opera House the light-voiced Frances Alda. The "Vissi d'Arte" is a fervid, throbbing song, but there was little throb in Mme Alda's interpretation. However, soloist and conductor shook hands amiably and the audience applauded.

FRANCES ALDA

Mme. Alda and the orchestra were both heard to much better advantage in the two Marx songs that came later. They were two excellent songs, by the way, illustrating the superior strength of the German lyric school of a decade ago, before the deluge.

Two novelties on the program were the Dvorak symphony in F major, a deservedly neglected work once popular in small German cities, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Fairy Tale," after Pushkin, another neglected yet interesting work often reminiscent of the classic "Scheherazade." One work was almost banal, the other extremely fanciful. There was variety, anyhow.

Strauss' monumental tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," is the final and by long odds the finest work on the program, and it was splendidly performed yesterday. Mr. Monteux conducted the performance with unwonted insight and enthusiasm.

ADVTISRR Oct. 21

NOVELTIES HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Alda Sings Well—Strauss' "Zarathustra" Revived

The first performance here of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Conte Feerique," and the revival of Strauss' "Also Sprach Zarathustra," last heard here in 1916, made yesterday's Symphony concert musically notable. The soloist, Frances Alda, gave an excellent performance of the hackneyed "Vissi d'Arte," from Puccini's "Tosca," and sang feelingly two very sentimental songs with more or less modern harmonic and orchestral trimmings composed by Josef Marx, an Austrian not previously known here. The symphony was Dvorak's in F-major, an early work never before played in Boston.

If Dvorak had been contented to write a suite instead of a symphony, and had strung together several movements with as much melodic vitality and rhythmic energy as he put into the slow movement and scherzo of this symphony he would have produced a piece likely to take a permanent place in the repertory of Pop concerts. The difficulty most composers since Beethoven find with writing symphonies is chiefly in the development section of the first movement. After the magnificence of the Eroica, C-minor, and above all the ninth symphony development sections, nobody ventures to go back to the naive juggling with themes that sufficed Haydn for development. Yet nobody except Brahms has ever followed Beethoven's symphonic methods with success in a symphony. Hence the [illegible] of the first and [illegible]

[illegible] The performance [illegible] the life and color Mr Monteux almost always imparts to this type of Russian music.

To judge from the scattering nature of the applause at the end of Strauss' great work, many in the audience have not yet been able to follow its essential simple and even old-fashioned plan. Perhaps the complexity of the literary program quoted by the composer from Nietzsche is bewildering. The music is really much less difficult to grasp than the inscrutable mingling of wisdom with nonsense which inspired it. Strauss has put plenty of good tunes, rather highly spiced harmonically and orchestrally to be sure, into his music. His orchestration, especially his attempts at conveying strange moods by means of strange noises, is at least as brilliant as that of Rimsky-Korsakov. The performance was painstaking, and often admirable.

Next week Benno Moiseiwitsch will play with the orchestra a concerto for pianoforte by Tcherepnin. Mozart's E flat major symphony, Liszt's "Battle of the Huns" and a novelty by Vaughan Williams are the other numbers announced.

GLOBE - Oct. 21

From AMERICAN
New York City
OCT 1 1922

Novelties which will be included in the Boston Symphony's programmes this season comprise Honneger's "Horace Victorieux;" Saint-Saens' "Carnival des Animaux;" Chausson's "Soir de Fete;" Strawinsky's suite from "Pulcinella" and the same composer's "Rites of Spring;" Skriabin's Symphony No. 3, "The Divine Poet;" Rimsky-Karsakoff's "Tsar Sultan;" new works by the English composers Holst, Vaughn, Williams and Goossens and others by Italian and Spanish writers.

REPUBLICAN,
Springfield, Mass.
Oct. 1

PREPARES FOR FINE SEASON

Monteux to Start Boston Symphony Rehearsing Tomorrow

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra which is to give a concert here, is assembling the 100 musicians of the orchestra and has ordered the first rehearsal for 10 o'clock on tomorrow morning, in Symphony hall. The season opens in the orchestra's own city on Friday afternoon, the 13th.

Mr Monteux spent a part of the past summer in Europe, where he consulted many composers of note. As a result, the orchestra is to present a number of new works of importance, not only from America but from England, France Germany Italy, Russia and Spain. As a matter of course, the accepted master works of the classic symphonic repertory will predominate in all the programs.

The splendid personnel of last season remains intact, and with a wealth of fine music in prospect and a maximum traveling schedule, the coming 42d season of the Boston Symphony orchestra promises to be one of the most successful that this celebrated organization has ever had.

In Boston, virtually all of the seats for the regular series of 48 concerts have been taken by advance subscription, and for the extra concerts, the Young People's concerts, and the pension fund concerts, there is a like demand, making a total of 59 concerts to be given in Boston. There will also be 28 concerts in the various cities of New England and 26 concerts in other cities, as far north as Montreal and Toronto and as far south as Richmond, Washington and Baltimore, making a sum total of 113 concerts, which is as large a number as the orchestra can possibly undertake.

ADVERTISER,
Boston, Mass.

Familiar Works for Symphony Opening

TOMORROW morning the Boston Symphony Orchestra will assemble for the first rehearsal of the season, which begins October 13. The personnel remains intact.

Pierre Monteux has made the following program for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz' "Fantastic Symphony," "Theme and Variations" by Enrico Bossi and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" prelude.

[14]

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 1 1922

Boston Symphony Starts Rehearsals

To-morrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra will start rehearsals in preparation for the opening of its season in Boston, Oct. 13. Indications are that the orchestra is about to embark on one of the most successful years it has ever had.

In Boston virtually all the seats for the regular series of 48 concerts have been taken in advance by subscription and for the extra concerts, the Young People's concerts, and the Pension Fund concerts, there is a like demand, making a total of 59 concerts to be given in Boston. There will also be 28 concerts in the various cities of New England and 26 concerts in other cities, as far north as Montreal and Toronto, and as far south as Richmond, Washington and Baltimore, making a sum total of 113 concerts.

During his summer in Europe, Mr. Monteux consulted many composers of note, and as a result the orchestra is to present in the course of the season a number of new works of importance, not only from America but from England, France, Germany, Italy, Russia and Spain. As a matter of course, the accepted masterworks of the classic symphony repertory will predominate upon all the programmes.

The splendid personnel of last season remains intact, and with a wealth of fine music in prospect and a maximum traveling schedule, the coming 42nd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be one of the most successful this celebrated organization has ever had.

Russian music, which is expected to take a large place in our concert halls this season, will be represented on Mr. Monteux's programmes among other pieces by Scriabin's Third Symphony, Stravinsky's suite from "Pulcinella," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "The Tsar Saltan."

Among English composers there will be Eugene Goosens, Holst and Vaughan Williams; among Italians, Tommasini and Davico, and the Spaniard, Turina.

France will be represented by Saint-Saens's "Carnival of Animals," of which only "The Swan" has been played—and danced here by Pavlowa; Chausson's "Soir d'Ete" and Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" for first performances in this country.

N. Y.
HERALD
OCT 1 - 1922

Having interviewed several composers during his sojourn in Europe last July, Pierre Monteux, who is now preparing to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 13, announces a number of new works of interest.

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts, Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese; extracts from his "Rites of Spring;" Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan," in the form of a suite. The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams and Eugene Goosens, will be represented; the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico and the Spanish composer "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra."

WORLD, OCT 1 - 1922
New York City.

NEW WORKS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SEASON

Pierre Monteux to Offer Several American "Premieres"

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America during the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens Oct. 13 in Boston, according to an announcement from the director, Pierre Monteux. They are: Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." The burlesque of Saint-Saens is particularly familiar to the conductor, who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double string quartet of the Parisian private society, La Trompette, with the composer at the piano. Honneger's score has been called, both in Paris and London, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams, and Eugene Goosens, will be represented; the Italian composers, Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals [illegible]

[illegible] the masterpieces of the established repertory will comprise the greater part of the Boston Symphony programme, to which the works mentioned above will yield first consideration.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
OCT 2 - 1922

Every sign points to an unusually successful season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in the Academy of Music on the following Friday evenings: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16, and April 6. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, is assembling the one hundred musicians of the orchestra and has ordered the first rehearsal for to-day in Symphony Hall, Boston, in preparation for the opening of the season in the orchestra's own city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. The soloists to be heard at the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn are undoubtedly the very greatest artists of the day. They will be Emma Calve, the eminent dramatic singer of France; Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano; Olga Samaroff, Georges Enesco and Pablo Casals.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
OCT 8 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

Five Concerts to Be Given at the Academy of Music.

Pierre Monteux, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his fourth successive season, has assembled the 101 musicians and is now rehearsing daily for the opening of the season in Boston, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Oct. 14.

The usual series of five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on the following Friday evenings: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 18 and April 6.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
OCT 8 1922

Pierre Monteux, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his fourth successive season, has assembled his 101 musicians and is now rehearsing daily for the opening of the season in Boston, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. The usual serie sof five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, on the following Friday evenings: December 1, January 5, February 2, March 16 and April 6.

EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be December 1, January 5, February 2, March 16, and April 6.

The Oratorio Society of New York

FROM OCT 8 1922
WORLD,
New York City.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Department of Education, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be heard in five Friday evening concerts at the Academy of Music. The concerts, which begin at 8.15, are scheduled for Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6, when the following famous soloists are to appear: Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano; Olga Samaroff, called the foremost pianist of her sex; Emma Calve, Pablo Casals, cellist, and Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, celebrated in Europe as a violin virtuoso, and who will be America's most distinguished musical visitor this season.

EAGLE Oct. 8
Brooklyn, New York

Mr. Monteux' Programs

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spent a part of the past summer in Europe, where he consulted a number of composers of note. As a result, the orchestra is to present in the course of the season a number of new works of importance, not only from America but from England, France, Germany, Italy, Russia and Spain. The accepted master-works of the classic symphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the programs.

OCT 8 1922
N.Y. TIMES

Boston Orchestra Resuming.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra met last Monday morning for Pierre Monteux's first rehearsal in preparation for its home season in Symphony Hall, beginning next Friday and Saturday and running for twenty-four weeks. The personnel of last season remains intact.

Mr. Hale in The Boston Herald notes that Mr. Monteux has made the following program for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will be the first number; this masterwork includes these descriptive episodes: Dream; Passions; A Ball; Scene in the Meadow; March to the Scaffold; A Witch's Sabbath; "Theme and Variations," by the Italian composer Enrico Bossi will also be played, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

WORLD OCT 15 1922
New York City

Pierre Monteux, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his fourth successive season, with his 101 musicians, opened the season in Boston, in Symphony Hall, last Friday afternoon. The usual series of five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday evenings, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6. As regards the soloists announced to appear at these concerts, it would be hard to find a more brilliant list of celebrities, and yet it is a curious fact that only one of these—Olga Samaroff, the celebrated pianist—has before appeared as a Boston Symphony Orchestra soloist at these concerts. The two singers, Frieda Hempel and Emma Calve, have until, recently largely confined their careers to the operatic stage, and the fact that each of them has proved herself as much or even more a mistress of concert singing adds to the anticipation of the two programmes on which they are to figure. Of the two remaining instrumental artists, Pablo Casals, the Spanish genius, who is absolutely unchallenged as a master of the violoncello, is of course well known. Georges Enesco, on the other hand, we know only as a composer, for he has never before visited our country.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
OCT 15 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices, on Friday evenings, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6, started its forty-second season in Symphony Hall, Boston on Friday, Oct. 13. The demand for the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston and the other cities of its travels is as great as, and in many cases greater than ever before. The soloists for the Brooklyn concerts of the orchestra will be Frieda Hempel, Olga Samaroff, Georges Enesco, Emma Calve, and Pablo Casals.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
OCT 15 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music under Institute auspices on Friday evenings, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6, started its forty-second season in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday. The soloists for the Brooklyn concerts of the orchestra will be Frieda Hempel, Olga Samaroff, Georges Enesco, Emma Calve and Pablo Casals. Pierre Monteux is beginning his fourth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
OCT 21 1922

Frances Alda of the Metropolitan Opera Company is the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston to-day. She sings the prayer from "Tosca" and two songs with orchestra by Joseph Marx. The orchestral numbers selected by Mr. Monteux for this concert are Dvorak's third symphony, never before performed in Boston; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Conte feerique," and Richard Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra."

[15]

EVE. POST OCT 21 1922
NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will reappear here at Carnegie Hall on November 30. The dates for later concerts are December 2, 4; January 4, 6; February 1, 3; March 15, 17; April 5, 7. It will be the fourth season under M. Monteux. Among the novelties he brought back from Europe are Saint-Saëns's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fête."

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the great Russian pianist, will appear as soloist at the third pair of symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play with the orchestra Tcherennin's concerto. Pierre Monteaux will conduct.

TRAV. Oct. 21.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

"ZARATHUSTRA" AND ASSORTED PREFACES

Strauss's Tone-Poem Understandingly and Roundly Played — The Book of Life That It Opens and the Riddle That It Leaves Unread — Rimsky-Korsakov Catalogues Himself — Dvorak's Pretty Music Repeated—Mme. Alda and Songs

SET one of the longer and later tone poems of Strauss upon the programme of a symphony concert and the sense of impending dread or delight overshadows all that preceded it. A prudent conductor does not often begin afternoon or evening with such a lengthy, exacting piece. Before he passes to it he would warm his orchestra to the playing, his audience to the hearing, of music. Besides, perish the thought that late-comers by so little as five minutes, should wait behind closed doors through the thirty more usually necessary to Strauss in this field of self-expression. Accordingly, minded that "Thus Spake Zarathustra," tone-poem unheard through six years at Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux put it yesterday afternoon at the end of the listed pieces. There it was altogether in place and there it held an audience so intent that few departures blurred the progress of the music; while little dressing of hair and donning of hats obscured the questioning, enigmatic close. Yet, as inevitably as usual, the earlier numbers of the day seemed less to advance toward "Zarathustra" than to recede from it toward some limbo of pieces filling a waiting hour.

Four of these five, however, were music unheard previously in Boston; while no less than fourteen times in twenty-five years has "Zarathustra" stalked and sounded through Symphony Hall. One of these waifs and wayfarers was Dvorak's little Symphony in F major, heard with lively pleasure the preceding evening in Cambridge, described and discussed in these columns only yesterday; and on that very afternoon received with no less happy warmth by an audience truly Bostonian. Another was Rimsky-Korsakov's curious epitome of his abilities and idiosyncrasies in musical composition, "A Fairy Tale." Two more were songs with orchestra by the Viennese, Joseph Marx, who is seldom bidden into American concert-rooms. Mme. Alda of the Metropolitan Opera House, appearing for the first time "at these concerts," sang them. She sang also the soliloquy and petition, "Vissi d'Arte" of Tosca in Puccini's like-named music-drama.

A singular choice, it is easy to say, hackneyed these twenty years in a hundred operatic concerts; much dependent for significance upon the moment at which it is heard in the opera; less of Puccini as talent for music than as talent for the theatre. Mme Alda would have preferred to bring the witsful musing air to the lute sung by Marietta in the first act of Korngold's recent music-drama, "The Dead City"; yet somehow the orchestral parts—of a "repertory piece" at the Metropolitan—were undiscoverable. She waived a idea. Mr. Monteux's suggestion of Elsa recounting of her dream in "Lohengrin" and upon "Vissi d'Arte" fastened. In all fairness be it said, she sang the fragment well and heartily the audience applauded both her and it.

From another angle, little more fortunate to Mme. Alda were the songs of Marx. A dozen years ago, he was possibly the genius about to flower in whom Mr. Newman and other discoverers put a printed faith. Not yet has he fulfilled these anticipations. Since he is now in his forty-first year, if the stress of Vienna still spares him, he is not too likely to justify them. For the expectation, even, it is hard to find warrant in the two pieces heard yesterday—"A Song to Mary" and "If Love Hath Entered Thy Heart"—the latter at least written in the days of the prophets. None the less, it seemed in 1922 no better or no worse than the songs that properly practised and properly sentimental German composers write by the ream. It unfolds the frequent mystical rhetoric in a fluent melody, otherwise undistinguished. It advances viably through as familiar progressions and modulations. It proved a serviceable "vehicle" for Mme. Alda, as it would to any other well graced singer. "The Song to Mary" cultivated simplicity, won it more artfully, gained savor, even, of quiet folk-song.

Neither piece suffered under performance. Mme. Alda's voice was clear, bright, suave, sensitive. She summoned at will the workadays arts and the more sophisticated refinements of song. The matter and the mood of the music lay quite within her grasp. As readily she conveyed them to hearers. Yet Marx's well conducted commonplace could hardly stir good-willed, yet discerning ears; while it was easier to believe in the musical perception and discrimination of Mme Alda when she [illegible] into a gently piteous musing upon the [illegible] of life and the prayer into as gentle entreaty over its mysteries. A Puccini so mitigated from the theatre becomes a Puccini the more graphic and individual in the concert-hall.

The prying maker of the programme-book did no more than date Rimsky-Korsakov's "Fairy Tale"; enumerate the instruments employed; recite the fantastic word-picturing wherewith Poushkin prefaces the music. That fragment resembles nothing so much as the curtains that Russians sometimes set in their theatres or the frescoes that "primitive" artists of the folk, like Larionov or Mme. Gontcharova, design for receptive walls and eyes, jumbling together learned cats, enchanted cottages, ambling mortars, maids in trees, knights and ladies bespelled, like portents prodigies, signs and wonders. All this is "Russian spirit," Poushkin affirms. "It smells of Russia." There is no doubting.

It would be as interesting, however, to know why Rimsky-Korsakov, writing in tones the tale that in Poushkin's ear the cat left untold, should no more than catalogue his powers, as though he were replying to a proffered commission. To paper he puts music that moves with Oriental tang over Oriental intervals; music that hints at his spiral-like, ascendant, aromatic melody; music that anticipates the clanging fêtes of "Scheherasade" and the young pair that sat in the garden and all day spoke of love; music that underscores his skill with short figures and sharp rhythms, his imagination and ingenuity with harmonies and timbres. In fine, a catalogue raisonné of Rimsky-Korsakov's abilities as composer is this "Fairy Tale"; an epitome of his contributions to modern music-making, by no means disagreeable to hear. But why "Fairy Tale"? These talents, this fruition, are substantial, established facts.

So to "Zarathustra" and so, also, to the pity that music, quite able to speak for itself, should be encumbered in every self-respecting programme-book by so many pages of Nietzschean gospelling. "Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche" wrote Strauss on the title-page. Upon the flyleaf he also set a note out of Nietzsche's book wherein Zarathustra explains his withdrawal from the haunts of men, his return to them, exhorting and exemplifying. Therewith the composer might have stopped and let his music otherwise convey its own purport. Yet he strewed the score with chapter-heads as it were—"Of the Great Longing"; "Of Joys and Passions"; "The Dance-Song"; "The Night-Song"; so forth and so onward. Therewith everyone concerned should also have paused; but the unquenchable commentators, the insatiable "programmists," proceeded to adorn each sub-title with glosses and expansions from Nietzsche's precious—and also spacious—pages. The outcome was inevitable for every hearer with so much as a tithe of New England conscience in the concert-room. Minded to grasp "Zarathustra," he reads Nietzsche when he should be listening to Strauss. Primarily concerned with music, he drugs himself with print.

No doubt "Zarathustra" is a tone-poem "freely after Friedrich Nietzsche." The listeners must take Strauss's written word for it. Yet the music happens also to be a tone-poem deeply and poignantly out of life as men live it, try to understand it, more than half conquer it, give back a little, with the eternal riddle questioning discordant in their ears. At the beginning Strauss writes saturate, striding splendors—the sustained surge of the basses; the piercing trumpets, the shrilling answering strings; the brightening color suffusing, animating the tonal mass; the final upsweep of a hundred instrumental voices fastening on a single chord, outspreading, proclaiming it. Zarathustra may be awakening, descending, as the Nietzscheans say; but the Book of Life is also opened and therein are written the minds and the hearts of men.

Thereafter Strauss reads in tones off its pages, man unto man. Darkly stir the human impulses, forever seeking the ideal zest, happiness, achievement. Wherewith shall this "great longing" be fed to fulfillment? Not with sombre meditation, since they dull and dwarf. Not with learning since it is dry and lifeless. Not with the pains and penalties of death, for they will not fructify. It is possible to hear all these things in the first stretches of Strauss's tone-poem. Yet still men struggle forward. Wherewith shall they be fortified and stimulated? With the joy that is in living and with the freedom that is pathway thereto. It is possible to hear both in "The Dance-Song," "The Night-Song." Man so touches exaltation, and "The Night-Wanderer's Song" swells and clangs with it. The bell—"Fate's bell—cleaves and rends his high-heart d[illegible] ing. Into his musings creeps again the riddle of living, curling anew upon his s[illegible]. There is no answer, hint the soft dissonances, the gently jangled keys at the end. "Vanity of vanities"—there is no answer. Not the book of Zarathustra, but the Book of Life" wrote Strauss in his tone-poem; not programme-music, but music of human spirits in travail.

Strauss wrote also in "Zarathustra" a music that apart from all significances, actual or imagined, may in itself engross the minds and move the hearts of men. As some indeed say, to do so is the first and also the last end of music-making. The mounting measures of the beginning draw near to sublimity. The music of the "great longing" searches and glows with the beauty and the power of Straussian melody. The ironic Strauss writes the bitter fugato "Of Learning." The music that gropes forward and struggles upward to joy, quivers with striving, pierces with anticipation. "The Dance-Song" glimmers, brightens, rises radiant through the tonal web. If it falls away—the waltz-rhythm is a pitfall—yet does it mount again through the climacteric songs of Night. Fate's bell, Fate's riddle—there is no questioning the imagery of Strauss's tones. H. T. P.

TRANS-Oct. 21

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 1 192

Boston Symphony Starts Rehearsals

To-morrow the Boston Symphony Orchestra will start rehearsals in preparation for the opening of its season i Boston, Oct. 13. Indications are that th orchestra is about to embark on on of the most successful years it has eve had.

In Boston virtually all the seats fo the regular series of 48 concerts hav been taken in advance by subscription and for the extra concerts, the Youn People's concerts, and the Pension Fun concerts, there is a like demand, making a total of 59 concerts to be given in Boston. There will also be 28 concerts in the various cities of New England and 26 concerts in other cities, as far north as Montreal and Toronto, and as far south as Richmond, Washington and Baltimore, making a sum total of 113 concerts.

During his summer in Europe, Mr. Monteux consulted many composers of note, and as a result the orchestra is to present in the course of the season a number of new works of importance, not only from America but from England, France, Germany, Italy, Russia and Spain. As a matter of course, the accepted masterworks of the classic symphony repertory will predominate upon all the programmes.

The splendid personnel of last season remains intact, and with a wealth of fine music in prospect and a maximum traveling schedule, the coming 42nd season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra promises to be one of the most successful this celebrated organization has ever had.

Russian music, which is expected to take a large place in our concert halls this season, will be represented on Mr. Monteux's programmes among other pieces by Scriabin's Third Symphony, Stravinsky's suite from "Pulcinella," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite, "The Tsar Saltan."

Among English composers there will be Eugene Goosens, Holst and Vaughan Williams; among Italians, Tommasini and Davico, and the Spaniard, Turina.

France will be represented by Saint-Saens's "Carnival of Animals," of which only "The Swan" has been played—and danced here by Pavlowa; Chausson's "Soir d'Ete" and Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" for first performances in this country.

N. Y.
HERALD
OCT 1 - 1922

Having interviewed several composers during his sojourn in Europe last July, Pierre Monteux, who is now preparing to open the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston on October 13, announces a number of new works of interest.

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America at these concerts, Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese; extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan," in the form of a suite. The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams and Eugene Goosens, will be represented; the Italian composers Tommasini and Davico and the Spanish composer "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra."

WORLD, OCT 1 - 1922
New York City.

NEW WORKS FOR BOSTON SYMPHONY'S SEASON.

Pierre Monteux to Offer Several American "Premieres."

Three French scores are to have their first performances in America during the forty-second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens Oct. 13 in Boston, according to an announcement from the director, Pierre Monteux. They are: Saint-Saens's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux" and Chausson's "Soir de Fete." The Burlesque of Saint-Saens is particularly familiar to the conductor, who, at its early performance, took the viola part in the double string quartet of the Parisian private society, La Trompette, with the composer at the piano. Honneger's score has been called, both in Paris and London, the most important work which has so far come from the Parisian "Six."

Russian music will include Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella," after Pergolese, extracts from his "Rites of Spring," Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "The Tsar Saltan" in the form of a suite.

The English composers, Holst, Vaughn Williams, and Eugene Goosens, will be represented; the Italian composers, Tommasini and Davico, and the Spanish composer "Turina." A number of works by native composers are to be announced later. There will be several revivals of German pieces, notably those of Bruckner, Mahler, Max Reger and Strauss's "Zarathustra." Naturally, the masterpieces of the established repertory will comprise the greater part of the Boston Symphony programme, to which the works mentioned above will yield first consideration.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
OCT 2 - 192

Every sign points to an unusually successful season for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in the Academy of Music on the following Friday evenings: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16, and April 6. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, is assembling the one hundred musicians of the orchestra and has ordered the first rehearsal for to-day in Symphony Hall, Boston, in preparation for the opening of the season in the orchestra's own city on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. The soloists to be heard at the five concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn are undoubtedly the very greatest artists of the day. They will be Emma Calve, the eminent dramatic singer of France; Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano; Olga Samaroff, Georges Enesco and Pablo Casals.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
OCT 8 192

BOSTON SYMPHONY SEASON.

Five Concerts to Be Given at the Academy of Music.

Pierre Monteux, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his fourth successive season, has assembled the 101 musicians and is now rehearsing daily for the opening of the season in Boston, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Oct. 14.

The usual series of five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, on the following Friday evenings: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 18 and April 6.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
OCT 8 1922

Pierre Monteux, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his fourth successive season, has assembled his 101 musicians and is now rehearsing daily for the opening of the season in Boston, which will take place in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon, Oct. 13. The usual serie sof five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, under the auspices of the Institute and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, on the following Friday evenings: December 1, January 5, February 2, March 16 and April 6.

EVE. POST
NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts next season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be December 1, January 5, February 2, March 16, and April 6.

The Oratorio Society of New York

FROM WORLD,
New York City.

Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Department of Education, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will be heard in five Friday evening concerts at the Academy of Music. The concerts, which begin at 8.15, are scheduled for Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6, when the following famous soloists are to appear: Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano; Olga Samaroff, called the foremost pianist of her sex; Emma Calve, Pablo Casals, cellist, and Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, celebrated in Europe as a violin virtuoso, and who will be America's most distinguished musical visitor this season.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York
Oct. 8

Mr. Monteux' Programs

Pierre Monteux, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, spent a part of the past summer in Europe, where he consulted a number of composers of note. As a result, the orchestra is to present in the course of the season a number of new works of importance, not only from America but from England, France, Germany, Italy, Russia and Spain. The accepted master-works of the classic symphonic repertory will, of course, predominate upon the programs.

OCT 8 192
N.Y. TIMES

Boston Orchestra Resuming.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra met last Monday morning for Pierre Monteux's first rehearsal in preparation for its home season in Symphony Hall, beginning next Friday and Saturday and running for twenty-four weeks. The personnel of last season remains intact.

Mr. Hale in The Boston Herald notes that Mr. Monteux has made the following program for the first pair of concerts: Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" will be the first number; this masterwork includes these descriptive episodes: Dream; Passions; A Ball; Scene in the Meadow; March to the Scaffold; A Witch's Sabbath; "Theme and Variations," by the Italian composer Enrico Bossi will also be played, and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger."

WORLD
New York City

Pierre Monteux, who is to be conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for his fourth successive season, with his 101 musicians, opened the season in Boston, in Symphony Hall, last Friday afternoon. The usual series of five concerts will be given in the Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday evenings, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6. As regards the soloists announced to appear at these concerts, it would be hard to find a more brilliant list of celebrities, and yet it is a curious fact that only one of these—Olga Samaroff, the celebrated pianist—has before appeared as a Boston Symphony Orchestra soloist at these concerts. The two singers, Frieda Hempel and Emma Calve, have until recently largely confined their careers to the operatic stage, and the fact that each of them has proved herself as much or even more a mistress of concert singing adds to the anticipation of the two programmes on which they are to figure. Of the two remaining instrumental artists, Pablo Casals, the Spanish genius, who is absolutely unchallenged as a master of the violoncello, is of course well known. Georges Enesco, on the other hand, we know only as a composer, for he has never before visited our country.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
[illegible] 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices, on Friday evenings, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6, started its forty-second season in Symphony Hall, Boston on Friday, Oct. 13. The demand for the Boston Symphony concerts in Boston and the other cities of its travels is as great as, and in many cases greater than ever before. The soloists for the Brooklyn concerts of the orchestra will be Frieda Hempel, Olga Samaroff, Georges Enesco, Emma Calve, and Pablo Casals.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF OCT [illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLANS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give five concerts in Brooklyn at the Academy of Music under Institute auspices on Friday evenings, Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 6, started its forty-second season in Symphony Hall, Boston, last Friday. The soloists for the Brooklyn concerts of the orchestra will be Frieda Hempel, Olga Samaroff, Georges Enesco, Emma Calve and Pablo Casals. Pierre Monteux is beginning his fourth year as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
OCT 21 1922

Frances Alda of the Metropolitan Opera Company is the soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston to-day. She sings the prayer from "Tosca" and two songs with orchestra by Joseph Marx. The orchestral numbers selected by Mr. Monteux for this concert are Dvorak's third symphony, never before performed in Boston; Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Conte féerique," and Richard Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra."

[15]

EVE. POST OCT 21 1922
NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will reappear here at Carnegie Hall on November 30. The dates for later concerts are December 2, 4; January 4, 6; February 1, 3; March 15, 17; April 5, 7. It will be the fourth season under M. Monteux. Among the novelties he brought back from Europe are Saint-Saëns's "Carnival des Animaux," Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," and Chausson's "Soir de Fête."

SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the great Russian pianist, will appear as soloist at the third pair of symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony hall Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play with the orchestra Tcherennin's concerto. Pierre Monteaux will conduct.

TRAV. Oct. 21.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

"ZARATHUSTRA" AND ASSORTE PREFACES

Strauss's Tone-Poem Understandingl and Roundly Played — The Book o Life That It Opens and the Riddle Tha It Leaves Unread — Rimsky-Korsako Catalogues Himself — Dvorak's Prett Music Repeated—Mme. Alda and Songs

SET one of the longer and later tone poems of Strauss upon the pr gramme of a symphony concert an the sense of impending dread or de light overshadows all that preceded it. prudent conductor does not often begi afternoon or evening with such a length exacting piece. Before he passes to it h would warm his orchestra to the playin his audience to the hearing, of music. Besides, perish the thought that late-come by so little as five minutes, should wa behind closed doors through the thirty mor usually necessary to Strauss in this field o self-expression. Accordingly, minded t "Thus Spake Zarathustra," tone-poem un heard through six years at Symphony Hall Mr. Monteux put it yesterday afternoon a the end of the listed pieces. There i was altogether in place and there it hel an audience so intent that few departure blurred the progress of the music; while little dressing of hair and donning of hat obscured the questioning, enigmatic close Yet, as inevitably as usual, the earlier numbers of the day seemed less to advance toward "Zarathustra" than to recede from it toward some limbo of pieces filling a waiting hour.

Four of these five, however, were music unheard previously in Boston; while no less than fourteen times in twenty-five years has "Zarathustra" stalked and sounded through Symphony Hall. One of these waifs and wayfarers was Dvořák's little Symphony in F major, heard with lively pleasure the preceding evening in Cambridge, described and discussed in these columns only yesterday; and on that very afternoon received with no less happy warmth by an audience truly Bostonian. Another was Rimsky-Korsakov's curious epitome of his abilities and idiosyncrasies in musical composition, "A Fairy Tale." Two more were songs with orchestra by the Viennese, Joseph Marx, who is seldom bidden into American concert-rooms Mme. Aida of the Metropolitan Opera House, appearing for the first time "at these concerts," sang them. She sang also the soliloquy and petition, "Vissi d'Arte" of Tosca in Puccini's like-named music-drama.

A singular choice, it is easy to say, hackneyed these twenty years in a hundred operatic concerts; much dependent for significance upon the moment at which it is heard in the opera; less of Puccini as talent for music than as talent for the theatre. Mme Alda would have preferred to bring the witsful musing air to the lute, sung by Marietta in the first act of Korngold's recent music-drama, "The Dead City"; yet somehow the orchestral parts—of a "repertory piece" at the Metropolitan—were unscoverable. She waived a ide Mr. Monteux's suggestion of Elsa recounting of her dream in "Lohengrin" and upon "Vissi d'Arte" fastened. In all fairness be it said, she sang the fragment well and heartily the audience applauded both her and it.

From another angle, little more fortunate to Mme. Alda were the songs of Marx. A dozen years ago, he was possibly the genius about to flower in whom Mr. Newman and other discoverers put a printed faith. Not yet has he fulfilled these anticipations. Since he is now in his forty-first year, if the stress of Vienna still spares him, he is not too likely to justify them. For the expectation, even, it is hard to find warrant in the two pieces heard yesterday—"A Song to Mary" and "If Love Hath Entered Thy Heart"—the latter at least written in the days of the prophets. None the less, it seemed in 1922 no better or no worse than the songs that properly practised and properly sentimental German composers write by the ream. It unfolds the frequent mystical rhetoric in a fluent melody, otherwise undistinguished. It advances viably through as familiar progressions and modulations. It proved a serviceable "vehicle" for Mme. Alda, as it would to any other well graced singer. "The Song to Mary" cultivated simplicity, won it more artfully, gained savor, even, of quiet folk-song.

Neither piece suffered under performance. Mme. Alda's voice was clear, bright, suave, sensitive. She summoned at will the workadays arts and the more sophisticated refinements of song. The matter and the mood of the music lay quite within her grasp. As readily she conveyed them to hearers. Yet Marx's well conducted commonplace could hardly stir good-willed, yet discerning ears; while it was easier to believe in the musical perception and discrimination of Mme Alda when she softened Tosca's soliloquy into a gently piteous musing upon the issues of life and the prayer into as gentle entreaty over its mysteries. A Puccini so mitigated from the theatre becomes a Puccini the more graphic and individual in the concert-hall.

The prying maker of the programme-book did no more than date Rimsky-Korsakov's "Fairy Tale"; enumerate the instruments employed; recite the fantastic word-picturing wherewith Poushkin prefaces the music. That fragment resembles nothing so much as the curtains that Russians sometimes set in their theatres or the frescoes that "primitive" artists of the folk, like Larionov or Mme. Gontcharova, design for receptive walls and eyes, jumbling together learned cats, enchanted cottages, ambling mortars, naiads in trees, knights and ladies bespelled, like portents prodigies, signs and wonders. All this is "Russian spirit," Poushkin affirms. "It smells of Russia." There is no doubting.

It would be as interesting, however, to know why Rimsky-Korsakov, writing in tones the tale that in Poushkin's ear the cat left untold, should no more than catalogue his powers, as though he were replying to a proffered commission. To paper he puts music that moves with Oriental tang over Oriental intervals; music that hints at his spiral-like, ascendant, aromatic melody; music that anticipates the clanging fêtes of "Scheherazade" and the young pair that sat in the garden and all day spoke of love; music that underscores his skill with short figures and sharp rhythms, his imagination and ingenuity with harmonies and timbres. In fine, a catalogue raissonné of Rimsky-Korsakov's abilities as composer is this "Fairy Tale"; an epitome of his contributions to modern music-making, by no means disagreeable to hear. But why "Fairy Tale"? These talents, this fruition, are substantial, established facts.

So to "Zarathustra" and so, also, to the pity that music, quite able to speak for itself, should be encumbered in every self-respecting programme-book by so many pages of Nietzschean gospelling. "Freely after Friedrich Nietzsche" wrote Straus on the title-page. Upon the flyleaf he als set a note out of Nietzsche's book wherei Zarathustra explains his withdrawal fron the haunts of men, his return to them, exhorting and exemplifying. Therewith th composer might have stopped and let hi music otherwise convey its own purport Yet he strewed the score with chapter-heads as it were—"Of the Great Longing"; "Of Joys and Passions"; "The Dance-Song"; "The Night-Song"; so forth and so onward. Therewith everyone concerned should also have paused; but the unquenchable commentators, the insatiable "programmists," proceeded to adorn each sub-title with glosses and expansions from Nietzsche's precious—and also spacious—pages. The outcome was inevitable for every hearer with so much as a tithe of New England conscience in the concert-room. Minded to grasp "Zarathustra," he reads Nietzsche when he should be listening to Strauss. Primarily concerned with music, he drugs himself with print.

No doubt "Zarathustra" is a tone-poem "freely after Friedrich Nietzsche." The listeners must take Strauss's written word for it. Yet the music happens also to be a tone-poem deeply and poignantly out of life as men live it, try to understand it, more than half conquer it, give back a little, with the eternal riddle, questioning discordant in their ears. At the beginning Strauss writes saturate, striding, splendors—the sustained surge of the basses; the piercing trumpets, the shrilling, answering strings; the brightening color suffusing, animating the tonal mass; the final upsweep of a hundred instrumental voices fastening on a single chord, outspreading, proclaiming it. Zarathustra may be awakening, descending, as the Nietzscheans say; but the Book of Life is also opened and therein are written the minds and the hearts of men.

Thereafter Strauss reads in tones off its pages, man unto man. Darkly stir the human impulses, forever seeking the ideal zest, happiness, achievement. Wherewith shall this "great longing" be fed to fulfillment? Not with sombre meditation, since they dull and dwarf. Not with learning since it is dry and lifeless. Not with the pains and penalties of death, for they will not fructify. It is possible to hear all these things in the first stretches of Strauss's tone-poem. Yet still men struggle forward. Wherewith shall they be fortified and stimulated? With the joy that is in living and with the freedom that is pathway thereto. It is possible to hear both in "The Dance-Song," "The Night-Song." Man so touches exaltation, and "The Night-Wanderer's Song" swells and clangs with it. The bell—"Fate's bell—cleaves and rends his high-hearted visioning. Into his musings creeps again the riddle of living, curling anew upon his s iri There is no answer, hint the soft dissonances, the gently jangled keys at the end. "Vanity of vanities"—there is no answe Not the book of Zarathustra, but the Book of Life" wrote Strauss in his tone-poem; not programme-music, but music of human spirits in travail.

Strauss wrote also in "Zarathustra" a music that apart from all significances, actual or imagined, may in itself engross the minds and move the hearts of men. As some indeed say, to do so is the first and also the last end of music-making. The mounting measures of the beginning draw near to sublimity. The music of the "great longing" searches and glows with the beauty and the power of Straussian melody The ironic Strauss writes the bitter fugato "Of Learning." The music that gropes forward and struggles upward to joy, quivers with striving, pierces with anticipation "The Dance-Song" glimmers, brightens rises radiant through the tonal web. If it falls away—the waltz-rhythm is a pitfall—yet does it mount again through the climacteric songs of Night. Fate's bell, Fate's riddle—there is no questioning the imagery of Strauss's tones. H. T. P.

TRANS-Oct. 21

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Benno Moiseiwitsch, Rusian pianist, will be the soloist at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will play Tcherepnin's Piano Concerto. The symphony will be Mozart's in E-flat major (K. No. 543). Mr. Monteux will also conduct a fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double stringed orchestra by Vaughan Williams, the English composer, known to Boston by his London Symphony and song cycle, "On Wenlock Edge." This fantasia has not yet been played here. The concert program will close with Liszt's symphonic poem, "The Battle of the Huns."

HERALD-Oct 22

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15: Boston Symphony Orchestra, third program, Symphony in E flat major, Mozart; Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis, Vaughn Williams; Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra, Tcherepnin; "The Battle of the Huns," Liszt. Soloist, Benno Moiseiwitsch.

GLOBE Oct 22

Symphony Programme

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the great Russian pianist, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the third pair of concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will be heard in the unfamiliar Pianoforte Concerto of the Russian, Tcherepnine. The symphony will be that of Mozart in E-flat major (K. No. 543). Mr. Monteux will also conduct A Fantasia on a Theme, by Thomas Tallis, for double stringed orchestra by Vaughan Williams, the English composer, known to Boston by his London Symphony. The programme will close with Liszt's Symphonic Poem for orchestra and organ. "The Battle of the Huns."

POST-Oct. 22

Frederick E. Lowell has resigned from the board of trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra pending a two years' travel in Europe and his place has been taken by E. Sohier Welsh.

Nikisch's Grave

Student and orchestral players of the Leipsic Gewandhaus concerts where Arthur Nikisch, conductor, for a period, of the Boston Symphony directed so often in the later years of his life, are subscribing to a fund to make Nikisch's grave "a place of solemn beauty." Subscriptions for the fund are spreading through Germany, Austria and other countries of Europe. The Manchester Guardian recently paid this tribute to memory of the distinguished conductor:

There is an old taunt that death snuffs out the fame of an actor or performer when it snuffs out his life, while that of the creative artist endures. The conductor cannot even be called a performer in any strict sense, and it might be argued that his fame is more intangible than that of the performer even while he is alive.

"Yet we think no musician would venture to pit the fame of any mere performer against the fame of Arthur Nikisch, the conductor. Richter and Nikisch were the first men to make themselves famous by the art of conducting alone. There were conductors before them, but none of note who had not some greater claim on the musician's allegiance. Today the conductor has become the outstanding figure of our modern musical life, and it is mainly through him that enthusiasms for the creative works of musical genius are fostered. Men like Richter and Nikisch have created an art, and it has taken its stamp so strongly from their example that their art is a long way from dying with them.

"With Nikisch, to make music was never anything less than a ceremony. He was the priest of genius. No priest could regard the ritual of his office with more awe than did Nikisch the act of music-making. But he was a priest all on fire. No everyday beginning was for him. Everyone had to be strung up to the pitch of their highest endeavor before he ventured on the first note, and he kept them up to that pitch until the last note was ended. Music in his hands underwent a transforming intensity. It was never merely itself, but itself plus Arthur Nikisch and the sum of all the abilities under him. Yet this intensity Nikisch was able to illumine with an equally wonderful versatility. Under no conductor was the composer himself more truly heard than under Nikisch. In his hands music became a sort of rapture."

Russian Fairy Tales

There is a great consolation for those disappointed in any piece of music heard at the Boston Symphony concerts for the first time. That is, the manifold seductions of the programme book with the notes of Mr. Philip Hale. And so, after pricking up our ears and listening vainly for one little sign of inspiration in the new piece of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "A Fairy-tale," we turned the leaves of our programme book and found there the needed consolation. It was contained in this gorgeous passage from the Russian poet Pushkin, published on the fly leaf of the score of Rimsky-Korsakoff's totally inadequate composition—the famous passage of description and homage by Pushkin, to the spirit of Russian folklore.

"In a round spot on the edge of the sea is a green oak. A golden chain hangs from this tree. A well-informed cat is attached to the chain and prowls about the oak by day and by night. When he goes to the right he hums a song; when he goes to the left he tells a tale. There are prodigies on one side and the other. A satyr wanders about; a naiad sits on a branch; the footprints of marvellous beasts are seen in unfamiliar paths. On hen's claws is a cottage without doors or windows. The forest and the valley swarm with thousands of spectres.

"It is there that at daybreak the billows dash on the lonely, sandy beach and 30 handsome knights leave in rows the crystal waves, followed by their counsellor of the sea. A young captive monarch is temporarily a terrible sovereign. There in the clouds and in the sight of the folk, a magician bears a hero across woods and the seas.

"There in her prison a young queen sheds tears, having for sole servant and companion a faithful wolf. There walks a mortar rambling with an old sorceress. There King Kostchie is dying as he looks at his gold. There is Russian spirit: there everything smells of Russia.

"I have gone there; I have drank hydromel; I have seen the green oak near the sea; I have sat at the roots of the tree; the learned cat has told me his stories.

"One of them I recall. Here it is."

The Bogey of "Form"

Conservatives of the old school look askance on anybody who flings a taunt at a respectable symphony or suggests that a man might well omit a few of the variations Brahms wrote on a theme of Paganini when he performs them at a concert. We consider the growing discontent with the merely respectable symphony a good sign, and not merely a symptom of flippancy and disregard of high tradition. It used to be a very fine and laudable thing if a composer could so much as write a plausible sounding symphony with a first theme in the tonic and the second theme in dominant or related minor. They would talk of form. "Form" must be the basis of art.

Surest thing you know! But what form? Dvorak tried to write symphonies and with the exception of the "New World" symphony he wrote very bad ones. His form—the form ideal for self-expression on the part of Dvorak—proved to be the "Slavonic Dance," or the simple song or instrumental piece, and not at all that of the orthodox presbyterian symphony. He was at a awful disadvantage when he tried to put himself into the straightjacket of the classiest. And when a man writes unnaturally, however correct his style, we call it bad and not good form or anything like it. Symphony concerts of Friday afternoon and last night were truth to say, deadly dull. This though Dvorak, having elected to write a symphony, saw his duty and carried it out like a man.

"Empty as a Jug"

That, if you like, is mastery of "form." That is the thing, according to tradition, lacking which to his credit a man who writes tunes cannot call himself a composer. We think the mastery of form not so easy, nor the theory of form so simple a thing. For us, "form" is not a given number of measures of music, filled out in a certain way. "Form" is the particular shape and mold demanded by a particular idea. There is a much finer form in Debussy's "L'Apres-midi d'un Faune" than there is in Dvorak's F major symphony, because Debussy's form strikes out into a new realm and proves the vehicle of vehicles, the one just and inevitable expression of a very subtle musical idea. That is form. Dvorak's symphony is only hollow imitation and is empty as a jug in days of prohibition (And what could be more empty than that?) Let us have an end of respectability for respectability's sake in music. Let us give no quarter to the composer who says the proper thing merely because he thinks he ought to say something, and has nothing to say.

POST-Oct. 22

SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Benno Moiseiwitsch, the great Russian pianist, will appear as soloist with the Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. He will be heard in Tcherepnin's pianoforte concerto. Mozart's E-flat major symphony, and Liszt's symphonic poem for orchestra and organ. "The Battle of the Huns," are on the program.

ADVTSR. Oct 22

FULL SCORE FROM A PLENTIF WEEK-END

Mr. Monteux's Debated Version of "Zar thustra"—The People's Symphony O chestra Begins Promisingly—Titta Ru Again Illustrious and Potent Singer Miss Walch's Young Abilities—An A niversary for George Henschel

ON Saturday as well as on Friday Symphony Hall, many were dissenters to Mr. Monteux's v sion of "Thus Spake Zarath tra." Their own ears and eyes told th that, alike in afternoon and in eveni Strauss's music, sounding through voices of conductor and orchestra, held a whole audience rapt. None the less they persisted in the view that he had tamed, even dulled the tone-poem. In their opinion, he should have borne it forward more sweepingly and emphatically; indulged oftener in "great [illegible] and [illegible] the power of the band; made the music "epical," even if, so played, it did at moments sound confused and obscure. In such fashion, they recalled, was "Zarathustra" heard hereabouts when it was novel piece.

Beyond doubt, the music has been, and will be, so conveyed with corresponding effect upon hearers—but not when Strauss himself was conductor, as last autumn in New York, or when another leader, like Dr. Muck six years ago in Boston, had with him studied the score. In both instances Strauss plainly desired a luminous, plastic, well-poised "reading" of his music that should keep the lines clear, the details adjusted, the color warm, the tonal design and progress both firm and supple. Nowhere did he or Dr. Muck, following his counsels, seek "big effects," unless they were obviously ordained—say at the beginning of the tone-poem or at the climax of "The Night-Wanderer's Song."

Strauss, in fine, purposed "Zarathustra" as meditation in music over the riddle of life rather than as vast proclamation of Nietzschean gospels or resounding glorification of Nietzsche's hero. Zarathustra and he who created him became indeed but as means to this end. Here, as elsewhere, Strauss writes music for the sake of the music, and not primarily to project through tones an imaginary figure or to impart a minutely devised programme. He would have the musical content of "Zarathustra" clarified, sustained, exalted, confident that all else within his purpose would thereby be added unto it. Like Dr. Muck, Mr. Monteux followed these prescriptions. Had the resulting performance been twice as loud and sweeping it would not have praised him half as much. H. T. P.

Auspicious Beginnings

For an orchestra to reveal at the opening concert of the season a lack of finish and precision in its playing is so common an occurrence that an acceptable performacne in such circumstance is always a matter for comment. Let it then be recorded forthwith that at the St. James Theatre yesterday afternoon the People's Symphony Orchestra, beginning the third year of its existence, gave an excellent account of itself. Never, so it seemed, has that band given a better balanced, more effective presentation of all the pieces on a single programme. Often in previous concerts one or two numbers have betrayed shortcomings in the band, whether arising from numerical deficiencies, lack of preparation or some cause less easily definable. The members of yesterday's audience, many of whom no doubt were hearing some or all of the pieces for the first time, may be assured that one and all were heard in adequate if not in brilliant or illuminating performance.

Herein lies cause for satisfaction, and for still greater satisfaction if the standard set yesterday can be maintained throughout the score of concerts to come. As those who are its public voice have repeatedly asserted, the purpose of the People's Orchestra is deliberately educational. To present to those generally unacquainted with such matters suitable performances of standard orchestral compositions is a righteous act. Per contra a halting version of classical symphony or fragment of Wagnerian music-drama gains the composer no new friends it may even win him undeserved enemies.

Quite exceptionally Mr. Mollenhauer, or whoever has the matter in hand, has set forth, subject to minor changes, the programmes for all the concerts of the impending series. In this list there is to be noted, first of all, a decided widening of the repertory. Many later and some earlier composers, hitherto undeservedly neglected are now included. And there is a commendable attempt, not only to present a wide range of music, but also to place on each programme at least one composition of lighter character. The untrained listener will find the symphony by Beethoven or Mozart more palatable if a waltz by Strauss or Komzak or a bit of ballet-music stands beside it. Wisely the People's Orchestra does not adhere too rigidly to the sacerdotal standard of traditional symphony concerts. For that matter, not a few would like occasionally to hear from Mr. Monteux some of the pieces relegated to the "Pops." Their performance by the full band, thoroughy rehearsed, might prove both revelation and pleasurable experience. By a curious coincidence the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday made known here a "Fairy Legend" by Rimsky-Korsakov, and at the St. James yesterday afternoon there was to be heard an unfamiliar waltz by Johann Strauss bearing the title "Fairy Tales." In intricacy and variety of musical and instr mental device, the Russian's piece has cle ascendancy over the Austrian's. But b the saving grace of spontaneous melody call it inspiration if you will—the walt proved diverting, and by the lack of tha precious quality the symphonic piec proved dull to hear.

Besides the Waltz yesterday's pr gramme embraced the sparkling Overtu to "Figaro's Wedding," the Fourth Beethoven's Symphonies, and the balle music from Massenet's opera, "The Cid Except in the brilliant "Aragonnaise Massenet here falls below Bizet and Cha brier, not to mention Debussy and Ravel as musical evocator of Spain. Neverthe less these pieces are effectively made an they hold well their thirty-seven years Regarding Beethoven's symphonies an in genious commentator once declared tha each of the nine surpassed its predecessor A pretty conceit, this; but it will not bear analysis. As the "Pastoral" Symphony falls below the Fifth, so—if not to the same degree—does the Fourth fail to reach the heights of the "Eroica." Yet this Fourth Symphony has its moments. The first movement with its mystical Introduction is a masterpiece. The theme of the Adagio, though treated at undue length, is beautiful, and the Finale abounds in the rollicking good humor of which Beethoven was on rare occasion capable. W. S. S.

TRANS-Oct. 23

[16]

[illegible]

TO GOOD ADVANTAGE

Auditorium Provides Proper Setting for Well Balanced Program.

It spoke well for the manifestly increasing interest in good music that the first symphony concert in the new Memorial Auditorium found the great hall well filled.

These concerts are now hopefully established here as regular features of the musical season, but last night for the first time the Boston Symphony orchestra played in an auditorium suited in every respect to a program of the kind. Tested and found satisfactory for the purposes of song, the Auditorium proved an admirable place for the enjoyment of instrumental music. The platform gave space enough for the comfortable seating of the great orchestra, although there was not a great deal to spare, and the choir gallery back of the stage served as an excellent sounding board to transmit the resonance of the music as well as its more delicate passages.

Mr. Monteux had chosen a program well calculated to maintain the interest of the audience, with a symphony and a tone poem for the strong meat of the menu, sundry pieces of the dance music of the stage for pleasing variety and a standard overture for the final course. In detail the list follows:

Tchaikovsky—Symphony No. 4 in F Minor, Op. 36
- I. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima
- II. Andantino in modo di canzona
- III. Scherzo; Pizzicato ostinato: Allegro
- IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco

Liszt—Symphonic Poem No. 3, "Les Préludes."

Berlioz—Three Pieces from "The Damnation of Faust"
- (a) Menuet
- (b) Valse des Sylphes
- (c) Rákoczy March

Wagner—Overture to "Tannhäuser."

Due in part to its environment, and in great measure to the spirit and enthusiasm with which Mr. Monteux directed his men, the superb band has never been heard here to better advantage. The Tschaikowsky symphony, the motive of which has already been set forth in these columns, is one that may be enjoyed for the beauty of the music alone.

From the first sonorous trumpet call of the introduction, the Fate motive, which gives the key to the whole, through the more or less intricate development of the first movement, it was played in masterly fashion, culminating in the dramatic coda in which the brass again sounds the tragic note.

The songful andante of the second movement with its plaintive melody for the oboe, exquisitely played, and gradually merging into a march movement, is tuneful music in itself and needs no pondering over program notes to mar the pure enjoyment of it.

Having worked out these movements in regular symphonic form the composer was ready to let his fancy play, and so follows the playful scherzo, opened by the strings played pizzicato. The virtuosi of the string choirs plucked the measures with remarkable gradations of shading and accent, as Mr. Monteux indicated his will with them. Small wonder that on the first performance of this movement the orchestra was obliged to repeat it. That might easily have happened last evening had not long established custom forbidden it. So with like grace and more flowing melody the old folk song of the Birch tree was developed and transformed through various musical guises.

Doubtless for the popular qualities of this scherzo and for the stirring and vigorous march movement of the finale, played with really thrilling effect, Mr. Monteux had chosen the symphony for his Lowell program.

Somewhat akin in motive, but different in conception and treatment, Liszt's tone poem "Les Préludes" gave opportunity to note the smooth quality of the wood-wind, the flutes, clarinets, the higher and lower pitched reeds, against the shimmering accompaniment of the strings. Here was less of intricacy and more of flowing melody, perhaps, as in the pastorale melody sounded at various times by the horn, the oboe or the clarinet, but not without its moments of stress, as in the martial theme which Mr. Monteux brought out so incisively toward the close.

Once again Mr. Monteux showed his practiced skill with music of the ballet, for the rhythm and accent of which he has an especial flair, in the dance music which Berlioz arranged for "The Damnation of Faust," eerie and palpitating music incidental to the spectacle upon the stage, but not without its charm in the concert hall. So the minuet, the serenade of Will-o'-the-Wisps, was fairylike rather than reminiscent of the stately graces of the ball room and the waltz of the sylphes airy in its all too fleeting graces. Long a standby of the Pop concerts in Boston, it is safe to say that the Hungarian march has rarely been given with the elastic vigor and esprit to which the conductor urged his band last night. No question but the number made its appeal. It was music which all could understand and which even the connoisseurs in music need not be ashamed to enjoy.

No overture in the standard repertory displays the virtuosity of the orchestra, the rich beauty of its brass choir, the quality of flutes and reeds, and the skill of the strings in intricate adornment of a melodic theme than Wagner's "Tannhäuser." From the Pilgrims' chorus, through the seductive music of the Venusburg, to the sonorous climax, Mr. Monteux conducted and instrumentalists played with a verve that dispelled any impression of routine, although routine it must have been to players so long accustomed to its performance.

That same freshness and elasticity [illegible] the program [illegible] might call [illegible] Recalled [illegible] and again [illegible] Mr. Monteux bade his band share in the evident appreciation.

Next March on the 27th of the month Mr. Albert E. Brown, local manager announces a second concert by the orchestra, at which Elly Ney, skilled and expert pianist, will be the soloist. S. R. F.

LOWELL CITIZEN, Oct. 2

SION FUND CONCERT

[illegible] all-Russian program, with the [illegible] Russian prima donna, Mme Oda Slobodskaja, will characterize the Pension Fund concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, at 3:30. Mme. Oda Slobodskaja is a newcomer to America and known as the leading soprano of the Petrograd grand opera. She will sing Russian operatic arias with the orchestra.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Saint-Saens's humorous score, "The Carnival of the Animals," will be performed for the first time here at the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. Two short pieces, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," by Charles T. Griffes, the late American composer, will also be played.

TRAV-Oct. 28

Third Concert by Boston Symphony

The third concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mozart, Symphony in E flat major (Koechel No. 543).

Vaughan Williams, Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-stringed orchestra.

Tcherepnin, Concerto for piano and orchestra, Op. 30.

Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "The Battle of the Huns."

Benno Moiseiwitsch was the pianist. Vaughan Williams' Fantasia was played for the first time in Boston and the Concerto by Tcherepnin was played for the first time at these concerts. The fantasia is a revival of the concerto form as practiced by Corelli, Handel and many less illustrious composers. It would perhaps be more exact to say that it is a revival of the spirit of these old concerti grossi, for of course it does not attempt to conform to the more rigid rules of these compositions, nor is it in more than one movement, yet the resemblance is there, nevertheless, particularly in the employment of a smaller body of players which responds antiphonally to the larger group. By the employment of modal harmonies, the composer also evokes the atmosphere of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The fantasia suffers from its rhythmic monotony; the succession of one long-drawn harmony after another continually cries for relief, and Tallis' theme finally becomes lost in the web of sound which is spun around it.

Tcherepnin's Concerto is frankly virtuoso music, written for the display of the pianist, and yet for all that it is never tawdry. It opens with a vigorous theme of strongly Russian character which is quite extensively developed by the piano and orchestra. This is succeeded by a slow section in which a less distinctive melody is given out first by the piano and then by various solo instruments accompanied by the latter. In this section there are passages à la Thalberg which might well have been dispensed with and the composer lingers somewhat too long over his theme, which often borders on the sugary. It is grateful music for both soloist and orchestra, however, and after all, good tunes are so rare in present day music that when a composer happens to light on one he may be forgiven for tarrying. A long cadenza for the piano alone and a few measures of brilliant passage work conclude the work. It is a relief to hear an unfamiliar concerto. To be sure, a new piece of this character means hard work for both soloist and orchestra when time for rehearsal is necessarily limited, but the concertos of Schumann, Beethoven and others of the classical repertory, effective as they may be, are over familiar. Mr. Moiseiwitsch is a pianist who needs no praise; he is always welcome; his playing is always satisfying to ear and intellect. All his charm of style, beauty of tone, well restrained virtuosity and sound musicianship were again in evidence yesterday afternoon.

In conclusion, Mr. Monteux revived Liszt's boisterous "Battle of the Huns." It was given a spirited reading. In hearing Liszt's music one is always reminded of the debt owed him by his son-in-law, the great Richard. How much the world owes Liszt, the composer, through Wagner, it is just beginning to find out, and for this reason, if for no other, the revival of these symphonic poems is justifiable.

And yet the most beautiful music of the afternoon was Mozart's symphony. Assuredly Mozart was one of the most finished of musicians and yesterday his symphony was given one of the most finished performances. S. M.

MONITOR-Oct. 28

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. MONTEUX ARRAYS A WARRING PROGRAMME

Cherepnin's Reverberant Concerto and Liszt's Empty Tone-Poem of Huns Em[illegible] Side by Side with the Graces of [illegible] and the Charm of Vaughan-Williams—Mr. Moiseiwitsch Also SHARPER contrast Mr. Monteux could hardly have made between the halves of the programme that he set yesterday for the Symphony Concert. It began with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, first and lightest of the three in which the composer sealed his handiwork in such form. It continued with the Fantasia fostered in Vaughan Williams, Briton of the present, by a hymn of Thomas Tallis, Elizabethan maker of music. Mr. Williams uses only a string orchestra, often divided into two. He cultivates archaic harmonies appropriate to Tallis's time and theme. He seeks and gains the tranquility, the reticence, the pervading measure of this elder music. Fitly then, his piece of 1910 companioned the serene, pellucid, rippling Symphony set to paper by Mozart in 1788. Hearing both, the audience dwelt for an hour in such an Arcadia of music as Poussin was wont to set visualized, upon his canvases.

Over the intermission leapt the transition. Mr. Moiseiwitsch, called anew to the Symphony Concerts and again warmly welcomed, proffered a Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by the Russian, Cherépnin, faintly remembered as the composer of the ballet "Narcissus" in which Nijinsky once danced no farther away than the Metropolitan Opera House. Nearly every Russian composer writes such a Concerto—one, two, even three—since music for the piano flourished in Muscovy—and still flourishes in Bolshevy—to high esteem. Usually he succeeds in the writing of a piece taxing the pianist and displaying the piano to the utmost. Half as often he also infuses into the Concerto poetic suggestion, emotional implication, moments of songful beauty, flights of instrumental power. Of such, for remembered examples, are Rakhmaniov's Concertos—when the composer plays the piano part.

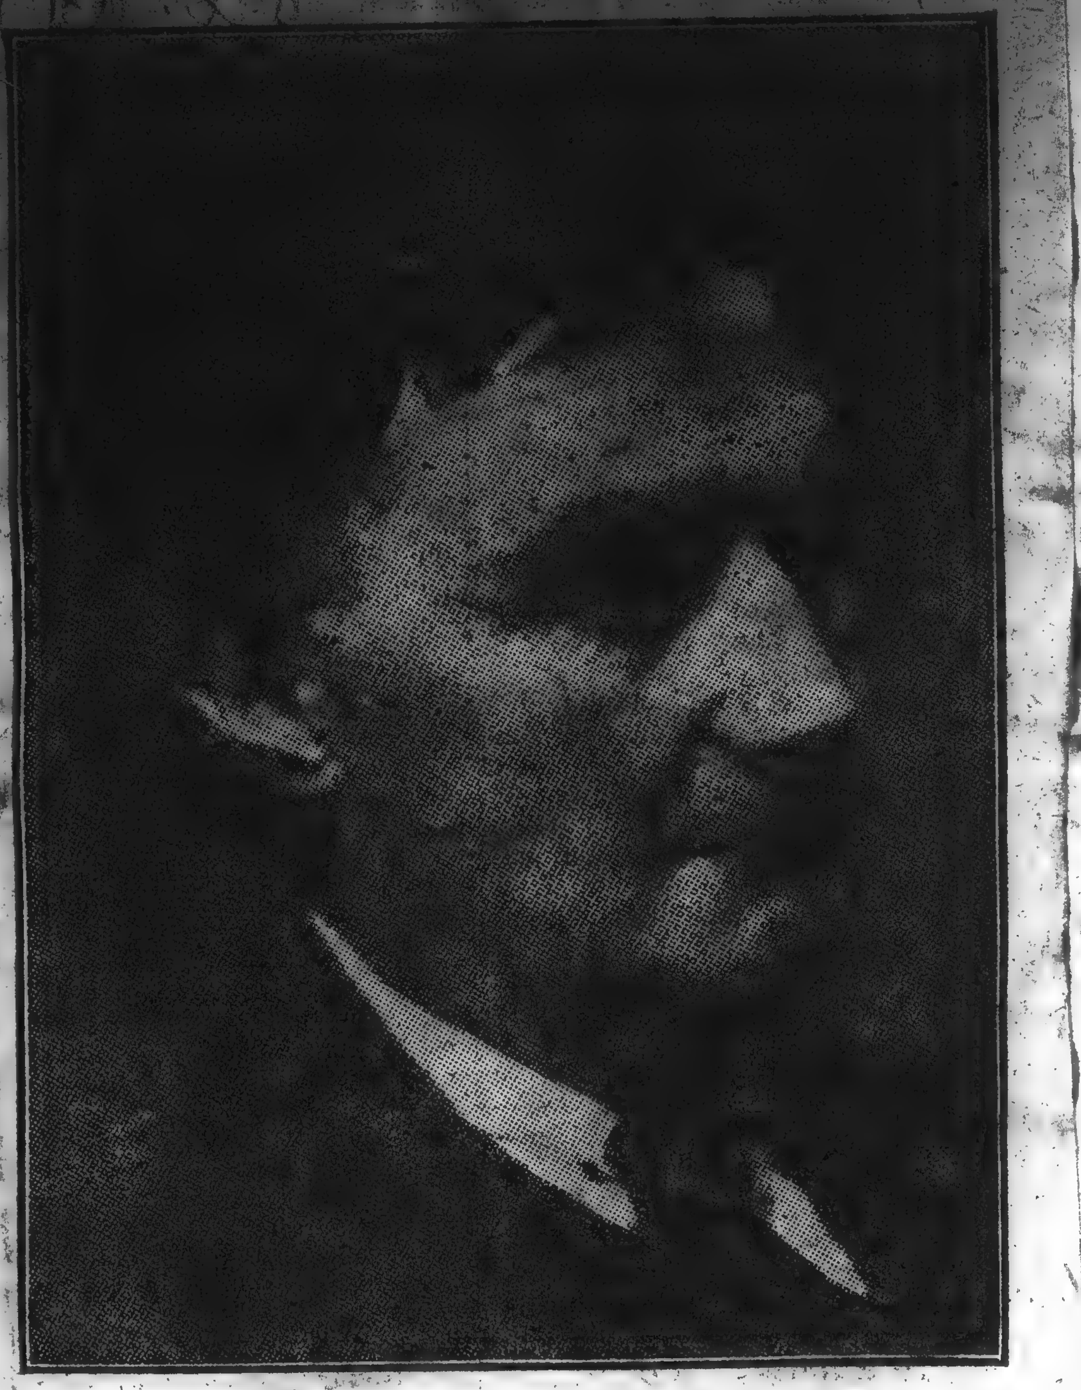
Cherépnin, however, like Liapunov from Mme. Leginska's hands a few seasons ago, may not gain even these modest heights. With his feet firmly fixed to the pedals and eyes, fingers, mind and heart fastened to the keyboard, he writes a Concerto that shall keep the pianist hurdling over difficulties; providing that virtuoso with a full ten minutes of unaccompanied display; doubly and triply affirming the piano to be a pulsatile instrument, quite innocent of the voice of song. Cherépain sets the pianist to the scribbling of large-lined arabesques upon the surface of a tonal wall sustained by the orchestra. He bids them declaim stoutly, sweepingly. He whips him through the labyrinth of a skeletonized cadenza that articulates difficulty to difficulty and feat to feat. He sends the pianist shepherding the orchestra with shouts and blows through a brief finale. He condescends, incidentally and dutifully, to a few songful measures for that much-enduring man—and also for a much-enduring audience. It is quite possible to write a Concerto that shall be no more than a sonorous machine; to make it an anatomical chart, as it were, of the pianist's larger technical powers and of the larger mechanics of the piano. In this very piece, Cherépnin has proved the possibility—and therewith stopped rather than ended.

Now such a Concerto is precisely the music that Mr. Moiseiwitsch should not play. Of course, he could and did play it to the hilt, while loud and long plaudits answered him. He rode over every feat of strength and agility. He unrolled the arabesque like a tapestry of sonorities. His declamation was proclamation. He mapped the cadenza-like interlude in large and intricate design. He martialled the orchestra before him. No whit of the desired force, the square-cut progress, the occasional splendor of tone did he miss. His eloquence was as incessant, strenuous, dry and hollow as Chérepnin's own. What his mind perceived and willed, his hand accomplished. Yet nowhere in the playing was there hint of mood or fancy. Imagination took cover, felicity fled away from these incessant sonorities, these vasty tapestries of display. There was no poetry; the only audible passion was the passion that conquering resounds. Now the shortcoming of Mr. Moiseiwitsch when he plays pieces of Beethoven, say, or Schumann, or Chopin or even Brahms, is dryness of voice and mood. He makes them an exercise in mentality, rather than sensibility, of insight and power rather than of feeling and poetry. He most reveals his finer self when he prefers to seek—and sometimes gain—poetized passion. But yesterday, back and forth, he and Cherépnin only juggled and thundered.

As though the Concerto were not enough, upon it, Mr. Monteux piled Liszts tone-poem "The Battle of the Huns," mute but no doubt chafing at Symphony Hall these nine years. By common consent of twentieth-century ears, one and another of Liszt's Symphonic Poems is still good to hear as romantic, ornate flamboyant exercise in music-making—say "Orpheus" or "Mazeppa." Others characterize or picture so graphically and showily that, like "Tasso," they deserve occasional revival. Two more, "Preludes" and "The Voices of the Mountain" vision in tones enough to clear routine romantic commonplace. Nearly all the remainder ring too hollow and sound too cheap and obvious ever to be resurrected. Upon the verge of that category hangs "The Battle of the Huns" and into the pit, it should forthwith be thrust.

Mystery, illusion there are not when Liszt bids his hosts of Heathen and Christians rise from the dead and in the air renew fighting. His battle-piece is thin platitude. Only the rhythmic figure that haunts the Hunnish host gives life to the conflict. The hymn of the victorious Christians rises; and the listener hears the soft [illegible] of coin into the contribution-box while [illegible] sings the Offertory, [illegible] cus. For the love of the Muse of music and her eight sisters, "The Battle of the Huns" should be irrevocably banished from symphony concerts, A. D. 1922. If not, some one should revise the piece and give the victory in music to Attila's hosts. They have at least that graphic, snapping, rhythmic figure. Strauss would have made it snarl.

Vision and Virility



Vaughan Williams

Composer of the London and the Pastoral Symphonies and of the "Tallis Fantasia" of Yesterday

With reason, then, did Mozart prevail; while becomingly Vaughan Williams kept him company. The wind-choir of the orchestra has seldom sounded more supple and limpid than it did yesterday through Mozart's songful measures, suffusing them with an opalescent radiance, keeping them in curve and motion with sensitive, changeful, lips and fingers. Mr. Monteux held to just and pliant paces; shaped phrases, moulded contours, set in accents, yet seldom over-stressed them. Probably even his diminished string-choir was too heavy, too sharp, for Mozart's running figures and light, firm "tuttis." A bit too well those strings feel the oats of their unified power. None the less, Mozart prevailed and by nothing else than the persisting beauty, the inexhaustible felicity, of a music that expresses naught but itself. Here flows pure design in tones. As well question the pattern of a Grecian border or a Chinese lacquer. Here also flows song that writes its own loveliness upon the air; while Mozart is ever shading and quirking the pen. It needs no other virtues. Here stateliness marches as in the minuet or high spirits flash and race as in the finale, with Mozart, the alchemist, transmuting mood into tones in a whisk of his magic. Yet the song spontaneous as it seems, owes not a little to his shaping elegance, incessant fancies, inexhaustible dexterities. After all, he does marshal these "tuttis," set in those modulations, array contrasts, ordain halts and dashes. By a hundred musical ways do the composers accomplish these useful, pleasing things. Beyond all others, Mozart's ways endure as the processes of genius.

Writing music, Vaughan Williams takes thought, not always the custom of composers in our speed-ridden, rough-edged time. If the thought run grave and deep and large, he gives it form and speech in such music as the "London Symphony" of warm and moving memory. If his spirit brood and pulse and glow, with an inner eagerness and illumination we listeners hear such music as the recent "Pastoral Symphony." If he is content to muse and fancy and charm in gentle introspection then do we receive these "Tallis Variations." Moreover, whatever the utterance, the composer's expressive means completely and economically fulfill his ends. Often he is reticent; always he is poised; but in this moderation, this certainty, dwells a quiet beauty, a gently penetrating power. Vaughan Williams's music, each piece according to kind, first attracts, then persuades, and finally suffuses the hearer. Mind, imagination, heart, all stir to it. The final sensation is a wholly content submission to the composer. Without an audible effort, he imposes will, purpose, mood, suggestion.

The theme of Tallis's hymn-tune engages the ear—open, changeful, supple, warm-voiced as music went in sixteenth-century England. Gradually disclosing it, Vaughan Williams gradually works its spell upon hearers. Therewith he sets to variations upon it. His smaller orchestra occasionally echoes these plays of invention, fancy, resource. His solo-instruments isolate, embroider, diversify. His full string choir amplifies and enriches. Often he courts, with the smile of scholarship, archaic or churchly harmonies. Yet in his own fertile skill, in Ravel's teaching as well, dwells an ultra-modern sensibility to divided, merged, contrasted, shaded timbres in a string choir. The matter of these "Tallis Variations" runs serene and full. Fancy and resource play hand in hand over them; the musing mind finds the apt means; out of serenity speaks charm; out of finesse puris felicity. Too many composers in the newest modes splotch, spur and spice their music. In this "Tallis Fantasia" Vaughan Williams stays and muses that he may more finely chisel and glint his cameos.

MOISEIWITSCH WINS SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

Pianist at His Best in Tcherepnin Concerto

Ralph Vaughan Williams Also Is Pleasing

Benno Moiseiwitsch was warmly applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert after his performance of an unfamiliar piano concerto by Tcherepnin. An extraordinary command of every resource of his instrument, added to his sound and subtle musicianship make him one of the most remarkable of living pianists. Boston has had too few chance to hear him.

Techerepnin, a pupil of Rimsky Korsakoff and a teacher in the Petrograd Conservatory, has in this concerto written music which recalls the bombast and sentimentality of Rubinstein or Tchaikovsky rather than the work of the newer Russian composers. The orchestration has little of the clarity and elegance of style that distinguish Rimsky Korsakoff's work. It is turgid and confused. But show pieces must not be taken too seriously.

The audience also seemed greatly pleased by the first performance here of a "Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis," by Ralph Vaughan Williams. Tallis was a 16th century Engish church composer, some of whose tunes are still sung with conventionally modernized harmonirations in our Protestant churches. Mr Williams, known here by his "London Symphony" as one of the more ambitious of the younger English composers, has in this piece for double string orchestra given free reign to his decided gift for modal harmony, and produced music in keeping with Tallis' period.

This Fantasia must have sounded its best in the original performance in the Gloucester, Eng. Cathedral. It is ecclesiastical in tone and depends more upon atmosphere than upon musical construction for its effect. Yesterday's performance was movingly eloquent.

Liszt's "Battle of the Huns," the concluding number, dates as obviously and tiresomely from the 1850s as does Kaulbach's mural painting in Berlin, which suggested it to the composer. It is sonorous, theatrical, empty music, saying nothing at great length and with tiresome reiterations. One wonders how the composer capable of writing the "Faust" symphony and the B minor piano sonata could have produced anything so banal and inept.

The first number was Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, one of the most miraculous of all musical masterpieces, before which written comments become pointless. Mr Monteux, with all his pains, could not hide the fact the delicacy of this music is marred by performance in a huge hall by more than twice the proper number of players. Yet despite this drawback, it eclipsed everything in the concert for at least one listener, who, hearing it, could nnderstand why men brought up on Mozart used to object to Beethoven and the whole 19th century as noisy and vulgar, without, of course, sharing their horror of novelty and of romantic intensity.

Next week Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Saint Saens' quasi-humorous "Carnival of the Animals," Glazunov's "Stenka Razin," and for important American novelty, two pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, are numbers [illegible]

GLOBE-Oct. 28

ON the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has set the long promised and long anticipated jeu d'esprit of Saint-Saëns, "The Animals' Carnival." There it is listed in these serio-comic subdivisions: (1) Introduction and "Royal March of the Lion"; (2) Hens and Roosters; (3) "Hémiones—A Swift Species"; (4) Tortoises; (5) The Elephant; (6) Kangaroos; (7) Aquarium; (8) Persons with Long Ears; (9) The Cuckoo Deep in the Woods; (10) Aviary; (11) Pianists; (12) Fossils; (13) The Swan; (14) Finale. Two pianos dot the little orchestra imposed by the composer. Messrs. de Voto and Stevens will play them. Otherwise the programme for these Symphony Concerts traverses; Brahms's Fourth Symphony, in E minor; two pictorial pieces by the imagining Griffes—"Clouds" and "The White Peacock"—orchestral versions of piano-scores; and Glazunov's tone-poem of the Russian hero, "Stenka Razine."

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the profit of its Pension Fund, with Mr. Monteux conducting; the band on its mettle and Russian pieces filling the programme viz. Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite, "Scheherazade"; the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor"; Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razine"; Chaikovsky's Overture, "1812." Mme. Slobodskaja, lately heard here with the Ukrainian Choir, will be the assisting singer, also in Russian numbers.

TRANS-Oct. 28

WILLIAMS' MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

English Fantasia Wins Approval—Russian Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

One walks about Boston today and goes up on Beacon Hill, looks at old buildings and landmarks, recalls this and that episode of the history of great America, and then perceives, let us say, Boylston street, and wonders whether a present like ours can ever have an atmosphere, or approach in artistic or dramatic significance the times that are with us no longer. And then one walks into Symphony Hall and hears the Fantasia on a theme by the old English composer, Thomas Tallis, by the modern English composer, Vaughan Williams, played by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and wonders still more a similar thing—namely, whether there will ever be a time as fit for music-making as the age which produced that haunting old tune and moved Vaughan Williams, who is living today, to string it out into such beautiful music.

SINGULARLY BEAUTIFUL

Vaughan Williams' Fantasia, for double string orchestra, was the crowning feature of the third Symphony programme of the season. It is singularly beautiful music, practically a set of free variations on a lovely and archaic tune by an Elizabethan composer. But here at last are developments which do not aim merely to astonish the hearer, which spring inevitably, not merely from the musical structure of a chosen melody, but from the emotional moods which that melody has inevitably provoked in the breast of a sensitive creative musician.

The opening, once heard, would never be forgotten, with the antiphonal responses of the one orchestra to the other, the sense of dim, far-off, ineffably beautiful things. The composer adheres both in spirit and letter to the harmonic character of the old music, and the result is the effect of an ancient cloistral grey, of something at once noble and shadowy and beautiful and austere.

To Be Reckoned With

Mme. de Stael made the celebrated remark, now bromidic, about music being frozen architecture. Searching in vain in our mind for some simile to give the reader an impression only to be realized, probably, by the hearer, it seemed to us the spirit of old architecture was in this music, the expression of a composer suddenly reminded of his heritage, feeling profoundly the beautiful and tragic past of his land. This composer retrospects, not merely through the past years of his own life, but the very life of the country that bore him. He finds, at the moment of creation, more living companions in the ages past than in the bus-drivers and the clerks and the money-changers of the present.

Vaughan Williams, of the "London" Symphony, the song cycle, "On Wedlock Edge," and this Fantasia, is indeed a poet and an English composer to be reckoned with.

Mr. Noisiewitch's Playing

Of the Fantasia the orchestra gave a superb performance. An equally brilliant performance was given by Benno Noisiewitch, piano soloist of the occasion, when he introduced a work of far less merit—the Tcherepnin piano concerto. As a vehicle of a magnificent virtuoso performance the concerto was acceptable. Whether in and by itself as a musical creation, it would stand dispassionate examination, is a different matter. We are rather certain that it wouldn't, in spite of a vigorous opening theme, of very pretentious orchestration, of an occasional and not terrifying Russianism.

It is a virtuoso's piece. As such Mr. Noisiewitch gave it a memorable interpretation. It is difficult to conceive of this concerto better played. Mr. Noisiewitch has a prodigious technic, but equal beauty of tone; the clearest sense of form, and yet true imagination; dramatic fire, and a very acute sense of values.

Liszt's Music Still Young

The programme opened with a classic, Mozart's E flat major symphony, delightfully played, and came to an end with what is still modern, Liszt's "Battle of the Huns," after the picture of Kaulbach, wherein the spirits of defeated warriors rise again from the plain to battle with the soldiers of Christianity, with the organ as well as the orchestra, and "Veni creator" and "Crux fidelis" to tell the tale. And, acknowledging the customary Listzian bombast and striving for the greatest, the ultimate effect, it is a fine-sounding piece of music.

How did the man do these things, with all his piano playing and fetes and letter writing and amours and the rest of it? To answer that may explain how his symphonic poems, with all their tawdriness, keep their place decade after decade on orchestral programmes, and how wonders are achieved by genius.

POST-Oct. 28.

Russian Pianist Symphony Star

Benno Moiseiwitsch, a young Russian who has won a place among the leading pianists, is the star of this week's Symphony concerts. He won an ovation at the matinee yesterday, when Tcherepnin's concerto for piano and orchestra was given its first performance in Boston. It was a brilliant effort, inspired by one of the finest compositions Mr. Monteux has so far introduced at these concerts. Another enjoyable novelty was the Vaughan Williams fantasia for string orchestra, a work of ecclisiastical character, based upon a tune from an old English psalter.

The program, which will be repeated tonight, also includes the classic Mozart symphony in E-flat major and one of Liszt's imposing symphonic poems, "The Battle of the Huns."

ADVTSR-Oct. 28.

THIRD CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Two Unfamiliar Pieces Played — A Churchly Fantasia by Williams

PERFORMANCE BY PIANIST BRILLIANT

By PHILIP HALE

The third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major; Vaughan Williams, Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis, for double stringed orchestra (first time here); Tcherepnin, Concerto for piano, with orchestra (first time nere); Liszt, Symphonic Poem No. 11, "The Battle of the Huns." Benno Moiselwitsch was the pianist.

After a sympathetic performance of Mozart's symphony, which is characterized in the first two movements by the grace, the suavity and the tender melancholy peculiar to that composer; in the Scherzo and Finale by the light-heartedness that differs from the frank jollity of Haydn's lively movements, came the Fantasia by Vaughan Williams, which, composed for a festival at Gloucester, England, was performed there in the Cathedral in 1910.

Tallis is known to us chiefly by a hymn tune which bears his name, and a chant or two. Yet he was a great man, not only in his day and generation but in the history of music. The theme chosen by Williams for the exercise of his inventive ability is one of eight tunes written by Tallis for Archbishop Parker's psalter in 1567. At the time this tune was curiously described as one that rages and roughly brays. To modern ears it appears stately, solemn, sombre, reminding one of old Herew chants. The Fantasia preserves an ecclesiastical character throughout, music eminently fitted [illegible] cathedral, [illegible] concert [illegible]

[17]

Trans Oct 28

SYMPHONY CONCERT

MR. MONTEUX ARRAYS A WARRING PROGRAMME

Cherepnin's Reverberant Concerto and Liszt's Empty Tone-Poem of Huns Embattled Side by Side with the Graces of Mozart and the Charm of Vaughan-Williams—Mr. Moiseiwitsch Also SHARPER contrast Mr. Monteux could hardly have made between the halves of the programme that he set yesterday for the Symphony Concert. It began with Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, first and lightest of the three in which the composer sealed his handiwork in such form. It continued with the Fantasia fostered in Vaughan Williams, Briton of the present, by a hymn of Thomas Tallis, Elizabethan maker of music. Mr. Williams uses only a string orchestra, often divided into two. He cultivates archaic harmonies appropriate to Tallis's time and theme. He seeks and gains the tranquility, the reticence, the pervading measure of this elder music. Fitly then, his piece of 1910 companioned the serene, pellucid, rippling Symphony set to paper by Mozart in 1788. Hearing both, the audience dwelt for an hour in such an Arcadia of music as Poussin was wont to set visualized, upon his canvases.

Over the intermission leapt the transition. Mr. Moiseiwitsch, called anew to the Symphony Concerts and again warmly welcomed, proffered a Concerto for Piano and Orchestra by the Russian, Cherépnin, faintly remembered as the composer of the ballet "Narcissus" in which Nijinsky once danced no farther away than the Metropolitan Opera House. Nearly every Russian composer writes such a Concerto—one, two, even three—since music for the piano flourished in Muscovy—and still flourishes in Bolshevy—to high esteem. Usually he succeeds in the writing of a piece taxing the pianist and displaying the piano to the utmost. Half as often he also infuses into the Concerto poetic suggestion, emotional implication, moments of songful beauty, flights of instrumental power. Of such, for remembered examples, are Rakhmaniov's Concertos—when the composer plays the piano part.

Cherépnin, however, like Liapunov from Mme. Leginska's hands a few seasons ago, may not gain even these modest heights. With his feet firmly fixed to the pedals and eyes, fingers, mind and heart fastened to the keyboard, he writes a Concerto that shall keep the pianist hurdling over difficulties; providing that virtuoso with a full ten minutes of unaccompanied display; doubly and triply affirming the piano to be a pulsatile instrument, quite innocent of the voice of song. Cherépnin sets the pianist to the scribbling of large-lined arabesques upon the surface of a tonal wall sustained by the orchestra. He bids them declaim stoutly, sweepingly. He whips him through the labyrinth of a skeletonized cadenza, that articulates difficulty to difficulty and feat to feat. He sends the pianist shepherding the orchestra with shouts and blows through a brief finale. He condescends, incidentally and dutifully, to a few songful measures for that much-enduring man—and also for a much-enduring audience. It is quite possible to write a Concerto that shall be no more than a sonorous machine; to make it an anatomical chart, as it were, of the pianist's larger technical powers and of the larger mechanics of the piano. In this very piece, Cherépnin has proved the possibility—and therewith stopped rather than ended.

Now such a Concerto is precisely the music that Mr. Moiseiwitsch should not play. Of course, he could and did play it to the hilt, while loud and long plaudits answered him. He rode over every feat of strength and agility. He unrolled the arabesque like a tapestry of sonorities. His declamation was proclamation. He mapped the cadenza-like interlude in large and intricate design. He martialled the orchestra before him. No whit of the desired force, the square-cut progress, the occasional splendor of tone did he miss. His eloquence was as incessant, strenuous, dry and hollow as Cherépnin's own. What his mind perceived and willed, his hand accomplished. Yet nowhere in the playing was there hint of mood or fancy. Imagination took cover, felicity fled away from these incessant sonorities, these vasty tapestries of display. There was no poetry; the only audible passion was the passion that conquering resounds. Now the shortcoming of Mr. Moiseiwitsch when he plays pieces of Beethoven, say, or Schumann, or Chopin or even Brahms, is dryness of voice and mood. He makes them an exercise in mentality, rather than sensibility, of insight and power rather than of feeling and poetry. He most reveals his finer self when he prefers to seek—and sometimes gain—poetized passion. But yesterday, back and forth, he and Cherépnin only juggled and thundered.

As though the Concerto were not enough, upon it, Mr. Monteux piled Liszts tone-poem "The Battle of the Huns," mute but no doubt chafing at Symphony Hall these nine years. By common consent of twentieth-century ears, one and another of Liszt's Symphonic Poems is still good to hear as romantic, ornate flamboyant exercise in music-making—say "Orpheus" or "Mazeppa." Others characterize or picture so graphically and showily that, like "Tasso," they deserve occasional revival. Two more, "Preludes" and "The Voices of the Mountain" vision in tones enough to clear routine romantic commonplace. Nearly all the remainder ring too hollow and sound too cheap and obvious ever to be resurrected. Upon the verge of that category hangs "The Battle of the Huns" and into the pit, it should forthwith be thrust.

Mystery, illusion there are not when Liszt bids his hosts of Heathen and Christians rise from the dead and in the air renew fighting. His battle-piece is thin platitude. Only the rhythmic figure that haunts the Hunnish host gives life to the conflict. The hymn of the victorious Christians rises; and the listener hears the soft fall of coin into the contribution-box while the choir sweetly sings the Offertory. [illegible] the hymn into a resound- [illegible] across a tonal circus. For the love of the Muse of music and her eight sisters, "The Battle of the Huns" should be irrevocably banished from symphony concerts, A. D. 1922. If not, some one should revise the piece and give the victory in music to Attila's hosts. They have at least that graphic, snapping, rhythmic figure. Strauss would have made it snarl.

Vision and Virility

Vaughan Williams

Composer of the London and the Pastoral Symphonies and of the "Tallis Fantasia" of Yesterday

With reason, then, did Mozart prevail; while becomingly Vaughan Williams kept him company. The wind-choir of the orchestra has seldom sounded more supple and limpid than it did yesterday through Mozart's songful measures, suffusing them with an opalescent radiance, keeping them in curve and motion with sensitive, changeful, lips and fingers. Mr. Monteux held to just and pliant paces; shaped phrases, moulded contours, set in accents, yet seldom over-stressed them. Probably even his diminished string-choir was too heavy, too sharp, for Mozart's running figures and light, firm "tuttis." A bit too well those strings feel the oats of their unified power.

None the less, Mozart prevailed and by nothing else than the persisting beauty, the inexhaustible felicity, of a music that expresses naught but itself. Here flows pure design in tones. As well question the pattern of a Grecian border or a Chinese lacquer. Here also flows song that writes its own loveliness upon the air; while Mozart is ever shading and quirking the pen. It needs no other virtues. Here stateliness marches as in the minuet or high spirits flash and race as in the finale, with Mozart, the alchemist, transmuting mood into tones in a whisk of his magic. Yet the song spontaneous as it seems, owes not a little to his shaping elegance, incessant fancies, inexhaustible dexterities. After all, he does marshal these "tuttis," set in those modulations, array contrasts, ordain halts and dashes. By a hundred musical ways do the composers accomplish these useful, pleasing things. Beyond all others, Mozart's ways endure as the processes of genius.

Writing music, Vaughan Williams takes thought, not always the custom of composers in our speed-ridden, rough-edged time. If the thought run grave and deep and large, he gives it form and speech in such music as the "London Symphony" of warm and moving memory. If his spirit brood and pulse and glow, with an inner eagerness and illumination we listeners hear such music as the recent "Pastoral Symphony." If he is content to muse and fancy and charm in gentle introspection then do we receive these "Tallis Variations." Moreover, whatever the utterance, the composer's expressive means completely and economically fulfill his ends. Often he is reticent; always he is poised; but in this moderation, this certainty, dwells a quiet beauty, a gently penetrating power. Vaughan Williams's music, each piece according to kind, first attracts, then persuades, and finally suffuses the hearer. Mind, imagination, heart, all stir to it. The final sensation is a wholly content submission to the composer. Without an audible effort, he imposes will, purpose, mood, suggestion.

The theme of Tallis's hymn-tune engages the ear—open, changeful, supple, warm-voiced as music went in sixteenth-century England. Gradually disclosing it, Vaughan Williams gradually works its spell upon hearers. Therewith he sets to variations upon it. His smaller orchestra occasionally echoes these plays of invention, fancy, resource. His solo-instruments isolate, embroider, diversify. His full string choir amplifies and enriches. Often he courts, with the smile of scholarship, archaic or churchly harmonies. Yet in his own fertile skill, in Ravel's teaching as well, dwells an ultra-modern sensibility to divided, merged, contrasted, shaded timbres in a string choir. The matter of these "Tallis Variations" runs serene and full. Fancy and resource play hand in hand over them; the musing mind finds the apt means; out of serenity speaks charm; out of finesse purls felicity. Too many composers in the newest modes splotch, spur and spice their music. In this "Tallis Fantasia" Vaughan Williams stays and muses that he may more finely chisel and glint his cameos.

ON the programme for the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux has set the long promised and long anticipated jeu d'esprit of Saint-Saëns, "The Animals' Carnival." There it is listed in these serio-comic subdivisions: (1) Introduction and "Royal March of the Lion"; (2) Hens and Roosters; (3) "Hémiones—A Swift Species"; (4) Tortoises; (5) The Elephant; (6) Kangaroos; (7) Aquarium; (8) Persons with Long Ears; (9) The Cuckoo Deep in the Woods; (10) Aviary; (11) Pianists; (12) Fossils; (13) The Swan; (14) Finale. Two pianos dot the little orchestra imposed by the composer. Messrs. de Voto and Stevens will play them. Otherwise the programme for these Symphony Concerts traverses; Brahms's Fourth Symphony, in E minor; two pictorial pieces by the imagining Griffes—"Clouds" and "The White Peacock"—orchestral versions of piano-scores; and Glazunov's tone-poem of the Russian hero, "Stenka Razine."

Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the profit of its Pension Fund, with Mr. Monteux conducting; the band on its mettle and Russian pieces filling the programme viz. Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite, "Scheherazade"; the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor"; Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razine"; Chaikovsky's Overture, "1812." Mme. Slobodskaja, lately heard here with the Ukrainian Choir, will be the assisting singer, also in Russian numbers.

TRANS-Oct 28

MOISEIWITSCH WINS SYMPHONY AUDIENCE

Pianist at His Best in Tcherepnin Concerto

Ralph Vaughan Williams Also Is Pleasing

Benno Moiseiwitsch was warmly applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert after his performance of an unfamiliar piano concerto by Tcherepnin. An extraordinary command of every resource of his instrument, added to his sound and subtle musicianship make him one of the most remarkable of living pianists. Boston has had too few chance to hear him.

Techerepnin, a pupil of Rimsky Korsakoff and a teacher in the Petrograd Conservatory, has in this concerto written music which recalls the bombast and sentimentality of Rubinstein or Tchaikovsky rather than the work of the newer Russian composers. The orchestration has little of the clarity and elegance of style that distinguish Rimsky Korsakoff's work. It is turgid and confused. But show pieces must not be taken too seriously.

The audience also seemed greatly pleased by the first performance here of a "Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis," by Ralph Vaughan Williams. Tallis was a 16th century Engish church composer; some of whose tunes are still sung with conventionally modernized harmonirations in our Protestant churches. Mr Williams, known here by his "London Symphony" as one of the more ambitious of the younger English composers, has in this piece for double string orchestra given free reign to his decided gift for modal harmony, and produced music in keeping with Tallis' period.

This Fantasia must have sounded its best in the original performance in the Gloucester, Eng, Cathedral. It is ecclesiastical in tone and depends more upon atmosphere than upon musical construction for its effect. Yesterday's performance was movingly eloquent.

Liszt's "Battle of the Huns," the concluding number, dates as obviously and tiresomely from the 1850s as does Kaulbach's mural painting in Berlin, which suggested it to the composer. It is sonorous, theatrical, empty music, saying nothing at great length and with tiresome reiterations. One wonders how the composer capable of writing the "Faust" symphony and the B minor piano sonata could have produced anything so banal and inept.

The first number was Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, one of the most miraculous of all musical masterpieces, before which written comments become pointless. Mr Monteux, with all his pains, could not hide the fact the delicacy of this music is marred by performance in a huge hall by more than twice the proper number of players. Yet despite this drawback, it eclipsed everything in the concert for at least one listener, who, hearing it, could understand why men brought up on Mozart used to object to Beethoven and the whole 19th century as noisy and vulgar, without, of course, sharing their horror of novelty and of romantic intensity.

Next week Brahms' Fourth Symphony, Saint Saens' quasi-humorous "Carnival of the Animals," Glazunov's "Stenka Razin," and for important American novelty, two pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, are numbers an-

GLOBE-Oct, 28

WILLIAMS' MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

English Fantasia Wins Approval—Russian Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

One walks about Boston today and goes up on Beacon Hill, looks at old buildings and landmarks, recalls this and that episode of the history of great America, and then perceives, let us say, Boylston street, and wonders whether a present like ours can ever have an atmosphere, or approach in artistic or dramatic significance the times that are with us no longer. And then one walks into Symphony Hall and hears the Fantasia on a theme by the old English composer, Thomas Tallis, by the modern English composer, Vaughan Williams, played by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and wonders still more a similar thing—namely, whether there will ever be a time as fit for music-making as the age which produced that haunting old tune and moved Vaughan Williams, who is living today, to string it out into such beautiful music.

SINGULARLY BEAUTIFUL

Vaughan Williams' Fantasia, for double string orchestra, was the crowning feature of the third Symphony programme of the season. It is singularly beautiful music, practically a set of free variations on a lovely and archaic tune by an Elizabethan composer. But here at last are developments which do not aim merely to astonish the hearer, which spring inevitably, not merely from the musical structure of a chosen melody, but from the emotional moods which that melody has inevitably provoked in the breast of a sensitive creative musician.

The opening, once heard, would never be forgotten, with the antiphonal responses of the one orchestra to the other, the sense of dim, far-off, ineffably beautiful things. The composer adheres both in spirit and letter to the harmonic character of the old music, and the result is the effect of an ancient cloistral grey, of something at once noble and shadowy and beautiful and austere.

To Be Reckoned With

Mme. de Staël made the celebrated remark, now bromidic, about music being frozen architecture. Searching in vain in our mind for some simile to give the reader an impression only to be realized, probably, by the hearer, it seemed to us the spirit of old architecture was in this music, the expression of a composer suddenly reminded of his heritage, feeling profoundly the beautiful and tragic past of his land. This composer retrospects, not merely through the past years of his own life, but the very life of the country that bore him. He finds, at the moment of creation, more living companions in the ages past than in the bus-drivers and the clerks and the money-changers of the present.

Vaughan Williams, of the "London" Symphony, the song cycle, "On Wedlock Edge," and this Fantasia, is indeed a poet and an English composer to be reckoned with.

Mr. Noisiewitch's Playing

Of the Fantasia the orchestra gave superb performance. An equally brilliant performance was given by Benno Noisiewitch, piano soloist of the occasion, when he introduced a work of far less merit—the Tcherepnin piano concerto. As a vehicle of a magnificent virtuoso performance the concerto was acceptable. Whether in and by itself as a musical creation, it would stand dispassionate examination, is a different matter. We are rather certain that it wouldn't, in spite of a vigorous opening theme, of very pretentious orchestration, of an occasional and not terrifying Russianism.

It is a virtuoso's piece. As such Mr. Noisiewitch gave it a memorable interpretation. It is difficult to conceive of this concerto better played. Mr. Noisiewitch has a prodigious technic, but equal beauty of tone; the clearest sense of form, and yet true imagination; dramatic fire, and a very acute sense of values.

Liszt's Music Still Young

The programme opened with a classic, Mozart's E flat major symphony, delightfully played, and came to an end with what is still modern, Liszt's "Battle of the Huns," after the picture of Kaulbach, wherein the spirits of defeated warriors rise again from the plain to battle with the soldiers of Christianity, with the organ as well as the orchestra, and "Veni creator" and "Crux fidelis" to tell the tale. And, acknowledging the customary Listzian bombast and striving for the greatest, the ultimate effect, it is a fine-sounding piece of music.

How did the man do these things, with all his piano playing and fetes and letter writing and amours and the rest of it? To answer that may explain how his symphonic poems, with all their tawdriness, keep their place decade after decade on orchestral programmes, and how wonders are achieved by genius.

POST-Oct. 28.

Russian Pianist Symphony Star

Benno Moiseiwitsch, a young Russian who has won a place among the leading pianists, is the star of this week's Symphony concerts. He won an ovation at the matinee yesterday, when Tcherepnin's concerto for piano and orchestra was given its first performance in Boston. It was a brilliant effort, inspired by one of the finest compositions Mr. Monteux has so far introduced at these concerts. Another enjoyable novelty was the Vaughan Williams fantasia for string orchestra, a work of ecclisiastical character, based upon a tune from an old English psalter.

The program, which will be repeated tonight, also includes the classic Mozart symphony in E-flat major and one of Liszt's imposing symphonic poems, "The Battle of the Huns."

ADVTSR-Oct. 28.

THIRD CONCERT OF SYMPHONY

Two Unfamiliar Pieces Played — A Churchly Fantasia by Williams

PERFORMANCE BY PIANIST BRILLIANT

By PHILIP HALE

The third program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mozart, Symphony in E flat major; Vaughan Williams, Fantasia on a Theme by Tallis, for double stringed orchestra (first time here); Tcherepnin, Concerto for piano, with orchestra (first time here); Liszt, Symphonic Poem No. 11, "The Battle of the Huns." Benno Moiseiwitsch was the pianist.

After a sympathetic performance of Mozart's symphony, which is characterized in the first two movements by the grace, the suavity and the tender melancholy peculiar to that composer; in the Scherzo and Finale by the light-heartedness that differs from the frank jollity of Haydn's lively movements, came the Fantasia by Vaughan Williams, which, composed for a festival at Gloucester, England, was performed there in the Cathedral in 1910.

Tallis is known to us chiefly by a hymn tune which bears his name, and a chant or two. Yet he was a great man, not only in his day and generation but in the history of music. The theme chosen by Williams for the exercise of his inventive ability is one of eight tunes written by Tallis for Archbishop Parker's psalter in 1567. At the time this tune was curiously described as one that rages and roughly brays. To modern ears it appears stately, solemn, sombre, reminding one of old Herew chants. The Fantasia preserves an ecclesiastical character throughout, music eminently fitted for a cathedral, impressive in a concert hall. Williams has shown [illegible]

[17]

[illegible] of the [illegible] using the [illegible] of strings and solo players so as to produce contrasting, fine and beautiful effects. It is truly devotional music, needing no words to incite "contemplation of the first composer"; devotional, but not dull, not disfigured by the sentimental passages which too often are found in modern English music for the church. Yet the Fantasia would be still more impressive if it were a little shorter. M. Jean-Aubry has well said in his "Music and the Nations" that the general tendency of English music is to be too long. "It has allowed itself to be inoculated with wholly debatable ideas concerning development." This is true even of the romantic and poetic Arnold Bax. Mr. Monteux with the players gave a superb performance of the Fantasia which was to the glory of the incomparable strings.

Tcherepnin's Concerto was awarded the Bellaiev prize in 1909. In spite of its being a prize composition, it is a virtuoso piece for pianist, orchestra and conductor, bristling with difficulties for all of them. While it abounds in brilliant pages, there are pages of little musical significance, pages of nothing more or less than padding. The more important sections are those that are purely lyrical; these have genuine emotional quality and charm. In them there is melodic individuality. There is occasionally in the more brilliant pages a barbaric wildness that is not displeasing, with instrumentation that is at times peculiar and effective, at other times chiefly singular as in a use of the Glockenspiel with the piano.

The performance was one to be remembered, if only for the triumphant surmounting of difficulties by pianist, conductor and orchestra. It has been well said of Mr. Moiseiwitsch by a foreign critic that he has a pronounced sense of style. That is to say in his case that he grasps and expresses the style of the composer whose music he happens to play. Yesterday his singing of the melodic lines, his exquisite delicacy and fleetness in arabesques, his quiet authority, his musical feeling which gave life to futile measures, and they were not a few, were as remarkable as the vigor and the dash of his bravura. And in his performance he was eloquently supported by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra.

Liszt's Symphonic poem, suggested by Kaulbach's mural painting, wears better than some of Liszt's other works in this field. How modern it is in certain passages! How succeeding composers have profited by him—Wagner especially! There were times yesterday when one thought the "Ride of the Valkyries" was to be played in full. Liszt was at work on "The Battle of the Huns" early in 1857. "The Valkyrie" was completed in 1856. Did the musical idea of strange doings in the air occur to both composers about the same time? The typical rhythmic figure? The spirited performance brought an end to a most interesting concert.

The performance will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week comprises Brahms's Fourth Symphony; "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," by Griffes (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saens's "Animal's Carnival" (first time in Boston), and Glazounov's Symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

HERALD-Oct. 28.

Symphony Programme

At the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in Boston the posthumous score of the late French composer, Saint-Saens, "Carnival of the Animals." This burlesque of the menagerie and the piano virtuoso is familiar to Mr. Monteux, in that he played viola in one of the two string quartets in its early performance under the composer at the semi-private Parisian society, "The Trumpet." The following appear successively in the score: Lion, chickens, turtles, elephant, kangaroo, cuckoo and birds of the air, aquarium, "persons with long ears," pianists, fossils and the swan. The piano parts will be taken by Alfred deVoto and Richard E. Stevens.

Another interesting number will be "Clouds," and "The White Peacock," two short descriptive pieces by Charles T. Griffes, the late American composer, whose "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" has been notably performed at these concerts.

The symphony will be the fourth of Brahms in E minor, and the closing number Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," which is based on Russian folk tunes.

Critics Who Are Late

The rule at the Symphony concerts is now quite rigidly followed, that if a symphony in four movements opens a programme there will be a chance for late arrivals to gain their seats between the first and the second movement, but not between any of the other movements of the symphony, during which the doors will be kept closed. It is a good rule, for everybody but reviewers who arrive late and have to listen through cracks in the door or jiu-jitsu an usher, shake him until his teeth rattle and, bellowing critical indignation at this insult to their rank, jam their way into the perturbed auditorium.

POST- Oct. 29.

PENSION FUND

A concert with a program entirely of Russian music will be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, at 3:30. The proceeds will be given to the pension fund for retired musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Monteux has chosen a program of unusual interest for the occasion, to be headed by Rimsky-Korsakov's famous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." The rhythmic and barbaric Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" will be played, also Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," with its use of the Volga Bargemen's Song. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

The interest will be further enhanced by the appearance of Mme. Oda Slobodskaja, who will sing Russian [illegible] [illegible] orchestra.

[illegible] aja is [illegible] She took leading roles at the Imperial Opera at Petrograd until only 10 months ago. She is already known in Boston by her recent [illegible] with the Ukrainian chorus.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux will conduct for the first time in Boston Saint-Saens' "Carnival of Animals." This burlesque of the menagerie and the piano virtuoso is familiar to Mr. Monteux in that he played viola in one of the two string quartets in an early performance under the composer at the semi-private Parisian society "The Trumpet." The following appear successively in the score: Lion, cocks and hens, tortoises, elephant, kangaroos, cuckoo and birds of the air, aquarium, "persons with long ears," pianists, fossils and the swan. The piano parts will be taken by Alfred deVoto and Richard E. Stevens. "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," two short descriptive pieces by Charles T. Griffes, will be played. The symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms in E minor; the closing number, Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

HERALD-Oct. 29,

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in Boston the posthumous score of the late French composer, Saint-Saens, "Carnival of the Animals," a burlesque of the managerie. The piano parts will be taken by Alfred deVoto and Richard E. Stevens. "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," two short descriptive pieces by Charles T. Griffes; the Brahms Symphony in E minor and Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," are the other numbers.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A concert with a program of Russian numbers will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, November 12, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" suite, the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture are the numbers chosen by Pierre Monteux. Oda Slobodskaja, Russian prima donna, will sing operatic arias with the orchestra.

ADVTSR-Oct. 29.

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15. Boston Symphony Orchestra, fourth program. Fourth Symphony, Brahms; "Carnival of the Animals," Saint-Saëns; "Clouds," and "The White Peacock," Griffes; "Stenka Razine," Glazounov. There will be no soloist.

The Symphony program this week pays deserved tribute to the late Griffes by including two short pieces of his. "The White Peacock" was interpreted last season by the Bolm Ballet at the Shubert Theatre. "Clouds" has not been given in Boston. "Khubla Khan," familiar to the Symphony audience, first proved to this city that Griffes was what a press agent would probably call "the Eugene O'Neill of American music," the one real genius we have produced in this century.

GLOBE-Oct. 29.

THE string-choir of the Symphony Orchestra deserves the praise it is the custom to heap upon it. With tireless pains Mr. Monteux chose and maintains it; while the sixty-three players are as ambitious and diligent as he. For the most part, they are young men advancing, or proved virtuosi in the prime of middle age. They now play with an exceeding unanimity and precision—in the shaping of phrases and the turning of modulations, in rhythmic accent and whatever other stress the composer may ordain. As one, moreover, go the quality and the balance of their tone. The basses are firm and rich; the violoncellos vibrate darkly and songfully; the violas have gained in characteristic color; the second violins have individuality and do not merely "fill in" a pattern; the first shimmer or stride at conductor's and composer's will. More than any other division of the orchestra this string-choir is Mr. Monteux's handiwork. It vies now with the wood-winds. both steadily praise him.

Sixty-three men, however, are sixty-three men. Playing upon stringed instruments, they produce no small body of tone. The sixty-three and the conductor, guiding and swaying them, are also human. Therefore they are not unconscious of their present virtue or unwilling to display it. Consequently, more than once through the six concerts of the current season, they have tended to be over-emphatic and insistent; to press against the whole orchestral balance with too large and firm a weight of tone; to blur and coarsen measures wherein they should have been limpid of voice and fine-cut of line. They were so in the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" at the first pair of concerts. At the second, they did not altogether escape this pitfall in Dvorák's pretty, simple Symphony. Once and again, last week, though reduced in numbers, they overdid Mozart's Symphony in E-flat. With reason the conductor and the string-players cultivate weight and power. Often enough, as in "Zarathustra," the composer demands such abilities. Yet to measure weight and to control power is crown to the gaining thereof. Too frequently of late Mr. Monteux and the sixty-three have erred in an excess of zeal. Every string-choir should have supple vigors at command. It is not necessary also to be muscular.

H. T. P.

TRANS-Oct. 30.

NOVEL PIECES: OTHER PLEASING PROSPECTS

Saint-Saens's Menagerie and Fine-Grained Tone-Poems by Griffes at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow — Belioz Fashionable as Well as Fantastic—Skriabin, According to Monteux—Enter Isa Kremer—A New Piece by Mr. Chadwick—Resurrecting Spohr

TO many who are wholly or largely ignorant of the bulk of his music, Camille Saint-Saëns is known as the composer of two alluring melodies—the aria "Mon Cœur s'Ouvre à Ta Voix" from "Samson and Delilah and the flowing tune and undulating accompaniment known as "The Swan." Originally written for the violoncello, the latter piece has been transferred to the violin, transcribed for the piano, and subjected to various arrangings. In most editions the title is supplemented by the information that "The Swan" is an "extract" from "The Carnival of Animals." But familiar as the swan itself had become, the other animals were never made known to us. Here follows the explanation.

In February, 1886, Saint-Saëns wrote a "Grand Zoölogical Fantasy," this same "Carnival of Animals," largely humorous in character, to be played as a surprise at the annual Mardi-Gras concert of one Lebouc, a violoncellist. A few days later the Fantasy was repeated. Learning of it as he passed through Paris, Liszt requested and received a private hearing. For several years Saint-Saëns permitted performances under special conditions; then finally forbade them altogether. Fortunately a clause in his will provided for the lifting of the ban and the publication of the "Carnival." Henceforth and anywhere it may now be heard without restriction. Lately brought to performance in New York by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra, Mr. Monteux and our own band will reveal it to Bostonian ears tomorrow and Saturday. The score of the curious composition calls for two pianos, flute, clarinet, harmonica, xylophone, two violins, violas, violoncello and double-bass. For the harmonica—a device of musical glasses now obsolete—the celesta furnishes excellent substitute, and here as in New York, the full string-band will play the parts assigned to the quintet.

Set on the printed programme the fourteen divisions of the "Carnival" present a formidable appearance, but most of them are extremely brief. By way of introduction comes a "Royal March of the Lion," for the two pianos and the strings. From time to time in the pompous march are chromatic scales that roar appropriately. The next section, "Hens and Roosters," for clarinet, piano, violins and violas, reveals musical procedures familiar since the days of Daquin and his "Cockoo." Number three, "Wild Asses" ("Swift Animals," as the composer terms them), is no more than a series of exceedingly rapid scale passages for the two pianists. In the fourth piece, "Turtles," the lively tune that concludes the Overture to Offenbach's "Orphée aux Enfers" is played with great deliberation by all the strings in their lower register, against repeated chords for the piano. To characterize The Elephant (number five), a solo double-bass plays as part of a lengthy arioso a few bars of the "Waltz of the Sylphs" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and later a few measures of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." A piano provides the sole accompaniment. Through staccato chords for the piano Saint-Saëns suggests the hopping and posing of Kangaroos (number six). And the ensuing piece, by title "Aquarium," suggestive both of waters and of the creatures that swim therein, falls to the flute, celesta, pianos and strings, without basses. To first and second violins, who bray in high-pitched harmonies descending to prolonged tones on the G string, is assigned the portrayal of the eighth species, "The Gentlemen with Long Ears." Number nine, "The Cuckoo in the Woods," consists of faint calls from a clarinet behind the scenes, sounding through soft chords for the piano. Birds in general are suggested in the tenth piece, "Aviary," by dizzy scales for the flute, the pianos and strings accompanying.

Among the "animals" Saint-Saëns included pianists, and number eleven is a farcical parody on the practice-hour. The two pianists play, "in the clumsy fashion of a beginner," five-finger exercises, ascending by semi-tones, and similar contrivances, absurdly punctuated and reënforced by the rest of the orchestra. In the twelfth piece, "Fossils," the composer displays tunes of which he is weary—the xylophone-tune from his own "Danse Macabre," several old French songs ("J'ai du Bon Tabac," "Ah! Vous Dirai-je Maman," "Partant pour la Syrie" and "Au Clair de la Lune"), and the air, "Una Voce Poco Fa" from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." The thrice familiar melody of The Swan, number thirteen, is of course played by a solo 'cello, both pianos providing the waves on which it swims and sings. In the fourteenth and final number all the instruments are for the first time heard together; most of the animals reappear, and the Long-Eared Gentlemen—thought by some to be the reviewers—have the final word. W. S. S.

Griffes's Miniatures

Very different from these pranks and fancies are the other "novelties" of this week's programme—two highly imaginative pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock." Originally written for the piano, both of these have been thus heard here, and "The White Peacock" was mimed, with the accompaniment of small orchestra, in Mr. Bolm's matinee at the Shubert Theatre last spring. The instrumentation for full orchestra is from the composer's own hand and it should enhance the poetic and pictorial quality of his music. Poems by William Sharp, herewith reproduced, served him for inspiration, and they should prove sufficient clue to the content of the music.

Clouds

Mountainous [illegible]

[illegible]
Are sunk in the valleys
Of fathomless [illegible]

THE WHITE PEACOCK

Here where the sunlight
Floodeth the garden,
Where the pomegranate
Reareth its glory
Of gorgeous blossom;
Where the oleanders
Dream through the noontides;
. . . .
where the heart lies Pale blue in the hollows.
. . . .
Here where the dream-flowers,
The cream-white poppies,
Silently hover
. . . .
Here as the breath, as the soul of this beauty
Moveth in silence, and dreamlike, and slowly,
White as a snowdrift in mountain valleys
Where swiftly upon it the gold light lingers;
. . . .
Moves the white peacock, as tho' through the noontide
A dream of the moonlight were real for a moment.
Dim on the beautiful fan that he spreadeth,
. . . .
Dim on the cream-white are blue adumbrations
. . . .
Pale, pale as the breath of blue smoke in far woodlands.
Here, as the breath, as the soul of this beauty,
Moves the white peacock. W. S. S.

There will be no Symphony Concerts next week wherein Mr. Monteux and the orchestra journey north and west to cities in Canada and cities in New York. The next pair of concerts, then, will befall on Nov. 17 and 18, and for them the conductor proposes a Suite of Bach in D major; "Polyphemus," a tone-poem by the "new Italian" composer, Davico; and "The Divine Poem" of Skriabin, the ecstatic Russian. "Polyphemus" presumably harks back to the one-eyed monster of Greek myth and verse, lingering, perhaps, over the like-named play by the Parisian poet, Albert Samain. A rhapsodic piece by Davico was once played at a concert of the Boston Musical Association, but so cloudily that it yielded no notion of the composer. With that exception, he is newcomer hereabouts. Not since Mr. Fiedler's day, moreover, has any of the symphonies of Skriabin been heard in Boston. He chose "The Poem of Ecstasy." Mr. Monteux prefers "The Divine Poem."

TRANS. NOV. 2.

The program book of the Symphony concerts last week said that one of the movements in Saint-Saens's "Animals' Carnival," to be played tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, was entitled, "The Buckoo in the Depth of the Forest." As this "Carnival" is said to be a humorous piece, many undoubtedly thought that the "Buckoo" was an animal invented by Saint-Saens, to be classed with the "Whimbamper" and the great "Gyascutus." For "Buckoo" read "Cuckoo."

This "Animals' Carnival" will be worth hearing. (Among the animals are "Pianists." So will two little pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes: "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," inspired by poems of William Sharp. They were originally two of the four piano pieces entitled "Roman Sketches." "The White Peacock" was given here last March, mimed at the Shubert Theatre by Enid Brunova at an entertainment for the music school at Rheims.

HERALD - NOV. 2.

4TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Audience Finds Saint-Saens's Mood in "Animals' Carnival" Contagious

UNFAMILIAR PIECE BY GRIFFES PLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Griffes, Clouds and The White Peacock (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saeens, the Animals' Carnival (first time in Boston); Glazounov, Stenka Razin, Symphnoic poem.

Griffes, whose untimely death was a serious loss to American art and probably to the whole world of music, wrote a set of four piano pieces entitled "Roman Sketches." They were inspired by poems of William Sharp. "Clouds" was played for the first time in the orchestral version at Philadelphia in 1919. "The White Peacock," also orchestrated, was first performed at the Rivoli Theatre, New York, with stage setting and action. It was seen here at the Shubert Theatre in March of this year, when Enid Brunova mimed the peacock at an entertainment for the rebuilding of the Municipal School of Music at Rheims. The music as a piano piece had been played here before.

Sharp, better known as "Fiona Mac leod" saw near Rome clouds that suggested to him a city "with spires and gested to him a city "with spires of amber and golden domes, wide streets of [illegible] for [illegible] the [illegible] which did not [illegible] express stately mot[illegible]

But "The White Peaco[illegible] poetic music, free from any [illegible] absurd attempt at realism, bringing [illegible] the hearer the thought of the sunli[illegible] garden richly flowered with the cre[illegible] white peacock, the soul of this [illegible] Now was it seriously disturbin[illegible] sight in this garden for a moment [illegible] Debussy's Faun and hear the [illegible] his flute. Beautiful music [illegible] ranked with the [illegible] Dome of Kubla Khan."

Saint-Saens, a man of wit and iron[illegible] wrote his "Carnival of Animals: a Grand Zoological Fantasia" as a joke for a Mardi-Gras concert of Lebouc, a violoncellist. That was in 1886. Played in a semi-private fashion several times, the Suite was not published as a whole [illegible] this year, for permision was granted [illegible] Saint-Saens in his will. "The Swan," however, was published in 1887 and has been made familiar in concert halls and by the dance of Anna Pavlowa.

For once the Symphony audience laughed not at a composer, but with a composer. Deliberately funny music is as a rule about as humorous as a railway accident. Many a "Humoreske" is funereal. Saint-Saens was too clever to fall into a trap. Here is music that is amusing, witty, and without the assistance of words. The lion roars, the barnyard is vocal, tortoises moved to the can-can from Offenbach's "Orpheus" played at a slow pace; pianists are among the animals, practising their exercises; in "Fossils" Saint-Saens does not spare himself; the unwieldy elephant "to make them mirth us'd all his might and wreath'd his lithe proboscis"; kangaroos leap and donkeys bray. By the side of this musical jesting are the charming Aquarium, the "Aviary" (with the flute brilliantly played by Mr. Laurent) and "The Swan."

The performance was characterized by what Hazlitt would have called gusto. Mr. Kunze played the double bass in "The Elephant" as seriously as if the music were by Johannes Brahms; the pianists, Messrs. De Voto and Stevens, having no easy task, were wholly adequate, and Mr. Bedetti played the Swan's song with adorable simplicity, beauty of tone and feeling.

Does some one say: "But such music is beneath the dignity of a Symphony concert?" Go to; pish; likewise piffle. We take our music too seriously. Does one always wish it to be "educational"? Trying to solve problems, to put philosophical theories into music, to be psychical? There are many rooms in the great temple of the muse. One of the chambers is a banqueting hall. There is room there for Offenbach, for Johann Strauss, for the Sullivan of the operettas.

It is a pleasure to find Saint-Saens, unbuttoned and in a jocose mood. Let us remember the saying in the "Deipnosophists" of Athenaeus: "Music softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness, and produces affability and a sort of gentlemanlike joy."

The joy of Saint-Saens in "The Animals' Carnival" is gentlemanlike. And his joy yesterday was contagious.

A most interesting concert, with its impressive performance of Brahms's Symphony, a performance distinguished by clarity, emotional expression,—and in this symphony Brahms is now tender and contemplative, now rugged, austere, granitic—and by episodic treatment free from undue attention to the less essential measures.

No doubt Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" is to be preferred to many of his later academic reminiscent and laborious works. In this early composition he is more pictorial, more dramatic. An uneven symphonic poem, most effective when he portrays the river Volga using the famous song of the bargemen; elsewhere not without scrappy and futile measures in spite of the rush and the din.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts at Montreal, Toronto and certain cities of New York state next week. The program of the concerts in Boston on Nov. 17, 18, will be as follows: Bach, Suite in D major, No. 3, for orchestra; DaVico, "Polyphemus," symphonic poem (first time here); d'Indy, Symphony No. 2, B flat.

HERALD - NOV. 4.

HUMOROUS MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Saint-Saens "Animals' Carnival" Well Liked

BY OLIN DOWNES

The amusing work of Saint-Saens, "The Animals' Carnival," was a leading novelty of the fourth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. A veritable Noah's ark procession issued from the instruments: The "Ro[illegible] March of the Lion," "Cocks [illegible] Hens"; "Horses of Tart[illegible] animals); "Tortoises," [illegible] phant," "K[illegible]

[illegible] using the two bands of strings and solo players so as to produce contrasting, fine and beautiful effects. It is truly devotional music, needing no words to incite "contemplation of the first composer"; devotional, but not dull, not disfigured by the sentimental passages which too often are found in modern English music for the church. Yet the Fantasia would be still more impressive if it were a little shorter. M. Jean-Aubry has well said in his "Music and the Nations" that the general tendency of English music is to be too long. "It has allowed itself to be inoculated with wholly debatable ideas concerning development." This is true even of the romantic and poetic Arnold Bax. Mr. Monteux with the players gave a superb performance of the Fantasia which was to the glory of the incomparable strings.

Tcherepnin's Concerto was awarded the Beliaiev prize in 1909. In spite of its being a prize composition, it is a virtuoso piece for pianist, orchestra and conductor, bristling with difficulties for all of them. While it abounds in brilliant pages, there are pages of little musical significance, pages of nothing more or less than padding. The more important sections are those that are purely lyrical; these have genuine emotional quality and charm. In them there is melodic individuality. There is occasionally in the more brilliant pages a barbaric wildness that is not displeasing, with instrumentation that is at times peculiar and effective, at other times chiefly singular as in a use of the Glockenspiel with the piano.

The performance was one to be remembered, if only for the triumphant surmounting of difficulties by pianist, conductor and orchestra. It has been well said of Mr. Moiseiwitsch by a foreign critic that he has a pronounced sense of style. That is to say in his case that he grasps and expresses the style of the composer whose music he happens to play. Yesterday his singing of the melodic lines, his exquisite delicacy and fleetness in arabesques, his quiet authority, his musical feeling which gave life to futile measures, and they were not a few, were as remarkable as the vigor and the dash of his bravura. And in his performance he was eloquently supported by Mr. Monteux and the orchestra.

Liszt's Symphonic poem, suggested by Kaulbach's mural painting, wears better than some of Liszt's other works in this field. How modern it is in certain passages! How succeeding composers have profited by him—Wagner especially! There were times yesterday when one thought the "Ride of the Valkyries" was to be played in full. Liszt was at work on "The Battle of the Huns" early in 1857. "The Valkyrie" was completed in 1856. Did the musical idea of strange doings in the air occur to both composers about the same time? The typical rhythmic figure? The spirited performance brought an end to a most interesting concert.

The performance will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week comprises Brahms's Fourth Symphony; "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," by Griffes (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saens's "Animal's Carnival" (first time in Boston), and Glazounov's Symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

HERALD-Oct.28

Symphony Programme

At the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in Boston the posthumous score of the late French composer, Saint-Saens, "Carnival of the Animals." This burlesque of the menagerie and the piano virtuoso is familiar to Mr. Monteux, in that he played viola in one of the two string quartets in its early performance under the composer at the semi-private Parisian society, "The Trumpet." The following appear successively in the score; Lion, chickens, turtles, elephant, kangaroo, cuckoo and birds of the air, aquarium, "persons with long ears," pianists, fossils and the swan. The piano parts will be taken by Alfred deVoto and Richard E. Stevens.

Another interesting number will be "Clouds," and "The White Peacock," two short descriptive pieces by Charles T. Griffes, the late American composer, whose "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" has been notably performed at these concerts.

The symphony will be the fourth of Brahms in E minor, and the closing number Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razine," which is based on Russian folk tunes.

Critics Who Are Late

The rule at the Symphony concerts is now quite rigidly followed, that if a symphony in four movements opens a programme there will be a chance for late arrivals to gain their seats between the first and the second movement, but not between any of the other movements of the symphony, during which the doors will be kept closed. It is a good rule, for everybody but reviewers who arrive late and have to listen through cracks in the door or jiu-jitsu an usher, shake him until his teeth rattle and, bellowing critical indignation at this insult to their rank, jam their way into the perturbed auditorium.

POST-Oct.29.

PENSION FUND

A concert with a program entirely of Russian music will be given in Symphony hall on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, at 3:30. The proceeds will be given to the pension fund for retired musicians of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Mr. Monteux has chosen a program of unusual interest for the occasion, to be headed by Rimsky-Korsakov's famous symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." The rhythmic and barbaric Polovtsian dances from Borodin's "Prince Igor" will be played, also Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," with its use of the Volga Bargemen's Song. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

The interest will be further enhanced by the appearance of Mme. Oda Slobodskaja, who will sing Russian operatic arias with the orchestra. Mme. Slobodskaja is a recent [illegible] to America. She took leading roles at the Imperial Opera at Petrograd until only 10 months ago. She is already known in Boston by her recent appearance with the Ukrainian chorus.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the fourth pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux will conduct for the first time in Boston Saint-Saens' "Carnival of Animals." This burlesque of the menagerie and the piano virtuoso is familiar to Mr. Monteux in that he played viola in one of the two string quartets in an early performance under the composer at the semi-private Parisian society "The Trumpet." The following appear successively in the score: Lion, cocks and hens, tortoises, elephant, kangaroos, cuckoo and birds of the air, aquarium, "persons with long ears," pianists, fossils and the swan. The piano parts will be taken by Alfred deVoto and Richard E. Stevens. "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," two short descriptive pieces by Charles T. Griffes, will be played. The symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms in E minor; the closing number, Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

HERALD-Oct.29.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteux will conduct for the first time in Boston the posthumous score of the late French composer, Saint-Saens, "Carnival of the Animals," a burlesque of the managerie. The piano parts will be taken by Alfred deVoto and Richard E. Stevens. "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," two short descriptive pieces by Charles T. Griffes; the Brahms Symphony in E minor and Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," are the other numbers.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A concert with a program of Russian numbers will be given in Symphony Hall, Sunday afternoon, November 12, for the Boston Symphony Orchestra pension fund. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" suite, the Polovtsian Dances from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor," Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razine," and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture are the numbers chosen by Pierre Monteux. Oda Slobodskaja, Russian prima donna, will sing operatic arias with the orchestra.

ADVTSR-Oct.29

Friday at 2:30 and Saturday at 8:15. Boston Symphony Orchestra, fourth program. Fourth Symphony, Brahms; "Carnival of the Animals," Saint-Saëns; "Clouds," and "The White Peacock," Griffes; "Stenka Razine," Glazunov. There will be no soloist.

The Symphony program this week pays deserved tribute to the late Griffes by including two short pieces of his. "The White Peacock" was interpreted last season by the Bolm Ballet at the Shubert Theatre. "Clouds" has not been given in Boston. "Khubla Khan," familiar to the Symphony audience, first proved to this city that Griffes was what a press agent would probably call "the Eugene O'Neill of American music," the one real genius we have produced in this century.

GLOBE-Oct.29

The string-choir of the Symphony Orchestra deserves the praise it is the custom to heap upon it. With tireless pains Mr. Monteux chose and maintains it; while the sixty-three players are as ambitious and diligent as he. For the most part, they are young men advancing, or proved virtuosi in the prime of middle age. They now play with an exceeding unanimity and precision—in the shaping of phrases and the turning of modulations, in rhythmic accent and whatever other stress the composer may ordain. As one, moreover, go the quality and the balance of their tone. The basses are firm and rich; the violoncellos vibrate darkly and songfully; the violas have gained in characteristic color; the second violins have individuality and do not merely "fill in" a pattern; the first shimmer or stride at conductor's and composer's will. More than any other division of the orchestra this string-choir is Mr. Monteux's handiwork. It vies now with the wood-winds. both steadily praise him.

Sixty-three men, however, are sixty-three men. Playing upon stringed instruments, they produce no small body of tone. The sixty-three and the conductor, guiding and swaying them, are also human. Therefore they are not unconscious of their present virtue or unwilling to display it. Consequently, more than once through the six concerts of the current season, they have tended to be over-emphatic and insistent; to press against the whole orchestral balance with too large and firm a weight of tone; to blur and coarsen measures wherein they should have been limpid of voice and fine-cut of line. They were so in the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" at the first pair of concerts. At the second, they did not altogether escape this pitfall in Dvořák's pretty, simple Symphony. Once and again, last week, though reduced in numbers, they overdid Mozart's Symphony in E-flat. With reason the conductor and the string-players cultivate weight and power. Often enough, as in "Zarathustra," the composer demands such abilities. Yet to measure weight and to control power is crown to the gaining thereof. Too frequently of late Mr. Monteux and the sixty-three have erred in an excess of zeal. Every string-choir should have supple vigors at command. It is not necessary also to be muscular.

H. T. P.

TRANS-Oct.30.

[18]

MUSIC HERE

NOVEL PIECES: OTHER PLEASING PROSPECTS

Saint-Saens's Menagerie and Fine-Grained Tone-Poems by Griffes at the Symphony Concert Tomorrow—Belioz Fashionable as Well as Fantastic—Skriabin, According to Monteux—Enter Isa Kremer—A New Piece by Mr. Chadwick—Resurrecting Spohr

To many who are wholly or largely ignorant of the bulk of his music, Camille Saint-Saëns is known as the composer of two alluring melodies—the aria "Mon Cœur s'Ouvre à Ta Voix" from "Samson and Delilah and the flowing tune and undulating accompaniment known as "The Swan." Originally written for the violoncello, the latter piece has been transferred to the violin, transcribed for the piano, and subjected to various arrangings. In most editions the title is supplemented by the information that "The Swan" is an "extract" from "The Carnival of Animals." But familiar as the swan itself had become, the other animals were never made known to us. Here follows the explanation.

In February, 1886, Saint-Saëns wrote a "Grand Zoölogical Fantasy," this same "Carnival of Animals," largely humorous in character, to be played as a surprise at the annual Mardi-Gras concert of one Lebouc, a violoncellist. A few days later the Fantasy was repeated. Learning of it as he passed through Paris, Liszt requested and received a private hearing. For several years Saint-Saëns permitted performances under special conditions; then finally forbade them altogether. Fortunately a clause in his will provided for the lifting of the ban and the publication of the "Carnival." Henceforth and anywhere it may now be heard without restriction. Lately brought to performance in New York by Mr. Damrosch's orchestra, Mr. Monteux and our own band will reveal it to Bostonian ears tomorrow and Saturday. The score of the curious composition calls for two pianos, flute, clarinet, harmonica, xylophone, two violins, violas, violoncello and double-bass. For the harmonica—a device of musical glasses now obsolete—the celesta furnishes excellent substitute, and here as in New York, the full string-band will play the parts assigned to the quintet.

Set on the printed programme the fourteen divisions of the "Carnival" present a formidable appearance, but most of them are extremely brief. By way of introduction comes a "Royal March of the Lion," for the two pianos and the strings. From time to time in the pompous march are chromatic scales that roar appropriately. The next section, "Hens and Roosters," for clarinet, piano, violins and violas, reveals musical procedures familiar since the days of Daquin and his "Cockoo." Number three, "Wild Asses" ("Swift Animals," as the composer terms them), is no more than a series of exceedingly rapid scale passages for the two pianists. In the fourth piece, "Turtles," the lively tune that concludes the Overture to Offenbach's "Orphée aux Enfers" is played with great deliberation by all the strings in their lower register, against repeated chords for the piano. To characterize The Elephant (number five), a solo double-bass plays as part of a lengthy arioso a few bars of the "Waltz of the Sylphs" from Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," and later a few measures of the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." A piano provides the sole accompaniment. Through staccato chords for the piano Saint-Saëns suggests the hopping and posing of Kangaroos (number six). And the ensuing piece, by title "Aquarium," suggestive both of waters and of the creatures that swim therein, falls to the flute, celesta, pianos and strings, without basses. To first and second violins, who bray in high-pitched harmonies descending to prolonged tones on the G string, is assigned the portrayal of the eighth species, "The Gentlemen with Long Ears." Number nine, "The Cuckoo in the Woods," consists of faint calls from a clarinet behind the scenes, sounding through soft chords for the piano. Birds in general are suggested in the tenth piece, "Aviary," by dizzy scales for the flute, the pianos and strings accompanying.

Among the "animals" Saint-Saëns included pianists, and number eleven is a farcical parody on the practice-hour. The two pianists play, "in the clumsy fashion of a beginner," five-finger exercises, ascending by semi-tones, and similar contrivances, absurdly punctuated and reënforced by the rest of the orchestra. In the twelfth piece, "Fossils," the composer displays tunes of which he is weary—the xylophone-tune from his own "Danse Macabre," several old French songs ("J'ai du Bon Tabac," "Ah! Vous Dirai-je Maman," "Partant pour la Syrie" and "Au Clair de la Lune"), and the air, "Una Voce Poco Fa" from Rossini's "Barber of Seville." The thrice familiar melody of The Swan, number thirteen, is of course played by a solo 'cello, both pianos providing the waves on which it swims and sings. In the fourteenth and final number all the instruments are for the first time heard together; most of the animals reappear, and the Long-Eared Gentlemen—thought by some to be the reviewers—have the final word. W. S. S.

Griffes's Miniatures

Very different from these pranks and fancies are the other "novelties" of this week's programme—two highly imaginative pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock." Originally written for the piano, both of these have been thus heard here, and "The White Peacock" was mimed, with the accompaniment of small orchestra, in Mr. Bolm's matinée at the Shubert Theatre last spring. The instrumentation for full orchestra is from the composer's own hand and it should enhance the poetic and pictorial quality of his music. Poems by William Sharp, herewith reproduced, served him for inspiration, and they should prove sufficient clue to the content of the music.

CLOUDS

Mountainous glories,
[illegible]
The golden domes
Are sunk in the valleys
Of fathomless snows.

THE WHITE PEACOCK

Here where the sunlight
Floodeth the garden,
Where the pomegranate
Reareth its glory
Of gorgeous blossom;
Where the oleanders
Dream through the noontides;

. . . . . .

. . . where the heart lies
Pale blue in the hollows,

. . . . . .

Here where the dream-flowers,
The cream-white poppies,
Silently hover

. . . . . .

Here as the breath, as the soul of this beauty
Moveth in silence, and dreamlike, and slowly,
White as a snowdrift in mountain valleys
Where swiftly upon it the gold light lingers;

. . . . . .

Moves the white peacock, as tho' through the noontide
A dream of the moonlight were real for a moment.
Dim on the beautiful fan that he spreadeth,

. . . . . .

Dim on the cream-white are blue adumbrations

. . . . . .

Pale, pale as the breath of blue smoke in far woodlands,
Here, as the breath, as the soul of this beauty,
Moves the white peacock. W. S. S.

There will be no Symphony Concerts next week wherein Mr. Monteux and the orchestra journey north and west to cities in Canada and cities in New York. The next pair of concerts, then, will befall on Nov. 17 and 18, and for them the conductor proposes a Suite of Bach in D major; "Polyphemus," a tone-poem by the "new Italian" composer, Davico; and "The Divine Poem" of Skriabin, the ecstatic Russian. "Polyphemus" presumably harks back to the one-eyed monster of Greek myth and verse, lingering, perhaps, over the like-named play by the Parisian poet, Albert Samain. A rhapsodic piece by Davico was once played at a concert of the Boston Musical Association, but so cloudily that it yielded no notion of the composer. With that exception, he is newcomer hereabouts. Not since Mr. Fiedler's day, moreover, has any of the symphonies of Skriabin been heard in Boston. He chose "The Poem of Ecstasy." Mr. Monteux prefers "The Divine Poem."

TRANS. NOV. 2.

The program book of the Symphony concerts last week said that one of the movements in Saint-Saens's "Animals' Carnival," to be played tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening, was entitled, "The Buckoo in the Depth of the Forest." As this "Carnival" is said to be a humorous piece, many undoubtedly thought that the "Buckoo" was an animal invented by Saint-Saens, to be classed with the "Whimbamper" and the great "Gyascutus." For "Buckoo" read "Cuckoo."

This "Animals' Carnival" will be worth hearing. (Among the animals are "Pianists." So will two little pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes: "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," inspired by poems of William Sharp. They were originally two of the four piano pieces entitled "Roman Sketches," "The White Peacock" was given here last March, mimed at the Shubert Theatre by Enid Brunova at an entertainment for the music school at Rheims.

HERALD-NOV.2.

4TH CONCERT BY SYMPHONY

Audience Finds Saint-Saens's Mood in "Animals' Carnival" Contagious

UNFAMILIAR PIECE BY GRIFFES PLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4; Griffes, Clouds and The White Peacock (first time at these concerts); Saint-Saeens, the Animals' Carnival (first time in Boston); Glazounov, Stenka Razin, Symphnoic poem.

Griffes, whose untimely death was a serious loss to American art and probably to the whole world of music, wrote a set of four piano pieces entitled "Roman Sketches." They were inspired by poems of William Sharp. "Clouds" was played for the first time in the orchestral version at Philadelphia in 1919. "The White Peacock," also orchestrated, was first performed at the Rivoli Theatre, New York, with stage setting and action. It was seen here at the Shubert Theatre in March of this year, when Enid Brunova mimed the peacock at an entertainment for the rebuilding of the Municipal School of Music at Rheims. The music as a piano piece had been played here before.

Sharp, better known as "Fiona Macleod" saw near Rome clouds that suggested to him a city "with spires and gested to him a city "with spires of amber and golden domes, wide streets of topaz and amethyst ways"; mountainous glories moving superbly and crumbling [illegible] would be difficult for [illegible] this vision [illegible] that Griffes in [illegible] the well-nigh im[illegible] of dissonances [illegible] the hearer's [illegible] pathy for the poet [illegible] for it was hard to find a reason [illegible] the employment of these dissonances which did not give gorgeous coloring [illegible] express stately motion and fading [illegible]

But "The White Peacock" is beautiful poetic music, free from any anxious and absurd attempt at realism, bringing to the hearer the thought of the sunlit garden richly flowered with the cream-white peacock, the soul of this beauty. Now was it seriously disturbing to catch sight in this garden for a moment of Debussy's Faun and hear the echo of his flute. Beautiful music, worthy to be ranked with the composer's "Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan."

Saint-Saens, a man of wit and irony, wrote his "Carnival of Animals: a Grand Zoological Fantasia" as a joke for a Mardi-Gras concert of Lebouc, a violoncellist. That was in 1886. Played in a semi-private fashion several times, the Suite was not published as a whole till this year, for permision was granted by Saint-Saens in his will. "The Swan," however, was published in 1887 and has been made familiar in concert halls and by the dance of Anna Pavlowa.

For once the Symphony audience laughed not at a composer, but with a composer. Deliberately funny music is as a rule about as humorous as a railway accident. Many a "Humoreske" is funereal. Saint-Saens was too clever to fall into a trap. Here is music that is amusing, witty, and without the assistance of words. The lion roars, the barnyard is vocal, tortoises moved to the can-can from Offenbach's "Orpheus" played at a slow pace; pianists are among the animals, practising their exercises; in "Fossils" Saint-Saens does not spare himself; the unwieldy elephant "to make them mirth us'd all his might and wreath'd his lithe proboscis"; kangaroos leap and donkeys bray. By the side of this musical jesting are the charming Aquarium, the "Aviary" (with the flute brilliantly played by Mr. Laurent) and "The Swan."

The performance was characterized by what Hazlitt would have called gusto. Mr. Kunze played the double bass in "The Elephant" as seriously as if the music were by Johannes Brahms; the pianists, Messrs. De Voto and Stevens, having no easy task, were wholly adequate, and Mr. Bedetti played the Swan's song with adorable simplicity, beauty of tone and feeling.

Does some one say: "But such music is beneath the dignity of a Symphony concert?" Go to; pish; likewise piffle. We take our music too seriously. Does one always wish it to be "educational"? Trying to solve problems, to put philosophical theories into music, to be psychical? There are many rooms in the great temple of the muse. One of the chambers is a banqueting hall. There is room there for Offenbach, for Johann Strauss, for the Sullivan of the operettas.

It is a pleasure to find Saint-Saens, unbuttoned and in a jocose mood. Let us remember the saying in the "Deipnosophists" of Athenaeus: "Music softens moroseness of temper; for it dissipates sadness, and produces affability and a sort of gentlemanlike joy."

The joy of Saint-Saens in "The Animals' Carnival" is gentlemanlike. And his joy yesterday was contagious.

A most interesting concert, with its impressive performance of Brahms's Symphony, a performance distinguished by clarity, emotional expression,—and in this symphony Brahms is now tender and contemplative, now rugged, austere, granitic—and by episodic treatment free from undue attention to the less essential measures.

No doubt Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" is to be preferred to many of his later academic reminiscent and laborious works. In this early composition he is more pictorial, more dramatic. An uneven symphonic poem, most effective when he portrays the river Volga using the famous song of the bargemen; elsewhere not without scrappy and futile measures in spite of the rush and the din.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts at Montreal, Toronto and certain cities of New York state next week. The program of the concerts in Boston on Nov. 17, 18, will be as follows: Bach, Suite in D major, No. 3, for orchestra; DaVico, "Polyphemus," symphonic poem (first time here); d'Indy, Symphony No. 2, B flat.

HERALD-NOV.4.

HUMOROUS MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Saint-Saens "Animals' Carnival" Well Liked

BY OLIN DOWNES

The amusing work of Saint-Saens, "The Animals' Carnival," was a leading novelty of the fourth programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. A veritable Noah's ark procession issues from the instruments: The "Royal March of the Lion," "Cocks and Hens", "Horses of Tartary" (fleet animals); "Tortoises," "The Elephant," "Kangaroos," "Aquarium," "Persons [illegible] Cuckoo in the Depth of the Forest," "Aviary," "Pianists," "Fossils," "The Swan"—and a grand finale, in which the lion roars, the hens cackle and roosters crow, the horses again gallop wildly up the scale, the kangaroos leap about, and the "people with long ears" insist once more on being heard. With those and other reminiscences of the preceding musical tableaux the witty and ingenius series of little pieces comes to an end. The audience frequently laughed aloud. It is not often that a joke 36 years old has as much freshness and real, unexaggerated humor for the rising generation.

LOCKED UP SINCE 1886

"The Swan" is the one fragment of the "Animals' Carnival" which everybody knows and its performance on the solo 'cello by Mr. Bedetti brought a tumult of applause. It is indeed the musical climax of the series. But he was not the only soloist to triumph, as witness Mr. Max Kunze, solo double-bass, who took the orchestral role of the Elephant, and Mr. Georges Laurent, solo flute in "The Aquarium." These pieces Saint-Saens, in his 51st year, wrote in playful vein for the Mardi Gras concert of the 'cellist Lebouc. They were later performed by and before the famous composers' society, "La Trompetta," a performance in which Mr. Monteux took part as a viola player—in Paris, in the same year of 1886. And then Saint-Saens locked up this little "jeux d'esprit" for small orchestra, and only permitted its publication in his will.

This is real Gallic laughter. Always the musical jokes have point and esprit, and a very few measures make an astonishing effect. There is also the ingenious parodying of well known airs, such as the lumbering of the tortoises, to the air, very deep down and in ponderous tempo, of the "can-can," that gay, lively and indecent dance of the finale of Offenbach's music to "Orphee!" In the piece "Fossils," there is humorous reference to a number of airs such as "J'ai du bon tabac," and "Ah, vous dirai-je Maman," an air of Rosina from the "Barber of Seville" and a passing reference to material of Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre."

No wonder the pianists are classed as "animals!" They set off on a five-finger exercise a la Czerny, the orchestra whacking out a modulatory chord now and again, which does not silence these indefatigable "pianists," but only causes them to repeat their exercises a half tone higher up the scale. And here a word should be said for the admirable virtuosity of the two officiating pianists, Alfred de Voto and Richard E. Stevens. In "the Aquarium" are charming tints of tone-color. The Cuckoo harps on his eternal question, on the same notes, variously harmonized by other orchestral instruments than the clarinet. And the cackling of the hens! In all this Saint-Saens excels. What, indeed, is his principal shortcoming as composer of grand operas or symphonies? That, writing serious music, he was never able to take himself sufficiently seriously.

Pieces by Griffes

Other novelties were two compositions by Charles Tomlinson Griffes. "Clouds" and "The White Peacock." Both compositions show strongly the influence of Debussy, and the relation between Debussy's "Nuages" and the first piece of Griffes is too obvious to be ignored. "Peacocks" is a little more pungent, harmonically, and has perhaps the more substance of the two compositions. Neither of them shows an original composer. That is their tragedy and the tragedy of Griffes, a musician of exceptional sensitiveness and promise, who died two years ago, at the age of 36, before he had found himself. A tragedy, indeed. Because, if he shows nothing else in this music, he shows a sensibility to color and nuance in a degree not shown by any other American composer.

The concert opened with the E minor symphony of Brahms, for us one of the most beautiful of all symphonies, a very flower of the composer's genius. And this was the finest performance of Brahms we ever heard Mr. Monteux give: It had the ruggedness and at the same time the contemplative beauty of Brahms' latest period. It is music purged of earthly dross—beauty that uplifts because of its selfless beauty. And the "passacaglia" continually grows on one. There, indeed, is a movement sufficient to immortalize Brahms if it were the only symphonic movement he ever wrote.

The performance of Stenka Razin, the symphonic poem inspired by the barbaric tale of the Russian pirate, who conquered at last by his enemies, flung the Circassian princess that he loved as tribute into the great river and fell in the battle—this performance was very brilliant and had when the composer made it possible the note of hugeness, savagery and splendor. But it is only now and again that Glazounoff, in this composition of his youth really strikes that note, as in the impressive invocation to the river, in moments of development too episodic to be very strong, and in the sonorous peroration, when the ancient song of the Volga boatmen is flung out with all the power of the orchestra. This was the end of an uncommonly varied and interesting programme, and a concert full of achievements by the orchestra.

POST NOV. 4.

HUMOROUS HIT AT SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS

Even Symphony audiences are human.

Back of all the make-believe that enables highbrows to sit in hushed awe as the orchestra endeavors—in vain, of course—to picture a white peacock spreading his tail lurks the telltale laugh.

It is only once in long years that the laugh is hear, but it was heard yesterday when the orchestra imitated roosters and hens, the donkey's he-haw, the lion's roar and the child pianist hard at work practising scales. All this fun, and much more, came in the Saint Saens novelty, "The Animals' Carnival," played here for the first time.

The funniest part of the "Carnival" was the piano practise movement, with Alfred DeVoto and Richard E. Stevens as soloists. It was almost heartily enjoyed. From a Symphony standpoint, you might say the greeting was uproarious.

Max Kunze's double-bass solo in the playful "Elephant" movement and Georges Laurent's pyrotechnic flute playing in the "Aquarium" pictures were also applauded: but the warmest applause rewarded Jean Bedetti for his charming cello solo in "The Swan" number—a familiar extract from the "Carnival," to which Pavlowa and others have often danced. That "Swan" movement has classic beauty.

C. T. Griffes' two tone pictures, "The Clouds" and "The White Peacock," were also played for the first time at Symphony concerts. "The Clouds" is delightful, in the Debussy manner; a happy translation of William Sharp's imaginative poem. The other piece left too much to the imagination.

Brahm's E minor symphony and Glazounov's tone poem, "Stenka Razin," are also on the program, which will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-NOV. 4.

GRIFFES' MUSIC PLEASES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Good-humored laughter is about the last thing one expects to hear from an audience during a Boston Symphony concert, though agonized chuckles have occasionally been evoked in the past by such startling musical novelties as Schoenberg's "Five Orchestral Pieces" or Milhaud's Suite. Yesterday afternoon, however, "The Carnival of the Animals," an elaborate and often extremely funny musical joke, arranged by the late Camille Saint-Saens nearly 40 years ago for a private musical party in Paris, reduced some of the audience to tears of mirth.

The funniest of the animals were "pianists" who murdered Czerny, and "persons with long ears" who sounded like a good Republican's opinion of the Democratic party. There were also "tortoises" which crawled with ludicrous solemnity through some of the liveliest of Offenbach's gay tunes, "kangaroos" which leaped up and down the piano "putsch, putsch, putsch," to borrow Beethoven's expressive phrase; and, curiously enough, Pavlowa's "Swan."

Mr Bedetti roused great enthusiasm by his beautiful playing of the latter number, but one listener who has always disliked it, wondered from the now revealed context whether Saint-Saens did not have his tongue in his cheek when he composed it. Mr Kunze as the double-bass "elephant", Mr Laurent in the "aquarium" and Messrs De Voto and Stevens, the pianists, executed difficult technical feats with a zest.

The significant musical novelty of the afternoon was not Saint-Saens' clever jest, but two exquisite pieces by the late Charles Tomlinson Griffes, which roused applause more genuine and more prolonged than American music by anyone else has done at these concerts in 15 years. "Clouds" and "The White Peacock" are stamped with the same delicate fastidious, romantic genius that made Griffes' "Khubla Khan" the one unmistakable American masterpiece of recent seasons. This music is no mere academic exercise in classicism or modernism, it stirs the performer's and the listener's imagination. Griffes' music is being more and more often played in public, but one wishes for still more of it.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony was given a performance which showed Mr Monteux at his patient best as an endeavorer to assimilate music temperamentally antipathetic to him. He did not avoid making it clumsy in style, but the fault was partly Brahms'. There was cordial applause after each movement.

Glazunov's "Stenka Razin," a heavy handed attempt to copy Rimsky Korsakov, incidentally gave away to one listener the fact that the composer of "Scheherezade" had after all a formula for composition easier to borrow than the sonata form of Beethoven, which Brahms has used with so great and toilful skill. A few good tunes, a lot of orchestral color, and much rhythmic energy are all Rimsky needed to work his miracles, which somehow on closer acquaintance begin to seem less miraculous than they did.

There are no concerts next week. For Nov 17 and 18 a Bach suite, an Italian novelty by Davico, and Skriabin's "The Divine Poem," too long unheard here, are the numbers announced.

GLOBE- NOV. 4.

Fourth Program of the Boston Symphony

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Brahms, Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.
Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."
Saint-Saëns, "The Animals' Carnival."
Glazounoff, Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin," Op. 13.

The Saint-Saëns number was played for the first time in Boston and the Griffes pieces for the first time at these concerts.

"The Animals' Carnival" was in diverting contrast to the usual run of symphony concert offerings. Composed in 1886 for the private delectation of musicians and published in full only in the present year, it is a surpassing example of that kind of musical jesting with which only the most gifted composers can afford to experiment. The fact that Saint-Saëns would not permit the publication of this music during his life may seem to indicate that he himself was doubtful of its effect on his dignity as an artist. Yet the Boston audience, like those of Philadelphia and New York which recently heard it from Mr. Damrosch, gave itself unreservedly to the fun. In the sections devoted to the lion, cocks and hens, "Persons with long ears," and birds of the air, Saint-Saëns resorts to what is generally considered the lowest form of musical expression, imitation of sounds; yet he does it so delicately that there is no thought of an offense against taste. Everybody on the platform as well as in the audience was at the broad grin. There can hardly be great originality of treatment of the cries of birds. The call of the cuckoo in music preceded the writing of scores. The hen furnished a theme not only to Rameau but to Walter before him. Yet Saint-Saëns makes them amusing. The more imaginative representations, as of tortoises and kangaroos, by tempo and rhythm, are equally effective. Mr. Laurent's exquisite flute tones were the bubbling path of swift-darting fish in "The Aquarium." And Mr. Bedetti's cello revealed that "The Swan," the only one of the 14 sections hitherto generally known, is still beautiful when not bedeviled.

Griffes' tone-poems confirmed the excellent impression of the composer's powers left by his "Kubla Khan," of which, by the way, "The White Peacock" was reminiscent. By atmosphere, color and melodic line the composer suggests William Sharp's City of Cloud, and the progress of the peacock through a sun-bathed garden. These pieces were given cordial welcome.

But why was not the response to the splendid performance of Brahms' last symphony more understanding? Is it because people have heard so often that this is the last word of the most intellectual of composers on the symphonic form that they cannot perceive its qualities? True that the symphony is intellectual in the intricate and varied handling of its material; but true also that it is conspicuous for charm of melody, richness of design and stirring pulse of rhythm. When it is played as it was yesterday, there can be only one explanation of the fact that the applause was sufficient to recall the conductor only once; the hearers must have been listening, not to the music, but to the inward voice of prejudice.

MONTR- NOV. 4.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, following the orchestra's annual tour, which will include appearances in Montreal, Toronto and cities of the West. The fifth Boston program will include Bach's D major Suite (the one including the air for G string); the Symphonic Poem, "Polifermo," by Davico, and the Third Symphony of Scriabin, "The Divine Poem."

PENSION FUND

Next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, in Symphony hall, at 3:30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concert for the pension fund of its retired members. Mr. Monteux has compiled a Russian program of absorbing interest. The principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakovs "Scheherazade." Mme. Oda Slobodskaja, prima donna of the Petrograd Grand Opera Company, who appeared in Boston with the Ukrainian chorus, has offered to appear as soloist at this concert. She will sing Lisa's aria from "Pique Dame" and Jaroslavna's aria from "Prince Igor." The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Glazounov's "Stenka Razin," and, to close, Tchaikovsky's thunderous piece, the "1812" Overture.

HERALD NOV 5.

PENSION FUND PROGRAMME

Slobodskaja, Soloist

Next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, in Symphony Hall at 3:30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its customary concert, the proceeds to be added to the pension fund of its retired members.

Mr. Monteux has compiled a Russian programme of absorbing interest for this occasion. The principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's masterpiece, "Scheherazade," one of the most brilliant and gorgeously colorful scores ever written.

Mme. Oda Slobodskaja, the prima donna of the Petrograd Grand Opera Company, who has appeared in Boston with the Ukrainian Chorus, has offered to appear as soloist at this concert. She will sing the Lisa aria from Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame," and the Jaroslavna Aria from Borodini's "Prince Igor."

The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Glozounov's "Stenka Razin," a symphonic poem based on Russian folk-themes, and to close Tschaikovsky's thunderous battle piece the "1812" Overture.

Fifth Symphony

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening following the orchestra's annual tour, which is to include appearances in Montreal, Toronto, and cities of the West.

The fifth Boston programme will include Bach's D major Suite (the one including the air for G string); the Symphonic Poem, "Polifermo," by Davico, the Italian composer; and will close with the third symphony of Scriabin, "The Divine Poem," considered one of the foremost achievements of the recent Russian school, and hitherto unheard in Boston.

POST- NOV. 5

Russian Program Nov 12 By Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, exactly as heard at its regular series of concerts, for which tickets are not always procurable, will give a program of Russian music next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting. The proceeds of this concert go to the fund for pensioning retired members of the orchestra. Oda Slobodskaja, the Russian soprano, recently heard here as soloist with the Ukrainian Chorus, will sing arias from Tchaikovsky's opera, "The Queen of Spades," from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

The orchestra will play two of the best-known and best-liked Russian masterpieces, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," and Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture." It also offers less familiar but attractive numbers by Borodin and Glazunov. Those who wish to hear the orchestra but once or twice a year have now their best chance to get seats.

Fifth Symphony Program

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall will take place a week from Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, following the orchestra's annual tour, which is to include appearances in Montreal, Toronto and cities of the West.

The fifth Boston program will include Bach's D major suite (the one including the air for G string); the symphonic poem, "Polifermo," by Davico, the modernist Italian composer, and will close with the third symphony of Scriabin, "The Divine Poem," considered one of the foremost achievements of the recent Russian school, hitherto unheard in Boston.

GLOBE- NOV. 5.

PENSION FUND PROGRAM

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphonq Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pension fund concert, with a Russian program featuring Rimsky-Korsakov's masterpiece, the "Scheherazade" suite. Mme. Oda Slobodskaja, prima donna of the Petrograd Opera Company, will sing the Lisa aria from Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame," and the Jaroslana aria from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Glozounov's "Stenka Razin" and Tschaikovsky's "1812" overture will be the other features.

ADVTSR. NOV. 5.

Concerning the Boston Symphony

The present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to include five concerts in Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 10, is already well under way in Boston, where the orchestra has been playing weekly in Symphony Hall since Oct. 13. The orchestra has also given concerts elsewhere and during the coming week, prior to the first Providence concert, will visit Montreal, Toronto, Rochester, Buffalo, Cornell University and Dartmouth College.

Having spent last summer in Europe in quest of new scores of interest, according to his usual custom, Pierre Monteux has already produced several of them in Boston, notably, Saint-Saens's posthumous burlesque in music, "The Carnival of the Animals," which includes a whole menaggerie in most amusing fashion. In the early production of this score, at the semi-private society, "The Trumpet," in Paris, Mr. Monteux played in one of the two string quartets, while the composer conducted. Other new works that have been played are a Fantasia on an Old English Theme by the English composer, Vaughan Williams; Tcherepnin's Piano Concerto; Theme and Variations by the Italian composer, Bossi, and two short pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."

A [illegible] of unusual interest is promised [illegible] Providence, where also works of the modern schools will be played, although these will yield the first place, as elsewhere, to the established masterpieces of the symphonic repertory.

A splendid list of soloists will further increase the interest of each concert. Frieda Hempel, who will also appear with the orchestra in Boston, is now sailing from Europe to begin her season here. She has recently given a series of concerts in London, where the beauty of her voice and characterizing power immediately distinguished her from any other singer then in England. She has long been the idol of opera and concerts in this country, and her voice is such as to blend beautifully with a symphony orchestra.

The other soprano on the list, Clara Clemens, is purely a concert singer, yet in this field she has won for herself a high distinction and increasing attention in the cities in which she has sung. Her interpretations of songs reveal the cultured artist. Two finer pianists would be hard to find than Harold Bauer and Olga Samaroff, who are also to play in concertos with the orchestra. There will be a violoncello soloist in Jean Bedetti, the leader of that famous section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROV. NOV. 5.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS AT DARTMOUTH

HANOVER, N. H., Nov. 5.—The Boston Symphony orchestra received a large ovation at its concert here tonight in Webster Hall. A capacity throng greeted Conductor Monteau and his musicians. The concert was given under the auspices of the music department of Dartmouth College.

POST- NOV. 6.

MUSIC LOVERS ENTHUSED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Webster Filled When Boston Orchestra Appears and Pleases Audience

OPENS WITH "HEROIC"

Last Night's Program to Be First of Musical Series For This Season

By PROF. M. F. LONGHURST.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, made its first appearance before a Hanover audience in Webster Hall last evening under the auspices of the Department of Music. The hall was filled to capacity by an audience which followed with close attention and marked enthusiasm a program which, in its execution and interpretation, was indeed a tribute to this distinguished group of artists.

From the first crashing chords of the "Heroic" Symphony to the last massive tones of the "Mastersingers" overture the audience was under a spell.

The symphony as interpreted by Mr. Monteux was an artistic triumph. The opening theme so lovingly announced by the cellos, flitting its way hither and thither through the whole instrumentation, now boldly sung by the brass, now echoed softly by the wood-wind, invited the attention of the hearer.

Words cannot express the beauty of the majestic Funeral March. The strings and wood-wind linked to a melody so sad yet full of hope, were never more appealing. The scherzo, opening pianissimo, mysteriously, in the strings, works up to a tremendous climax, during which the main motive is heard, followed by the trio for French horns.

The Finale, a theme with variations, opening with passages for strings echoed by the wood wind, one of Beethoven's most masterly and individual works, brought this great symphony to a triumphant close.

Strauss, the greatest living composer, was well represented on this excellently contrasted program by one of his earlier works, "Don Juan." In this wonderfully vivid orchestral canvas, he has given the world a masterpiece of the tonal art, unusually effective as played last night.

Wagner's "Overture to the Mastersingers" was the concluding item on the program. The stirring martial character of this well-known work, introducing some of the composer's most inspiring melodies proved how well fitted Mr. Monteux is for that difficult role, a Wagnerian Conductor.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the first of a series of musicales.

DARTMTH. NOV. 6

[19]

Cuckoo in the Depth of the Forest," "Aviary," "Pianists," "Fossils," "The Swan"—and a grand finale, in which the lion roars, the hens cackle and roosters crow, the horses again gallop wildly up the scale, the kangaroos leap about, and the "people with long ears" insist once more on being heard. With those and other reminiscences of the preceding musical tableaux the witty and ingenius series of little pieces comes to an end. The audience frequently laughed aloud. It is not often that a joke 36 years old has as much freshness and real, unexaggerated humor for the rising generation.

LOCKED UP SINCE 1886

"The Swan" is the one fragment of the "Animals' Carnival" which everybody knows, and its performance on the solo 'cello by Mr. Bedetti brought a tumult of applause. It is indeed the musical climax of the series. But he was not the only soloist to triumph, as witness Mr. Max Kunze, solo double-bass, who took the orchestral role of the Elephant, and Mr. Georges Laurent, solo flute in "The Aquarium." These pieces Saint-Saens, in his 51st year, wrote in playful vein for the Mardi Gras concert of the 'cellist Lebouc. They were later performed by and before the famous composers society, "La Trompetta," a performance in which Mr. Monteux took part as a viola player—in Paris, in the same year of 1886. And then Saint-Saens locked up this little "jeux d'esprit" for small orchestra, and only permitted its publication in his will.

This is real Gallic laughter. Always the musical jokes have point and esprit, and a very few measures make an astonishing effect. There is also the ingenious parodying of well known airs, such as the lumbering of the tortoises, to the air, very deep down and in ponderous tempo, of the "can-can," that gay, lively and indecent dance of the finale of Offenbach's music to "Orphee!" In the piece "Fossils," there is humorous reference to a number of airs such as "J'ai du bon tabac," and "Ah, vous dirai-je Maman," an air of Rosina from the "Barber of Seville" and a passing reference to material of Saint-Saens' "Danse Macabre."

No wonder the pianists are classed as "animals!" They set off on a five-finger exercise a la Czerny, the orchestra whacking out a modulatory chord now and again, which does not silence these indefatigable "pianists," but only causes them to repeat their exercises a half tone higher up the scale. And here a word should be said for the admirable virtuosity of the two officiating pianists, Alfred de Voto and Richard E. Stevens. In "the Aquarium" are charming tints of tone-color. The Cuckoo harps on his eternal question, on the same notes, variously harmonized by other orchestral instruments than the clarinet. And the cackling of the hens! In all this Saint-Saens excels. What, indeed, is his principal shortcoming as composer of grand operas or symphonies? That, writing serious music, he was never able to take himself sufficiently seriously.

Pieces by Griffes

Other novelties were two compositions by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock." Both compositions show strongly the influence of Debussy, and the relation between Debussy's "Nuages" and the first piece of Griffes is too obvious to be ignored. "Peacocks" is a little more pungent, harmonically, and has perhaps the more substance of the two compositions. Neither of them shows an original composer. That is their tragedy and the tragedy of Griffes, a musician of exceptional sensitiveness and promise, who died two years ago, at the age of 36, before he had found himself. A tragedy, indeed. Because, if he shows nothing else in this music, he shows a sensibility to color and nuance in a degree not shown by any other American composer.

The concert opened with the E minor symphony of Brahms, for us one of the most beautiful of all symphonies, a very flower of the composer's genius. And this was the finest performance of Brahms we ever heard Mr. Monteux give: It had the ruggedness and at the same time the contemplative beauty of Brahms' latest period. It is music purged of earthly dross—beauty that uplifts because of its selfless beauty. And the "passacaglia" continually grows on one. There, indeed, is a movement sufficient to immortalize Brahms if it were the only symphonic movement he ever wrote.

The performance of Stenka Razin, the symphonic poem inspired by the barbaric tale of the Russian pirate, who conquered at last by his enemies, flung the Circassian princess that he loved as tribute into the great river and fell in the battle—this performance was very brilliant and had when the composer made it possible the note of hugeness, savagery and splendor. But it is only now and again that Glazounoff in this composition of his youth really strikes that note, as in the impressive invocation to the river, in moments of development too episodic to be very strong, and in the sonorous peroration, when the ancient song of the Volga boatmen is flung out with all the power of the orchestra. This was the end of an uncommonly varied and interesting programme, and a concert full of achievements by the orchestra.

POST NOV. 4.

HUMOROUS HIT AT SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS

Even Symphony audiences are human.

Back of all the make-believe that enables highbrows to sit in hushed awe as the orchestra endeavors—in vain, of course—to picture a white peacock spreading his tail lurks the telltale laugh.

It is only once in long years that the laugh is hear, but it was heard yesterday when the orchestra imitated roosters and hens, the donkey's he-haw, the lion's roar and the child pianist hard at work practising scales. All this fun, and much more, came in the Saint Saens novelty, "The Animals' Carnival." played here for the first time.

The funniest part of the "Carnival" was the piano practise movement, with Alfred DeVoto and Richard E. Stevens as soloists. It was almost heartily enjoyed. From a Symphony standpoint, you might say the greeting was uproarious,

Max Kunze's double-bass solo in the playful "Elephant" movement and Georges Laurent's pyrotechnic flute playing in the "Aquarium" pictures were also applauded: but the warmest applause rewarded Jean Bedetti for his charming cello solo in "The Swan" number—a familiar extract from the "Carnival," to which Pavlowa and others have often danced. That "Swan" movement has classic beauty.

C. T. Griffes' two tone pictures, "The Clouds" and "The White Peacock," were also played for the first time at Symphony concerts. "The Clouds" is delightful, in the Debussy manner; a happy translation of William Sharp's imaginative poem. The other piece left too much to the imagination.

Brahm's E minor symphony and Glazounov's tone poem, "Stenka Razin," are also on the program, which will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-NOV. 4.

GRIFFES' MUSIC PLEASES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Good-humored laughter is about the last thing one expects to hear from an audience during a Boston Symphony concert, though agonized chuckles have occasionally been evoked in the past by such startling musical novelties as Schoenberg's "Five Orchestral Pieces" or Milhaud's Suite. Yesterday afternoon, however, "The Carnival of the Animals," an elaborate and often extremely funny musical joke, arranged by the late Camille Saint-Saens nearly 40 years ago for a private musical party in Paris, reduced some of the audience to tears of mirth.

The funniest of the animals were "pianists" who murdered Czerny, and "persons with long ears" who sounded like a good Republican's opinion of the Democratic party. There were also "tortoises" which crawled with ludicrous solemnity through some of the liveliest of Offenbach's gay tunes, "kangaroos" which leaped up and down the piano "putsch, putsch, putsch," to borrow Beethoven's expressive phrase; and, curiously enough, Pavlowa's "Swan."

Mr Bedetti roused great enthusiasm by his beautiful playing of the latter number, but one listener who has always disliked it, wondered from the now revealed context whether Saint-Saens did not have his tongue in his cheek when he composed it. Mr Kunze as the double-bass "elephant", Mr Laurent in the "aquarium" and Messrs De Voto and Stevens, the pianists, executed difficult technical feats with a zest.

The significant musical novelty of the afternoon was not Saint-Saens' clever jest, but two exquisite pieces by the late Charles Tomlinson Griffes, which roused applause more genuine and more prolonged than American music by anyone else has done at these concerts in 15 years. "Clouds" and "The White Peacock" are stamped with the same delicate fastidious, romantic genius that made Griffes' "Khubla Khan" the one unmistakable American masterpiece of recent seasons. This music is no mere academic exercise in classicism or modernism, it stirs the performer's and the listener's imagination. Griffes' music is being more and more often played in public, but one wishes for still more of it.

Brahms' Fourth Symphony was given a performance which showed Mr Monteux at his patient best as an endeavorer to assimilate music temperamentally antipathetic to him. He did not avoid making it clumsy in style, but the fault was partly Brahms'. There was cordial applause after each movement.

Glazunov's "Stenka Razin," a heavy handed attempt to copy Rimsky Korsakov, incidentally gave away to one listener the fact that the composer of "Scheherezade" had after all a formula for composition easier to borrow than the sonata form of Beethoven, which Brahms has used with so great and toilful skill. A few good tunes, a lot of orchestral color, and much rhythmic energy are all Rimsky needed to work his miracles, which somehow on closer acquaintance begin to seem less miraculous than they did.

There are no concerts next week. For Nov 17 and 18 a Bach suite, an Italian novelty by Davico, and Skriabin's "The Divine Poem," too long unheard here, are the numbers announced.

GLOBE- NOV. 4.

Fourth Program of the Boston Symphony

The fourth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows:

Brahms, Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98.
Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."
Saint-Saëns, "The Animals' Carnival."
Glazounoff, Symphonic Poem, "Stenka Razin," Op. 13.

The Saint-Saëns number was played for the first time in Boston and the Griffes pieces for the first time at these concerts.

"The Animals' Carnival" was in diverting contrast to the usual run of symphony concert offerings. Composed in 1886 for the private delectation of musicians and published in full only in the present year, it is a surpassing example of that kind of musical jesting with which only the most gifted composers can afford to experiment. The fact that Saint-Saëns would not permit the publication of this music during his life may seem to indicate that he himself was doubtful of its effect on his dignity as an artist. Yet the Boston audience, like those of Philadelphia and New York which recently heard it from Mr. Damrosch, gave itself unreservedly to the fun. In the sections devoted to the lion, cocks and hens, "Persons with long ears," and birds of the air, Saint-Saëns resorts to what is generally considered the lowest form of musical expression, imitation of sounds; yet he does it so delicately that there is no thought of an offense against taste. Everybody on the platform as well as in the audience was at the broad grin. There can hardly be great originality of treatment of the cries of birds. The call of the cuckoo in music preceded the writing of scores. The hen furnished a theme not only to Rameau but to Walter before him. Yet Saint-Saëns makes them amusing. The more imaginative representations, as of tortoises and kangaroos, by tempo and rhythm, are equally effective. Mr. Laurent's exquisite flute tones were the bubbling path of swift-darting fish in "The Aquarium." And Mr. Bedetti's cello revealed that "The Swan," the only one of the 14 sections hitherto generally known, is still beautiful when not bedeviled.

Griffes' tone-poems confirmed the excellent impression of the composer's powers left by his "Kubla Khan," of which, by the way, "The White Peacock" was reminiscent. By atmosphere, color and melodic line the composer suggests William Sharp's City of Cloud, and the progress of the peacock through a sun-bathed garden. These pieces were given cordial welcome.

But why was not the response to the splendid performance of Brahms' last symphony more understanding? Is it because people have heard so often that this is the last word of the most intellectual of composers on the symphonic form that they cannot perceive its qualities? True that the symphony is intellectual in the intricate and varied handling of its material; but true also that it is conspicuous for charm of melody, richness of design and stirring pulse of rhythm. When it is played as it was yesterday, there can be only one explanation of the fact that the applause was sufficient to recall the conductor only once; the hearers must have been listening, not to the music, but to the inward voice of prejudice.

MONTR - NOV. 4.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, following the orchestra's annual tour, which will include appearances in Montreal, Toronto and cities of the West. The fifth Boston program will include Bach's D major Suite (the one including the air for G string); the Symphonic Poem, "Polifermo," by Davico, and the Third Symphony of Scriabin, "The Divine Poem."

PENSION FUND

Next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, in Symphony hall, at 3:30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its concert for the pension fund of its retired members. Mr. Monteux has compiled a Russian program of absorbing interest. The principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakovs "Scheherazade." Mme. Oda Slobodskaja, prima donna of the Petrograd Grand Opera Company, who appeared in Boston with the Ukrainian chorus, has offered to appear as soloist at this concert. She will sing Lisa's aria from "Pique Dame" and Jaroslavna's aria from "Prince Igor." The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Glazounov's "Stenka Razin," and, to close, Tchaikovsky's thunderous piece, the "1812" Overture.

HERALD NOV 5.

PENSION FUND PROGRAMME

Slobodskaja, Soloist

Nex Sunday afternoon, Nov. 12, in Symphony Hall at 3:30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its customary concert, the proceeds to be added to the pension fund of its retired members.

Mr. Monteux has compiled a Russian programme of absorbing interest for this occasion. The principal number will be Rimsky-Korsakov's masterpiece, "Scheherazade," one of the most brilliant and gorgeously colorful scores ever written.

Mme. Oda Slobodskaja, the prima donna of the Petrograd Grand Opera Company, who has appeared in Boston with the Ukrainian Chorus, has offered to appear as soloist at this concert. She will sing the Lisa aria from Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame," and the Jaroslavna Aria from Borodini's "Prince Igor."

The remaining purely orchestral numbers will be the Polovtsian Dances from "Prince Igor," Glozounov's "Stenka Razin," a symphonic poem based on Russian folk-themes, and to close, Tschaikovsky's thunderous battle piece the "1812" Overture.

Fifth Symphony

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening following the orchestra's annual tour, which is to include appearances in Montreal, Toronto, and cities of the West.

The fifth Boston programme will include Bach's D major Suite (the one including the air for G string); the Symphonic Poem, "Polifermo," by Davico, the Italian composer; and will close with the third symphony of Scriabin, "The Divine Poem," considered one of the foremost achievements of the recent Russian school, and hitherto unheard in Boston.

POST - NOV. 5

Russian Program Nov 12 By Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, exactly as heard at its regular series of concerts, for which tickets are not always procurable, will give a program of Russian music next Sunday afternoon at Symphony Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting. The proceeds of this concert go to the fund for pensioning retired members of the orchestra. Oda Slobodskaja, the Russian soprano, recently heard here as soloist with the Ukrainian Chorus, will sing arias from Tchaikovsky's opera, "The Queen of Spades," from Borodin's opera, "Prince Igor."

The orchestra will play two of the best-known and best-liked Russian masterpieces, Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade," and Tchaikovsky's "1812 Overture." It also offers less familiar but attractive numbers by Borodin and Glazunov. Those who wish to hear the orchestra but once or twice a year have now their best chance to get seats.

Fifth Symphony Program

The next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall will take place a week from Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, following the orchestra's annual tour, which is to include appearances in Montreal, Toronto and cities of the West.

The fifth Boston program will include Bach's D major suite (the one including the air for G string); the symphonic poem, "Polifermo," by Davico, the modernist Italian composer, and will close with the third symphony of Scriabin, "The Divine Poem," considered one of the foremost achievements of the recent Russian school, hitherto unheard in Boston.

GLOBE - NOV. 5.

PENSION FUND PROGRAM

Next Sunday afternoon at Symphonq Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pension fund concert, with a Russian program featuring Rimsky-Korsakov's masterpiece, the "Scheherazade" suite. Mme. Oda Slobodskaja, prima donna of the Petrograd Opera Company, will sing the Lisa aria from Tschaikovsky's "Pique Dame," and the Jaroslana aria from Borodin's "Prince Igor." The Polovtsian dances from "Prince Igor," Glozouncv's "Stenka Razin" and Tschaikovsky's "1812" overture will be the other features.

ADVTSR. NOV. 5.

Concerning the Boston Symphony

The present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to include five concerts in Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 10, is already well under way in Boston, where the orchestra has been playing weekly in Symphony Hall since Oct. 13. The orchestra has also given concerts elsewhere and during the coming week, prior to the first Providence concert, will visit Montreal, Toronto, Rochester, Buffalo, Cornell University and Dartmouth College.

Having spent last summer in Europe in quest of new scores of interest, according to his usual custom, Pierre Monteux has already produced several of them in Boston, notably, Saint-Saens's posthumous burlesque in music, "The Carnival of the Animals," which includes a whole menagerie in most amusing fashion. In the early production of this score, at the semi-private society, "The Trumpet," in Paris, Mr. Monteux played in one of the two string quartets, while the composer conducted. Other new works that have been played are a Fantasia on an Old English Theme by the English composer, Vaughan Williams; Tcherepnin's Piano Concerto; Theme and Variations by the Italian composer, Bossi, and two short pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."

A season of unusual interest is promised for Providence, where also works of the modern schools will be played, although these will yield the first place, as elsewhere, to the established masterpieces of the symphonic repertory.

A splendid list of soloists will further increase the interest of each concert. Frieda Hempel, who will also appear with the orchestra in Boston, is now sailing from Europe to begin her season here. She has recently given a series of concerts in London, where the beauty of her voice and characterizing power immediately distinguished her from any other singer then in England. She has long been the idol of opera and concerts in this country, and her voice is such as to blend beautifully with a symphony orchestra.

The other soprano on the list, Clara Clemens, is purely a concert singer, yet in this field she has won for herself a high distinction and increasing attention in the cities in which she has sung. Her interpretations of songs reveal the cultured artist. Two finer pianists would be hard to find than Harold Bauer and Olga Samaroff, who are also to play in concertos with the orchestra. There will be a violoncello soloist in Jean Bedetti, the leader of that famous section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROV. NOV. 5.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS AT DARTMOUTH

HANOVER, N. H., Nov. 5.—The Boston Symphony orchestra received a large ovation at its concert here tonight in Webster Hall. A capacity throng greeted Conductor Monteau and his musicians. The concert was given under the auspices of the music department of Dartmouth College.

POST-NOV. 6.

MUSIC LOVERS ENTHUSED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Webster Filled When Boston Orchestra Appears and Pleases Audience

OPENS WITH "HEROIC"

Last Night's Program to Be First of Musical Series For This Season

By PROF. M. F. LONGHURST.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, made its first appearance before a Hanover audience in Webster Hall last evening under the auspices of the Department of Music. The hall was filled to capacity by an audience which followed with close attention and marked enthusiasm a program which, in its execution and interpretation, was indeed a tribute to this distinguished group of artists.

From the first crashing chords of the "Heroic" Symphony to the last massive tones of the "Mastersingers" overture the audience was under a spell.

The symphony as interpreted by Mr. Monteux was an artistic triumph. The opening theme so lovingly announced by the cellos, flitting its way hither and thither through the whole instrumentation, now boldly sung by the brass, now echoed softly by the wood-wind, invited the attention of the hearer.

Words cannot express the beauty of the majestic Funeral March. The strings and wood-wind linked to a melody so sad yet full of hope, were never more appealing. The scherzo, opening pianissimo, mysteriously, in the strings, works up to a tremendous climax, during which the main motive is heard, followed by the trio for French horns.

The Finale, a theme with variations, opening with passages for strings echoed by the wood wind, one of Beethoven's most masterly and individual works, brought this great symphony to a triumphant close.

Strauss, the greatest living composer, was well represented on this excellently contrasted program by one of his earlier works, "Don Juan." In this wonderfully vivid orchestral canvas, he has given the world a masterpiece of the tonal art, unusually effective as played last night.

Wagner's "Overture to the Mastersingers" was the concluding item on the program. The stirring martial character of this well-known work, introducing some of the composer's most inspiring melodies proved how well fitted Mr. Monteux is for that difficult role, a Wagnerian Conductor.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the first of a series of musicales.

DARTMTH. NOV. 6

[19]

THOSE that still doubt the ripening of Mr. Monteux under the work and the standards of the Symphony Concerts should have heard his version of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms on Friday and Saturday last and may now profitably ponder it. There is no ascertainable record; yet, in all probability, until Mr. Monteux came as conductor to Boston, he had never lead in a symphony of Brahms. Parisians hear few of his pieces, major or minor. It is the custom to say that their minds, ears and spirits are at odds with his. Mr. Monteux's concerts, moreover, in those younger days, cultivated aspiring rather than established composers. Brahms's symphonies, he soon discovered, were integral and animate part of the repertory at the Symphony Concerts, and to them he set with ingrained alertness and thoroughness. His first efforts—upon one or the other of the middle symphonies—were obviously tentative; with the first, as played last year, he progressed far; with the fourth, as heard last week, he has now gained his ends.

Being a Latin, Mr. Monteux responds to the grave songfulness of Brahms. Being unfettered by any of the elder and mistaken Teutonic traditions, he gives this songfulness—abounding in the Fourth Symphony—free, full, supple and various voice. Having a keen ear for harmonic and instrumental color, for accent and progression, Mr. Monteux appreciates the pith and point and beauty with which Brahms in this last Symphony uses all four. Brahmsian indeed sounded his horns, clarinets, strings, drums, trombones, through these two performances. Brahmsian, too, was the distribution and proportioning of accent and color. Brahms knew sensuous symphonic beauty; but he could summon also loftiness and austerity. He did not forbear ruggedness. Occasionally he gratified himself with the abtruse. It is these Brahmsian qualities, audible though not paramount in the Fourth Symphony, that Latin conductors either miss or soften. Mr. Monteux now discovers and feels them, adjusts them scrupulously in the tonal fabric, in the moods behind. He is gaining the Brahmsian balance and integrity of beauty and of thought. And what aid at both concerts an orchestra on its mettle lent him!

H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV. 6.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A splendid programme, consisting entirely of Russian music, with Madame Oda Slobodskaja, the Russian prima donna, as soloist, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30, the proceeds to go to the orchestra's pension fund for retired members.

Pierre Monteux will present at this concert Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," a pictorial score of gorgeous splendor which is replete with brilliant solo passages by the various virtuosi of the orchestra.

Madame Slobodskaja, the leading soprano of the Petrograd grand opera, who came to this country recently to appear jointly with the Ukrainian Chorus, has offered her services for this concert and will sing with the orchestra arias from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Pique Dame," and Borodin's "Prince Igor." Mr. Monteux will also conduct the Polovtsian dances from this latter opera and close the concert with Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" and Tschaikowsky's "1912" overture.

Symphony Soloist

Carmela Ippoleto.

There is uncommon interest in the appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday night in Cambridge of Miss Carmela Ippolito, the young violinist of this city. Miss Ippolito has been singularly fortunate, not only in her natural talent and perhaps racial sensitiveness to beauty, but also in the fact that this talent has benefited by the soundest training.

She could have become a mere precocity, and, probably, disappeared, as such youthful precocities do, with the passing of the seasons. She has studied very seriously and substantially, not only as a virtuoso with Charles Martin Loeffler and others, but solfege with Georges Longy, the teacher, conductor and oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and harmony with Frank Stuart Mason of the New England Conservatory of Music. She has, in short, elected to become a musician as well as a fiddler.

Miss Ippolito was born in Boston of [illegible]ilian parents in 1902. Her brother, [illegible]tore Ippolito, gave her her first [illegible]s on the vi[illegible] and she made her [illegible] survivors [illegible] earthquake in Sicily in 1908. She became a pupil at the Boston Music School Settlement, then studied for some seasons with Gertruda Marshall. She worked with Mr. Loeffler from 1916 to 1920. In 1918 she graduated and in 1919 won a medal for solfege from the Longy School of Music. She was soloist with the Cecilia Singing Society in 1919 and played the Mozart Violin Concerto with the MacDowell Club Orchestra, April, 1920. She gave the first performance of Blair Fairchild's "Legends" for violin and orchestra at a concert of the Boston Musical Association in Jordan Hall, Feb. 16, 1921. In the same year she was winner of the New York State competition held under the auspices of the National Federation of Women's Clubs. Miss Ippolito has twice appeared as soloist with the People's Symphony Orchestra of this city. By far the most important test of her capacities, however, comes with the concert next Thursday evening. She should go far, because she has been well advised, has not paid too much attention to the praise of irresponsible admirers, and has prepared herself solidly for her appearance before the big public.

POST-NOV. 12

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Gives Superb Performance of "Scheherazade" Suite

For the 42d concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux arranged a program of Russian music: Rimsky-Korsakov's suite "Scheherazade," dances from Borodin's opera "Prince Igor," Glazinov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin," and the Tchaikovsky overture "1812." Miss Oda Slobodskaja sang an air from "Prince Igor" and one from Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame." There was a very large audience; it would tell more to the credit of Boston if one could report every seat filled.

The feature of the afternoon was the superb performance of the Scheherazade suite. The orchestra has never sounded better, Mr. Monteux has seldom reached a higher pitch of eloquence. Not a word more need be said—except that it is to be hoped that singers were present in numbers to listen to the third movement and learn therefrom what real song means. The audience evidently appreciated the quality of the performance, for it recalled again and again Mr. Monteux, who shared the acclaim with Mr. Burgin for his delightful playing of the measures for solo violin, and presently with the orchestra. The audience also heartily liked Miss Slobodskaja, recalling her many times after her airs.

R. R. G.

HERALD NOV 13.

ODA SLOBODSKAJA CONCERT SOLOIST

The splendid impression that Oda Slobodskaja, Russian soprano, made upon her Boston audience when she sang here about a month ago with the Ukrainian Chorus, was in every way strengthened when she appeared in the all-Russian program which Pierre Monteux arranged for the Pension Fund.

Mme. Slobodskaja has a voice that is remarkable in range, power and quality. She is a woman of distinctly regal appearance which enhances her native Russian beauty.

The "Scheherade," Rimsky-Korsakoff, beloved of every symphony audience the world over, was the opening number and in fairness to Mr. Monteux it must be said that it has never sounded better than on this occasion. Mr. Burgin received due applause for his various violin solos.

The latter half of the program was of shorter numbers for the orchestras and two arias from Russian operas for Mme. Slobodskaja.

AMECAN- NOV. 13

RUSSIAN PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concert for Benefit of Pension Fund

Playing of Korsakov Number Brings an Ovation

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a program of Russian music which aroused cordial applause from a large audience yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Oda Slobodskaja, the Russian soprano, first heard here with the Ukrainian Chorus, was the soloist. The proceeds of this concert go to the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra.

Mr Monteux chose wisely in putting Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade" on a program intended to attract a large popular audience. He conducted [illegible] with the dramatic and rhythmic [illegible] he used to bring to this [illegible] he was conducting [illegible] Ballet Russe. His hea[illegible] music, applauding eve[illegible] the piece vigorously and [illegible] end into an ovation which [illegible] brought the entire orchestra to its feet in acknowledgment.

The second half of the program, however, proved less interesting. The dances from Boredin's "Prince Igor," Glazunov's tone poem "Stenka Razin," the arias sung by Miss Slobodskaja, and finally Tchaikovsky's noisy trivial "1812" were monotonous collectively, however interesting separately. There would have been a far greater emotional range in an all-Beethoven or even an all-Wagner program, and incidentally if such a program had been offered, there would probably have been no vacant seats.

Tchaikovsky's "1812" was extraordinarily well played, sweeping the audience off its feet. The burst of applause came before the music quite stopped. The orchestra's share in the other numbers was capably performed.

Miss Slobodskaja is a typical Russian opera singer, abusing an extraordinarily good voice by misguided attempts at making her singing dramatic. Her tremolo, which often made one uncertain what note she was trying to sing, might seem dramatic in a blood and thunder operatic melodrama. In a concert hall, combined with her forcing of a naturally agreeable tone into a shrill and unbelievably loud shrieking, the effect was such as to make at least two listeners want to stuff their ears.

She reduces Chaliapin's musical faults to absurdity. Her one technical virtue, from the standpoint of concert singing was a diction so clear that even a listener unfamiliar with Russian could make out many of the words. She has a fine voice, as her few soft notes proved, though one wonders how any of it has survived her use of it. There was loud applause from yesterday's audience for Miss Slobodskaja, and several recalls.

GLOBE-NOV. 13.

Hempel with Boston Symphony

Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano, is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening concert of the Providence season, which will take place a week from Tuesday, Nov. 21, in Infantry Hall. The singer returned recently from Europe, where she had been enjoying a series of memorable successes in London, in time to begin her American tour by appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Canada. The orchestra spent the past week visiting a number of cities, including Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Eastman School of Music at Rochester and the universities of Dartmouth at Hanover and Cornell at Ithaca.

Miss Hempel's reception at the two Canadian concerts was enthusiastic, the more so since she has not sung in that part of the world for a considerable period. She is to sing with the orchestra in Boston and in Brooklyn as well as in Providence. This trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met with the heartiest welcome and praise at every hand, and will culminate in a pension fund concert to be given in Boston today, with a Russian programme.

The Providence season of concerts includes the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 10. The other soloists will be Harold Bauer and Olga Samaroff, pianists; Clara Clemens, concert soprano, whose recent recital in New York caused much enthusiasm and favorable discussion, and Jean Bedetti, the 'cello soloist of the orchestra.

PROV. JOURNAL-NOV. 12

Music and Musicians

By MARY M. HOWARD

A detailed account of how the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to Elmwood Music hall on Thursday evening, November 9th, has risen to its present world wide distinction, and how it has made Boston an important musical center, would constitute a long and impressive record of endeavor and fruition. In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full sized symphony orchestra believing that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill its ranks, and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the ensemble. The Boston Symphony orchestra in its original form had only 60 players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony concerts should provide only the finest music; that artistic consideration should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programmes, even the wisdom of the whole venture were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the orchestra added growth and success to the last. The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, engaged in 1884, was a thorough and arduous musician, who did much toward training the ensemble to its now traditional state of perfection. In 1889 came Arthur Nikisch, one of the most brilliant conductors of all time, who in turn was succeeded by [illegible] Paner in 1893. In [illegible] phony hall was built especially for the orchestra in 1900. The conductors since then have been: Karl Muck, 1906-1908, Max Fielder, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henry Raband 1918-1919, and since, Pierre Monteaux. The fame of the orchestra during these years rose to pre-eminence. The perfection of the Boston Symphony performances became the marvel of America, and even the musical world at large. Nothing comparable was to be heard elsewhere. In the autumn of 1919, Mr. Monteux, was offered the post of conductor, but could not obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening Boston symphony concerts of that season. In the season of 1919-1920 he became permanent conductor of the orchestra. His genius has added new qualities of beauty to the famous organization. In the present season, which in more ways than one is proving one of the most successful of them all, there will be given besides the regular 50 concerts in Boston and additional young people's concerts there, fifteen in greater New York, nine in Cambridge, five in Providence and other concerts in Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, New Bedford, New Haven, Hartford, Springfield, Fall River Lynn, Brockton, Portland, Northampton, Manchester, Syracuse, Itahaca, Binghamton, Middlebury, Burlington, Montreal. Seats for the Buffalo engagement are now on sale at the Musical Arts office, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

BUFFALO SUN EXPSS
Oct 29.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 29 1922

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

H. T. PARKER has been writing musical criticisms for The Boston Transcript for a good many years. Now he has collected, or rather a friend has "astutely assembled and ingeniously co-ordinated," a number of his articles in a volume entitled "Eighth Notes" (Dodd, Mead & Co.) The book, he says, is, "of purpose," fragmentary. Eighth notes are short, and so are most of the articles. It is enough if the impressions recorded "capture a sensation, decant a mood, reflect a trait, recall achievement, isolate an individualizing quality, hazard an opinion or, best of all, from the tinder of words rekindle the sparks of pleasure remembered." There is a general division of these impressions into classes—those concerning conductors, "singing actors," singers of songs, pianists, violinists and so on.

Mr. Parker has definite ideas and expresses them energetically in choice phraseology. These articles are not simply criticisms of particular occasions. They mostly have a wider significance or are general estimates. Thus, in his discussion of Toscanini he shows how he gave a final blow to the tradition that music and conductors must necessarily come from Germany. He is a "subjective" conductor, says Mr. Parker; what he would impress upon his hearers is his own reaction to the music in hand. Dr. Muck, on the other hand, regards himself only as a means to an end. His personal distinction was to be impersonal before his music; and of him Mr. Parker says: "No living conductor has assembled in himself more of the attributes of a great conductor or held them in juster balance than Dr. Muck." In the present and recent temper of Boston this verges upon treason. But Mr. Parker saves the day by remarking of Mr. Monteux that none has served the Boston Orchestra better than he in his "rescue" of it at a critical time. Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Stock and Mr. Stransky are also adjudicated; of the last he says that "where he falls short is in the sensitive modulation of his music by the fine instinct and imagination that dwell in conductors of the first rank and the subtlety—and also the truth—that makes an effect seem not an effect but the inevitable and irresistible voice of the music of the moment."

NEW MU
PUBLICATIO

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 29 1922

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD.

Mr. Monteux is going to have the [illegible]ton Symphony Orchestra play at [illegible] of its home concerts Gustav [illegible] suite, "The Planets."

The San Francisco Orchestra, [illegible]

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 29 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its forty-second season and its fourth under Pierre Monteux's direction on Oct. 13 at Symphony Hall, Boston, will be heard later than usual in New York this year. The ten concerts here on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons fall on Nov. 30 [illegible] Dec. 2, Jan. 4 and 6, Feb. 1 a[illegible] March 15 and 17 and April 5 and 7. The personnel of the orchestra remains practically that of last season.

In Boston virtually all seats for the regular series of forty-eight concerts have been taken in advance by subscription, while for the extra concerts, including a "Young People's series and the annual Pension Fund benefits, there is a like demand, making a total of fifty-nine concerts to be given in the orchestra's home town.

There will be twenty-eight conc[illegible] afield in various cities, as far N[illegible] Montreal and Toronto and as far [illegible] as Richmond, Washington and [illegible]more, making a sum total of 113 concerts, which the official prospectus declares to be as large a number as the orchestra can possibly undertake.

From NOV 4 1922
Evening Sun
New York City

Boston Symphony Plans.

The usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall are to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the following dates: November 30 and December 2, January 4 and 6, February 1 and 3, March 15 and 17 and April 5 and 7.

The present season is the forty-second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirty-seventh in New York city and the fourth under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The personnel of last season remains intact. The demand for concerts in Boston and in the number of cities visited is greater than ever before.

Pierre Monteux will introduce a number of new scores of interest, largely as a result of his trip to Europe last summer, where he consulted several composers. There have already been played at the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, which began October 13, Vaughan Williams's fantasia for strings on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Saint-Saens's "Carnival of the Animals" and Griffes's "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."

Scores to have their first performance in this country are Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chausson's "Soir de Fete" and Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella" (after Pergolese). Also on the prospective list is the same composer's "Rites of Spring," which score was first introduced by the conductor at the Concerts Monteux in Paris. Other Russian revivals will be Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from "The Tale of the Tsar Saltan." England will be represented by Eugene Goosens and Holst, whose "Planets" has not yet been played in Boston; Spain by Turina and Italy by Tommasini anl Davico. Symphonies of Brukner and Mahler will be added to the German list.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
NOV 4 1922

Prospectus of Boston Orchestra

The usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall are to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the following oates: November 30 and December 2, January 4 and 6, February 1 and 3, March 15 and 17, April 5 and 7

The present season is the forty-second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirty-seventh in New York City, and the fourth under the leadership of Pierre Monteux.

Pierre Monteux will introduce a number of new scores largely as a result of his trip to Europe last summer, where he consulted several composers. There have already been played at the concerts in Boston Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for Strings on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of the Animals," and Griffes's "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."

Scores to have their first performance in this country are Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chausson's "Soir de Fête," and Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella" (after Pergolese). Also on the prospective list is the same composer's "Rites of Spring," which score was first introduced by the conductor at the Concerts Monteux in Paris. Other Russian revivals will be Scriabin's Thir[illegible] Symphony, "The Divine Poem," a[illegible] Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "T[illegible] Tale of the Csar Saltan." En[illegible] will be represented by [illegible] Goosens, and Holst, whose "P[illegible] has not yet been played in [illegible] Spain by Turina, and Italy by [illegible]masini and Davico. Symphoni[illegible] Bruckner and Mahler will be [illegible] German list.

THOSE that still doubt the ripening of Mr. Monteux under the work and the standards of the Symphony Concerts should have heard his version of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms on Friday and Saturday last and may now profitably ponder it. There is no ascertainable record; yet, in all probability, until Mr. Monteux came as conductor to Boston, he had never lead in a symphony of Brahms. Parisians hear few of his pieces, major or minor. It is the custom to say that their minds, ears and spirits are at odds with his. Mr. Monteux's concerts, moreover, in those younger days, cultivated aspiring rather than established composers. Brahms's symphonies, he soon discovered, were integral and animate part of the repertory at the Symphony Concerts, and to them he set with ingrained alertness and thoroughness. His first efforts—upon one or the other of the middle symphonies—were obviously tentative; with the first, as played last year, he progressed far; with the fourth, as heard last week, he has now gained his ends.

Being a Latin, Mr. Monteux responds to the grave songfulness of Brahms. Being unfettered by any of the elder and mistaken Teutonic traditions, he gives this songfulness—abounding in the Fourth Symphony—free, full, supple and various voice. Having a keen ear for harmonic and instrumental color, for accent and progression, Mr. Monteux appreciates the pith and point and beauty with which Brahms in this last Symphony uses all four. Brahmsian indeed sounded his horns, clarinets, strings, drums, trombones, through these two performances. Brahmsian, too, was the distribution and proportioning of accent and color. Brahms knew sensuous symphonic beauty; but he could summon also loftiness and austerity. He did not forbear ruggedness. Occasionally he gratified himself with the abtruse. It is these Brahmsian qualities, audible though not paramount in the Fourth Symphony, that Latin conductors either miss or soften. Mr. Monteux now discovers and feels them, adjusts them scrupulously in the tonal fabric, in the moods behind. He is gaining the Brahmsian balance and integrity of beauty and of thought. And what aid at both concerts an orchestra on its mettle lent him!

H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV. 6.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A splendid programme, consisting entirely of Russian music, with Madame Oda Slobodskaja, the Russian prima donna, as soloist, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon in Symphony Hall at 3:30, the proceeds to go to the orchestra's pension fund for retired members.

Pierre Monteux will present at this concert Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," a pictorial score of gorgeous splendor which is replete with brilliant solo passages by the various virtuosi of the orchestra.

Madame Slobodskaja, the leading soprano of the Petrograd grand opera, who came to this country recently to appear jointly with the Ukrainian Chorus, has offered her services for this concert and will sing with the orchestra arias from Tschaikowsky's opera, "Pique Dame," and Borodin's "Prince Igor." Mr. Monteux will also conduct the Polovtsian dances from this latter opera and close the concert with Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" and Tschaikowsky's "1912" overture.

Symphony Soloist

Carmela Ippoleto.

There is uncommon interest in the appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Thursday night in Cambridge of Miss Carmela Ippolito, the young violinist of this city. Miss Ippolito has been singularly fortunate, not only in her natural talent and perhaps racial sensitiveness to beauty, but also in the fact that this talent has benefited by the soundest training.

She could have become a mere precocity, and, probably, disappeared, as such youthful precocities do, with the passing of the seasons. She has studied very seriously and substantially, not only as a virtuoso with Charles Martin Loeffler and others, but solfege with Georges Longy, the teacher, conductor and oboist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and harmony with Frank Stuart Mason of the New England Conservatory of Music. She has, in short, elected to become a musician as well as a fiddler.

Miss Ippolito was born in Boston of Sicilian parents in 1902. Her brother, Salvatore Ippolito, gave her her first lessons on the violin, and she made her [illegible] appearance [illegible] concert for [illegible] survivors of the earthquake in Sicily in 1908. She became a pupil at the Boston Music School Settlement, then studied for some seasons with Gertruda Marshall. She worked with Mr. Loeffler from 1916 to 1920. In 1918 she graduated and in 1919 won a medal for solfege from the Longy School of Music. She was soloist with the Cecilia Singing Society in 1919 and played the Mozart Violin Concerto with the MacDowell Club Orchestra, April, 1920. She gave the first performance of Blair Fairchild's "Legends" for violin and orchestra at a concert of the Boston Musical Association in Jordan Hall, Feb. 10, 1921. In the same year she was winner of the New York State competition held under the auspices of the National Federation of Women's Clubs. Miss Ippolito has twice appeared as soloist with the People's Symphony Orchestra of this city. By far the most important test of her capacities, however, comes with the concert next Thursday evening. She should go far, because she has been well advised, has not paid too much attention to the praise of irresponsible admirers, and has prepared herself solidly for her appearance before the big public.

POST-NOV. 12.

SYMPHONY PLAYS FOR PENSION FUND

Gives Superb Performance of "Scheherazade" Suite

For the 42d concert in aid of the pension fund of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Mr. Monteux arranged a program of Russian music: Rimsky-Korsakov's suite "Scheherazade," dances from Borodin's opera "Prince Igor," Glazinov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin," and the Tchaikovsky overture "1812." Miss Oda Slobodskaja sang an air from "Prince Igor" and one from Tchaikovsky's "Pique Dame." There was a very large audience; it would tell more to the credit of Boston if one could report every seat filled.

The feature of the afternoon was the superb performance of the Scheherazade suite. The orchestra has never sounded better, Mr. Monteux has seldom reached a higher pitch of eloquence. Not a word more need be said—except that it is to be hoped that singers were present in numbers to listen to the third movement and learn therefrom what real song means. The audience evidently appreciated the quality of the performance, for it recalled again and again Mr. Monteux, who shared the acclaim with Mr. Burgin for his delightful playing of the measures for solo violin, and presently with the orchestra. The audience also heartily liked Miss Slobodskaja, recalling her many times after her airs.

R. R. G.

HERALD-NOV 13.

ODA SLOBODSKAJA CONCERT SOLOIST

The splendid impression that Oda Slobodskaja, Russian soprano, made upon her Boston audience when she sang here about a month ago with the Ukrainian Chorus, was in every way strengthened when she appeared in the all-Russian program which Pierre Monteux arranged for the Pension Fund.

Mme. Slobodskaja has a voice that is remarkable in range, power and quality. She is a woman of distinctly regal appearance which enhances her native Russian beauty.

The "Scheherade," Rimsky-Korsakoff, beloved of every symphony audience the world over, was the opening number and in fairness to Mr. Monteux it must be said that it has never sounded better than on this occasion. Mr. Burgin received due applause for his various violin solos.

The latter half of the program was of shorter numbers for the orchestras and two arias from Russian operas for Mme. Slobodskaja.

AMICAN- NOV 13

RUSSIAN PROGRAM BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

Concert for Benefit of Pension Fund

Playing of Korsakov Number Brings an Ovation

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a program of Russian music which aroused cordial applause from a large audience yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Oda Slobodskaja, the Russian soprano, first heard here with the Ukrainian Chorus, was the soloist. The proceeds of this concert go to the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra.

Mr Monteux chose wisely in putting Rimsky Korsakov's "Scheherezade" on a program intended to attract a large popular audience. He conducted it with the dramatic and rhythmic quality he used to bring to this music when he was conductor for the [illegible] Ballet Russe. His hearers [illegible] music, applauding every [illegible] of the piece vigorously and bursting at the end into an ovation which finally brought the entire orchestra to its feet in acknowledgment.

The second half of the program, however, proved less interesting. The dances from Boredin's "Prince Igor," Glazunov's tone poem "Stenka Razin," the arias sung by Miss Slobodskaja and finally Tchaikovsky's noisy trivial "1812" were monotonous collectively, however interesting separately. There would have been a far greatr emotional range in an all-Beethoven or even an all-Wagner program, and incidentally if such a program had been offered, there would probably have been no vacant seats.

Tchaikovsky's "1812" was extraordinarily well played, sweeping the audience off its feet. The burst of applause came before the music quite stopped.

The orchestra's share in the other numbers was capably performed.

Miss Slobodskaja is a typical Russian opera singer, abusing an extraordinarily good voice by misguided attempts at making her singing dramatic. Her tremolo, which often made one uncertain what note she was trying to sing, might seem dramatic in a blood and thunder operatic melodrama. In a concert hall, combined with her forcing of a naturally agreeable tone into a shrill and unbelievably loud shrieking, the effect was such as to make at least two listeners want to stuff their ears.

She reduces Chaliapin's musical faults to absurdity. Her one technical virtue, from the standpoint of concert singing was a diction so clear that even a listener unfamiliar with Russian could make out many of the words. She has a fine voice, as her few soft notes proved, though one wonders how any of it has survived her use of it. There was loud applause from yesterday's audience for Miss Slobodskaja, and several recalls.

GLOBE-NOV. 13.

Hempel with Boston Symphony

Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano, is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the opening concert of the Providence season, which will take place a week from Tuesday, Nov. 21, in Infantry Hall. The singer returned recently from Europe, where she had been enjoying a series of memorable successes in London, in time to begin her American tour by appearances with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Canada. The orchestra spent the past week visiting a number of cities, including Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Eastman School of Music at Rochester and the universities of Dartmouth at Hanover and Cornell at Ithaca.

Miss Hempel's reception at the two Canadian concerts was enthusiastic, the more so since she has not sung in that part of the world for a considerable period. She is to sing with the orchestra in Boston and in Brooklyn as well as in Providence. This trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra met with the heartiest welcome and praise at every hand, and will culminate in a pension fund concert to be given in Boston today, with a Russian programme.

The Providence season of concerts includes the following Tuesday evenings: Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 10. The other soloists will be Harold Bauer and Olga Samaroff, pianists; Clara Clemens, concert soprano, whose recent recital in New York caused much enthusiasm and favorable discussion, and Jean Bedetti, the 'cello soloist of the orchestra.

PROV. JOURNAL-NOV. 12

Music and Musicians

By MARY M. HOWARD

A detailed account of how the Boston Symphony orchestra, which comes to Elmwood Music hall on Thursday evening, November 9th, has risen to its present world wide distinction, and how it has made Boston an important musical center, would constitute a long and impressive record of endeavor and fruition. In 1881, the late Major Henry L. Higginson realized the first dream and aspiration of his life by founding in Boston a full sized symphony orchestra believing that there was a musical public for such an undertaking. Sparing no expense, he engaged the finest musicians then available in Europe to fill its ranks, and brought to this country one after another of the world's greatest conductors to lend their individual genius to the cumulative improvement of the ensemble. The Boston Symphony orchestra in its original form had only 60 players, and its conductor was George Henschel, a celebrated musician of the day. The initial aims were that the musicians should play under one conductor in one orchestra and not debase their talents by routine engagements; that the symphony concerts should provide only the finest music; that artistic consideration should always be paramount, and that the conductor be given absolute control. Controversy waxed hot in those days. The policies, the programmes, even the wisdom of the whole venture were violently attacked and staunchly defended. But the wisdom of the founder was justified as each succeeding year of the orchestra added growth and success to the last. The second conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, engaged in 1884, was a thorough and arduous musician, who did much toward training the ensemble to its now traditional state of perfection. In 1889 came Arthur Nikisch, one of the most brilliant conductors of all time, who in turn was succeeded by Emil Pauer in 1893. In 1898 Mr. Gericke returned for a period of [illegible] years, during which time [illegible] phony hall was built especially for the orchestra in 1900. The conductors since then have been: Karl Muck, 1906-1908, Max Fielder, 1908-1912; Karl Muck, 1912-1918; Henry Raband 1918-1919, and since, Pierre Monteaux. The fame of the orchestra during these years rose to pre-eminence. The perfection of the Boston Symphony performances became the marvel of America, and even the musical world at large. Nothing comparable was to be heard elsewhere. In the autumn of 1919, Mr. Monteux, was offered the post of conductor, but could not obtain his release from existing engagements except for a short period, when he conducted the opening Boston symphony concerts of that season. In the season of 1919-1920 he became permanent conductor of the orchestra. His genius has added new qualities of beauty to the famous organization. In the present season, which in more ways than one is proving one of the most successful of them all, there will be given besides the regular 50 concerts in Boston and additional young people's concerts there, fifteen in greater New York, nine in Cambridge, five in Providence and other concerts in Baltimore, Washington, Richmond, New Bedford, New Haven, Hartford, Springfield, Fall River Lynn, Brockton, Portland, Northampton, Manchester, Syracuse, Itahaca, Binghamton, Middlebury, Burlington, Montreal. Seats for the Buffalo engagement are now on sale at the Musical Arts office, No. 230 Delaware avenue.

BOFFALO SONEYPSS
Oct 29,

[20]

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 29 1922

MUSIC

NEW MUSICAL PUBLICATIONS

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

H. T. PARKER has been writing musical criticisms for The Boston Transcript for a good many years. Now he has collected, or rather a friend has "astutely assembled and ingeniously co-ordinated," a number of his articles in a volume entitled "Eighth Notes" (Dodd, Mead & Co.) The book, he says, is, "of purpose," fragmentary. Eighth notes are short, and so are most of the articles. It is enough if the impressions recorded "capture a sensation, decant a mood, reflect a trait, recall achievement, isolate an individualizing quality, hazard an opinion or, best of all, from the tinder of words rekindle the sparks of pleasure remembered." There is a general division of these impressions into classes—those concerning conductors, "singing actors," singers of songs, pianists, violinists and so on.

Mr. Parker has definite ideas and expresses them energetically in choice phraseology. These articles are not simply criticisms of particular occasions. They mostly have a wider significance or are general estimates. Thus, in his discussion of Toscanini he shows how he gave a final blow to the tradition that music and conductors must necessarily come from Germany. He is a "subjective" conductor, says Mr. Parker; what he would impress upon his hearers is his own reaction to the music in hand. Dr. Muck, on the other hand, regards himself only as a means to an end. His personal distinction was to be impersonal before his music; and of him Mr. Parker says: "No living conductor has assembled in himself more of the attributes of a great conductor or held them in juster balance than Dr. Muck." In the present and recent temper of Boston this verges upon treason. But Mr. Parker saves the day by remarking of Mr. Monteux that none has served the Boston Orchestra better than he in his "rescue" of it at a critical time. Mr. Mengelberg, Mr. Stock and Mr. Stransky are also adjudicated; of the last he says that "where he falls short is in the sensitive modulation of his music by the fine instinct and imagination that dwell in conductors of the first rank and the subtlety—and also the truth—that makes an effect seem not an effect but the inevitable and irresistible voice of the music of the moment."

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 29 1922

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD.

Mr. Monteux is going to have the Boston Symphony Orchestra play at a [illegible] of its home concerts Gustav Holst's suite, "The Planets."

The San Francisco Orchestra, under

NEW YORK
N. Y.
TIMES
OCT 29 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its forty-second season and its fourth under Pierre Monteux's direction on Oct. 13 at Symphony Hall, Boston, will be heard later than usual in New York this year. The ten concerts here on Thursday evenings and Saturday afternoons fall on Nov. 30 and Dec. 2, Jan. 4 and 6, Feb. 1 and 3, March 15 and 17 and April 5 and 7. The personnel of the orchestra remains practically that of last season.

In Boston virtually all seats for the regular series of forty-eight concerts have been taken in advance by subscription, while for the extra concerts, including a "Young People's series and the annual Pension Fund benefits, there is a like demand, making a total of fifty-nine concerts to be given in the orchestra's home town.

There will be twenty-eight concerts afield in various cities, as far North as Montreal and Toronto and as far South as Richmond, Washington and Baltimore, making a sum total of 113 concerts, which the official prospectus declares to be as large a number as the orchestra can possibly undertake.

From NOV 4 1922
Evening Sun
New York City

Boston Symphony Plans.

The usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall are to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the following dates: November 30 and December 2, January 4 and 6, February 1 and 3, March 15 and 17 and April 5 and 7.

The present season is the forty-second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirty-seventh in New York city and the fourth under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The personnel of last season remains intact. The demand for concerts in Boston and in the number of cities visited is greater than ever before.

Pierre Monteux will introduce a number of new scores of interest, largely as a result of his trip to Europe last summer, where he consulted several composers. There have already been played at the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, which began October 13, Vaughan Williams's fantasia for strings on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Saint-Saens's "Carnival of the Animals" and Griffes's "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."

Scores to have their first performance in this country are Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chausson's "Soir de Fete" and Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella" (after Pergolese). Also on the prospective list is the same composer's "Rites of Spring," which score was first introduced by the conductor at the Concerts Monteux in Paris. Other Russian revivals will be Scriabin's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from "The Tale of the Tsar Saltan." England will be represented by Eugene Goossens and Holst, whose "Planets" has not yet been played in Boston; Spain by Turina and Italy by Tommasini anl Davico. Symphonies of Brukner and Mahler will be added to the German list.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
NOV 1 1922

Prospectus of Boston Orchestra

The usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall are to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the following dates: November 30 and December 2, January 4 and 6, February 1 and 3, March 15 and 17, April 5 and 7

The present season is the forty-second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirty-seventh in New York City, and the fourth under the leadership of Pierre Monteux.

Pierre Monteux will introduce a number of new scores largely as a result of his trip to Europe last summer, where he consulted several composers. There have already been played at the concerts in Boston Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for Strings on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of the Animals," and Griffes's "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."

Scores to have their first performance in this country are Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chausson's "Soir de Fête," and Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella" (after Pergolese). Also on the prospective list is the same composer's "Rites of Spring," which score was first introduced by the conductor at the Concerts Monteux in Paris. Other Russian revivals will be Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Rimsky-Korsakov's Suite from "The Tale of the Csar Saltan." England will be represented by Eugene Goosens, and Holst, whose "Planets" has not yet been played in Boston, Spain by Turina, and Italy by Tommasini and Davico, Symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler will be added to the German list.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
NOV 4 1922

[illegible] series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall are to be given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the following dates: Nov. 30 and Dec. 2, Jan. 4 and 6, Feb. 1 and 3, March 15 and 17, April 5 and 7.

The present season is the forty-second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the thirty-seventh in New York City, and the fourth under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux will introduce a number of new scores of interest, largely as a result of his trip to Europe last summer, where he consulted several composers. There have already been played at the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, which began Oct. 13, Vaughan Williams's fantasia for strings on a theme by Thomas Tallis, Saint-Saëns's "Carnival of the Animals," and Griffes's "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."

Scores to have their first performance in this country are Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," Chausson's "Soir de Fête," and Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella" (after Pergolese). Also on the prospective list is the same composer's "Sacre du Printemps," which was first introduced by the conductor at the Concerts Monteux in Paris. Other Russian revivals will be Scriabin's "The Divine Poem" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's suite from "The Tale of the Tsar Saltan." England will be represented by Eugene Goosens and Holst, whose "Planets" has not yet been played in Boston; Spain by Turina, and Italy by Tommasini and Davico. Symphonies of Bruckner and of Mahler will be added to the German list. The masterpieces of the classic repertory will of course comprise the bulk of the programmes.

N. Y.
HERALD
NOV

The coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will include the usual double series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall to be given on November 30 and December 2, January 4 and 6, February 1 and 3, March 15 and 17, April 5 and 7. The season, which is the forty-second of the orchestra, will be its thirty-seventh in New York city and the fourth under the direction of Pierre Monteux. Mr. Monteux spent a part of the past summer in Europe in consultation with a number of composers. As a result he will give new works of particular interest in the course of the season.

Every indication of the present season is favorable. The orchetra's personnel remains largely as before, with no noteworthy changes. In Boston virtually all the seats for the regular series of forty eight concerts have been taken in advance by subscription, and for the extra series of young people's concerts and pension fund concerts there is a like demand, thus making a total of sixty-eight concerts to be given in that city. The usual ten concerts in New York and five in Brooklyn, together with visits to various cities as far North as Montreal and Toronto and as far South as Richmond, Washington and Baltimore, make a sum total of 113 concerts, which is as large a number as the orchestra can undertake.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
NOV 5

Unfamiliar Works On Programs of Boston Symphony

The coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the forty-second of the orchestra and the thirty-seventh in New York and the fourth to be conducted by Pierre Monteux, will include the usual double series of five Thursday evenings and five Saturday afternoons in Carnegie Hall: November 30-December, January 4-6, February 1-3, March 15-17 and April 5-7.

Among scores announced as being performed for the first time in this country on the Boston program are: Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chausson's "Soir de Fete," and Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella" (after Pergolese). Also on the prospective list is the same composer's "Rites of Spring," which score was first introduced by the conductor at the Concerts Monteux in Paris. Other Russian revivals will be Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Great Britain will be represented by Eugene Goossens and Holst, whose "Planets" has not yet been played in Boston; Spain by Turina, and Italy by Tommasini and Davico. Symphonies by Bruckner and Mahler are added to the German list. The standard classics will, of course, comprise the bulk of the programs.

A distinctly favorable outlook is reported for the present season, in which the personnel of the orchestra has suffered no notable change. Subscriptions are heavy in Boston for the five extra evening concerts, pension fund and young people's concerts, as well as the larger series, a total of sixty. Outside of Boston, besides the ten New York concerts, five will be given in Brooklyn and visits to points ranging from Montreal on the North to Richmond on the South.

P. I.
JOURNAL

Concerning the Boston Symphony

The present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to include five concerts in Infantry Hall on the Tuesday evenings of Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 23, Feb 27 and April 10, is already well under way in Boston, where the orchestra has been playing weekly in Symphony Hall since Oct. 13. The orchestra has also given concerts elsewhere and during the coming week, prior to the first Providence concert, will visit Montreal, Toronto, Rochester, Buffalo, Cornell University and Dartmouth College.

Having spent last summer in Europe in quest of new scores of interest, according to his usual custom, Pierre Monteux has already produced several of them in Boston, notably, Saint-Saens's posthumous burlesque in music, "The Carnival of the Animals," which includes a whole menagerie in most amusing fashion. In the early production of this score, at the semi-private society, "The Trumpet," in Paris, Mr. Monteux played in one of the two string quartets, while the composer conducted. Other new works that have been played are a Fantasia on an Old English Theme by the English composer, Vaughan Williams; Tcherepnin's Piano Concerto; Theme and Variations by the Italian composer, Bossi, and two short pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock."

A season of unusual interest is promised for Providence, where also works of the modern schools will be played, although these will yield the first place, as elsewhere, to the established masterpieces of the symphonic repertory.

A splendid list of soloists will further increase the interest of each concert. Frieda Hempel, who will also appear with the orchestra in Boston, is now sailing from Europe to begin her season here. She has recently given a series of concerts in London, where the beauty of her voice and characterizing power immediately distinguished her from any other singer then in England. She has long been the idol of opera and concerts in this country, and her voice is such as to blend beautifully with a symphony orchestra.

The other soprano on the list, Clara Clemens, is purely a concert singer, yet in this field she has won for herself a high distinction and increasing attention in the cities in which she has sung. Her interpretations of songs reveal the cultured artist. Two finer pianists would be hard to find than Harold Bauer and Olga Samaroff, who are also to play in concertos with the orchestra. There will be a violoncello soloist in Jean Bedetti, the leader of that famous section in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 5 1922

Coming Concert Givers.

It is the aim of the new City Symphony Orchestra to build up an entirely new musical public in New York City. To this end popular Sunday afternoon concerts will be held, beginning Nov. 19, at the Manhattan Opera House.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifteen New York concerts, starting Nov. 30, will present works by Griffes, Vaughan Williams, Goosens, Holst, Saint-Saëns, Chausson, Honegger, Scriabin and Stravinsky.

Georgette Leblanc-Maeterlinck, who will give a series of "dramatizations of songs" here this Winter, is to appear Dec. 17 as soloist for the International Composers' Guild at the Klaw Theatre.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
NOV 5 1922

Prospectus of Boston Symphony.

The coming season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will include the usual double series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall, to be given on November 30 and December 2, January 4 and 6, February 1 and 3, March 15 and 17, April 5 and 7. This season, which is the forty-second of the orchestra, will be the thirty-seventh in New York City, and the fourth under the direction of Pierre Monteux.

Mr. Monteux spent a part of the past Summer in Europe, in consultation with a number of composers. As a result, new works of particular interest will be played in the course of the season. The following scores have already been played at the concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, which have been given weekly since the opening of the season on the 13th of last month: Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for Strings on a theme by Thomas Talis, Saint-Saens's "Carnival of the Animals," Griffes's "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," Bossi's "Theme and Variations," Dvorak's Third Symphony, Tcherepnim's Piano Concerto (Moisciwitsch soloist), and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Fairy Legend." Scores to have their first performance in this country are Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chausson's "Soir de Fete," and Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinello" (after Pergolese). Also on the prospective list is the same composer's "Rites of Spring," which score was first introduced by the conductor at the Concerts Monteux in Paris. Other Russian revivals will be Scriabin's Third Symphony, "The Divine Poem," and will be represented by Eugene Goosens, and Holst, whose "Planets" has not yet been played in Boston, Spain by Turina, and Italy by Tommasini and Davico. Symphonies of Bruckner and Mahler will be added to the German list. The masterpieces of the classic repertory will, of course, comprise the bulk of the programs.

Every indication of the present season is favorable. The splendid personnel remains as before with no noteworthy changes. In Boston virtually all the seats for the regular series of forty-eight concerts have been taken in advance by subscription, and for the extra series, young people's concerts, and Pension Fund concerts, there is a like demand, making a total of sixty-eight concerts to be given in Boston. The usual ten concerts in New York City and five in Brooklyn, together with visits to various cities as far north as Montreal and Toronto, and as far south as Richmond, Washington, and Baltimore, make a sum total of 113 concerts, which is as large a number as the orchestra can undertake.

From
Evening Sun
New York City
NOV 11 1922

The Symphonies.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just concluded a tour of Canada and New York State, having given concerts in Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Rochester, Hanover and Ithaca. Pierre Monteaux will introduce on the program of the coming week the symphonic poem "Polyphemus" by the Italian modernist, Davico, and will also conduct Bach's D major suite and d'Indy's symphony in B flat.

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to begin at the end of this month, and the usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
NOV 11 1922

Boston Orchestra in Canada

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has just concluded a tour of Canada and New York State, having given concerts in Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, Rochester, Hanover, and Ithaca. The visits to the last three cities were made under the auspices of the Eastman School of Music, Dartmouth College, and Cornell University respectively.

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to begin at the end of this month, and the usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on November 30 and December 2, January 4 and 6, February 1 and 3, March 15 and 17 and April 5 and 7.

EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which is to give the usual series of five concerts in the Academy of Music, under Institute auspices, on the following Friday evenings: Dec. 1, Jan. 5, Feb. 2, March 16 and April 16, spent the past week in a tour which included concerts in Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, the Eastman School of Music at Rochester and the Universities of Dartmouth and Cornell at Ithaca. Frieda Hempel arrived from Europe in time to begin her American tour by singing with the orchestra in Montreal and Toronto. She is to sing with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn. Other artists engaged for the Brooklyn series are Emma Calve, the French dramatic soprano; Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violinist; Olga Samaroff and Pablo Casals.

N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 1[illegible] 1922

On Behalf of Wilhelm Gericke.

Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor who first set the standards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and through years worked toward them, is now in his seventy-eighth year, a poor man in Vienna. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities, and month by month the fall of the crown toward nothingness has stripped him of income. To relieve his necessities the Symphony Orchestra announces a special concert for Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, in Symphony Hall. Private subscriptions are already swelling the fund to be so established. In particular various conductors now working in the United States are pledging an annual subscription to it.

N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 12 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, due in New York on Nov. 30, spent the past week in a tour to Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo and the new Eastman School of Music, Rochester, N. Y., playing also at Hanover, N. H., before Dartmouth College, and at Ithaca, N. Y., before the students of Cornell University. A Pension Fund concert, with a Russian program, was to mark the players' return to Boston today.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
NOV 12 1922

Boston Symphony Visits Canada.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra spent the past week in a tour which included concerts at Montreal, Toronto, Buffalo, the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, and the universities of Dartmouth at Hanover and Cornell at Ithaca. A Pension Fund concert, with a Russian program, will mark the orchestra's return to Boston to-day.

Pierre Monteux will introduce on the program of the coming week the symphonic poem, "Polyphemus," by the Italian modernist, Davico, and will also conduct Bach's D-major Suite, and d'Indy's Symphony in B flat.

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to begin at the end of this month, and the usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts will take place in Carnegie Hall on November 30, December 2, January 4-8, February 1-3, March 15-17, and April 5-7.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD IN CONCERT

Magnificent Program is Given by Band at Massey Hall.

BRAHMS' SYMPHONY

Mme. Frieda Hempel is Perfect Interpreter of Mozart.

Ever since the war the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in the offing, making signs of coming to Toronto, but only last night did they reach here. Twice have dates for the engagement been announced, only to be cancelled. They were to have celebrated some anniversary or other in connection with the history of Massey Hall, but circumstances prevented their coming, and so far as one remembers the anniversary went by unnoticed. But at last the famous Boston band was able to set a date and keep it. They came here yesterday and gave one of the finest concerts that Toronto has enjoyed in many a day. We have to thank them not only for coming themselves, but for bringing with them Mme. Frieda Hempel, a charming soprano, who won the audience at once. In fact, the one thing that last night's gathering apparently regretted was that they could not hear more of Mme. Hempel. They made it quite evident that they wanted her back again. Perhaps she will come to us in a recital.

A Splendid Band.

Since the Boston Symphony Orchestra last visited Toronto it has passed thorugh some parlous days. The wartime activities of Dr. Muck, a brilliant but tactless musician, who was too loyal to his Fatherland for his own good, almost disrupted the band that Col. Higginson's generosity had made possible. There was a time when rival organizations in New York got to the point of displaying a little unholy joy at the thought that they might not have to continue to bow to the Boston musical tradition. Then Pierre Monteux took charge of the orchestra. Perhaps it was just as well that its visit under the baton of Mr. Monteux has been delayed until now. It has given him time to mould his musicians nearer to his heart's desire. After all, no musical organization can do its best work in a transition period. We must not forget the experience of our own Mendelssohn Choir. Mr. Monteux has a band now that compares favorably with the best that can be found anywhere. He is not an inspiring conductor; nor does he make the audience feel, through the medium of his orchestra, an overwhelming personality. The Boston Orchestra does not represent the triumphs of a distinctive personage. Mr. Monteux has at his control a magnificent tone, rich and warm. He does not thrill you with brilliant moments, but he permits you to revel in a flow of glorious sound. He gave the audience last night no shattering climaxes. Even the final passages of "Les Preludes" were characterized more by a splendid sonority than by any exploitation of the theatrical side of Liszt's music. The band gave a well-balanced program. They opened with one of the supreme examples of absolute music, Brahms' C minor Symphony, and left one wondering how anybody could have found this noble composition dry or labored or dull. It hardly even seems austere. Their interpretation was majestic and impressive. Two novelties were offered, little bits of descriptive music by a young American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes, who died two years ago. They were short scraps of tone painting, one a picture of clouds and the other a garden scene, in the midst of which strutted a white peacock. They were light confections, pretty though unimportant. They are the sort of compositions that one enjoys hearing without having any desire ever to hear them again. Then to complete the evening Mr. Monteux offered a piece of program music, Liszt's tone poem "Les Preludes." It is a graphic composition that always moves an audience, and the Boston band played it superbly. They made it a tone picture of life, with its agitations, its fears and uncertainties, and here and there those moments of triumph and joy that make existence worth while.

Mme. Frieda Hempel.

The assisting artist of the evening might be termed the perfect Mozartian. Never has one heard a voice so exactly suited to the rendering of the lilting tunefulness of the music of Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart. His arias might have been written for Mme. Frieda Hempel to sing. Hers is a lyric soprano of deliciously soft and melting quality. Offhand one cannot remember a sweeter tone. The gracious presence of the prima donna fits with her voice and the arias that she sings. She gave only two last night, "Deh Vieni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Martern aller Artern" from "Die Entfuhrung aus dem Serail." They were pieces of delicate and lovely singing, especially the first of them. Mme. Hempel is supreme in her particular field of song.

MAIL ONTARIO-NOV. 8

MUSIC NOTES

Boston Symphony Orchestra at Massey Hall

(Yenmita)

Miss Frieda Hempel was the assisting artist. She sang two Mozart numbers, "O Come My Heart's Delight" from Figaro, and "Thou May'st Learn to Hate Me" from "The Abduction." The first is a simple melody calling for no decorative vocalization, the second is coloratura in character. She has been called by some "a second Swedish nightingale," and we are not surprised. Her voice is purest soprano of clear limpid tone quality, clear and sweet as a nightingale's. She sings with most beautiful simplicity and perfect intonation. She can do anything with her voice in the matter of light and shade, trill, turn, shake and rapidest scale passage. She can take a planissimo and a forte on top C. with equal ease One hardly knows which to admire the more; the rich purity of her lovely voice or the unaffected simplicity of her singing. She is undoubtedly a great artist. She was rapturously recalled five times, but gave no encore. Neither did the orcestra give an encore, in spite of enthusiastic demands. For which restraint both artist and orchestra deserve the best thanks of all earnest music lovers.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last night to an audience that nearly filled Massey Hall, and it played with all the astonishing technique and temperamental beauty that can be expected from an orchestral instrument well nigh perfect. In its selection of programme, and in its restrained and masterly interpretation, M. Pierre Monteux, the conductor, proved himself a statesman in musicianship. He knows every strand of technical and temperamental possibility in his fine body of players, and secured the extreme of artistic expression with a minimum of display. The programme included Brahms' Number One Symphony, Liszt'e Symphonic Poem, "the Preludes," and two musical pictures by Griffes, a United States composer recently deceased.

Many hundreds, if not a thousand have heard the Philadelphia Orchestra at one time or another, and it is inevitable that, whilst their hearts were thrilled by the Boston playing, some comparison between the work of the two must have exercised their minds. Therefore a thought or two in this connection may be worth while.

The beauty of Philadelphia playing is arrestive, assertive, individual, and in its highest moods ecstatic. The beauty of Boston playing is more insinuating than arrestive. It suggests more than it asserts. Its ecstacy is more subjective than objective. If the technical brilliance and temperamental fervor of Philadelphia stuns you, those qualities of Boston are more merciful and leave you merely subdued. Philadelphia is so dogmatic that it leaves you nothing to wonder at. Boston leaves you the richest heritage of musical hearts and minds—reflection.

The playing of the Brahms revealed to perfection the warm human sympathy of violin tone, the purity of intonation, and the presence of just enough vibrato to color the clear cut beauty of its never-lacking melodies. Glorious fortes were hushed in an instant to whispering pianos and breathless pianissimos. Pizzicatos were crisp but never toneless, and mezzo soforzandos were tender as the sobbing of hushed grief. The bass and cello sections were sonorous and rich as diapasons endowed with sentiment. Think of nine double basses for a foundation, and ten 'cellos and twelve violas for the inner harmonies! Is it surprising that the tone in the strings glows at times with the rich glory of the setting sun.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

Conducted by E. R. PARKHURST.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Return After Many Years' Absence Fills Massey Hall.

A brilliant assemblage of music lovers that exhausted the seating capacity of Massey Hall last night greeted the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although the organization has been in existence 42 years, it has been heard in this city only on two previous occasions. The first was on October 4, 1905, with Dr. Gericke as conductor; the second on January 29, 1913, when Dr. Muck was the regular conductor, but, owing to his illness, his place was taken by Anton Witek, the concert-meister. The program of the 1905 concert consisted of Schumann's Symphony in C major, Op. 61; the Berlioz arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," the Tschaikovski "Italian Caprice," the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," and Spohr's violin concerto in D minor, played by Mr. Willy Hess. The program in 1913 consisted of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture, and Mendelssohn's violin concerto, played by Mr. Anton Witek.

From a popular point of view the program of last night cannot be compared with either of those quoted above. The "magnum opus" was Brahms' first symphony, that in C minor, composed when he was 49 years of age. It is a scholastic, intellectual composition, which has little in it to appeal to the masses. The first movement is a quarter of an hour's restless and sombre music, unrelieved by a flow of frank melody, and causes the average listener to say: "Rest, perturbed spirit." The slow movement is more attractive, the orchestral effects being more delicate, and the appeal of its melody soft and engaging. The finale, however, is the illuminating feature of the work, and both in regard to the vitality of its subjects and the distinction of its orchestration, makes amends for the other movements. The symphony occupied three-quarters of an hour in performance, and one would infer was interpreted by the conductor, Pierre Monteux, with a sympathetic understanding of its spirit.

The opinions of critical commentators, from the very first production of the symphony, have always been very contradictory. The famous German critic, Hanslick, said: "The one thing we may speak of as a simple fact, accepted alike by friend and foe, is that no composer has yet approached so nearly to the great works of Beethoven as Brahms in the finale of his C minor Symphony." The critic of The Weiner Zeitung said: "His strong, moral earnestness, the depth and purity of his conception of the world and of life. and the intellectuality which have always obtained for him the esteem of the noble-minded and withheld from him the favor of the masses, are to be found again in his work. None the less, however, are the shadows there which, but too easily, accompany such lights. The want of inspiriting fancy, the absence of sensuous charm, and a sullen asceticism almost amounting to insipidity. . . So there is nothing that can be admired without reserve, until, with sure step, with strong, proud gait that reminds one of the majesty of Beethoven, the finale strikes out. The hearer experiences a sensation of brightness, as at the rising of the sun after a night of sorrow. Here is a truly artistic achievement." Again, per contra, the distinguished critic, Louis Ehert, pronounced the first movement the most artistically important of the work.

The second orchestral selection consisted of two impressionist pictures, "The Clouds" and "The White Peacock," by the late Charles Tomlinson Griffes, an American composer, held in high estimation by his countrymen. The special attraction of the music of these numbers was found in the play of orchestral color, which in a measure conjured up memories of Debussy. Here the various sections of the orchestra showed great refinement of tone and splendid technique. The audience manifested its pleasure with several demonstrations of applause.

The third selection was Liszt's fairly familiar symphonic poem, "The Preludes," which delighted the audience as a unit. One was struck in rehearing this work with the masterly manner in which Liszt has contrasted the individual color of the different instruments, both in solo and the mass. And the effect of the singing of the dominant melody on its successive appearances in different moods and lights was entrancingly brought out by the superb playing of the wood and brass wind. The conductor was recalled four times, with the climax of the evening's enthusiasm.

The very welcome and only soloist was Frieda Hempel, the famed coloratura soprano, fresh from her triumphs in London, England. She sang only two numbers, the aria "Deh Vieni" and the aria "Martern Aller Artern," both by Mozart. She made a complete conquest of her hearers, the purity of her exquisitely delicate voice and the pearl-like brilliancy of the florid passages in the second aria proving extremely fascinating. She was rapturously recalled again and again, but the inexorable laws of the Boston Orchestral Association forbade her to grant the encore so ardently desired. And the patrons of the concert had a real grievance in this matter, for they naturally considered it a high-handed proceeding to prevent the singer, after travelling perhaps some hundreds of miles to come here, from giving them an extra number or two.

Mons. Monteux demonstrated in the Liszt composition that he is an interpretative master, as well as being a splendid director.

TORONTO GLOBE - NOV. 8.

But excellent as were the strings the wood wind was no less beautiful. The oboe melody in the first movement sang out with a dulcet smoothness and faultless intonation that are seldom heard from that instrument. The phrase in the Andante played by the horns in close harmony was rendered with the perfection of tone and nuance that one would hear only on an organ.

The closing Allegro showed something of the tonal volume of which the orchestra was capable, but not all. The utmost was reserved, with masterly art, for the great Liszt number that terminated the programme.

It was in the Liszt number that the full beauty of the brass and percussion section was displayed. Every mood from meditation to exultation finds expression in this work. From an opening unison pizzicato, deep and mystical, it develops until a stately phrase is announced by the brass in full confident harmony. Then follow sweeping melodies for 'cellos caught up by violins and little melodic snatches comment upon the most beautiful of horn harmony. Tone is piled on tone, rhythm takes a quicker movement until the end is reached in a maximum of tonal volume glowing and intense, the greatest fortissimo of the evening.

TORONTO-TELE. NOV. 8.

"Clouds" and "The White Peacock" were the two musical pictures that the orchestra offered between the Brahms and the Liszt. Frankly, we begrudged the time spent by the orchestra in playing them. The first is an alleged picture of clouds "builded superbly in the heights of heaven." In addition to the strings, it is scored for piccolo, three flutes, three oboes, clarinets, etc., and celesta, tam-tam and two harps. We cannot say what the tam tam did. The harps and the celesta tinkled prettily, but there was no conviction in the number. Rhythm was an independent between th various instruments as tonality was. The harps jingled in one key and the celesta jangled in another. It might have represented clouds to the composer's mind. To us it was reminiscent of fog.

"The White Peacock" was no better. This was supposed to be a musical picture of a white peacock moving through a sunlit garden of pomegranates, oleanders, magnolia and other beautiful things. In its lighter moments it was just as sketchy and indefinite and tinkly as "Clouds." When it broadened out it reminded us strongly as the "Proficere" in Elgar's Gerontius. Unresolvable discords are bad enough when they are noisy, but when you have them jangling in mincing little pianissimo passages you feel you want ot shtu the door.

We wish musicians who delight in heaven's lovely clouds and earth's beautiful gardens would be thankfully content to do as humbler mortals do, worship and be silent.

Needless to say, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played these numbers, as they played everything else, perfectly.

TORONTO-TELE. NOV. 8

BOSTON AND BRAHMS GIVE TORONTO THRILLS

The Great Classic Orchestra Does Itself Credit With Classic Composer.

SUBDUED MONTEUX

Frieda Hempel, Coloraturist, Does Her Share in a Delightful Program.

By AUGUSTUS BRIDLE.

Brahms and Boston gave Toronto orty minutes of highly intellectual nthusiasm last evening. After early ten years absence what better e-introduction could Boston have ere than Brahms—and in his Symhony No. 1? The management [illegible] to impress [illegible] hat a rather more iridescent program might suit us better; in any ase not to begin with Brahms. But Boston was obdurate; Brahms came irst; and nobody regretted it—except the Brahmsite who plays Old St. Andrew's organ and unavoidably ate, missed it!

Never before has Brahms been so hailed with boisterous acclamations here. Or was it—Boston? Or—both? In any case rare combination. The audience seemed to hunger for Brahms. Yet, suppose it had been played by the splendid Cleveland rchestra; or Detroit; or the Philrmonic? No; none of these could [illegible] spell. Stokow[illegible] did it last se[illegible] on with the No. 2, which he told me n Philadelphia has to emerge from erfect silence.

Boston persists as a great orchesra in spite of fate; as great now as ver, even with many of the old ersonnel gone; minus Muck, or Nikisch, or George Henschel its first onductor, and great friend of Brahms. These players could have layed anything and made everybody appy.

There is a subdued enchantment bout a Boston-Brahms program. Here is no common furore. Dignity holds her seat. Mr. Monteux is almost sculpturesquely dignified. He has no antics; no ecstasies; no rhapsodies; no glorious, perspiring xultations. Firmly he beats the ime, delivers the accent, models the uance, develops sonorous climax, eclines to the diminuendo—all in erfect restraint, not without emoion.

But—what a band! Who could ot conduct it? Such violins. Seldom oes one get such a tone from se[illegible] [illegible] I have never heard [illegible] d along the rear on a dais—the only isarrangement that Boston permits, with the result of far greater sonorty.

Brahms No. 1—Beethoven's Tenth s Bulow seems to have said—has n its first movement enormous readth of string sonority, stretching ike a vast many-patterned rug; a ery intellectual, not hectic, not even motional movement. The Andante weeps graciously in and weaves a grey spell of enchantment without a ob, but with such gravity and impressive sadness. The Allegretto develops more color, more abandon, with a number of delectations from various tone colors in the band, and a sedate dance that moves like a stately minuet; dulcet oboe solos embroidered with violas and two passages of perfectly wonderful pizzicati—all the strings answering one another. The Adagio, ushered in, after a brief pause but no interval, gives out a noble and plaintive theme from various sections which later in Beethovenian fashion interweaves with a fine march suggestive of the Hymn of Joy; later with a third sub-theme that is needed to furnish material for a great climax.

And when it's all done you sit and gaze back at what seems to have been a classic city of sound in the clouds; glad to have had the gates of Brahms' severe heaven opened by such an orchestra.

After ten minutes' intermission comes Frieda Hempel, a slender figure; blonde, smiling, tall and gracious—to warble an aria from the Marriage of Figaro, of Mozart. Pearls of limpid sweetness; divine nothings; Jenny Lind-like raptures of tone that never trouble the soul of any singer, but must be done perfectly. Frieda Hempel is perfect in her way; a singer who would be startled at a tone with any passion in it, and who seems capable of quietly doing anything that Mozart or Rossini ever wrote for the coloratura voice. She won seven recalls, but gave no encore. People seem to recognize perfection in miniature; and the cold chastity of these Mozart arias sung by Hempel came as a nice contrast to the Brahms; a vocalist who could do a large number of perfect form songs beautifully and must be a delight in some of the lighter operas; but for a whole program would be like trying to make garments out of pearl necklaces.

The two Griffes picturesques were exquisitely played with perfect nuances; the Clouds and the White Peacock; sensuous irresolutions made for the piano—on which they would be poor little attenuations, but from such an orchestra were very lovely indeed. This is program music de luxe; when you have a city of clouds and a white peacock to describe. But the poet Lamartine, as well as the composer, missed the point about the clouds—which might have seemed like a city but drifted away after the walls were up and the streets full of people; and a white peacock is far too exquisite for those to whom the swan is about the limit by way of musical aviation.

The evening wound up thunderously with a full-lunged orgy of orchestration from that master of the emotional senses in sound, Franz Liszt. How often have we heard Les Preludes done by inferior orchestras and colossal conductors. And how gorgeously the Bostonians delivered its rampant sonorities and its sad suggestions, when the whole great band grew into a hurricane of tonal energy and left nothing to be desired so far as Liszt was concerned—except to have made him gasp with exultation could he have heard it. Not such a wonderful program; but it left a wonderful trail and a yearning to hear Boston again—even by way of Brahms.

TORONTO-STAR NOV. 8.

MUSIC and DRAMA

VISITS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Canada have always been rare and circumstances during the past decade have tended to make them rarer. Even after the difficulties created by the war were removed ill-luck seemed to dog arrangements for its coming so that for some of us the news that it was actually on the way seemed too good to be true. The concert at Massey Hall on Nov. 7th was a demonstration that despite the vicissitudes which preceded the appointment of Pierre Monteux as conductor, The Boston Symphony Orchestra is still one of the world's great musical organizations. Of the old faces I recognized but one, the white haired 'cellist, Alwyn Schroeder one of Wilhelm Gericke's old guard and a shining figure in the now disbanded Kneisel Quartette. Though much of the former membership has gone, absorbed chiefly by the New York Philharmonic-National Orchestra and the Detroit Orchestra; the new force that has been built up under Pierre Monteux is fully worthy of the traditions to which it succeeds. The orchestra is of superb quality in all sections; the strings are thrilling in elastic, sensuous quality; the Woodwind exquisitely pure and lyrical and the brass is gloriously mellow. The radiant plastic tone which the ensemble produces is superlatively fine.

Mr. Monteux is a conductor of uniquely varied experience who came to America a few years ago as conductor of the Daghilieff Russian Ballet. He had previously distinguished himself as a conductor of the Opera Comique in Paris and also conducted popular orchestral concerts in Paris. It was the brilliance he displayed as a conductor of summer concerts in New York shortly after his arrival in America that led to his engagement at Boston. Owing to the breadth of his training, his interpretations have more dramatic appeal than is usually associated with the French school of conducting,—which tends to a cool and formal elegance. Ample elegance and distinction characterize his style, but probably his experience as an interpreter of richly dramatic Russian music no doubt broadened him on the temperamental side.

The chief work given at the Toronto concert was Brahms' lovely first Symphony in C minor. Last season one wrote of the ever growing popularity of Brahms now that the public had come to a finer understanding of his idiomatic genius, and it is amazing to learn that in the later seventies after its first presentation at Carlsruhe in 1876, this symphony was denounced as labored, crabbed, cryptic and dull. Those were the days of the Brahms-Wagner rivalry when the Wagnerians valiantly held that all absolute music was obsolete. The many hundreds of Torontonians who listened with enthusiasm to lyrical ecstacies of this work would regard as mad any critic of today who pronounced it crabbed or dull. All movements are interpenetrated with a glorious melodic impulse, and the final one "Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio" is superb in its poetic exaltation. Mr. Monteux seemed to show a little coldness in the first movement, but as the symphony proceeded developed glowing fervor. In the coda of the final movement he did not build up quite so massive an effect as does Albert Coates, who makes this particular movement his "piece de resistance," but Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the work as a whole was masterly in expression and intellectual grasp.

Though, as has been said, certain critics once derided this symphony, it is but fair to our forebears to say that from the outset it won a great deal of attention. This fact is shown by an incident related by Walter Damrosch. When news reached New York in 1877 that Brahms had completed a symphony curiosity was so great to hear it that Dr. Leopold Damrosch and Theodore Thomas, rival conductors were both eager to have the honor of presenting it for the first time in America. Thomas stole a march on his rival by securing a promise from the local music dealer who had control of the score and orchestral parts to sell them to him exclusively. Leopold Damrosch was in dismay, when a woman pupil called on him and presented him with a full copy of the score. She had simply gone to the dealer and purchased it from the dealer in the usual way, the latter having no suspicion that it was to be used for orchestral performance. Four copyists were at once set to work to transcribe the orchestral parts and Damrosch was able to surprise New York by presenting the work a week ahead of Thomas. This was in December 15, 1877. The new symphony thus got an invaluable advertisement in America at the very outset, though its popularity was to come years later.

Other works performed by Mr. Monteux were two exquisite descriptive pieces "Clouds" and "The White Peacock" by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, an American composer born at Elmira, N.Y. in 1884 who died untimely in 1920. He was a pupil of Humperdinck, who perhaps developed his delicate descriptive quality and rare gifts in instrumentation. It is interesting to note that the eminent Canadian singer Eva Gauthier has brought into prominence some of his songs in Oriental modes. Quite plainly Griffes was a genius of the minor order. Of these works and of Liszt's familiar but unfadingly fresh and noble tone poem "Les Preludes," the interpretations were richly poetic and colorful.

An added feature was the first appearance in Toronto of the beautiful lyric soprano, Frieda Hempel. She is a singer of enchanting appearance and wonderfully magnetic personality. Her voice is light, but wooing and tender, and of so even a quality that its tones in scale singing are like a string of perfectly matched pearls. She carries the conviction that she is first of all a musician, who uses her voice just as a great violinist uses his instrument for purposes of pure, inspired interpretation. Few singers convey such an impression and this combination of lovely voice with true musicianship makes her the ideal interpreter of Mozart. She sang two of his arias; one gay, "Deh Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and one pathetic, "Martern aller Artern" from "The Seraglio." The musical melodic delicacy of the composer and the refinement of his ornaments, were flawlessly interpreted by this mistress of that finest of vocal assets, a perfect legato style. Miss Hempel's triumph was immediate. The audience recalled her seven times, and she would gladly have sung again but that the rules of the Boston Symphony Orchestra forbid encores. However there will be other opportunities to hear her if all goes well, for Mr. Withrow immediately booked her for an individual concert next season.

This long-delayed concert was originally intended as a celebration of the 25th anniversary of the opening of Massey Hall; and must rank as a red-letter event in its illustrious record.

[22]

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

Conducted by E. R. PARKHURST.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Its Return After Many Years' Absence Fills Massey Hall.

A brilliant assemblage of music lovers that exhausted the seating capacity of Massey Hall last night greeted the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra. Although the organization has been in existence 42 years, it has been heard in this city only on two previous occasions. The first was on October 4, 1905, with Dr. Gericke as conductor; the second on January 29, 1913, when Dr. Muck was the regular conductor, but, owing to his illness, his place was taken by Anton Witek, the concert-meister. The program of the 1905 concert consisted of Schumann's Symphony in C major, Op. 61; the Berlioz arrangement of Weber's "Invitation to the Waltz," the Tschaikovski "Italian Caprice," the overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," and Spohr's violin concerto in D minor, played by Mr. Willy Hess. The program in 1913 consisted of Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," Wagner's "Meistersinger" overture, and Mendelssohn's violin concerto, played by Mr. Anton Witek.

From a popular point of view the program of last night cannot be compared with either of those quoted above. The "magnum opus" was Brahms' first symphony, that in C minor, composed when he was 49 years of age. It is a scholastic, intellectual composition, which has little in it to appeal to the masses. The first movement is a quarter of an hour's restless and sombre music, unrelieved by a flow of frank melody, and causes the average listener to say: "Rest, perturbed spirit." The slow movement is more attractive, the orchestral effects being more delicate, and the appeal of its melody soft and engaging. The finale, however, is the illuminating feature of the work, and both in regard to the vitality of its subjects and the distinction of its orchestration, makes amends for the other movements. The symphony occupied three-quarters of an hour in performance, and one would infer was interpreted by the conductor, Pierre Monteux, with a sympathetic understanding of its spirit.

The opinions of critical commentators, from the very first production of the symphony, have always been very contradictory. The famous German critic, Hanslick, said: "The one thing we may speak of as a simple fact, accepted alike by friend and foe, is that no composer has yet approached so nearly to the great works of Beethoven as Brahms in the finale of his C minor Symphony." The critic of The Weiner Zeitung said: "His strong, moral earnestness, the depth and purity of his conception of the world and of life. and the intellectuality which have always obtained for him the esteem of the noble-minded and withheld from him the favor of the masses, are to be found again in his work. None the less, however, are the shadows there which, but too easily, accompany such lights. The want of inspiriting fancy, the absence of sensuous charm, and a sullen asceticism almost amounting to insipidity. . . So there is nothing that can be admired without reserve, until, with sure step, with strong, proud gait that reminds one of the majesty of Beethoven, the finale strikes out. The hearer experiences a sensation of brightness, as at the rising of the sun after a night of sorrow. Here is a truly artistic achievement." Again, per contra, the distinguished critic, Louis Ehert, pronounced the first movement the most artistically important of the work.

The second orchestral selection consisted of two impressionist pictures, "The Clouds" and "The White Peacock," by the late Charles Tomlinson Griffes, an American composer, held in high estimation by his countrymen. The special attraction of the music of these numbers was found in the play of orchestral color, which in a measure conjured up memories of Debussy. Here the various sections of the orchestra showed great refinement of tone and splendid technique. The audience manifested its pleasure with several demonstrations of applause.

The third selection was Liszt's fairly familiar symphonic poem, "The Preludes," which delighted the audience as a unit. One was struck in rehearing this work with the masterly manner in which Liszt has contrasted the individual color of the different instruments, both in solo and the mass. And the effect of the singing of the dominant melody on its successive appearances in different moods and lights was entrancingly brought out by the superb playing of the wood and brass wind. The conductor was recalled four times, with the climax of the evening's enthusiasm.

The very welcome and only soloist was Frieda Hempel, the famed coloratura soprano, fresh from her triumphs in London, England. She sang only two numbers, the aria "Deh Vieni" and the aria "Martern Aller Artern," both by Mozart. She made a complete conquest of her hearers, the purity of her exquisitely delicate voice and the pearl-like brilliancy of the florid passages in the second aria proving extremely fascinating. She was rapturously recalled again and again, but the inexorable laws of the Boston Orchestral Association forbade her to grant the encore so ardently desired. And the patrons of the concert had a real grievance in this matter, for they naturally considered it a high-handed proceeding to prevent the singer, after travelling perhaps some hundreds of miles to come here, from giving them an extra number or two.

Mons. Monteux demonstrated in the Liszt composition that he is an interpretative master, as well as being a splendid director.

TORONTO GLOBE NOV 8

But excellent as were the strings the wood wind was no less beautiful. The oboe melody in the first movement sang out with a dulcet smoothness and faultless intonation that are seldom heard from that instrument. The phrase in the Andante played by the horns in close harmony was rendered with the perfection of tone and nuance that one would hear only on an organ.

The closing Allegro showed something of the tonal volume of which the orchestra was capable, but not all. The utmost was reserved, with masterly art, for the great Liszt number that terminated the programme.

It was in the Liszt number that the full beauty of the brass and percussion section was displayed. Every mood from meditation to exultation finds expression in this work. From an opening unison pizzicato, deep and mystical, it develops until a stately phrase is announced by the brass in full confident harmony. Then follow sweeping melodies for 'cellos caught up by violins and little melodic snatches comment upon the most beautiful of horn harmony. Tone is piled on tone, rhythm takes a quicker movement until the end is reached in a maximum of tonal volume glowing and intense, the greatest fortissimo of the evening.

"Clouds" and "The White Peacock" were the two musical pictures that the orchestra offered between the Brahms and the Liszt. Frankly, we begrudged the time spent by the orchestra in playing them. The first is an alleged picture of clouds "builded superbly in the heights of heaven." In addition to the strings, it is scored for piccolo, three flutes, three oboes, clarinets, etc., and celesta, tam-tam and two harps. We cannot say what the tam tam did. The harps and the celesta tinkled prettily, but there was no conviction in the number. Rhythm was an independent between th various instruments as tonality was. The harps jingled in one key and the celesta jangled in another. It might have represented clouds to the composer's mind. To us it was reminiscent of fog.

"The White Peacock" was no better. This was supposed to be a musical picture of a white peacock moving through a sunlit garden of pomegranates, oleanders, magnolia and other beautiful things. In its lighter moments it was just as sketchy and indefinite and tinkly as "Clouds." When it broadened out it reminded us strongly as the "Proficere" in Elgar's Gerontius. Unresolvable discords are bad enough when they are noisy, but when you have them jangling in mincing little pianissimo passages you feel you want ot shtu the door.

We wish musicians who delight in heaven's lovely clouds and earth's beautiful gardens would be thankfully content to do as humbler mortals do, worship and be silent.

Needless to say, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played these numbers, as they played everything else, perfectly.

TORONTO-TELE. NOV. 8.

TORONTO-TELE. NOV. 8

TELE NOV 8

[22]

BOSTON AND BRAHMS GIVE TORONTO THRILLS

The Great Classic Orchestra Does Itself Credit With Classic Composer.

SUBDUED MONTEUX

Frieda Hempel, Coloraturist, Does Her Share in a Delightful Program.

By AUGUSTUS BRIDLE.

Brahms and Boston gave Toronto forty minutes of highly intellectual enthusiasm last evening. After nearly ten years absence what better re-introduction could Boston have here than Brahms—and in his Symphony No. 1? The management had thought to impress upon Mr. Monteux that a rather more iridescent program might suit us better; in any case not to begin with Brahms. But Boston was obdurate; Brahms came first; and nobody regretted it—except the Brahmsite who plays Old St. Andrew's organ and unavoidably late, missed it!

Never before has Brahms been so hailed with boisterous acclamations here. Or was it—Boston? Or—both? In any case rare combination. The audience seemed to hunger for Brahms. Yet, suppose it had been played by the splendid Cleveland Orchestra; or Detroit; or the Philharmonic? No, none of these could have woven the spell. Stokowski could have done it; did it last season with the No. 2, which he told me in Philadelphia has to emerge from perfect silence.

Boston persists as a great orchestra in spite of fate; as great now as ever, even with many of the old personnel gone; minus Muck, or Nikisch, or George Henschel its first conductor, and great friend of Brahms. These players could have played anything and made everybody happy.

There is a subdued enchantment about a Boston-Brahms program. Here is no common furore. Dignity holds her seat. Mr. Monteux is almost sculpturesquely dignified. He has no antics; no ecstasies; no rhapsodies; no glorious, perspiring exultations. Firmly he beats the time, delivers the accent, models the nuance, develops sonorous climax, declines to the diminuendo—all in perfect restraint, not without emotion.

But—what a band! Who could not conduct it? Such violins. Seldom does one get such a tone from seconds and violas; I have never heard violas so gorgeously insistent; and the nine double-basses were palisaded along the rear on a dais—the only disarrangement that Boston permits, with the result of far greater sonority.

Brahms No. 1—Beethoven's Tenth as Bulow seems to have said—has in its first movement enormous breadth of string sonority, stretching like a vast many-patterned rug; a very intellectual, not hectic, not even emotional movement. The Andante sweeps graciously in and weaves a grey spell of enchantment without a sob, but with such gravity and impressive sadness. The Allegretto develops more color, more abandon, with a number of delectations from various tone colors in the band, and a sedate dance that moves like a stately minuet; dulcet oboe solos embroidered with violas and two passages of perfectly wonderful pizzicati—all the strings answering one another. The Adagio, ushered in, after a brief pause but no interval, gives out a noble and plaintive theme from various sections which later in Beethovenian fashion interweaves with a fine march suggestive of the Hymn of Joy; later with a third sub-theme that is needed to furnish material for a great climax.

And when it's all done you sit and gaze back at what seems to have been a classic city of sound in the clouds; glad to have had the gates of Brahms' severe heaven opened by such an orchestra.

After ten minutes' intermission comes Frieda Hempel, a slender figure; blonde, smiling, tall and gracious—to warble an aria from the Marriage of Figaro, of Mozart. Pearls of limpid sweetness; divine nothings; Jenny Lind-like raptures of tone that never trouble the soul of any singer, but must be done perfectly. Frieda Hempel is perfect in her way; a singer who would be startled at a tone with any passion in it, and who seems capable of quietly doing anything that Mozart or Rossini ever wrote for the coloratura voice. She won seven recalls, but gave no encore. People seem to recognize perfection in miniature; and the cold chastity of these Mozart arias sung by Hempel came as a nice contrast to the Brahms; a vocalist who could do a large number of perfect form songs beautifully and must be a delight in some of the lighter operas; but for a whole program would be like trying to make garments out of pearl necklaces.

The two Griffes picturesques were exquisitely played with perfect nuances; the Clouds and the White Peacock; sensuous irresolutions made for the piano—on which they would be poor little attenuations, but from such an orchestra were very lovely indeed. This is program music de luxe; when you have a city of clouds and a white peacock to describe. But the poet Lamartine, as well as the composer, missed the point about the clouds—which might have seemed like a city but drifted away after the walls were up and the streets full of people; and a white peacock is far too exquisite for those to whom the swan is about the limit by way of musical aviation.

The evening wound up thunderously with a full-lunged orgy of orchestration from that master of the emotional senses in sound, Franz Liszt. How often have we heard Les Preludes done by inferior orchestras and colossal conductors. And how gorgeously the Bostonians delivered its rampant sonorities and its sad suggestions, when the whole great band grew into a hurricane of tonal energy and left nothing to be desired so far as Liszt was concerned—except to have made him gasp with exultation could he have heard it. Not such a wonderful program; but it left a wonderful trail and a yearning to hear Boston again—even by way of Brahms.

TORONTO-STAR NOV. 8.

MUSIC and DRAMA

VISITS of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Canada have always been rare and circumstances during the past decade have tended to make them rarer. Even after the difficulties created by the war were removed ill-luck seemed to dog arrangements for its coming so that for some of us the news that it was actually on the way seemed too good to be true. The concert at Massey Hall on Nov. 7th was a demonstration that despite the vicissitudes which preceded the appointment of Pierre Monteux as conductor, The Boston Symphony Orchestra is still one of the world's great musical organizations. Of the old faces I recognized but one, the white haired 'cellist, Alwyn Schroeder one of Wilhelm Gericke's old guard and a shining figure in the now disbanded Kneisel Quartette. Though much of the former membership has gone, absorbed chiefly by the New York Philharmonic-National Orchestra and the Detroit Orchestra; the new force that has been built up under Pierre Monteux is fully worthy of the traditions to which it succeeds. The orchestra is of superb quality in all sections; the strings are thrilling in elastic, sensuous quality; the Woodwind exquisitely pure and lyrical and the brass is gloriously mellow. The radiant plastic tone which the ensemble produces is superlatively fine.

Mr. Monteux is a conductor of uniquely varied experience who came to America a few years ago as conductor of the Daghilieff Russian Ballet. He had previously distinguished himself as a conductor of the Opera Comique in Paris and also conducted popular orchestral concerts in Paris. It was the brilliance he displayed as a conductor of summer concerts in New York shortly after his arrival in America that led to his engagement at Boston. Owing to the breadth of his training, his interpretations have more dramatic appeal than is usually associated with the French school of conducting, which tends to a cool and formal elegance. Ample elegance and distinction characterize his style, but probably his experience as an interpreter of richly dramatic Russian music no doubt broadened him on the temperamental side.

The chief work given at the Toronto concert was Brahms' lovely first Symphony in C minor. Last season one wrote of the ever growing popularity of Brahms now that the public had come to a finer understanding of his idiomatic genius, and it is amazing to learn that in the later seventies after its first presentation at Carlsruhe in 1876, this symphony was denounced as labored, crabbed, cryptic and dull. Those were the days of the Brahms-Wagner rivalry when the Wagnerians valiantly held that all absolute music was obsolete. The many hundreds of Torontonians who listened with enthusiasm to lyrical ecstacies of this work would regard as mad any critic of today who pronounced it crabbed or dull. All movements are interpenetrated with a glorious melodic impulse, and the final one "Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio" is superb in its poetic exaltation. Mr. Monteux seemed to show a little coldness in the first movement, but as the symphony proceeded developed glowing fervor. In the coda of the final movement he did not build up quite so massive an effect as does Albert Coates, who makes this particular movement his "piece de resistance," but Mr. Monteux's interpretation of the work as a whole was masterly in expression and intellectual grasp.

Though, as has been said, certain critics once derided this symphony, it is but fair to our forebears to say that from the outset it won a great deal of attention. This fact is shown by an incident related by Walter Damrosch. When news reached New York in 1877 that Brahms had completed a symphony curiosity was so great to hear it that Dr. Leopold Damrosch and Theodore Thomas, rival conductors were both eager to have the honor of presenting it for the first time in America. Thomas stole a march on his rival by securing a promise from the local music dealer who had control of the score and orchestral parts to sell them to him exclusively. Leopold Damrosch was in dismay, when a woman pupil called on him and presented him with a full copy of the score. She had simply gone to the dealer and purchased it from the dealer in the usual way, the latter having no suspicion that it was to be used for orchestral performance. Four copyists were at once set to work to transcribe the orchestral parts and Damrosch was able to surprise New York by presenting the work a week ahead of Thomas. This was in December 15, 1877. The new symphony thus got an invaluable advertisement in America at the very outset, though its popularity was to come years later.

Other works performed by Mr. Monteux were two exquisite descriptive pieces "Clouds" and "The White Peacock" by Charles Tomlinson Griffes, an American composer born at Elmira, N.Y. in 1884 who died untimely in 1920. He was a pupil of Humperdinck, who perhaps developed his delicate descriptive quality and rare gifts in instrumentation. It is interesting to note that the eminent Canadian singer Eva Gauthier has brought into prominence some of his songs in Oriental modes. Quite plainly Griffes was a genius of the minor order. Of these works and of Liszt's familiar but unfadingly fresh and noble tone poem "Les Preludes," the interpretations were richly poetic and colorful.

An added feature was the first appearance in Toronto of the beautiful lyric soprano, Frieda Hempel. She is a singer of enchanting appearance and wonderfully magnetic personality. Her voice is light, but wooing and tender, and of so even a quality that its tones in scale singing are like a string of perfectly matched pearls. She carries the conviction that she is first of all a musician, who uses her voice just as a great violinist uses his instrument for purposes of pure, inspired interpretation. Few singers convey such an impression and this combination of lovely voice with true musicianship makes her the ideal interpreter of Mozart. She sang two of his arias; one gay, "Deh Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and one pathetic, "Martern aller Artern" from "The Seraglio." The musical melodic delicacy of the composer and the refinement of his ornaments, were flawlessly interpreted by this mistress of that finest of vocal assets, a perfect legato style. Miss Hempel's triumph was immediate. The audience recalled her seven times, and she would gladly have sung again but that the rules of the Boston Symphony Orchestra forbid encores. However there will be other opportunities to hear her if all goes well, for Mr. Withrow immediately booked her for an individual concert next season.

This long-delayed concert was originally intended as a celebration of the 25th anniversary of the opening of Massey Hall; and must rank as a red-letter event in its illustrious record.

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Vladimir Resnikoff as soloist, inaugurated the orchestral concerts, which are to be an important feature of the Eastman Theater music enterprises, with a superb concert last night. If memory serves it was Beethovens "Eroica" which was the symphosy of the concert given in Rochester by the Boston Symphony some ten years ago under Dr. Muck's direction which was the last local concert by this great orchestra previous to last night; and it was Beethoren's "Eroica" that Pierre Monteaux chose for his opening number last night. Sisce Rochester last heard the Boston Symphony it has had its troubles; its best friends were saddened by what threatened to be a break from its high standards of performance, which admittedly set standards for orchestral performance in this country and paralleled standards anywhere. But under Monteaux's capable, indomitable and particularly well experienced direction the orchestra has been recovered to its ambitions, its mechanical superiority and its musicianly idealism; so much has been said of it by the Boston and New York experts who have heard it continuously and this may be well believed on last night's evidence.

The old refinement of tone is there; the beautiful plancy of sectional contribution to the orchestral tone quality, the corporate adaptability to every demand of the director are unquestionably re-established. In the symphony and again in the Wagner "Meistersinger" prelude, which was altogether gorgeous in tonal appeal, the realization of musical magnitude and sonority was as complete as one could wish. This orchestra eliminates all unmusical noise from its climax. In the Debussy "Afternoon of a Faun" the solo section capacity of this fine band was demonstrated in a performance that gave to Debussy's music the tonal beauty and elegance of execution upon which appreciation of the composers idiomatic suggestion of his subject depends for enjoyable realization. Monteaux expression and his own conviction of its logic is carried to hearers by the performance he gets from his orchestra.

Monteaux's quality was revealed amply in the symphony. He is not a "virtuoso" director: he is active, exact, marvously energetic; he has absolute command. A first impression of drillmasterism vanishes as the refinement of his efforts appear. The Beethoven was given a beautifully detailed reading; the music was completely revealed; it was legitimate, non-sensational, but dramatic and technically worked out to admirable finish. It was perhaps less emotionally exciting than some readings this same orchestra has played, but it would be hard to question the judgment and taste of it.

In the soloist of the evening Rochester has particular interest, since Vladimir Resnikoff is first violin of the Kilburn Quartet and one of the Eastman School men. He is young, has abounding and brilliant mechanics, and at his debut he might have been expected to choose a "display" medium. Instead he elected to be heard and judged in the Brahms concerto, which is a fine piece of music, not a show medium at all, except that to play it well requires not only a masterly violin management, but also a very genuine musical intelligence. Aside from an intricate cadenza, the violin is made the medium for expression of 'Brahms' ideas, some of them wholly direct and of appealing beauty, some of them more labored and less plainly attractive, but the whole moulded with the skill that belonged peculiarly to the composer.

It was good to see this young stranger artist, realizing, as he must, that he was playing a rather critical performance with a background which for excellence in detail could not be surpassed in orchestral accompaniments, grow out of a preliminary nervousness into absorbtion in his music, and make the violin sing melodies delightfully yielding to his bow a really charming tone, not particularly round or sonorous, but of searching intensity and a quality that reaches to the topmost notes. The tricky cadenza he managed excellently; if there were occasional slips from perfect clarity, they were few and never was there a slip from the voicing of the melodic beauties of the score. This was musical playing of a score that to play musically demands far more than technic. It is to be a pleasure to come to know Mr. Resnikoff's playing well in all its phases, as Rochester is likely to do this season.

There was a fine audience, late in getting seated and thereby somewhat disturbing to Mr. Monteaux who was compelled to wait several times in the symphony before beginning a movement. It is good to hear the Boston Symphony again and the audience made this plain, and showed its pleasure in Resnikoff's performance with cordial emphasis.

ROCHESTER-DEMOCRAT-NOV. 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ITS BEST

Personnel Changed, Wonderful Organization.

A brilliant audience welcomed the Boston Symphony orchestra with Pierre Monteux, conductor, in a recital in Elmwood Music hall last evening, this being the second of the "Musical Arts" series of concerts of which Bessie Bellanca is local manager.

The Boston Symphony orchestra again lives up to its reputation as a superb orchestral body, and although the personnel has changed from that under Dr. Muck's regime, it still remains one of the finest symphonic organizations, and under Pierre Monteux's scholarly direction continues to forge ahead in musical achievement.

Mr. Monteux is a musician cast in a heroic mold. He has the French elegance of style, a complete command of his players and his readings are marked by dramatic force and an exquisite sense of poetic form and outline.

The Tschaikowsky symphony in F minor was a masterly performance, one musical authority declaring it had not been played better even under the great Nikisch. The full beauty of the various choirs in the orchestra was effectively brought out, and the rondo movement evoked such applause that at the close Mr. Monteux was recalled three times to acknowledge the ovation.

The Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes, by Liszt, revealed the brilliant resources of both conductor and musicians and Mr. Monteux paid his players the compliment of having them rise to share the honors.

The haunting Prelude and "Love Death Music" from Tristan and Isolde" disclosed Mr. Monteux as a Wagnerian conductor of magnificent proportions. There was something of transcendent beauty about this performance which left the audience thrilled under the spell of its magic.

The climax to a splendid program was the Overture to Tannhauser in which Mr. Monteux revealed himself as a modernist, giving a reading of marked interest.

BUFFELO-COORIER-NOV-10

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTOR

By MARY M. HOWARD.

The second concert of the Musical Arts series, Bessie Bellanca, manager, which took place last evening in Elmwood Music hall, brought back to Buffalo, after an absence of several years, the Boston Symphony orchestra under its conductor of three seasons, Pierre Monteux. An audience of splendid proportions filled the hall and gave Mr. Monteux and his players most cordial welcome at the outset and enthusiastic recognition of the value of their work.

The programme included only very well known musical offerings, namely: Tschaikowski's fourth symphony; Liszt's The Preludes; the prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde, and the Tannhauser overture, Wagner. One novelty, at least, would have been very acceptable to Buffalo listeners, to whom the works presented last night are as familiar as household words. The symphony was a happy choice, not merely because of its intrinsic beauty, but because it was the one chosen for performance by the composer himself, when he visited this country in the season of 1891-1892 at the invitation of Andrew Carnegie, and was the dominating figure at the dedication of Carnegie hall, New York. This same symphony was first played by the Boston symphony orchestra in November, 1896, under the direction of Emil Paur.

Tschaikowski dedicated his fourth symphony to his best friend, Nadejda von Meck, a wealthy woman whom he never met, but who aided him when he was in dire financial need. He also outlined the definite programme upon which the work is founded, from the Fate motive that the horns and bassoons give out at the beginning, through the half sad, half sweet memories pictured in the second movement with its exquisite oboe theme, through the whimsical dream fancies of the scherzo, on to the close of the final movement, which makes frequent use of a well known Russian folksong, and is based on the motto: "Go among the people. See how they understand how to be happy," and portrays a popular merrymaking.

To this symphony, with its wonderful variety of mood, its varying panorama of tone pictures, Mr. Monteux brought the musicianly reading, the colorful delineation of a gifted and skilled conductor. With graceful and incisive gesture he secured from his men a performance marked by tonal beauty, striking effects of expression and admirable compactness. The movement of least interest was the scherzo, in which the pizzicati of the strings did not always sound clear and crisp. At the close of the symphony, Mr. Moneux was repeatedly recalled, and applause was divided between leader and led.

As a matter of interpretation, the highest mark of the evening was reached in the Tristan and Isolde excerpt. The tempos were admirably chosen, neither too fast nor too dragging, and there was beautiful proportion of the orchestral sections throughout. The Liszt Preludes also received effective and imaginative treatment which lent new interest to its familiar measures. A concervative performance of the Tannhauser overture brought the programme to a close, and the audience gave renewed proof of its enjoyment.

BUFFLO-EXPSS-NOV.10.

ORCHESTRA WINS NEW LAURELS IN FINE PROGRAM

Boston Symphony Concert in Bailey Hall Proves Notable Musical Event — Pierre Monteux Directs Playing of Numbers Unsurpassed For Beauty

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bailey Hall was in many ways reminiscent of that given in the same auditorium last December by this famous organization. Once more under the baton of Pierre Monteux was the same perfection of execution shown, the same artistic feeling and musicianship. But last night's program was even better than that played in Ithaca last year. It was a tremendous program, and one not soon to be forgotten, replete with sheer beauty and harmony. Mr. Monteux with his carefully chosen orchestra could hardly fail to make a concert a musical event, but when he selected the present program he made assurance doubly sure.

The second and last movement of the Brahms Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, would seem to come as near perfection as it is humanely possible to arrive, and the orchestra, individually and collectively, showed appreciation of the subtlety and charm of the music, the magicianly way in which it discloses treasure after treasure. Particularly notable were the flute passages and the recurrent horn motive. It is said that the composer spent nearly 16 years in writing this symphony, but for the wealth of musical material and perfection of detail finally attained the time seems short.

After a 10-minute intermission, the symphony was followed by Strauss' Don Juan, an exceedingly interesting piece of descriptive music in which the various love motifs alternate with the spirited passages, denoting the knight's wild career and final downfall. Two harps used in this number added much to the beauty of the score.

Few orchestral programs are now considered complete without one at least of Debussy's compositions. That played last evening was "L'spresmidi d'un Faune," full of unusual harmonization, and colorful passages. The flute solos played by G. Laurent were particularly haunting, and suggestive of the pagan pastoral atmosphere found in Mallarme's poem on which the prelude is founded.

Tchaikovsky's popular overture, written in commemoration of the repulse of Napoleon by the Russians in 1812, completed the program, and with its tremendous full orchestra passages, supplemented with cannon, made an excellent finale, as well as a striking contrast to the poetic rhapsody which preceded it. The introduction of the Marseillaise and the Russian hymn, striving with each other, produces a striking effect from a musical viewpoint, as well as serving the composer's purpose by typifying the conflict of the French and Russian armies. The overture contains notable thematic interludes as well as a great deal of glorious noise.

It is sometimes said that there is no beauty in modern music. Last evening's concert disproved that assertion for each composition had more than an intellectual interest, and more haunting melodies than one or two of the principal themes of the symphony it would be difficult to find. The audience was anxious for an encore, but wisely, at the conclusion of such a program, none was given, although the conductor was recalled many times.

Two welcome innovations in the arrangements for the concert also were worthy of note, the first looking to the comfort of the audience, and the second to that of the orchestra. The overhead lights which have dazzled and tired the collective eyes of every audience since Bailey Hall was built, were turned off during the concert for the first time, adding immeasurably to the enjoyment of the program, and the members of the orchestra were provided with additional stage lights and were seated on a special platform raised in tiers so that they were able to see the conductor much more easily than when all were on the same level. It is sincerely hoped that last evening's lighting arrangements will be followed in the subsequent concerts of the series.

ITHACA-NEWS-NOV. 11.

LARGE AUDIENCE ENJOYS CONCERT AT BAILEY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Second Appearance in University Concerts.

VARIED PROGRAM GIVEN

Old Masters Are Neglected, But Brahms' Symphony Sets Classic Note.

Another instance of the fact that no cloud is ever found without a silver lining was furnished last night to some 2300 Cornellians, faculty members and Ithacans who crowded Bailey Hall to capacity to hear the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Ithaca. This musical treat made ample amends to those who were unable to attend the festivities at New York.

As always, in technique, in tone, and in interpretation of the numbers given, this justly famous organization made good its claim to the position of the finest symphony orchestra in the United States. Under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French composer, who has led the orchestra for the past few years, a program was rendered last evening which left nothing to be desired, either in scope, or in execution.

Brahms Symphony Heads List

The classic style was represented by the First Brahms Symphony in C minor, one of the most marvelous pieces of musical composition in orchestral literature. The last two movements, particultrly with their majestic sweep, and exquisite grace, drew thunders of applause.

The more modern German and French schools were represented by Strauss and Debussy. The former's Tone Poem, Don Juan, was selected by Mr. Monteux, and its sensuous harmonies, thrilling climax, and supremely tragic finals were in striking contrast to Prelude from Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy. This work, with its whimsical, humorous passages, carried largely by the woodwind, was interpreted with a finish possible only as a result of the work of one of the best authorities on Debussy. The prelude, combining haunting, almost plaintive themes into a lovely idyll is justly classed as one of the finest pieces of contemporary composition.

Tschaikowsky Number

The last number was the dramatic "1812" Overture of Tschaikowsky, a stirring climactic battle-thing which commemorates the victory of the Russian over the French forces after the tragic retreat from Moscow. The serious note of the overture is set by a solemn theme carried in the first few measures on the 'cellos, and taken up by the violas, woodwind, brasses, and finally by the violins. The conflict between the Russian National Authem, carried on the strings, and the Marseillaise, typifying France, carried by the brasses, occupies the major portion of the composition, although a wierd Russian dance is interpolated. The overture ends with the triumph of the Russian, over the French air, and the stately march is, at the very last, rendered by all the pieces.

CORNELL-SUN-NOV. 11.

[23]

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A splendid program, consisting entirely of Russian music, with Oda Slobodskaja, the Russian prima donna, as soloist, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at Symphony hall at 3:30. The proceeds will go to the orchestra's pension fund for retired members. Mr. Monteux will conduct at this concert Himsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, gorgeous "Scheherazade." Mme. Slobodskaja, soprano of the Petrograd Grand Opera, who came to this country recently to appear jointly with the Ukrainian chorus, has offered her services and will sing with the orchestra arias from Tchaikovsky's opera "Pique Dame" and Borodin's "Prince Igor." Mr. Monteux will also conduct the Polovtsian dances from the latter opera, Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

FIVE EXTRA CONCERTS

The extra series [illegible] Boston Symphony [illegible], which were started last year with such great success, will be continued. They will be given on Monday evenings in Symphony Hall, Dec. 11, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 26 and April 23.

Mr. Monteux will present regular symphony programs at these concerts. The soloists will be Ernest Schelling, pianist and composer; Magdeleine Brard, pianist; Ester Ferrabini Jacchia, soprano, and Florence Macbeth, soprano. There will be one violin soloist, Renee Chemet.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will take place next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The program will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4, E minor; Bruch, concerto for violin, No. 1, G minor; Liszt, symphonic poem, "The Preludes." Carmel[illegible]ppolito will be the solo violinist.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Boston Symphony concerts, in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will conduct Bach's Suite in D major, the symphonic poem, "Polyphemus," by Davico, and d'Indy's great symphony in B-flat.

HERALD-NOV. 12.

MUSIC

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, with Vladimir Resnikoff as soloist, inaugurated the orchestral concerts, which are to be an important feature of the Eastman Theater music enterprises, with a superb concert last night. If memory serves it was Beethovens "Eroica" which was the symphosy of the concert given in Rochester by the Boston Symphony some ten years ago under Dr. Muck's direction which was the last local concert by this great orchestra previous to last night; and it was Beethoven's "Eroica" that Pierre Monteaux chose for his opening number last night. Sisce Rochester last heard the Boston Symphony it has had its troubles; its best friends were saddened by what threatened to be a break from its high standards of performance, which admittedly set standards for orchestral performance in this country and paralleled standards anywhere. But under Monteaux's capable, indomitable and particularly well experienced direction the orchestra has been recovered to its ambitions, its mechanical superiority and its musicianly idealism; so much has been said of it by the Boston and New York experts who have heard it continuously and this may be well believed on last night's evidence.

The old refinement of tone is there; the beautiful plancy of sectional contribution to the orchestral tone quality, the corporate adaptability to every demand of the director are unquestionably re-established. In the symphony and again in the Wagner "Meistersinger" prelude, which was altogether gorgeous in tonal appeal, the realization of musical magnitude and sonority was as complete as one could wish. This orchestra eliminates all unmusical noise from its climax. In the Debussy "Afternoon of a Faun" the solo section capacity of this fine band was demonstrated in a performance that gave to Debussy's music the tonal beauty and elegance of execution upon which appreciation of the composers idiomatic suggestion of his subject depends for enjoyable realization. Monteaux expression and his own conviction of its logic is carried to hearers by the performance he gets from his orchestra.

Monteaux's quality was revealed amply in the symphony. He is not a "virtuoso" director: he is active, exact, marvously energetic; he has absolute command. A first impression of drill-masterism vanishes as the refinement of his efforts appear. The Beethoven was given a beautifully detailed reading; the music was completely revealed; it was legitimate, non-sensational, but dramatic and technically worked out to admirable finish. It was perhaps less emotionally exciting than some readings this same orchestra has played, but it would be hard to question the judgment and taste of it.

In the soloist of the evening Rochester has particular interest, since Vladimir Resnikoff is first violin of the Kilburn Quartet and one of the Eastman School men. He is young, has abounding and brilliant mechanics, and at his debut he might have been expected to choose a "display" medium. Instead he elected to be heard and judged in the Brahms concerto, which is a fine piece of music, not a show medium at all, except that to play it well requires not only a masterly violin management, but also a very genuine musical intelligence. Aside from an intricate cadenza, the violin is made the medium for expression of 'Brahms' ideas, some of them wholly direct and of appealing beauty, some of them more labored and less plainly attractive, but the whole moulded with the skill that belonged peculiarly to the composer.

It was good to see this young stranger artist, realizing, as he must, that he was playing a rather critical performance with a background which for excellence in detail could not be surpassed in orchestral accompaniments, grow out of a preliminary nervousness into absorbtion in his music, and make the violin sing melodies delightfully yielding to his bow a really charming tone, not particularly round or sonorous, but of searching intensity and a quality that reaches to the topmost notes. The tricky cadenza he managed excellently; if there were occasional slips from perfect clarity, they were few and never was there a slip from the voicing of the melodic beauties of the score. This was musical playing of a score that to play musically demands far more than technic. It is to be a pleasure to come to know Mr. Resnikoff's playing well in all its phases, as Rochester is likely to do this season.

There was a fine audience, late in getting seated and thereby somewhat disturbing to Mr. Monteaux who was compelled to wait several times in the symphony before beginning a movement. It is good to hear the Boston Symphony again and the audience made this plain, and showed its pleasure in Resnikoff's performance with cordial emphasis.

ROCHESTER-DEMCRT-N[illegible]

BOSTON SYMPHONY HEARD AT ITS BEST

Personnel Changed, Wonderful Organization.

A brilliant audience welcomed the Boston Symphony orchestra with Pierre Monteux, conductor, in a recital in Elmwood Music hall last evening, this being the second of the "Musical Arts" series of concerts of which Bessie Bellanca is local manager.

The Boston Symphony orchestra again lives up to its reputation as a superb orchestral body, and although the personnel has changed from that under Dr. Muck's regime, it still remains one of the finest symphonic organizations, and under Pierre Monteux's scholarly direction continues to forge ahead in musical achievement.

Mr. Monteux is a musician cast in a heroic mold. He has the French elegance of style, a complete command of his players and his readings are marked by dramatic force and an exquisite sense of poetic form and outline.

The Tschaikowsky symphony in F minor was a masterly performance, one musical authority declaring it had not been played better even under the great Nikisch. The full beauty of the various choirs in the orchestra was effectively brought out, and the rondo movement evoked such applause that at the close Mr. Monteux was recalled three times to acknowledge the ovation.

The Symphonic Poem, Les Preludes, by Liszt, revealed the brilliant resources of both conductor and musicians and Mr. Monteux paid his players the compliment of having them rise to share the honors.

The haunting Prelude and "Love Death Music" from Tristan and Isolde" disclosed Mr. Monteux as a Wagnerian conductor of magnificent proportions. There was something of transcendent beauty about this performance which left the audience thrilled under the spell of its magic.

The climax to a splendid program was the Overture to Tannhauser in which Mr. Monteux revealed himself as a modernist, giving a reading of marked interest.

BUFFELO-COURIER-NOV-10

BOSTON SYMPHONY WITH PIERRE MONTEUX CONDUCTOR

By MARY M. HOWARD.

The second concert of the Musical Arts series, Bessie Bellanca, manager, which took place last evening in Elmwood Music hall, brought back to Buffalo, after an absence of several years, the Boston Symphony orchestra under its conductor of three seasons, Pierre Monteux. An audience of splendid proportions filled the hall and gave Mr. Monteux and his players most cordial welcome at the outset and enthusiastic recognition of the value of their work.

The programme included only very well known musical offerings, namely: Tschaikowski's fourth symphony; Liszt's The Preludes; the prelude and Love Death from Tristan and Isolde, and the Tannhauser overture, Wagner. One novelty, at least would have been very acceptable to Buffalo listeners, to whom the works presented last night are as familiar as household words. The symphony was a happy choice, not merely because of its intrinsic beauty, but because it was the one chosen for performance by the composer himself, when he visited this country in the season of 1891-1892 at the invitation of Andrew Carnegie, and was the dominating figure at the dedication of Carnegie hall, New York. This same symphony was first played by the Boston symphony orchestra in November, 1896, under the direction of Emil Paur.

Tschaikowski dedicated his fourth symphony to his best friend, Nadejda von Meck, a wealthy woman whom he never met, but who aided him when he was in dire financial need. He also outlined the definite programme upon which the work is founded, from the Fate motive that the horns and bassoons give out at the beginning, through the half sad, half sweet memories pictured in the second movement with its exquisite oboe theme, through the whimsical dream fancies of the scherzo, on to the close of the final movement, which makes frequent use of a well known Russian folksong, and is based on the motto: "Go among the people. See how they understand how to be happy," and portrays a popular merrymaking.

To this symphony, with its wonderful variety of mood, its varying panorama of tone pictures, Mr. Monteux brought the musicianly reading, the colorful delineation of a gifted and skilled conductor. With graceful and incisive gesture he secured from his men a performance marked by tonal beauty, striking effects of expression and admirable compactness. The movement of least interest was the scherzo, in which the pizzicati of the strings did not always sound clear and crisp. At the close of the symphony, Mr. Moneux was repeatedly recalled, and applause was divided between leader and led.

As a matter of interpretation, the highest mark of the evening was reached in the Tristan and Isolde excerpt. The tempos were admirably chosen, neither too fast nor too dragging, and there was beautiful proportion of the orchestral sections throughout. The Liszt Preludes also received effective and imaginative treatment which lent new interest to its familiar measures. A concervative performance of the Tannhauser overture brought the programme to a close, and the audience gave renewed proof of its enjoyment.

BUF[illegible]-NOV. 1[illegible]

ORCHESTRA WINS NEW LAURELS IN FINE PROGRAM

Boston Symphony Concert in Bailey Hall Proves Notable Musical Event — Pierre Monteux Directs Playing of Numbers Unsurpassed For Beauty

Last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Bailey Hall was in many ways reminiscent of that given in the same auditorium last December by this famous organization. Once more under the baton of Pierre Monteux was the same perfection of execution shown, the same artistic feeling and musicianship. But last night's program was even better than that played in Ithaca last year. It was a tremendous program, and one not soon to be forgotten, replete with sheer beauty and harmony. Mr. Monteux with his carefully chosen orchestra could hardly fail to make a concert a musical event, but when he selected the present program he made assurance doubly sure.

The second and last movement of the Brahms Symphony, No. 1, in C minor, would seem to come as near perfection as it is humanely possible to arrive, and the orchestra, individually and collectively, showed appreciation of the subtlety and charm of the music, the magicianly way in which it discloses treasure after treasure. Particularly notable were the flute passages and the recurrent horn motive. It is said that the composer spent nearly 16 years in writing this symphony, but for the wealth of musical material and perfection of detail finally attained the time seems short.

After a 10-minute intermission, the symphony was followed by Strauss' Don Juan, an exceedingly interesting piece of descriptive music in which the various love motifs alternate with the spirited passages, denoting the knight's wild career and final downfall. Two harps used in this number added much to the beauty of the score.

Few orchestral programs are now considered complete without one at least of Debussy's compositions. That played last evening was "L'spresmidi d'un Faune," full of unusual harmonization, and colorful passages. The flute solos played by G. Laurent were particularly haunting, and suggestive of the pagan pastoral atmosphere found in Mallarme's poem on which the prelude is founded.

Tchaikovsky's popular overture, written in commemoration of the repulse of Napoleon by the Russians in 1812, completed the program, and with its tremendous full orchestra passages, supplemented with cannon, made an excellent finale, as well as a striking contrast to the poetic rhapsody which preceded it. The introduction of the Marseillaise and the Russian hymn, striving with each other, produces a striking effect from a musical viewpoint, as well as serving the composer's purpose by typifying the conflict of the French and Russian armies. The overture contains notable thematic interludes as well as a great deal of glorious noise.

It is sometimes said that there is no beauty in modern music. Last evening's concert disproved that assertion for each composition had more than an intellectual interest, and more haunting melodies than one or two of the principal themes of the symphony it would be difficult to find. The audience was anxious for an encore, but wisely, at the conclusion of such a program, none was given, although the conductor was recalled many times.

Two welcome innovations in the arrangements for the concert also were worthy of note, the first looking to the comfort of the audience, and the second to that of the orchestra. The overhead lights which have dazzled and tired the collective eyes of every audience since Bailey Hall was built, were turned off during the concert for the first time, adding immeasurably to the enjoyment of the program, and the members of the orchestra were provided with additional stage lights and were seated on a special platform raised in tiers so that they were able to see the conductor much more easily than when all were on the same level. It is sincerely hoped that last evening's lighting arrangements will be followed in the subsequent concerts of the series.

ITHACA-NEWS-NOV. 11.

LARGE AUDIENCE ENJOYS CONCERT AT BAILEY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra Makes Second Appearance in University Concerts.

VARIED PROGRAM GIVEN

Old Masters Are Neglected, But Brahms' Symphony Sets Classic Note.

Another instance of the fact that no cloud is ever found without a silver lining was furnished last night to some 2300 Cornellians, faculty members and Ithacans who crowded Bailey Hall to capacity to hear the second Boston Symphony Orchestra concert at Ithaca. This musical treat made ample amends to those who were unable to attend the festivities at New York.

As always, in technique, in tone, and in interpretation of the numbers given, this justly famous organization made good its claim to the position of the finest symphony orchestra in the United States. Under the leadership of Pierre Monteux, the distinguished French composer, who has led the orchestra for the past few years, a program was rendered last evening which left nothing to be desired, either in scope, or in execution.

Brahms Symphony Heads List

The classic style was represented by the First Brahms Symphony in C minor, one of the most marvelous pieces of musical composition in orchestral literature. The last two movements, particultrly with their majestic sweep, and exquisite grace, drew thunders of applause.

The more modern German and French schools were represented by Strauss and Debussy. The former's Tone Poem, Don Juan, was selected by Mr. Monteux, and its sensuous harmonies, thrilling climax, and supremely tragic finals were in striking contrast to Prelude from Afternoon of a Faun by Debussy. This work, with its whimsical, humorous passages, carried largely by the woodwind, was interpreted with a finish possible only as a result of the work of one of the best authorities on Debussy. The prelude, combining haunting, almost plaintive themes into a lovely idyll is justly classed as one of the finest pieces of contemporary composition.

Tschaikowsky Number

The last number was the dramatic "1812" Overture of Tschaikowsky, a stirring climactic battle-thing which commemorates the victory of the Russian over the French forces after the tragic retreat from Moscow. The serious note of the overture is set by a solemn theme carried in the first few measures on the 'cellos, and taken up by the violas, woodwind, brasses, and finally by the violins. The conflict between the Russian National Authem, carried on the strings, and the Marseillaise, typifying France, carried by the brasses, occupies the major portion of the composition, although a wierd Russian dance is interpolated. The overture ends with the triumph of the Russian, over the French air, and the stately march is, at the very last, rendered by all the pieces.

CORNELL-SUN-NOV. 11.

[23]

PENSION FUND CONCERT

A splendid program, consisting entirely of Russian music, with Oda Slobodskaja, the Russian prima donna, as soloist, will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this afternoon at Symphony hall at 3:30. The proceeds will go to the orchestra's pension fund for retired members. Mr. Monteux will conduct at this concert Himsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, gorgeous "Scheherazade." Mme. Slobodskaja, soprano of the Petrograd Grand Opera, who came to this country recently to appear jointly with the Ukrainian chorus, has offered her services and will sing with the orchestra arias from Tchaikovsky's opera "Pique Dame" and Borodin's "Prince Igor." Mr. Monteux will also conduct the Polovtsian dances from the latter opera, Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" and Tchaikovsky's "1812" overture.

FIVE EXTRA CONCERTS

The extra series of five Boston Symphony concerts, which were started last year with such great success, will be continued. They will be given on Monday evenings in Symphony Hall, Dec. 11, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 26 and April 23.

Mr. Monteux will present regular symphony programs at these concerts. The soloists will be Ernest Schelling, pianist and composer; Magdeleine Brard, pianist; Ester Ferrabini Jacchia, soprano, and Florence Macbeth, soprano. There will be one violin soloist, Renee Chemet.

CAMBRIDGE SYMPHONY

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will take place next Thursday evening at 8 o'clock. The program will be as follows: Brahms, Symphony No. 4, E minor; Bruch, concerto for violin, No. 1, G minor; Liszt, symphonic poem, "The Preludes." Carmela Ippolito will be the solo violinist.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Boston Symphony concerts, in Symphony Hall, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteux will conduct Bach's Suite in D major, the symphonic poem, "Polyphemus," by Davico, and d'Indy's great symphony in B-flat.

H[illegible] N. 12.

MONTEUX

Musical Arts

Presents

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

ELMWOOD MUSIC HALL

Thursday Evening, November 9, 1922

Direction BESSIE BELLANCA

Taking cue from Mr. Monteux, Mr. Damrosch has set afoot a "Conductors' Fund" for the relief of Mr. Gericke's needs. To it he himself, Mr. Stock, Mr. Stokowski, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Gabrilowitsch has each subscribed $500. With Mr. Hertz and Mr. Bodansky, they are also committee to further the whole project.

TRANS- NOV. 16.

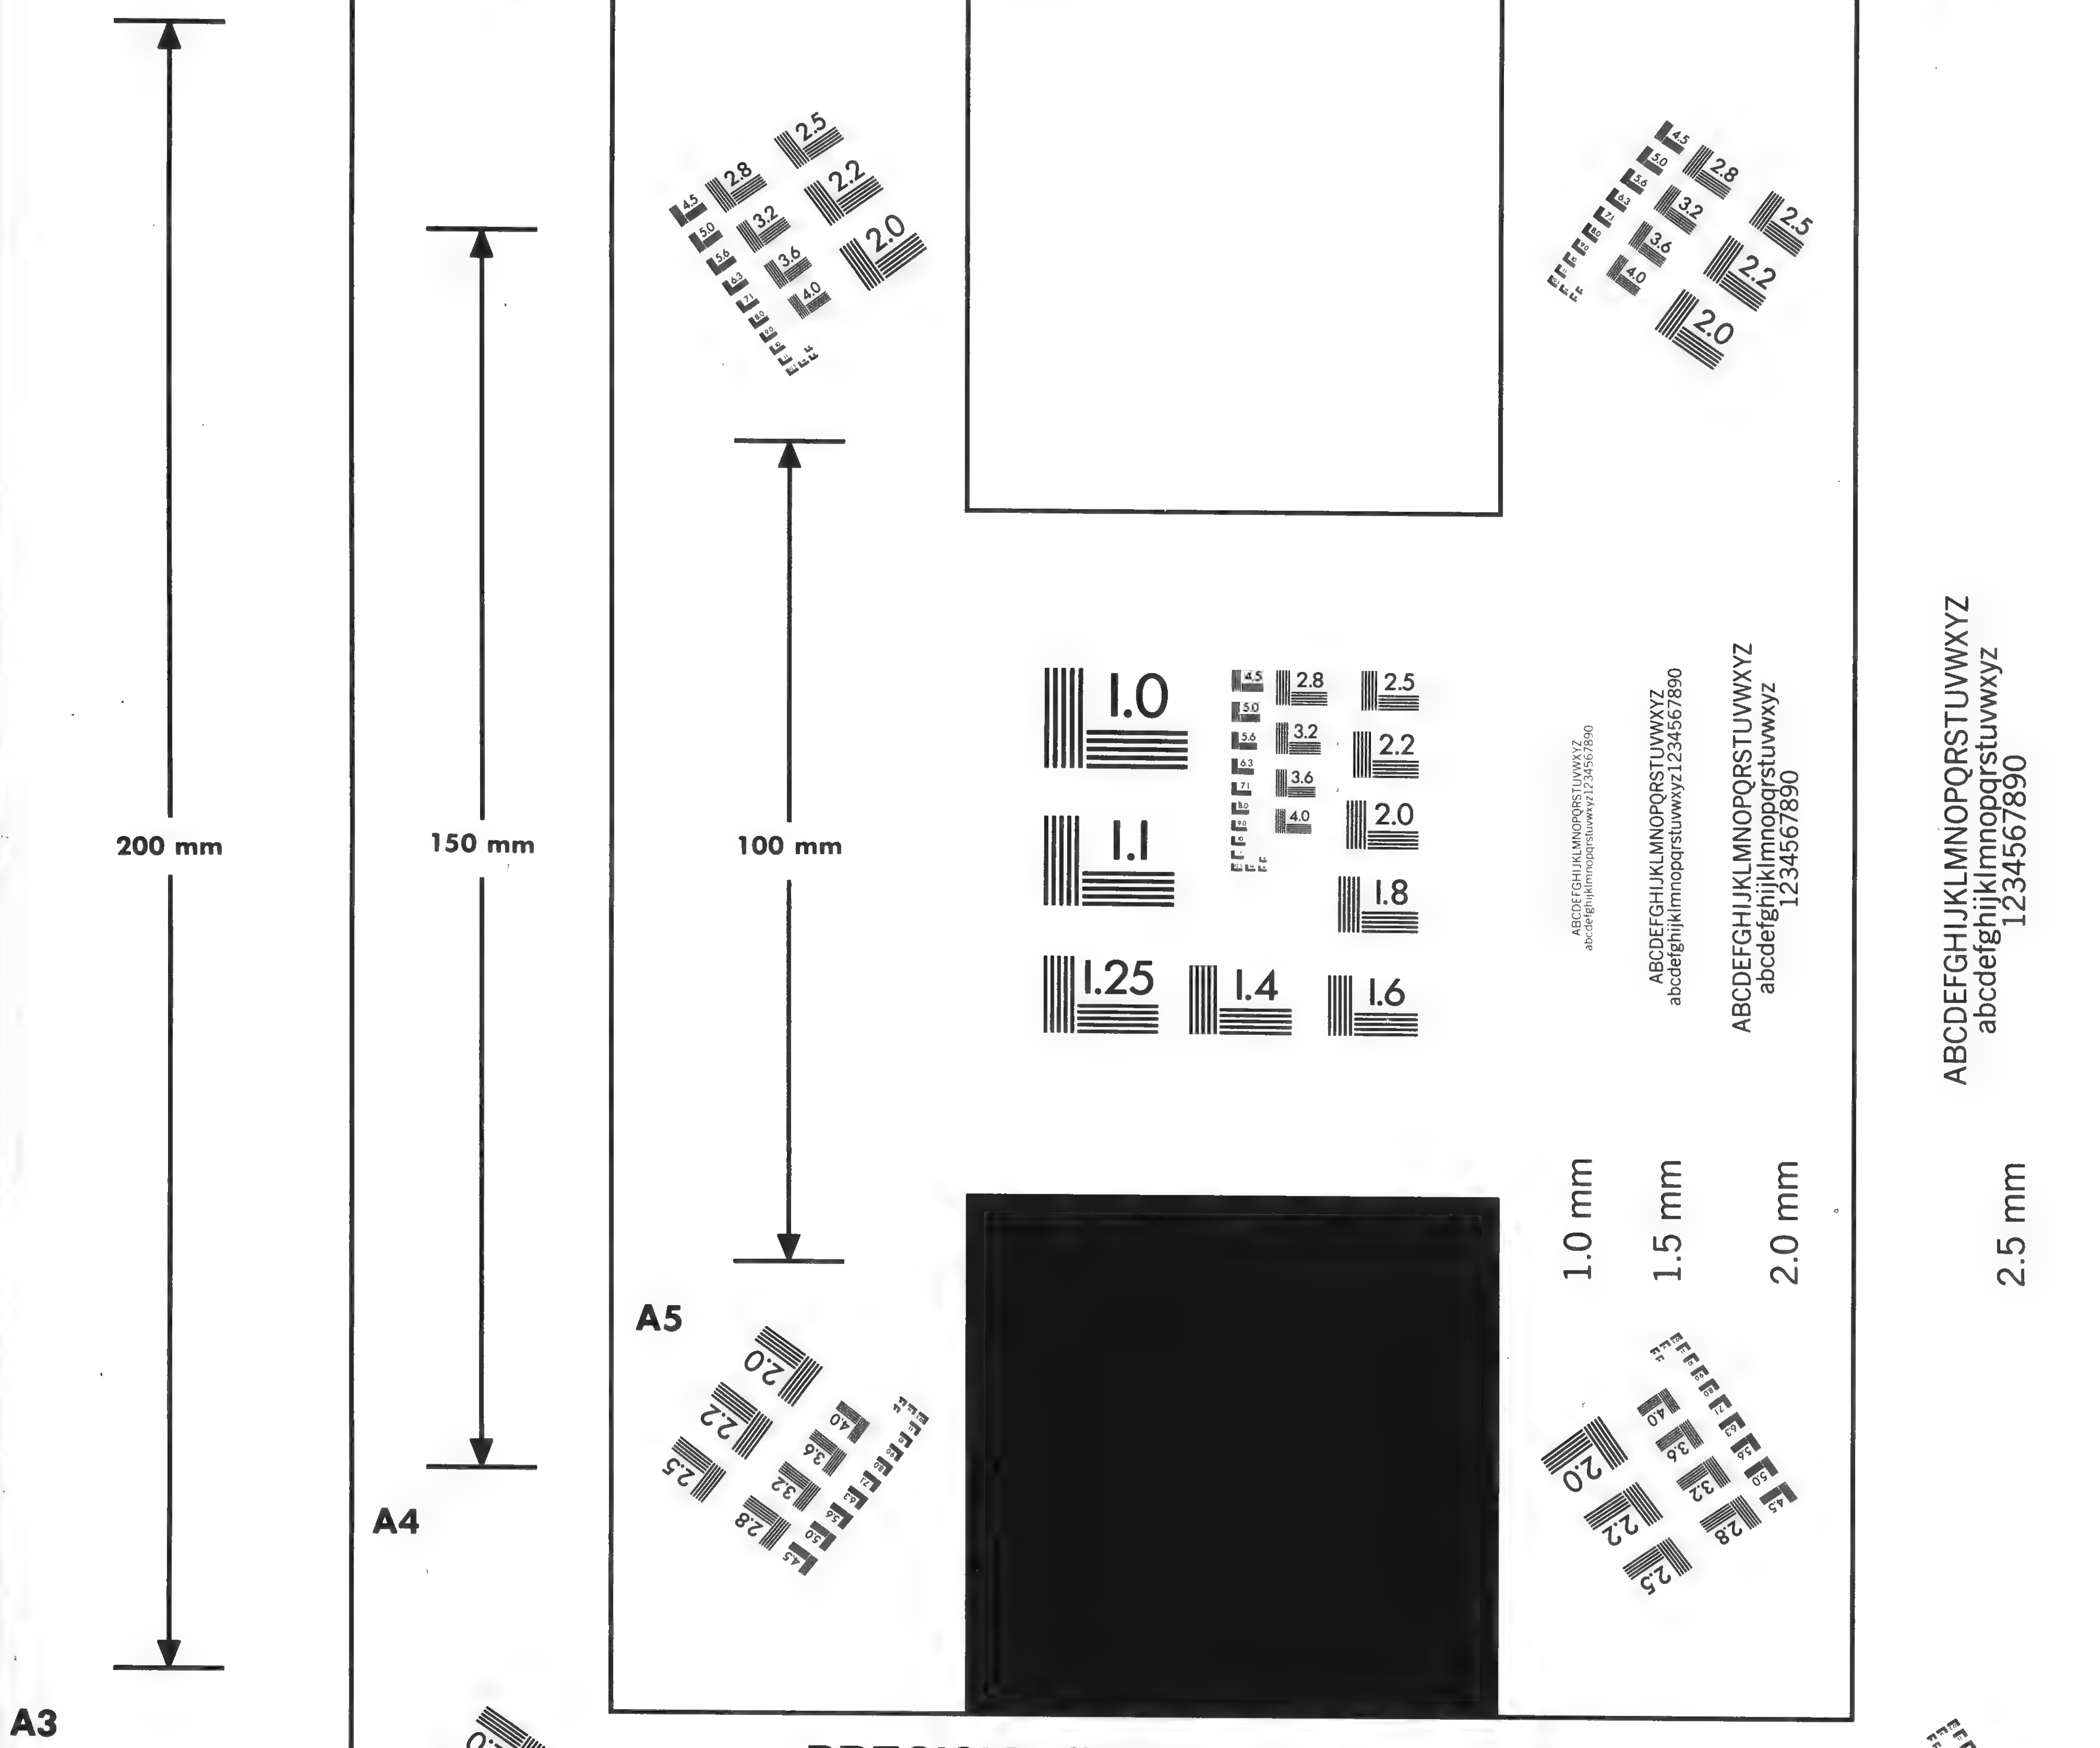
Davico's Cyclops

Rarely does Mr. Monteux set a programme for one of the twenty-four pairs of Symphony Concerts upon which may not be found either new or unfamiliar music, and his list for the concerts of this week contains, in Davico's symphonic poem "Polyphemus," a novelty from the hand of a composer little known hereabouts. Only once before has music by Davico been publicly heard in Boston, when his imaginative "Roman Impressions" were played at a concert of the Boston Musical Association in February, 1921. The few facts concerning Davico then set down in these columns may now be recalled. Born in Italy in 1889, Vincenzo Davico studied at Turin and later under Max Reger at Leipzig. A few short pieces for orchestra, pieces for voice and for piano, and chamber-music, together with an opera "La Dogaressa" and an oratorio based on Flaubert's "Temptation of Saint Anthony," make up the sum of his compositions. According to his fellow countryman, the critic Guido Gatti, Davico was one of the first of the Italians to show in his writing the influence of Debussy, tending in his instrumentation to use "positive color," and inclining toward the "non-complication of orchestral tissue." Mr. Gatti further characterizes Davico, the man: "A delicate, sensitive spirit, with a tendency to con-

TRANS- NOV. 16.

REDUCTION
RATIO
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

Musical Arts

Announces

MISCHA ELMAN
Celebrated Russian Violinist
Thursday Evening, December 14th
Prices: $2.75, $2.20, $1.65 and $1.10
(Including War Tax)

FEODOR CHALIAPIN
World's Greatest Basso-Baritone
Thursday Evening, January 25th
Prices: $3.30, $2.75, $2.20 and $1.10
(Including War Tax)

MARIA JERITZA
Sensational New Prima Donna of the Metropolitan Opera Company
Tuesday Evening, March 20th
Prices: $3.30, $2.75, $2.20 and $1.10
(Including War Tax)

Tickets Now for All Concerts

COLONIAL FLOWER SHOP

230 Delaware Avenue

Program

Tchaikovsky	Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Opus 36
Liszt	Symphonic Poem No 3, "Les Préludes" (after Lamartine)
Wagner	Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"
Wagner	Overture to "Tannhäuser"

Taking cue from Mr. Monteux, Mr. Damrosch has set afoot a "Conductors' Fund" for the relief of Mr. Gericke's needs. To it he himself, Mr. Stock, Mr. Stokowski, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Gabrilowitsch has each subscribed $500. With Mr. Hertz and Mr. Bodanzky, they are also committee to further the whole project.

TRANS - NOV. 16.

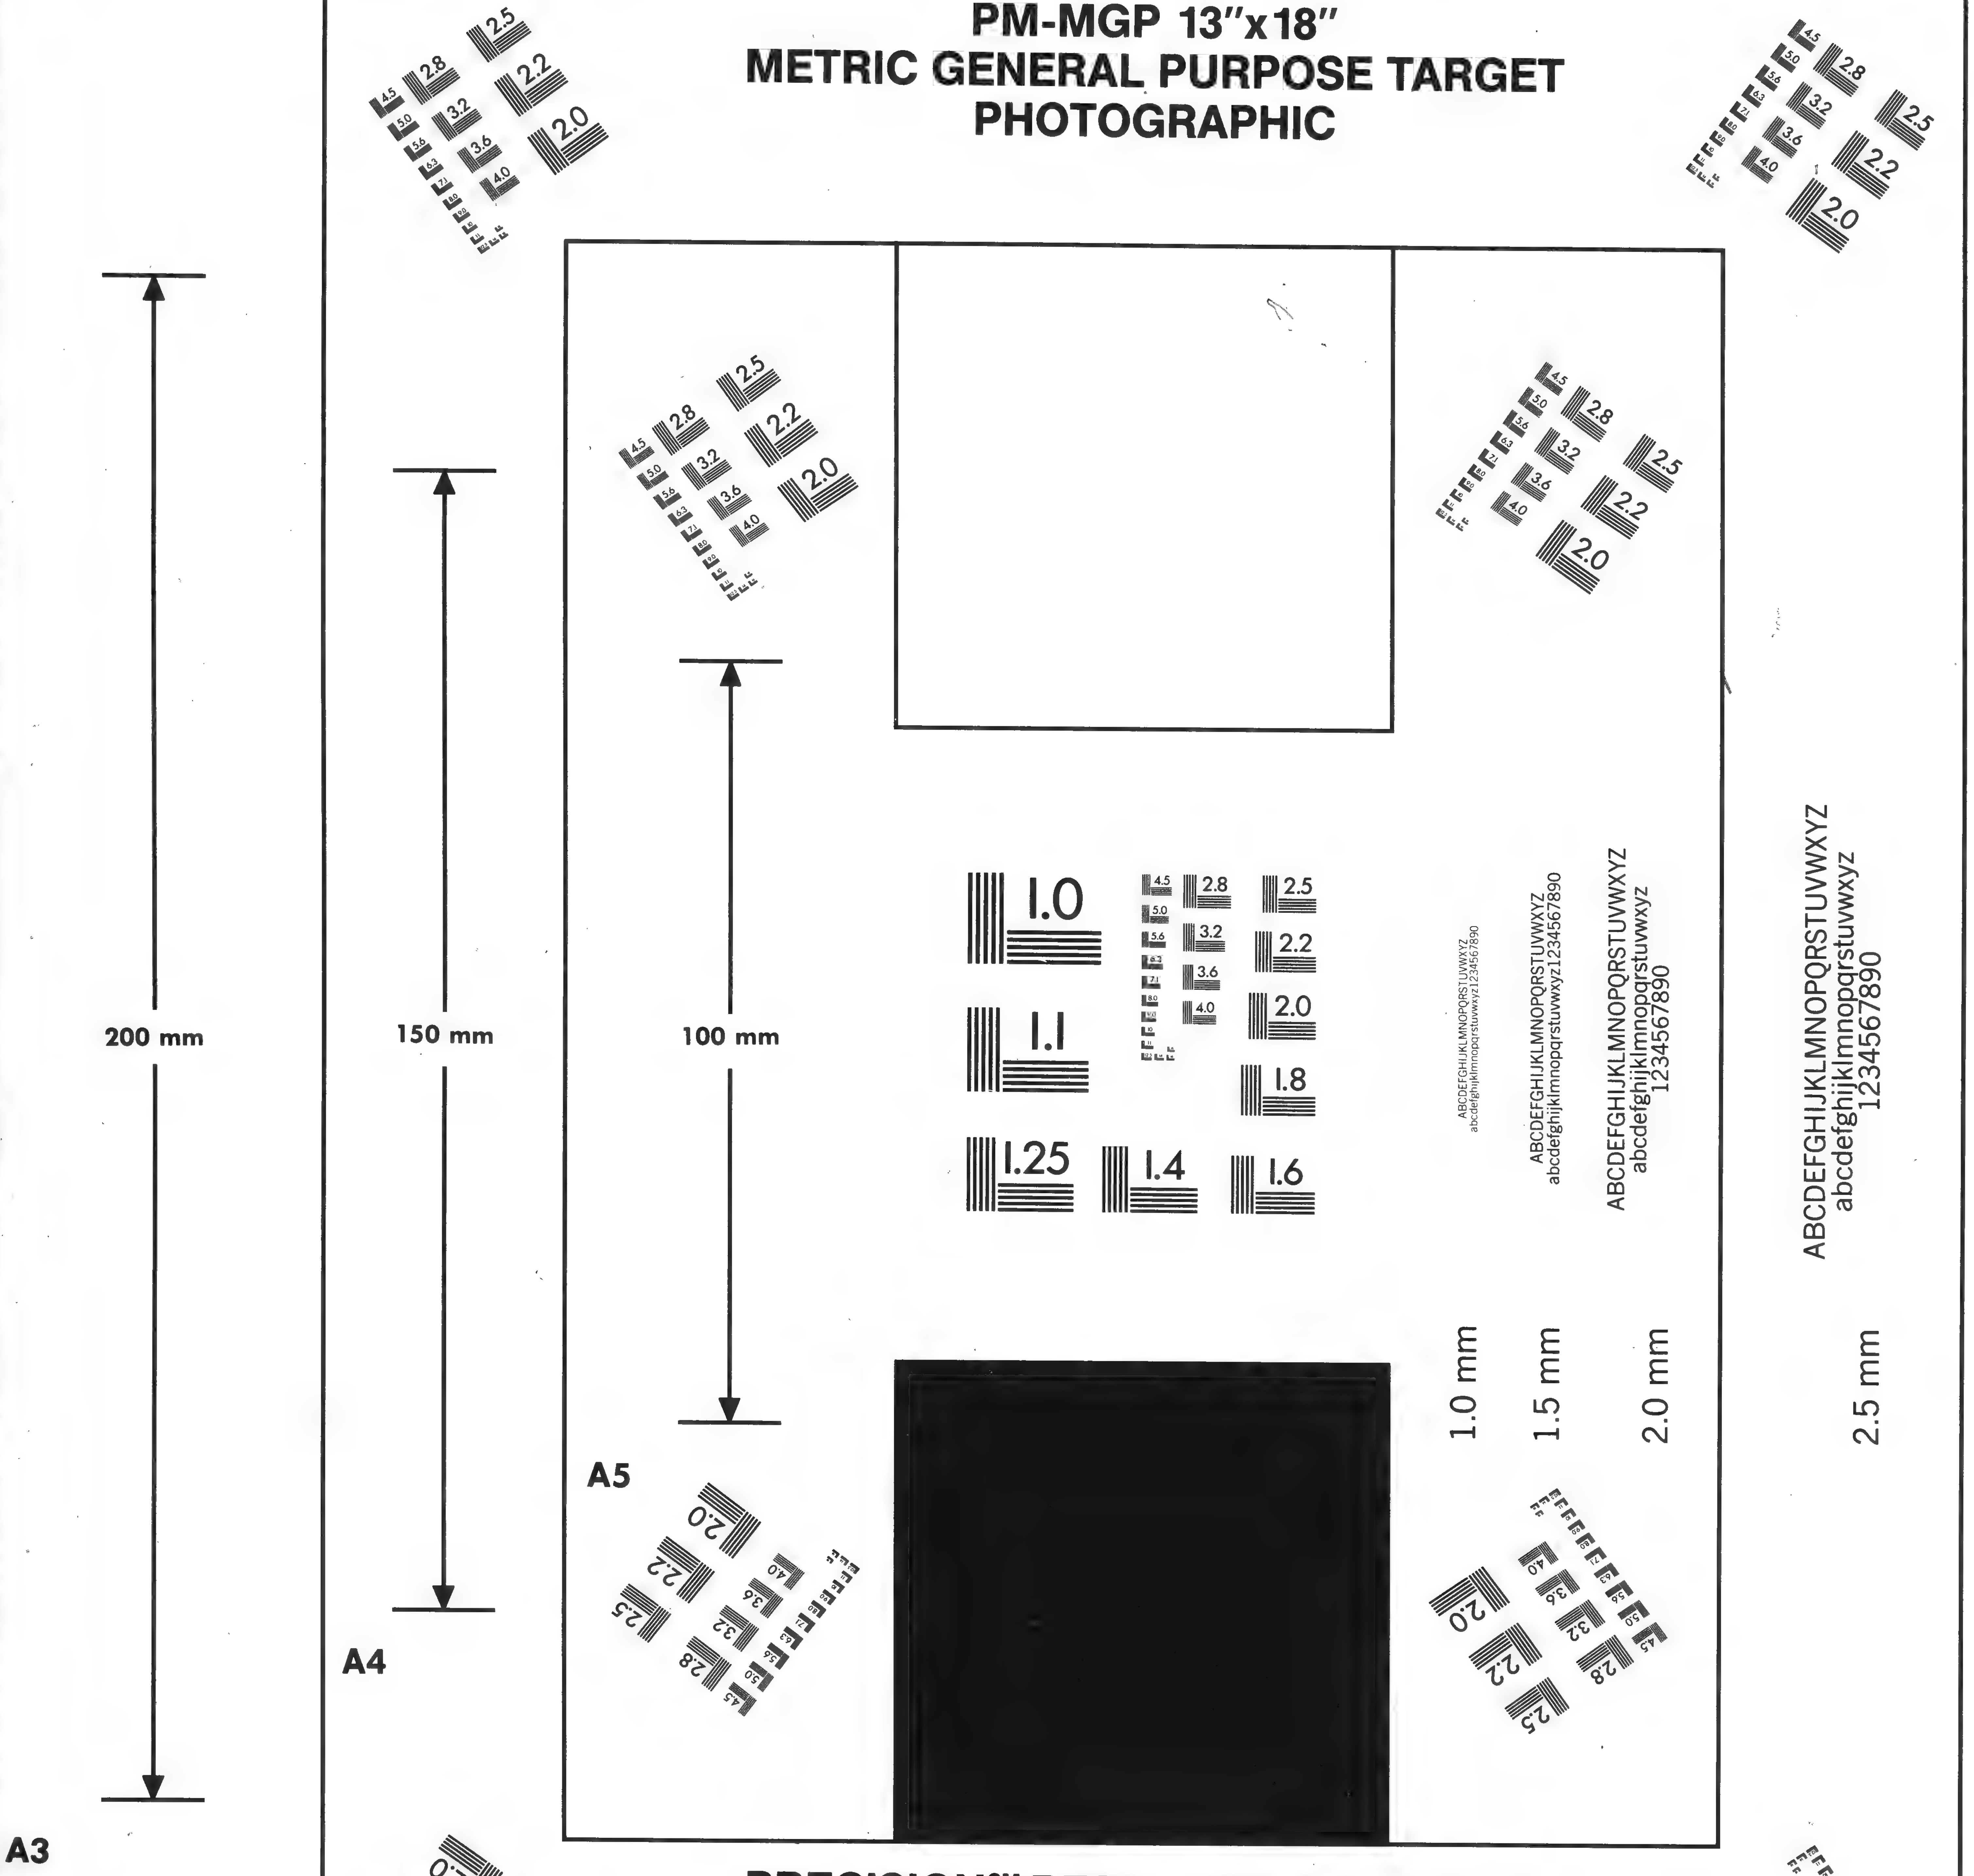
Davico's Cyclops

Rarely does Mr. Monteux set a programme for one of the twenty-four pairs of Symphony Concerts upon which may not be found either new or unfamiliar music, and his list for the concerts of this week contains, in Davico's symphonic poem "Polyphemus," a novelty from the hand of a composer little known hereabouts. Only once before has music by Davico been publicly heard in Boston, when his imaginative "Roman Impressions" were played at a concert of the Boston Musical Association in February, 1921. The few facts concerning Davico then set down in these columns may now be recalled. Born in Italy in 1889, Vincenzo Davico studied at Turin and later under Max Reger at Leipzig. A few short pieces for orchestra, pieces for voice and for piano, and chamber-music, together with an opera "La Dogaressa" and an oratorio based on Flaubert's "Temptation of Saint Anthony," make up the sum of his compositions. According to his fellow countryman, the critic Guido Gatti, Davico was one of the first of the Italians to show in his writing the influence of Debussy, tending in his instrumentation to use "positive color," and inclining toward the "non-complication of orchestral tissue." Mr. Gatti further characterizes Davico, the man: "A delicate, sensitive spirit, with a tendency to con-

TRANS - NOV. 16.

REDUCTION
RATIO
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MONTEUX

Musical Arts

Presents

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

PIERRE MONTEUX, Conductor

ELMWOOD MUSIC HALL

Thursday Evening, November 9, 1922

Direction BESSIE BELLANCA

Taking cue from Mr. Monteux, Mr. Damrosch has set afoot a "Conductors' Fund" for the relief of Mr. Gericke's needs. To it he himself, Mr. Stock, Mr. Stokowski, Mr. Monteux and Mr. Gabrilowitsch has each subscribed $500. With Mr. Hertz and Mr. Bodanzky, they are also committee to further the whole project.

TRANS-NOV. 16.

Davico's Cyclops

Rarely does Mr. Monteux set a programme for one of the twenty-four pairs of Symphony Concerts upon which may not be found either new or unfamiliar music, and his list for the concerts of this week contains, in Davico's symphonic poem "Polyphemus," a novelty from the hand of a composer little known hereabouts. Only once before has music by Davico been publicly heard in Boston, when his imaginative "Roman Impressions" were played at a concert of the Boston Musical Association in February, 1921. The few facts concerning Davico then set down in these columns may now be recalled. Born in Italy in 1889, Vincenzo Davico studied at Turin and later under Max Reger at Leipzig. A few short pieces for orchestra, pieces for voice and for piano, and chamber-music, together with an opera "La Dogaressa" and an oratorio based on Flaubert's "Temptation of Saint Anthony," make up the sum of his compositions. According to his fellow countryman, the critic Guido Gatti, Davico was one of the first of the Italians to show in his writing the influence of Debussy, tending in his instrumentation to use "positive color," and inclining toward the "non-complication of orchestral tissue." Mr. Gatti further characterizes Davico, the man: "A delicate, sensitive spirit, with a tendency to con-

TRANS-NOV. 16.

Carmela Ippolito Plays With Boston Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was assisted by Carmela Ippolito, violinist, at the concert given last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. The purely orchestral compositions were Brahms' 4th Symphony, perhaps the finest reading of Brahms that Mr. Monteux has given here, and already heard at the Boston concerts, and the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," of Liszt. Miss Ippolito played the Burch G minor concerto.

Appearing for the first time with the Boston Symphony, Miss Ippolito made an excellent impression. Her talent had already attracted much attention. Fortunately, it has been carefully and systematically developed. She played last night, not only with technical brilliancy and uncommon beauty of tone, but with a poise and a sense of fine proportions which older and more experienced virtuosi might envy.

The broad phrases of the opening were firmly and beautifully moulded and the recitative had dramatic feeling. The tone was always full and warm, not only on the lower strings but in the upper registers of the instrument. In passages of figuration there was security as well as brilliancy of style.

Specialists in the technic of the violin might descant on details. It is a more important and fundamental matter to observe that last night at the outset of her career, and under the strain of an important concert, Miss Ippolito's playing communicated the sense of certainty, ease, and confident mastery of nuance. Those who can hit or tweak or saw a given number of notes in a given amount of time are legion. Those whose technical foundation and style are so fortunately cultivated that the technic becomes the complete and unobtrusive servant of the musical idea so that its presence is forgotten, are very seldom encountered, particularly in the ranks of the youthful. Miss Ippolito had these qualities and she played with a refinement, a continence and adjustment of detail that gave a hackneyed piece of music an artistic and unhackneyed character.

Her own poise and concentration on the task in hand added to the impression of her playing. It is true that in certain places there was the perception of a young girl minding her "p's" and "q's," a realization of the "shalt not's" of a great musical mentor. But these carefully prepared effects were not merely imitative, they were accomplished with complete understanding of their purpose, and it was good to hear the finale played with dash, but not scramble, with points of comparative repose, and melodies broadly sung, in contrast to the bravura spirit of the movement of the whole.

At the end of the performance Miss Ippolito was repeatedly called to the stage—a tribute earned by hard work and an exceptional talent.

CARMELA IPPOLITO
Brilliant young violinist, who gave a concert in Cambridge last evening.

As conductor Mr. Monteux is first of all musician. He does not color with his own personality the music he plays, nor is he primarily engrossed with the personality of the composer. It is not Brahms or Liszt that he would have us hear, but the music of Brahms or Liszt. And in this he does well. The mists of tradition are prone to magnify the idiosyncracies, eccentricities and extravagances of the great, and so it is that Chopin is tagged as morbid, Chaikovsky as neurotic, Beethoven as choleric, Wagner as sensual and Brahms as austere. Not that such generalizations are necessarily erroneous; they have their foundation in fact; and it may not be denied that the personality of each of these men, as of any creator worthy the name, may be discerned in his work. But in its essentials all music—that is, music concerned primarily with problems of tone rather than with the suggestion of things outside itself—is much the same. And the conductor or performer who places before other considerations those of form, phraseology and euphony is doing service to the composer, even though he forfeit in the doing a portion of his own aggrandizement.

On the programme of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening stood two pieces that, regarded superficially, are almost polar opposites—the Fourth Symphony of Brahms and Liszt's "Preludes." To both Mr. Monteux gave just, discerning and revealing performance. Yet there are those who might not hear his version of the Symphony without wistfully recalling the more "characteristic" quality of another's. And some again, treasuring recollection of Mr. Mengelberg's cataclysmic interpretation of the "Preludes," might find Mr. Monteux's conception of the music by contrast colorless and uninteresting. Yet Brahms, whatever his personal character or the peculiarities of his instrumental and harmonic technique, wrote primarily as Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Mendelssohn had written before him. He sought proportion, balance, clarity (if he did not always gain it), beauty and expressiveness. He little recked of the "Brahms tradition" that was ultimately to confuse his creative work with his gravity of bearing, his ruggedness and reserve, and his leonine aspect, and that was dogmatically to maintain that these things must in some fashion be made patent in his music. For such tradition Mr. Monteux cares little. He would make of this Fourth Symphony eloquent, ordered, luminous music—and in this he succeeds. And those who can forget the fol-de-rol of "accepted interpretation" hear the piece as in revelation.

Again it is altogether unlikely that Liszt thought of the "Preludes" as tonal melodrama or that he ever dreamed that it would some day become a "cheval de bataille" for prima donna conductors. He too was writing, not a series of shocks and shivers and sentimentalities, a mere succession of sensations, but a piece of music, albeit programme music and in undeniably bombastic vein. And in all probability not only would he be the first to resent such extravagance as Mr. Mengelberg's with it, but he would also be the first to applaud the ordered eloquence of Mr. Monteux's performance. If the Hollander thinks chiefly of his hearers, the Frenchman regards first his composers—and his art.

Steadily mounting in the scale of achievement, Miss Carmela Ippolito, now well known here as violinist, last evening made her debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As in her recent appearance with the People's Symphony, she played Bruch's Concerto in G minor. Sobered and fired by the responsibilities of her position, she played last evening in a way to silence any doubt as to her skill and musicianship. Two weeks ago it was posible to note in her playing a new fineness, a new ripeness, and in Sanders Theatre these things were further evidenced. It has never been Miss Ippolito's way to rest upon her laurels, and undoubtedly she will see in the honor now accorded her less a realization of ambition than the unfolding of new opportunities.

W. S. S.

Incidents and Prospects

Some will praise and others will blame the decision of Mr. Monteux to include in Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, less the choral finale. Since no chorus is now partner to the orchestra the conductor must deprive the music of the composer's climax. Yet the three preceding divisions may still be heard in integrity and these Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play. Since Dr. Muck's day, they have not been heard at the Symphony Concerts. For novel experience of another sort comes also Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant," symphonic music for miming, drawn from Roman history or Roman fable of the victorious combat of Horatius "at the bridge." It is work, new to America, of the ablest composer amongst the Parisian "Six." Brahms's "Academic Overture" and two airs from Mozart to be sung by Mme Hempel also dot the programme.

TRANS-NOV. 17.

SYMPHONY CONCERT HAS FINE PROGRAM

Bach Suite and Davigo Novelty Played

D'Indy's Second Symphony Also Is Revived

There was no soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, the only new piece did not prove especially significant, and yet the program was one of the most attractive Mr Monteux has lately offered because of the revival of two neglected classics, Bach's Suite in D major, and d'Indy's Second Symphony.

Even one who is far from being a partisan of M d'Indy, one who regards his third symphony as vulgar and his fourth as dull, must admit his B flat major symphony, played yesterday, among the finest things produced by composers now living. It quite eclipsed Davico's "Polyphemus," and did not suffer unduly from juxtaposition with Bach.

Davico has in his "Polyphemus" tried to put into a music a tale of two illicit lovers interupted by an aggrieved rival. Although King Mark is hardly a cyclops, the situation otherwise parallels act 2 of "Tristan." Davico has borrowed many Wagnerian inventions, harmonic, orchestral, melodic. If he had also copied Wagner's way of slowly building up a musical climax in which the end is foreseen from the beginning by the composer and not by the listener, Davico's "poem" might have had more of the coherence needed in poetry. But he reversed the procedure of Wagner.

First violins were obliged to stand in acknowledgment of the applause that followed their extraordinarily beautiful playing of the air in the Bach suite which every amateur knows as "for the G-string," which it is not. One has never heard anything better played by the Symphony. The rest of the suite was also well done, though less subtly.

The program announced for next week contains three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; arias from Mozart to be sung by Frieda Hempel; Honegger's "Horatius Victorious," a novelty, and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

GLOBE - NOV. 18.

SYMPHONY GIVES FIFTH CONCERT

Davico's Poem, "Polyphemus," Presented for First Time in America

BACH'S SUITE IS GREATLY ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Suite, D major, No. 3; Davico, symphonic poem, "Polyphemus" (first time in America); d'Indy, Symphony, B flat major, No. 2.

Vincenzo Davico, born at Monaco in 1889, of Italian parentage, studied first at Turin. When he was 23 years old he studied at Leipsic with Max Reger, of whom flippant persons have said that he wallowed in beer and counterpoint. From Leipsic our Davico at some time went to Paris, where he was living last year, a confirmed Debussyite, according to report. What should be expected of a young Italian influenced by the two—Reger and Debussy?

Davico's "Roman Impressions" for orchestra was performed here last year at a concert of the Boston Musical Association. The suite made little impression on the New Englanders and foreigners there assembled, even if Rome impressed the composer, but it was evidenced that Italian love of beauty prevented him from any exhibition of sheer radicalism or "futurism," and that, by this suite at least, he is not to be classed with the more advanced Italians as Malipiero and Casella.

"Polyphemus." When one saw this title, there was thought at once of Ulysses and the putting out of the Cyclops's eye, a punishment justly deserved, for Polyphemus, though he fed his flocks on Mount Aetna, was not a gentle shepherd; he cared not for the gods and devoured human flesh. What a congenial subject for an ultra-modern composer, say one of "The Six" (now Five) of Paris!

No, Davico was moved to express in tones the loves of Acis and Galatea, the jealousy of Polyphemus and his crushing the amorous couple. Davico in his little note to the score says the Cyclops killed the two of them with a rock, but Macaulay's schoolboy, remembering his Ovid, knows better. Polyphemus slew Acis by throwing the top of Aetna on him, but Galatea ran away. Thus is history perverted by musicians.

Davico's symphonic music, thus inspired, might be described as both picturesque and sensuous. He evidently chose the old legend for the sake of the love music and the tragic contrast. The introductory measures are effectively novel. The lumbering giant is portrayed skilfully—after the hearer is told that Polyphemus is a character in the poem. The passion of the lovers increases little by little in intensity and there is genuine passion. The preliminary flourish to each ascending repetition of the amorous hymn may call to mind the prelude to "Tristan," but Davico has something to say for himself, and he says it musically. And when he reaches the tragic moment there is no doubt in the mind and ears of the hearer that Polyphemus hit the lovers and hit them hard. The few measures following are curious.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for acquainting Boston with the poem, which contains musical ideas. It is constructed without superfluity of detail; the instrumentation is rich in color; the poem is agreeably short. Signor Davico tells his story effectively and is not an hour in telling it. Nor in telling the sad tale does he stammer or exaggerate.

Bach's Suite was greatly enjoyed. The lively movements were played in the appropriate spirit, while there was refreshing variety in the expression. Too often the quick movements of Bach are performed in a lusty manner throughout, and monotony is thus engendered. The famous air was beautifully sung by the first violins, an incomparable band, nor did Mr. Monteux sentimentalize the charming measures.

There was an impressive performance of Vincent d'Indy's great symphony. His music has often been charged with the atrocious crimes of austerity and aloofness; it has been called cerebral. It is true that D'Indy uses his head, not loses it, in composition; that his music willy never be popular with the multitude; it lacks an obvious appeal to those who say with an air of finality: "I know what I like." It is not sugary; it is not theatrical. To say that it is cold is to say that it is not effusive. D'Indy does not gush. Nor does he permit himself to run with a mighty stir and din to a blatant climax, dearly loved by those who think that noise shows strength. He respects his art and himself, and does not trim his sails to catch the breeze of popular favor. There is a nobility in his music; there is to those who do not wear their heart on their sleeve true warmth. There is a soaring of the spirit, not a drooping to court favor. And no one has ever questioned his constructive skill.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Beethoven, First three movements of the 9th symphony; Honegger, "Triumphant Horatius" (first time in America); Brahms, Academic Festival overture. Frieda Hempel will sing arias by Mozart: "Deh vieni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Martern aller Arten" from "Die Entfuehrung."

HERALD NOV. 18.

SYMPHONY REVIVES OLD BACH

New Italian Work and D'Indy's Second Also Given

BY OLIN DOWNES

Old Bach was the youngest composer at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He opened the concert with a glorious flourish and a two-fisted blare of the trumpets, as the orchestra swung into the pompous introduction of the D major suite—the one with the familiar and ever beautiful "Air" for the strings.

HAS A PUNCH

This is music in popular phrase, "with a punch," and as such was it played. Mr. Monteux was equally fortunate in not sentimentalizing the lovely "air," and in meeting half way the gusto, the jocosity and matchless skill of the great contrapuntist, who wrote fugues as we write letters to our friends.

Next on the programme was the symphonic poem "Polyphemus" by Vincenzo Davico of Monaco, one of the young modern Italians who are discovering anew the glories of the modern orchestra and the symphonic form. We said "one of." We did not say a worthy contemporary-judged by this single composition, of such men as Respighi, of the orchestral composition, "Fountains of Rome," or Malapiero of that singularly beautiful piece called by the mystifying name of "Pauses of Silence." Davico is neither as mature in his technical equipment nor as original in invention as either of these others.

"Polyphemus" purports to delineate tonally the passion of Acis and Galatea, crushed and blotted out by the monstrous Polyphemus. The music is now Debussyish and now almost note for note the Richard Strauss of the opening of "Tod and Verklarung." The ideas are forced and without true meaning. They are developed in a manner as empty as it is pretentious.

Fortunately this piece did not last long, there had been Bach, and there was for a conclusion the towering second symphony of Vincent d'Indy. It stands today an acknowledged masterpiece. Less than 20 years ago it was an uttor mystery and ugliness to the audience which then heard the work for the first time. Nothing changes so rapidly as current estimates of music.

POST- NOV. 18

FRENCH MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

French music occupies much of the Symphony program this week, the principal work being d'Indy's B-flat symphony, beautiful and still ultra-modern in spite of its score of years.

A novelty, introduced for the first time in this country, is Vincenzo Davico's symphonic poem, "Polyphemus," based upon the classic story of Acis and Galatea the lovers destroyed by Polyphemus the Cyclops. Though an Italian, Davico has become an ardent follower of Debussy. This symphonic poem is mainly literal, descriptive music, skimming the surface of the love tragedy. It piqued the interest but left no deep impression.

An early 18th century masterpiece is the J. S. Bach suite in D major, modernized by Mendelssohn, with the immortal air for violins—often played by Elman, Heifetz and other stars in solo form. The first violins played it so well yesterday that they received a special little ovation of their own.

Mr. Monteux was especially happy in his reading of the d'Indy symphony and parts of the Bach suite. The same program will be repeated tonight.

BENEFIT FOR GERICKE, EX-SYMPHONY LEADER

Wilhelm Gericke, the famous Austrian musician, who did much to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra the artistic prestige which it has enjoyed for nearly 40 years, is in want in Vienna.

To help him out of his difficulties the orchestra will give a benefit performance at Symphony Hall the first week in December. Some of the older patrons of the orchestra, who recall his fine service as conductor, are subscribing generously.

ADVTGR-NOV. 18.

Carmela Ippolito Plays With Boston Symphony

BY OLIN DOWNES

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was assisted by Carmela Ippolito, violinist, at the concert given last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. The purely orchestral compositions were Brahms' 4th Symphony, perhaps the finest reading of Brahms that Mr. Monteux has given here, and already heard at the Boston concerts, and the symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," of Liszt. Miss Ippolito played the Burch G minor concerto.

Appearing for the first time with the Boston Symphony, Miss Ippolito made an excellent impression. Her talent had already attracted much attention. Fortunately, it has been carefully and systematically developed. She played last night, not only with technical brilliancy and uncommon beauty of tone, but with a poise and a sense of fine proportions which older and more experienced virtuosi might envy.

The broad phrases of the opening were firmly and beautifully moulded and the recitative had dramatic feeling. The tone was always full and warm, not only on the lower strings but in the upper registers of the instrument. In passages of figuration there was security as well as brilliancy of style.

Specialists in the technic of the violin might descant on details. It is a more important and fundamental matter to observe that last night at the outset of her career, and under the strain of an important concert, Miss Ippolito's playing communicated the sense of certainty, ease, and confident mastery of nuance. Those who can hit or tweak or saw a given number of notes in a given amount of time are legion. Those whose technical foundation and style are so fortunately cultivated that the technic becomes the complete and unobtrusive servant of the musical idea so that its presence is forgotten, are very seldom encountered, particularly in the ranks of the youthful. Miss Ippolito had these qualities and she played with a refinement, a continence and adjustment of detail that gave a hackneyed piece of music an artistic and unhackneyed character.

Her own poise and concentration on the task in hand added to the impression of her playing. It is true that in certain places there was the perception of a young girl minding her "p's" and "q's," a realization of the "shalt not's" of a great musical mentor. But these carefully prepared effects were not merely imitative, they were accomplished with complete understanding of their purpose, and it was good to hear the finale played with dash, but not scramble, with points of comparative repose, and melodies broadly sung, in contrast to the bravura spirit of the movement of the whole.

At the end of the performance Miss Ippolito was repeatedly called to the stage—a tribute earned by hard work and an exceptional talent.

CARMELA IPPOLITO
Brilliant young violinist, who gave a concert in Cambridge last evening.

As conductor Mr. Monteux is first of all musician. He does not color with his own personality the music he plays, nor is he primarily engrossed with the personality of the composer. It is not Brahms or Liszt that he would have us hear, but the music of Brahms or Liszt. And in this he does well. The mists of tradition are prone to magnify the idiosyncracies, eccentricities and extravagances of the great, and so it is that Chopin is tagged as morbid, Chaikovsky as neurotic, Beethoven as choleric, Wagner as sensual and Brahms as austere. Not that such generalizations are necessarily erroneous; they have their foundation in fact; and it may not be denied that the personality of each of these men, as of any creator worthy the name, may be discerned in his work. But in its essentials all music—that is, music concerned primarily with problems of tone rather than with the suggestion of things outside itself—is much the same. And the conductor or performer who places before other considerations those of form, phraseology and euphony is doing service to the composer, even though he forfeit in the doing a portion of his own aggrandizement.

On the programme of the Symphony Concert in Cambridge last evening stood two pieces that, regarded superficially, are almost polar opposites—the Fourth Symphony of Brahms and Liszt's "Preludes." To both Mr. Monteux gave just, discerning and revealing performance. Yet there are those who might not hear his version of the Symphony without wistfully recalling the more "characteristic" quality of another's. And some again, treasuring recollection of Mr. Mengelberg's cataclysmic interpretation of the "Preludes," might find Mr. Monteux's conception of the music by contrast colorless and uninteresting. Yet Brahms, whatever his personal character or the peculiarities of his instrumental and harmonic technique, wrote primarily as Mozart, Beethoven, Schumann and Mendelssohn had written before him. He sought proportion, balance, clarity (if he did not always gain it), beauty and expressiveness. He little recked of the "Brahms tradition" that was ultimately to confuse his creative work with his gravity of bearing, his ruggedness and reserve, and his leonine aspect, and that was dogmatically to maintain that these things must in some fashion be made patent in his music. For such tradition Mr. Monteux cares little. He would make of this Fourth Symphony eloquent, ordered, luminous music—and in this he succeeds. And those [illegible] forget the fol-de-rol of "accepted interpretation" hear the piece as in revelation.

Again it is altogether unlikely that Liszt thought of the "Preludes" as tonal melodrama or that he ever dreamed that it would some day become a "cheval de bataille" for prima donna conductors. He too was writing, not a series of shocks and shivers and sentimentalities, a mere succession of sensations, but a piece of music, albeit programme music and in undeniably bombastic vein. And in all probability not only would he be the first to resent such extravagance as Mr. Mengelberg's with it, but he would also be the first to applaud the ordered eloquence of Mr. Monteux's performance. If the Hollander thinks chiefly of his hearers, the Frenchman regards first his composers—and his art.

Steadily mounting in the scale of achievement, Miss Carmela Ippolito, now well known here as violinist, last evening made her début with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As in her recent appearance with the People's Symphony, she played Bruch's Concerto in G minor. Sobered and fired by the responsibilities of her position, she played last evening in a way to silence any doubt as to her skill and musicianship. Two weeks ago it was posible to note in her playing a new fineness, a new ripeness, and in Sanders Theatre these things were further evidenced. It has never been Miss Ippolito's way to rest upon her laurels, and undoubtedly she will see in the honor now accorded her less a realization of ambition than the unfolding of new opportunities.

W. S. S.

Incidents and Prospects

Some will praise and others will blame the decision of Mr. Monteux to include in the Symphony Concerts of next week Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, less the choral finale. Since no chorus is now partner to the orchestra the conductor must deprive the music of the composer's climax. Yet the three preceding divisions may still be heard in integrity and these Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play. Since Dr. Muck's day, they have not been heard at the Symphony Concerts. For novel experience of another sort comes also Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant," symphonic music for miming, drawn from Roman history or Roman fable of the victorious combat of Horatius "at the bridge." It is work, new to America, of the ablest composer amongst the Parisian "Six." Brahms's "Academic Overture" and two airs from Mozart to be sung by Mme. Hempel also dot the programme.

TRANS-NOV.17.

SYMPHONY CONCERT HAS FINE PROGRAM

Bach Suite and Davigo Novelty Played

D'Indy's Second Symphony Also Is Revived

There was no soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert, the only new piece did not prove especially significant, and yet the program was one of the most attractive Mr Monteux has lately offered because of the revival of two neglected classics, Bach's Suite in D major, and d'Indy's Second Symphony.

Even one who is far from being a partisan of M d'Indy, one who regards his third symphony as vulgar and his fourth as dull, must admit his B flat major symphony, played yesterday, among the finest things produced by composers now living. It quite eclipsed Davico's "Polyphemus," and did not suffer unduly from juxtaposition with Bach.

Davico has in his "Polyphemus" tried to put into a music a tale of two illicit lovers interupted by an aggrieved rival. Although King Mark is hardly a cyclops, the situation otherwise parallels act 2 of "Tristan." Davico has borrowed many Wagnerian inventions, harmonic, orchestral, melodic. If he had also copied Wagner's way of slowly building up a musical climax in which the end is foreseen from the beginning by the composer and not by the listener, Davico's "poem" might have had more of the coherence needed in poetry. But he reversed the procedure of Wagner.

First violins were obliged to stand in acknowledgment of the applause that followed their extraordinarily beautiful playing of the air in the Bach suite which every amateur knows as "for the G-string," which it is not. One has never heard anything better played by the Symphony. The rest of the suite was also well done, though less subtly.

The program announced for next week contains three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; arias from Mozart to be sung by Frieda Hempel; Honegger's "Horatius Victorious," a novelty, and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

GLOBE - NOV. 18.

SYMPHONY GIVES FIFTH CONCERT

Davico's Poem, "Polyphemus," Presented for First Time in America

BACH'S SUITE IS GREATLY ENJOYED

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Bach, Suite, D major, No. 3; Davico, symphonic poem, "Polyphemus" (first time in America); d'Indy, Symphony, B flat major, No. 2.

Vincenzo Davico, born at Monaco in 1889, of Italian parentage, studied first at Turin. When he was 23 years old he studied at Leipsic with Max Reger, of whom flippant persons have said that he wallowed in beer and counterpoint. From Leipsic our Davico at some time went to Paris, where he was living last year, a confirmed Debussyite, according to report. What should be expected of a young Italian influenced by the two—Reger and Debussy?

Davico's "Roman Impressions" for orchestra was performed here last year at a concert of the Boston Musical Association. The suite made little impression on the New Englanders and foreigners there assembled, even if Rome impressed the composer, but it was evidenced that Italian love of beauty prevented him from any exhibition of sheer radicalism or "futurism," and that, by this suite at least, he is not to be classed with the more advanced Italians as Malipiero and Casella.

"Polyphemus." When one saw this title, there was thought at once of Ulysses and the putting out of the Cyclops's eye, a punishment justly deserved, for Polyphemus, though he fed his flocks on Mount Aetna, was not a gentle shepherd; he cared not for the gods and devoured human flesh. What a congenial subject for an ultra-modern composer, say one of "The Six" (now Five) of Paris!

No, Davico was moved to express in tones the loves of Acis and Galatea, the jealousy of Polyphemus and his crushing the amorous couple. Davico in his little note to the score says the Cyclops killed the two of them with a rock, but Macaulay's schoolboy, remembering his Ovid, knows better. Polyphemus slew Acis by throwing the top of Aetna on him, but Galatea ran away. Thus is history perverted by musicians.

Davico's symphonic music, thus inspired, might be described as both picturesque and sensuous. He evidently chose the old legend for the sake of the love music and the tragic contrast. The introductory measures are effectively novel. The lumbering giant is portrayed skilfully—after the hearer is told that Polyphemus is a character in the poem. The passion of the lovers increases little by little in intensity and there is genuine passion. The preliminary flourish to each ascending repetition of the amorous hymn may call to mind the prelude to "Tristan," but Davico has something to say for himself, and he says it musically. And when he reaches the tragic moment there is no doubt in the mind and ears of the hearer that Polyphemus hit the lovers and hit them hard. The few measures following are curious.

Mr. Monteux is to be thanked for acquainting Boston with the poem, which contains musical ideas. It is constructed without superfluity of detail; the instrumentation is rich in color; the poem is agreeably short. Signor Davico tells his story effectively and is not an hour in telling it. Nor in telling the sad tale does he stammer or exaggerate.

Bach's Suite was greatly enjoyed. The lively movements were played in the appropriate spirit, while there was refreshing variety in the expression. Too often the quick movements of Bach are performed in a lusty manner throughout, and monotony is thus engendered. The famous air was beautifully sung by the first violins, an incomparable band, nor did Mr. Monteux sentimentalize the charming measures.

There was an impressive performance of Vincent d'Indy's great symphony. His music has often been charged with the atrocious crimes of austerity and aloofness; it has been called cerebral. It is true that D'Indy uses his head, not loses it, in composition; that his music willy never be popular with the multitude; it lacks an obvious appeal to those who say with an air of finality: "I know what I like." It is not sugary; it is not theatrical. To say that it is cold is to say that it is not effusive. D'Indy does not gush. Nor does he permit himself to run with a mighty stir and din to a blatant climax, dearly loved by those who think that noise shows strength. He respects his art and himself, and does not trim his sails to catch the breeze of popular favor. There is a nobility in his music; there is to those who do not wear their heart on their sleeve true warmth. There is a soaring of the spirit, not a drooping to court favor. And no one has ever questioned his constructive skill.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Beethoven, First three movements of the 9th symphony; Honegger, "Triumphant Horatius" (first time in America); Brahms, Academic Festival overture. Frieda Hempel will sing arias by Mozart: "Deh vieni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Martern aller Arten" from "Die Entfuehrung."

HERALD NOV. 18.

SYMPHONY REVIVES OLD BACH

New Italian Work and D'Indy's Second Also Given

BY OLIN DOWNES

Old Bach was the youngest composer at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He opened the concert with a glorious flourish and a two-fisted blare of the trumpets, as the orchestra swung into the pompous introduction of the D major suite—the one with the familiar and ever beautiful "Air" for the strings.

HAS A PUNCH

This is music in popular phrase, "with a punch," and as such was it played. Mr. Monteux was equally fortunate in not sentimentalizing the lovely "air," and in meeting half way the gusto, the jocosity and matchless skill of the great contrapuntist, who wrote fugues as we write letters to our friends.

Next on the programme was the symphonic poem "Polyphemus" by Vincenzo Davico of Monaco, one of the young modern Italians who are discovering anew the glories of the modern orchestra and the symphonic form. We said "one of." We did not say a worthy contemporary-judged by this single composition, of such men as Respighi, of the orchestral composition, "Fountains of Rome," or Malapiero of that singularly beautiful piece called by the mystifying name of "Pauses of Silence." Davico is neither as mature in his technical equipment nor as original in invention as either of these others.

"Polyphemus" purports to delineate tonally the passion of Acis and Galatea, crushed and blotted out by the monstrous Polyphemus. The music is now Debussyish and now almost note for note the Richard Strauss of the opening of "Tod and Verklarung." The ideas are forced and without true meaning. They are developed in a manner as empty as it is pretentious.

Fortunately this piece did not last long, there had been Bach, and there was for a conclusion the towering second symphony of Vincent d'Indy. It stands today an acknowledged masterpiece. Less than 20 years ago it was an utter mystery and ugliness to the audience which then heard the work for the first time. Nothing changes so rapidly as current estimates of music.

POST- NOV. 18

FRENCH MUSIC AT SYMPHONY

French music occupies much of the Symphony program this week, the principal work being d'Indy's B-flat symphony, beautiful and still ultra-modern in spite of its score of years

A novelty, introduced for the first time in this country, is Vincenzo Davico's symphonic poem, "Polyphemus," based upon the classic story of Acis and Galatea the lovers destroyed by Polyphemus the Cyclops. Though an Italian, Davico has become an ardent follower of Debussy. This symphonic poem is mainly literal, descriptive music, skimming the surface of the love tragedy. It piqued the interest but left no deep impression.

An early 18th century masterpiece is the J. S. Bach suite in D major, modernized by Mendelssohn, with the immortal air for violins—often played by Elman, Heifetz and other stars in solo form. The first violins played it so well yesterday that they received a special little ovation of their own.

Mr. Monteux was especially happy in his reading of the d'Indy symphony and parts of the Bach suite. The same program will be repeated tonight.

BENEFIT FOR GERICKE, EX-SYMPHONY LEADER

Wilhelm Gericke, the famous Austrian musician, who did much to give the Boston Symphony Orchestra the artistic prestige which it has enjoyed for nearly 40 years, is in want in Vienna.

To help him out of his difficulties the orchestra will give a benefit performance at Symphony Hall the first week in December. Some of the older patrons of the orchestra, who recall his fine service as conductor, are subscribing generously.

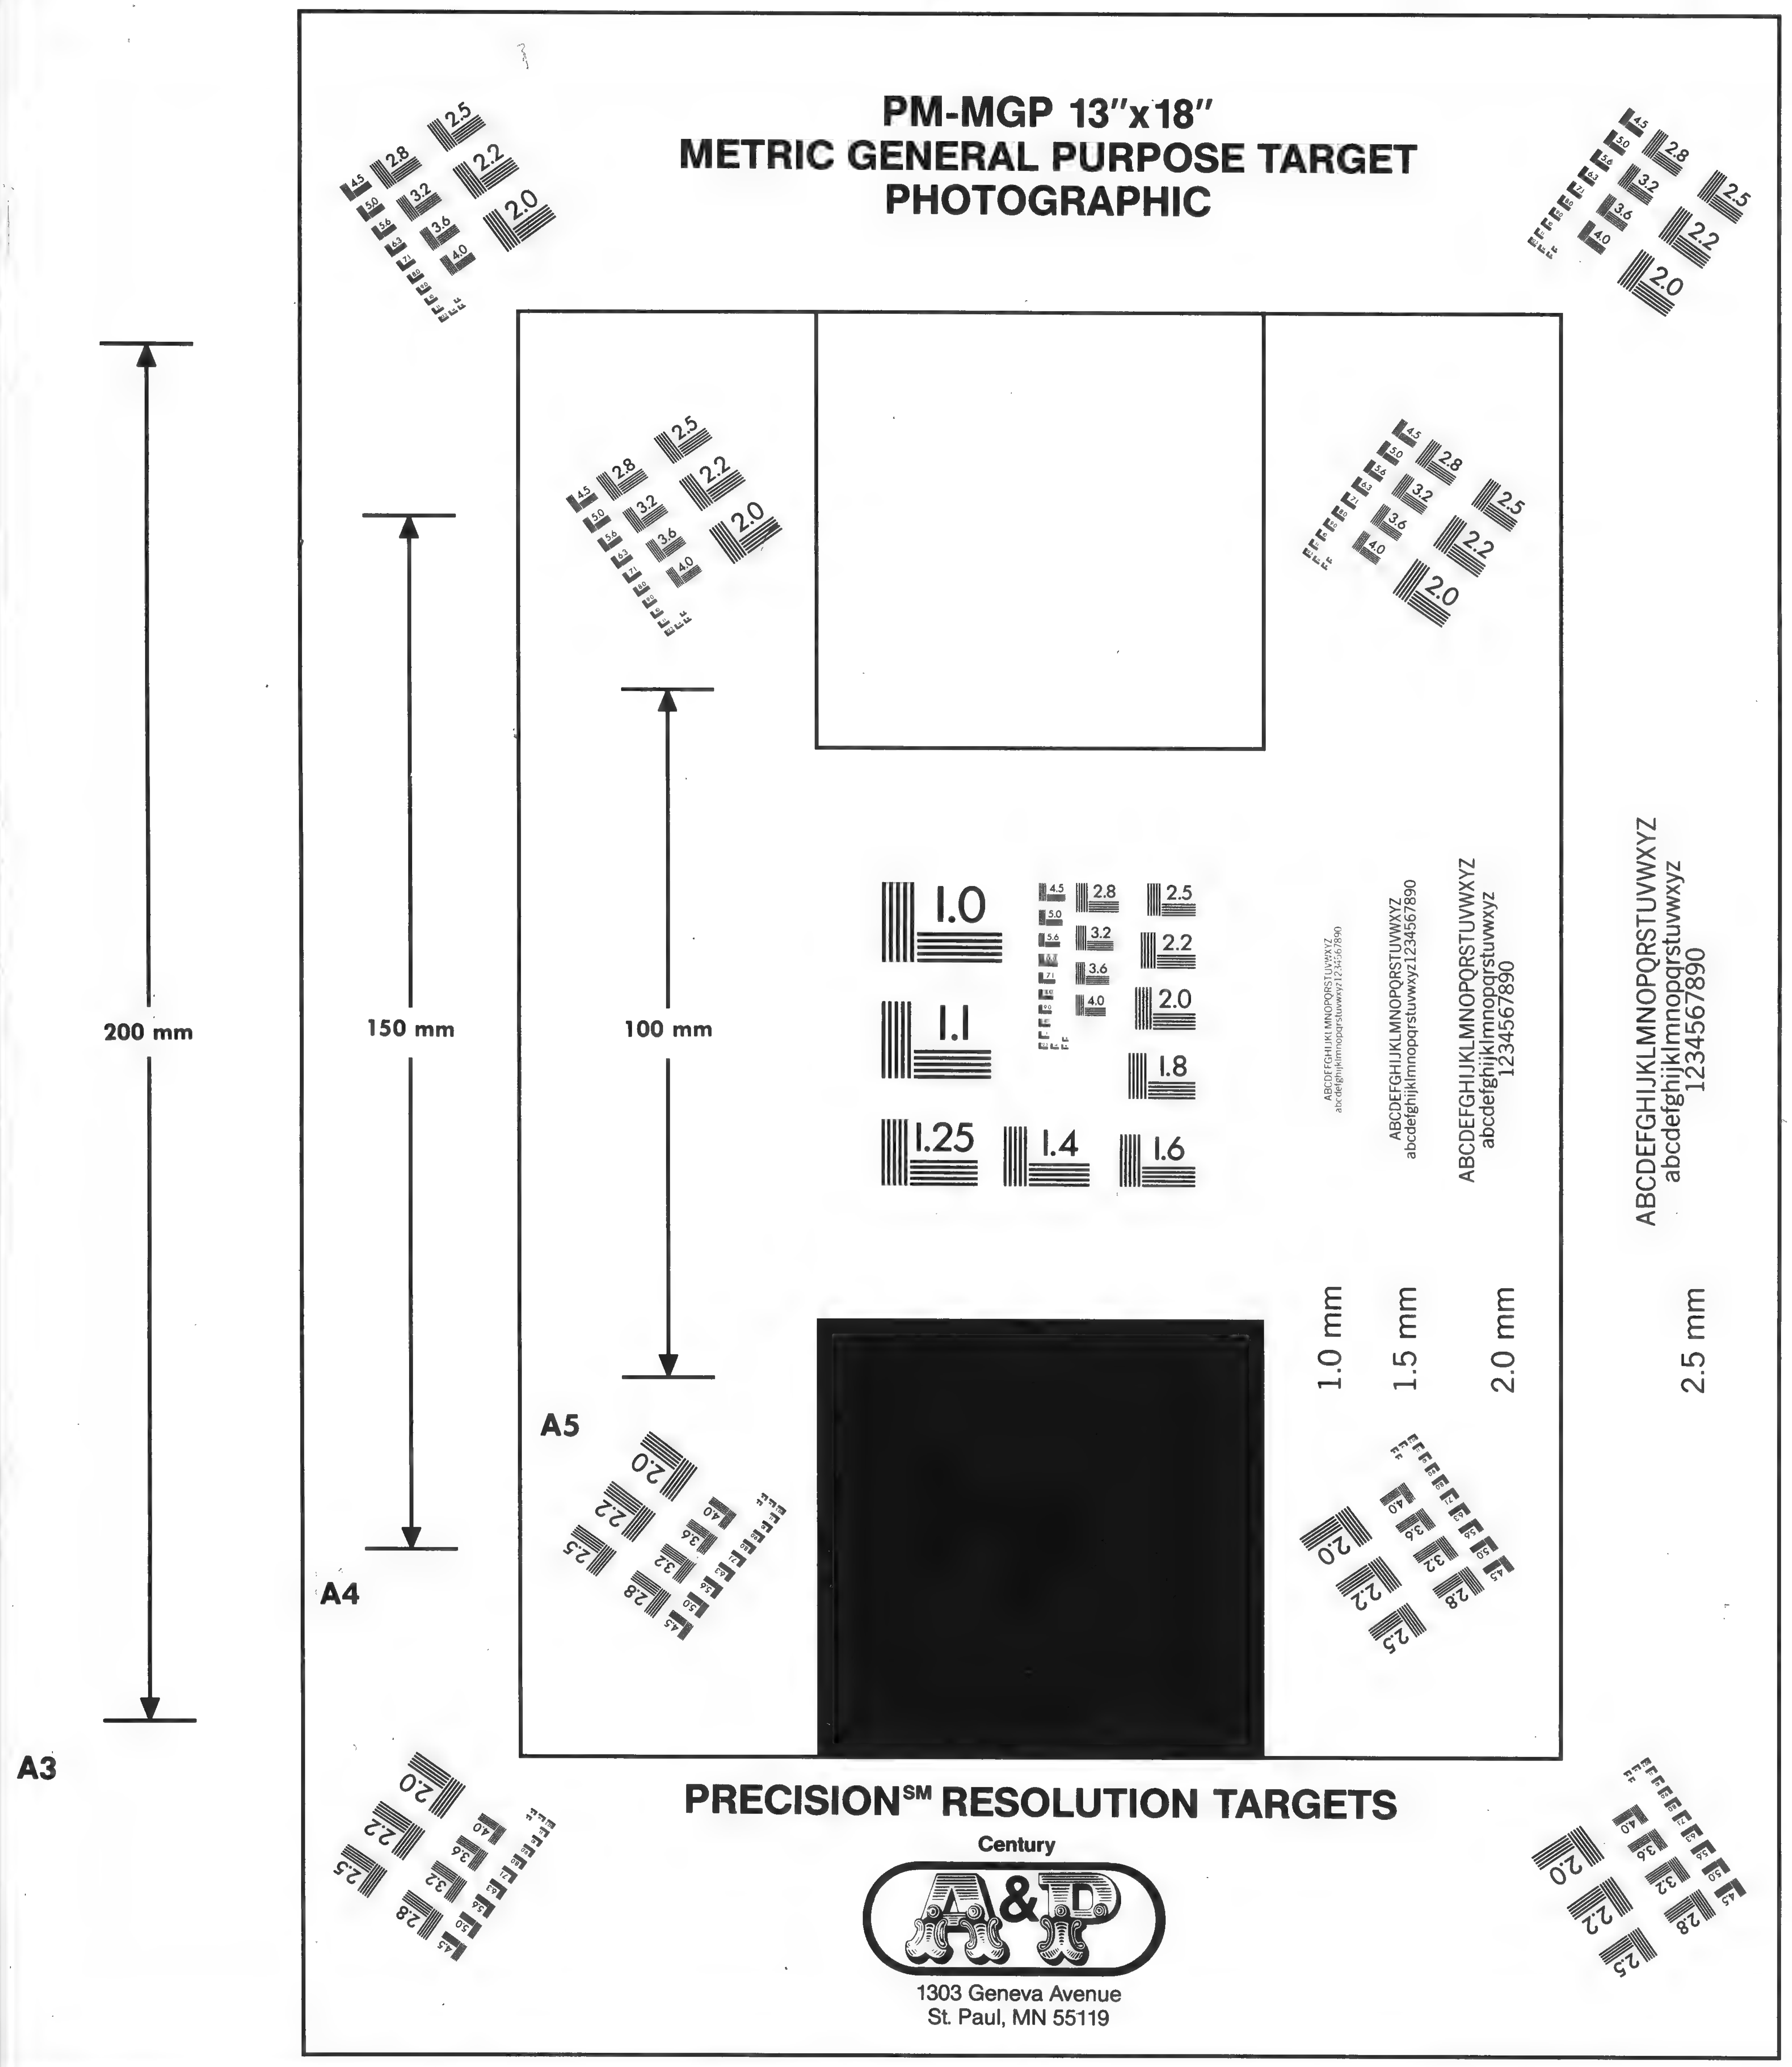
ADVTSR-NOV.18

REDUCTION

RATIO

14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
3.2
2.0
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

ESTRA OR RUM

SYMPHONY IS MINUS SOLOIST

Mr. Monteux did not have a soloist for his program yesterday afternoon. The first number was the Bach Suite in D major and that was interesting because it is beautiful music and was well played. The audience particularly like the "Air" which is famous the world over, both to professional and laymen.

The Davico symphonic poem "Polyphemus" followed the suite and it was the first performance of this number that has taken place in America. The hearers of yesterday found it, on the whole, entirely worth-while. In fact, parts of it were unusually lovely. Another hearing before too much time has elapsed would be of interest.

The closing number was the d'Indy Symphony in B flat major. It is long, it is complicated as to theme and rhythm and there were many who remarked at the conclusion that it was tiresome. Surely it cannot be denied that there are countless other symphonies which Mr. Monteux must know from past experience that his hearers enjoy far more than this one.

AMER. NOV. 18.

TO CONTINUE CONCERTS FOR COLLEGIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to continue the series of five Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall. These extra concerts were started last year as an outcome of the popular demand for Symphony concerts, which greatly exceeded the bounds of the regular longer series.

College students form a considerable portion of these audiences, and find in the Monday evening series a special opportunity to hear symphonic music to advantage. To many it is an introduction to one of the finest fields of artistic creation. Regular Symphony programs are presented, with a preponderance of the established masterpieces of the symphonic repertory.

To each concert an additional interest will be given by the appearance of a soloist of note. The list will include Ernest Schelling, the brilliant pianist and composer, and Magdeleine Brard, the talented young pianist who appeared as a prodigy in Boston two years ago, when the surprising skill and maturity of her playing attracted much attention. There will be two singers, Ester Ferrabini-Jacchia, the noted operatic soprano, and Florence Macbeth, a leading soprano of the Chicago Opera Company. There will be one violin soloist, Renee Chemet, an artist who has not yet been heard in Boston, but whose concerts elsewhere are attracting increasing attention.

BU.NEWS-NOV 21

SYMPHONY OR TRAIN RAIDED

CUSTOMS MEN SEIZE CANADIAN LIQUOR FROM MUSICIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, an institution almost sacred to worshippers of music, is minus one hundred and eighty-seven bottles of wines and liquors, seized by U. S. customs officers.

Customs officials and federal agents of the United States and Canada, by an apparently concerted plan, raided the special train of the orchestra as it was crossing the border from Canada, held it up long enough to tie up traffic on the railroad, threatened the arrest of the whole train, and wound up by haling two members of the orchestra before the United States commissioner at Buffalo.

News of the raid, which had been suppressed, reached the Boston American today.

The cleanup of wet goods, which the inspectors ferreted out, even from instrument cases, on brakerods under the cars and other desperate hiding places, brought forth the most sour chord the Symphony has ever intoned.

It was originally intended to take the entire orchestra of 110 members int ocustody, but discretion prevailed, and the only two arrested were those who had brazenly left bottles in their grips.

Some of the foreign artistes were almost prostrated.

It was reported that the customs authorities intended the raid to serve as a warning to othe rtraveling organizations, that smuggling of liquor into this country would not be tolerated.

The orchestra, in charge of Conductor Pierre Monteux, started on its tour a week ago last Sunday. The first concert was given at Dartmouth College, in Hanover, N. H., and as usual was a great success.

On Monday the musicians proceeded to Montreal, where another concert was given, going the following day to Toronto. Here the first evidence was seen that the brotherhood of man was not the controlling factor in the lives of our Canadian cousins.

At Massey Hall, Toronto, where the distinguished [illegible] from [illegible] officials suddenly apeared and demanded access to all the baggage.

With unswerving attention to duty, they rummaged through all the bagge, turning out the possesions of the musicans, hurling about indiscriminately toilet articals, silk underwear and clean shirts. The inspectors, careful men all, took no chances but even examined piccalos.

While the high-strung musicans stood by fuming at what they considered an outrage, the keen-eyed customs men brought their search to a successful conclusion. In one trunk, ownership not given, they discovered the contraband liquor for which they sought.

CONFISCATE LIQUOR.

With a stern warning to the musicians, the customs men confiscated several bottles, all they could find, and departed, clothed in smug self-satisfaction as in a garment.

The proceeding put a damper on the volatile spirits of the musicians, but they soon recovered, and after giving their concert prepared to shake the dust of Canada from their feet.

the comparatively lax inspection of the American officials. At that time the musicians had made no attempt to bring in illicit liquor.

On this occasion, however, some decided to take a chance. They loaded grips with choice cordials, liquers, cognac and Scotch.

They then boarded their train, and although manifesting some uneasiness, set forth to face whatever the future held in store with comparative equanimity.

BOARDS THE TRAIN.

The rude shock came at Welland, Ontario, just across the border from the United States. An American customs official boarded the train. Passing through he spread consternation in his wake by announcing that the first suitcase opened in Car No. 1 had contained a bottle of liquor.

He served solemn warning that if any more liquor were found on the persons, in the baggage of the musicians, or in the cars, the owners would be subject to arrest, fine and imprisonment.

The official, in a voice of doom, then ordered that all liquor be disposed of before the train crossed into American territory. He then departed.

Distinguished and dignified musicians, with international reputations, scurried about the cars, seeking hiding places, like frightened squirrels with Winter's horde of nuts.

Grips and suitcases were opened, and their owners, with arms filled with bottles, galloped up and down the cars. Some of the bottles were cached in instrument cases, French horns were made to do duty, seats were lifted and precious freight deposited beneath them.

The transoms in the roofs of the cars were favorite hiding places, while certain of the musicians, more ingenious than others, tied strings around the necks of bottles and suspended them from advantageous points in the washrooms. Others, when the train stopped at the border, ran out, leaped to the ground and tied their cherished possessions to the brake rods.

BURST INTO TEARS.

One member of the orchestra, a celebrity as well known in musical circles in Europe as he is in this country, tipped a porter to guard an especially treasured package. With the exception of a few poker players, he is believed to be the only musician to save his liquor.

When the train had crossed to the American side, bound for Buffalo, four inspectors boarded it, and havoc followed them. From car to car they proceeded, slowly and inflexibly, and they seemed to be gifted with the scent of bloodhounds. Wherever liquor was hidden they halted and practically no one escaped.

From hip pockets, from overcoats in the racks and hanging up, from transsoms, from beneath seots, and from the brake rods under the cars, they etracted bottles. The carnage was horrible. Even the suave and impressive Conductor Pierre Monteux was not exempt, it was whispered. Some of the musicians burst into tears. Leading first desk artists were overcome.

In only two instances, however, was liquor found in grips and ownership thereby indicated. The owners of these, apparently resigned to the discovery of their liquor, made no attempt to heed the warning of the [illegible]. They were taken fore the commissioner in Buffalo.

So great was the quantity of liquor seized that the inspectors were forced to impress the conductor and brakeman of the train into service as carriers. In some instances it was found musicians had bribed porters to place their bottles in the ice boxes.

In other cases the inspectors were unable to open the transoms, which had been jammed by the bottles, and were forced to break the glass.

AMER-NOV.16.

SOME will praise and others will blame the decision of Mr. Monteux to include in the Symphony Concerts of next week the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, less the choral finale. Since no chorus is now partner to the orchestra, the conductor must deprive the music of the composer's climax. Yet the three preceding divisions may still be heard in integrity, and these Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play. From Dr. Muck's day they have not passed to the Symphony Concerts. For novel experience of another sort comes also Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant," symphonic music for miming, drawn from Roman history or Roman fable of the victorious combat of Horatius "at the bridge." It is work, new to America, of the ablest composer amongst the Parisian "Six." Brahms's "Academic Overture" and two airs from Mozart to be sung by Mme. Hempel also dot the programme. One is the familiar "Deh Vieni" out of "Figaro's Wedding"; the other, the show-piece, less often sung, out of "The Elopement from the Harem."

Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the aid of Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor who first set the standards of the Symphony Orchestra, and through years worked toward them—now, in his seventy-eighth year, a poor man in Vienna. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities and month by month the fall of the crown toward nothingness has stripped him of income. A year ago Mr. Monteux, quick-minded, generous, free from every prejudice, purposed such a concert. Now he brings it to pass. An elder generation of Bostonians knew Mr. Gericke's work at first hand; a younger still enjoys the fruit of it. Both have [illegible] requite him.

Thursday evening, Dec. 7, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the third of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mme. Samaroff will be the assisting pianist.

TRANS-NOV.18,

[26]

SYMPHONY IS MINUS SOLOIST

Mr. Monteux did not have a soloist for his program yesterday afternoon. The first number was the Bach Suite in D major and that was interesting because it is beautiful music and was well played. The audience particularly like the "Air" which is famous the world over, both to professional and laymen.

The Davico symphonic poem "Polyphemus" followed the suite and it was the first performance of this number that has taken place in America. The hearers of yesterday found it, on the whole, entirely worth-while. In fact, parts of it were unusually lovely. Another hearing before too much time has elapsed would be of interest.

The closing number was the d'Indy Symphony in B flat major. It is long, it is complicated as to theme and rhythm and there were many who remarked at the conclusion that it was tiresome. Surely it cannot be denied that there are countless other symphonies which Mr. Monteux must know from past experience that his hearers enjoy far more than this one.

AMER. NOV. 18.

TO CONTINUE CONCERTS FOR COLLEGIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to continue the series of five Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall. These extra concerts were started last year as an outcome of the popular demand for Symphony concerts, which greatly exceeded the bounds of the regular longer series.

College students form a considerable portion of these audiences, and find in the Monday evening series a special opportunity to hear symphonic music to advantage. To many it is an introduction to one of the finest fields of artistic creation. Regular Symphony programs are presented, with a preponderance of the established masterpieces of the symphonic repertory.

To each concert an additional interest will be given by the appearance of a soloist of note. The list will include Ernest Schelling, the brilliant pianist and composer, and Magdeleine Brard, the talented young pianist who appeared as a prodigy in Boston two years ago, when the surprising skill and maturity of her playing attracted much attention. There will be two singers, Ester Ferrabini-Jacchia, the noted operatic soprano, and Florence Macbeth, a leading soprano of the Chicago Opera Company. There will be one violin soloist, Renee Chemet, an artist who has not yet been heard in Boston, but whose concerts elsewhere are attracting increasing attention.

BU. NEWS - NOV 21

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TRAIN RAIDED FOR RUM

CUSTOMS MEN SEIZE CANADIAN LIQUOR FROM MUSICIANS

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, an institution almost sacred to worshippers of music, is minus one hundred and eighty-seven bottles of wines and liquors, seized by U. S. customs officers.

Customs officials and federal agents of the United States and Canada, by an apparently concerted plan, raided the special train of the orchestra as it was crossing the border from Canada, held it up long enough to tie up traffic on the railroad, threatened the arrest of the whole train, and wound up by haling two members of the orchestra before the United States commissioner at Buffalo.

News of the raid, which had been suppressed, reached the Boston American today.

The cleanup of wet goods, which the inspectors ferreted out, even from instrument cases, on brakerods under the cars and other desperate hiding places, brought forth the most sour chord the Symphony has ever intoned.

It was originally intended to take the entire orchestra of 110 members int ocustody, but discretion prevailed, and the only two arrested were those who had brazenly left bottles in their grips.

Some of the foreign artistes were almost prostrated.

It was reported that the customs authorities intended the raid to serve as a warning to othe rtraveling organizations, that smuggling of liquor into this country would not be tolerated.

The orchestra, in charge of Conductor Pierre Monteux, started on its tour a week ago last Sunday. The first concert was given at Dartmouth College, in Hanover, N. H., and as usual was a great success.

On Monday the musicians proceeded to Montreal, where another concert was given, going the following day to Toronto. Here the first evidence was seen that the brotherhood of man was not the controlling factor in the lives of our Canadian cousins.

At Massey Hall, Toronto, where the distinguished musicians from Boston performed, Canadian customs officials suddenly apeared and demanded access to all the baggage.

With unswerving attention to duty, they rummaged through all the bagge, turning out the possesions of the musicans, hurling about indiscriminately toilet articals, silk underwear and clean shirts. The inspectors, careful men all, took no chances but even examined piccalos.

While the high-strung musicans stood by fuming at what they considered an outrage, the keen-eyed customs men brought their search to a successful conclusion. In one trunk, ownership not given, they discovered the contraband liquor for which they sought.

CONFISCATE LIQUOR.

With a stern warning to the musicians, the customs men confiscated several bottles, all they could find, and departed, clothed in smug self-satisfaction as in a garment.

The proceeding put a damper on the volatile spirits of the musicians, but they soon recovered, and after giving their concert prepared to shake the dust of Canada from their feet.

On the tour of the previous year [illegible] noted the comparatively lax inspection of the American officials. At that time the musicians had made no attempt to bring in illicit liquor.

On this occasion, however, some decided to take a chance. They loaded grips with choice cordials, liquers, cognac and Scotch.

They then boarded their train, and although manifesting some uneasiness, set forth to face whatever the future held in store with comparative equanimity.

BOARDS THE TRAIN.

The rude shock came at Welland, Ontario, just across the border from the United States. An American customs official boarded the train. Passing through he spread consternation in his wake by announcing that the first suitcase opened in Car No. 1 had contained a bottle of liquor.

He served solemn warning that if any more liquor were found on the persons, in the baggage of the musicians, or in the cars, the owners would be subject to arrest, fine and imprisonment.

The official, in a voice of doom, then ordered that all liquor be disposed of before the train crossed into American territory. He then departed.

Distinguished and dignified musicians, with international reputations, scurried about the cars, seeking hiding places, like frightened squirrels with Winter's horde of nuts.

Grips and suitcases were opened, and their owners, with arms filled with bottles, galloped up and down the cars. Some of the bottles were cached in instrument cases, French horns were made to do duty, seats were lifted and precious freight deposited beneath them.

The transoms in the roofs of the cars were favorite hiding places, while certain of the musicians, more ingenious than others, tied strings around the necks of bottles and suspended them from advantageous points in the washrooms. Others, when the train stopped at the border, ran out, leaped to the ground and tied their cherished possessions to the brake rods.

BURST INTO TEARS.

One member of the orchestra, a celebrity as well known in musical circles in Europe as he is in this country, tipped a porter to guard an especially treasured package. With the exception of a few poker players, he is believed to be the only musician to save his liquor.

When the train had crossed to the American side, bound for Buffalo, four inspectors boarded it, and havoc followed them. From car to car they proceeded, slowly and inflexibly, and they seemed to be gifted with the scent of bloodhounds. Wherever liquor was hidden they halted and practically no one escaped.

From hip pockets, from overcoats in the racks and hanging up, from transsoms, from beneath seots, and from the brake rods under the cars, they etracted bottles. The carnage was horrible. Even the suave and impressive Conductor Pierre Monteux was not exempt, it was whispered. Some of the musicians burst into tears. Leading first desk artists were overcome.

In only two instances, however, was liquor found in grips and ownership thereby indicated. The owners of these, apparently resigned to the discovery of their liquor, made no attempt to heed the warning of the customs official. They were taken into custody and later arraigned before the commissioner in Buffalo.

So great was the quantity of liquor seized that the inspectors were forced to impress the conductor and brakeman of the train into service as carriers. In some instances it was found musicians had bribed porters to place their bottles in the ice boxes.

In other cases the inspectors were unable to open the transoms, which had been jammed by the bottles, and were forced to break the glass.

AMER - NOV. 16.

SOME will praise and others will blame the decision of Mr. Monteux to include in the Symphony Concerts of next week the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, less the choral finale. Since no chorus is now partner to the orchestra, the conductor must deprive the music of the composer's climax. Yet the three preceding divisions may still be heard in integrity, and these Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will play. From Dr. Muck's day they have not passed to the Symphony Concerts. For novel experience of another sort comes also Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant," symphonic music for miming, drawn from Roman history or Roman fable of the victorious combat of Horatius "at the bridge." It is work, new to America, of the ablest composer amongst the Parisian "Six." Brahms's "Academic Overture" and two airs from Mozart to be sung by Mme. Hempel also dot the programme. One is the familiar "Deh Vieni" out of "Figaro's Wedding"; the other, the show-piece, less often sung, out of "The Elopement from the Harem."

Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, in Symphony Hall, a concert by the Symphony Orchestra for the aid of Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor who first set the standards of the Symphony Orchestra, and through years worked toward them—now, in his seventy-eighth year, a poor man in Vienna. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities and month by month the fall of the crown toward nothingness has stripped him of income. A year ago Mr. Monteux, quick-minded, generous, free from every prejudice, purposed such a concert. Now he brings it to pass. An elder generation of Bostonians knew Mr. Gericke's work at first hand; a younger still enjoys the fruit of it. Both have reason to requite him.

Thursday evening, Dec. 7, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the third of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mme. Samaroff will be the assisting pianist.

TRANS - NOV. 18,

[26]

REDUCTION RATIO
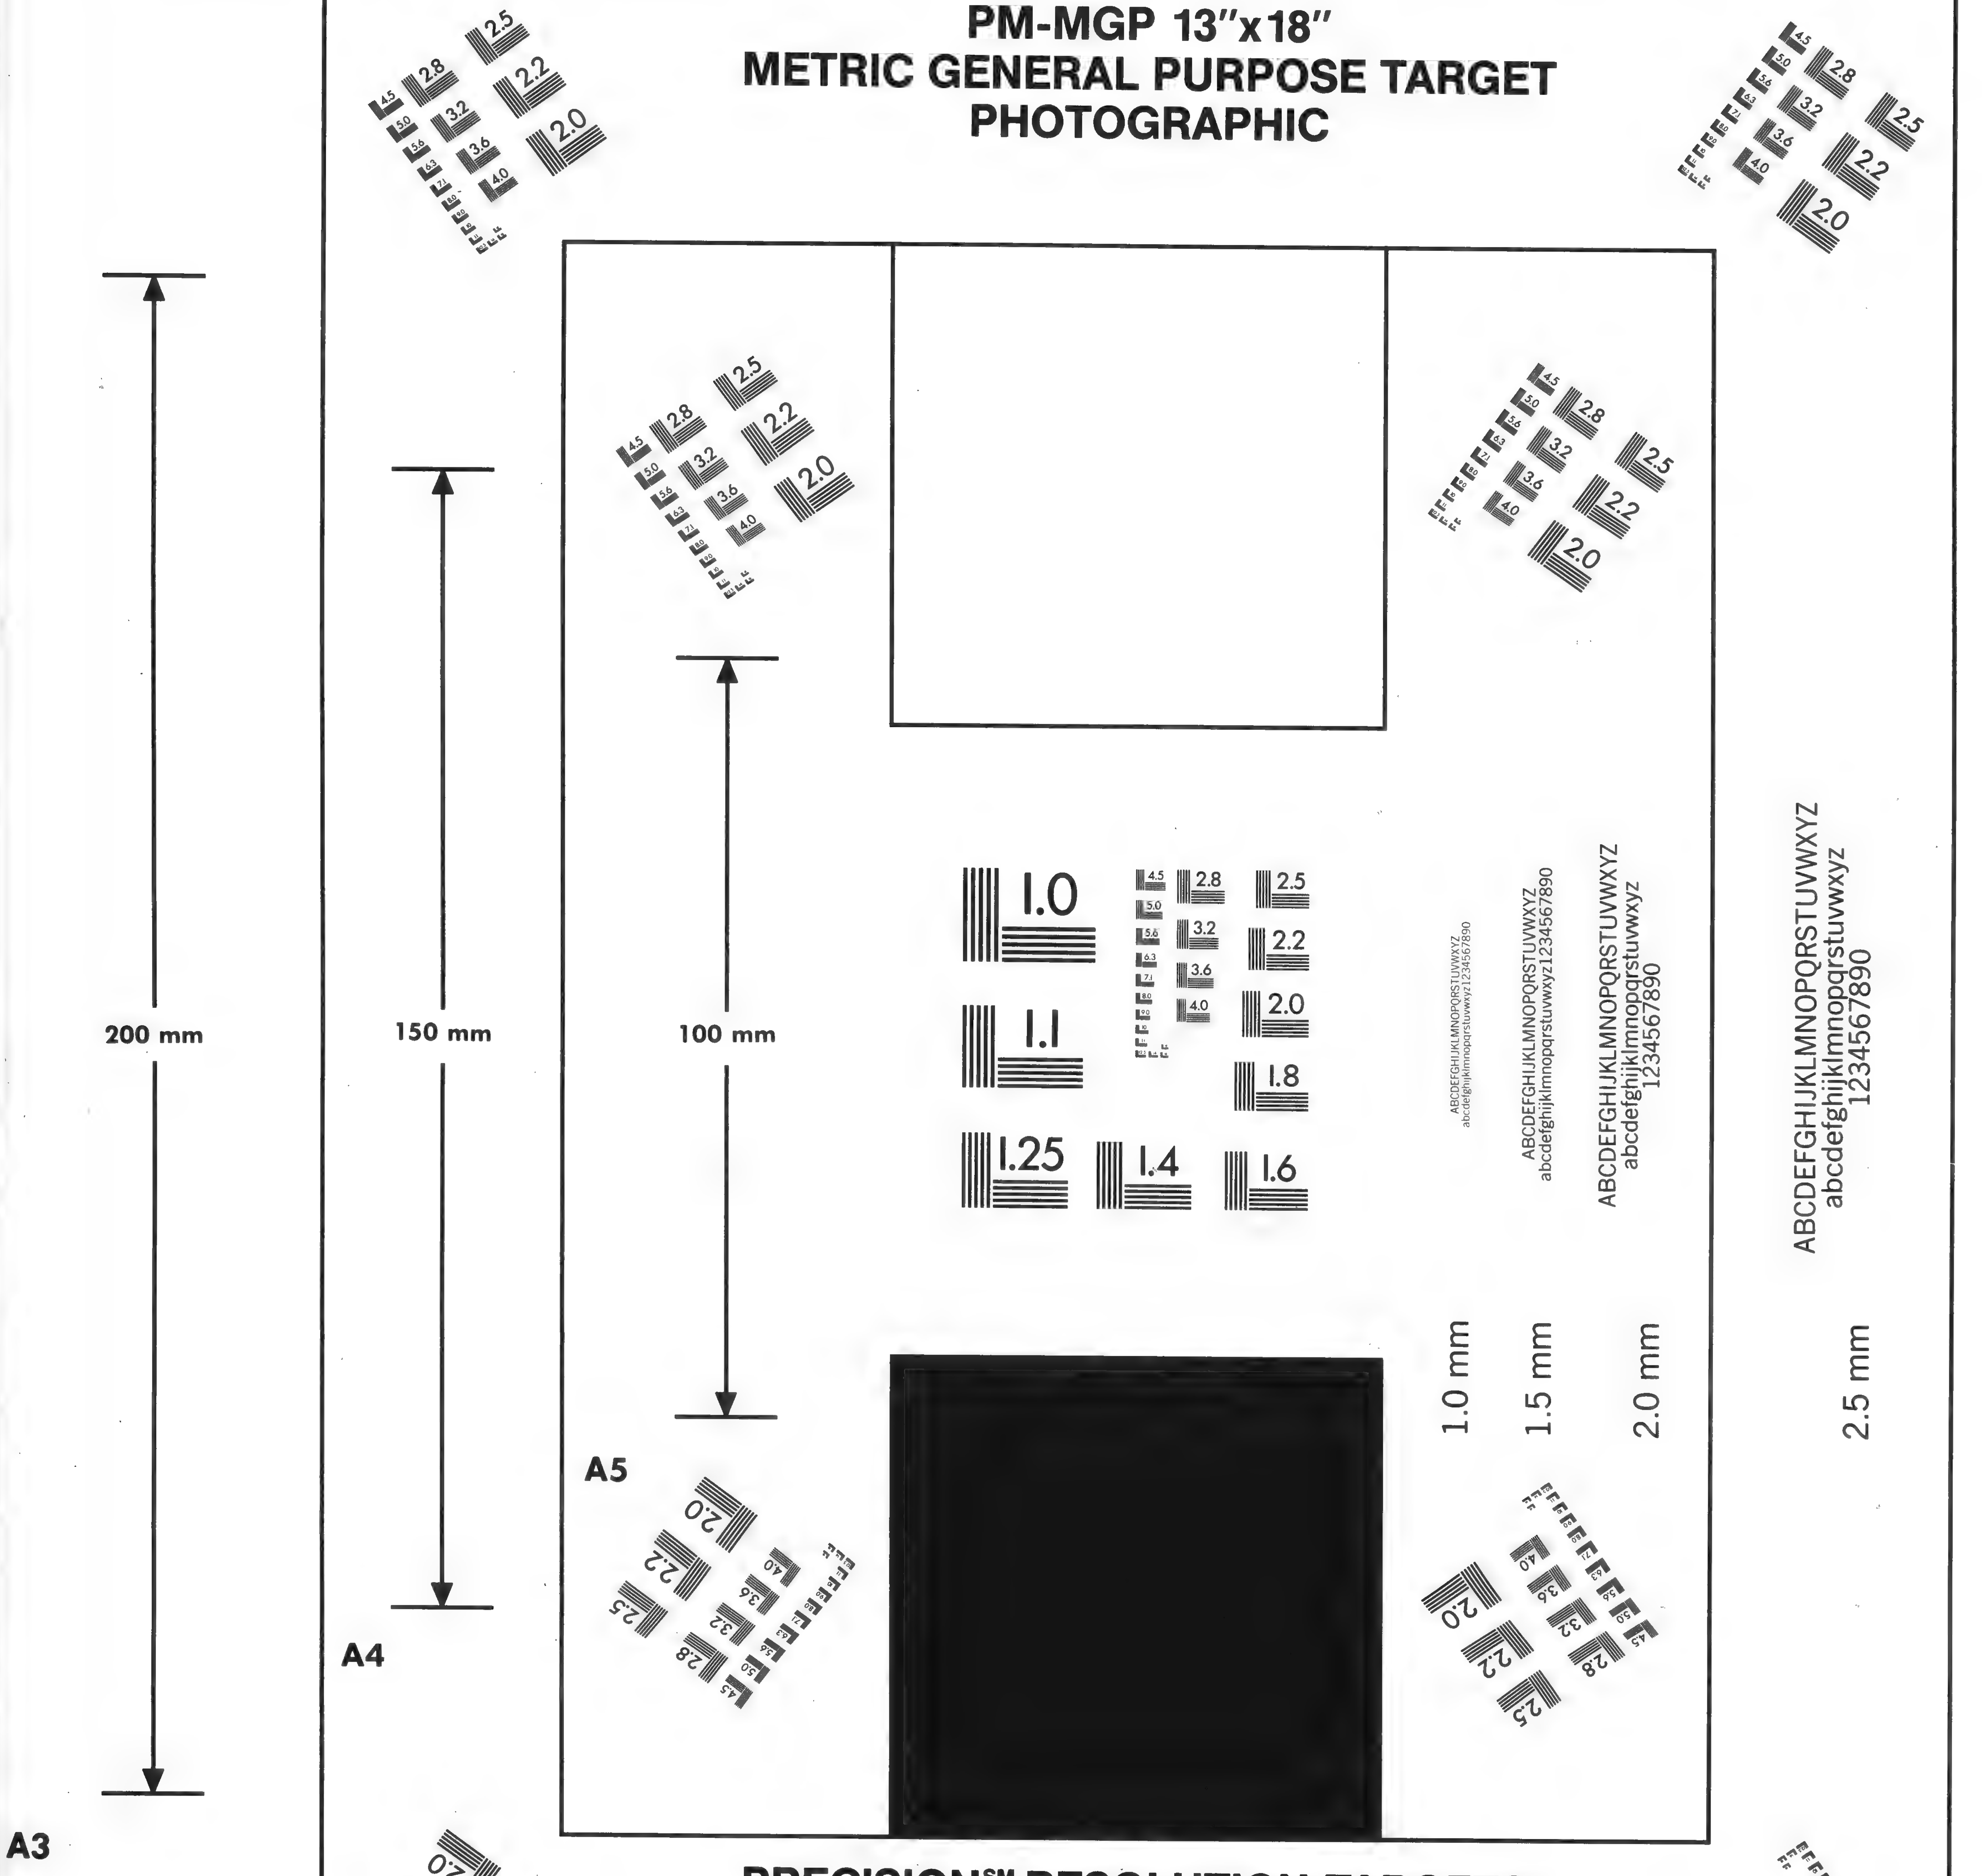
12x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ

SYMPHONY CONCERT

SINGULARITIES, PLEASURES AND PAINS

The Miniature Music of Davico Slight, Subtle, Suggestive and All His Own—The Frank and Full Delights of a Suite Out of Bach—Again the Heights and Also the Exactions of d'Indy's Reputed Masterpiece

At the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon, it was interesting to contrast the demeanor of the audience toward the Suite from Bach at the beginning, toward the Symphony from d'Indy at the end. Of strictly symphonic music Bach wrote little. Within it narrow is the field of choice. Often at Symphony Hall this Suite in D major has returned. Elsewhere, the "celebrated air for strings" and even other divisions are not overlooked. Familiarly, then, most of the audience heard. Yet had it been unacquainted with the music, it would have answered soon with as unfeigned pleasure. The melody, the rhythm, of Bach's Gavottes still please. Herrick's Julia might have paced to them. They keep a friendly elegance, a homely state. The bustle of Bach's Bourrée is agreeable to share. His jigging Finale beats light and neat. The "celebrated air" still sings itself in one of those deep curves of ascendant, intensifying song that eighteenth-century masters set to music-paper as easily as our young moderns repeat a figure or sharpen a dissonance. The robust, running pattern of the Overture, dividing, coalescing as the instrumental voices part or mate, exhilarates the ear. The vigors of Bach invigorate the hearer. The dullest may not resist the liveliness of the rhythms, the warmth of the occasional song, the gay or grave games of skill with the instrumental voices, the lusty design through which they sport. The human gusto of the music is as fresh in 1922 as it was in 1728. Bach's broad countenance smiles; his periwig shakes; his hands fling hither and thither—and joyous is it to see and hear. Happily engrossed, and openly honestly pleasured every one listens and nobody thinks once of duty.

Familiar, too, in degree and kind, is d'Indy's Second Symphony. When he himself first brought it to Boston, it was counted his masterpiece. Ever since, it has kept place in the repertory of the orchestra save through the years in which Dr. Muck and the composer were matching German contempt and Gallic scorn. (Yet with such music of exalted mental process Dr. Muck might have excelled any other conductor before or since essaying it.) Two years and more ago Mr. Monteux revived it. With reason yesterday he repeated it. And all the folk, as the old balladists used to say, gave him and the music attentive ear. Yet beside the elation over Bach's Suite, so manifestly was it the ear of dutiful obligation.

D'Indy is an eminent composer—eminent especially for heights and austerities. All the authorities have said as much. It is the tradition. Upon the loftiest and the coolest of these summits perches this Second Symphony. All the authorities so agree. Again it is the tradition. Yet even for the practiced and the devout with symphonic pieces, the music remains hard listening; while in mere pleasure-seekers minds will wander. Therefore one says to another "how truly beautiful is all this"—and together they make way to the nearest door. Or else to the end symphonic consciences hold firm and duty done becomes duty past—too tired also for more than obligatory applause. Within no very long memory, the authorities similarly proclaimed Brahms; while similarly audiences heard him. Now gladly they listen intent. A ha'penny for the authorities. Brahms pleases—of himself. Some day even d'Indy may be in like good case. Signs may be few; but wonders—witness the fortunes of Brahms!—still happen.

The listener expert and schooled may follow with interest the germination, growth, bloom and harvest of d'Indy's motivs. If he have also imagination, he may discover them set in array one against another, or passing and repassing, persisting and prevailing until one at least—the "great theme" of the close—is not to be overcome. If the hearer's mind be also keen and logical he may follow with sharpening zest and kindling satisfaction the ascending progress of the music. If he is alert to the play of modulation, harmonies, timbres, d'Indy will perpetually pique and persuade him. Before long, for its own sake, he will tingle to the pervading edginess of tone. A little longer, if he court the heights, he will breathe easily the rarefied tonal air. If gravities and nobilities stir him he will answer to the austere moods, the spiritual passion of the music.

Yet with all respect to d'Indy and in all admiration for this Second Symphony, the wayfaring man—as wayfaring goes at symphony concerts—still hears all these things vaguely, perceives them obscurely, darkly. He prefers his music, as Arnold preferred poetry, simple, sensuous, impassioned. The d'Indy of the Second Symphony is far from these states of soul and of composition in music, as such wayfarers comprehend them, respond to them. Their music is a music of the senses to the emotions. Through those same senses, d'Indy bids them to a music of the mind spiritualized. They draw back, like children when the tightening hand of the nurse draws them toward the dread dark closet. Yet the educative process with the Second Symphony goes forward. Obviously Mr. Monteux is resolute to continue it. Yet, at intervals, we hearers might receive also the easier lessons of the "Istar Variations" or the tone-poem of the mountain through a summer day. At the moment, the Parisian journals say, d'Indy himself is writing an operetta!

Between Bach for pleasure and d'Indy for edification came the briefest of intermezzi. One Davico wrote it—Italian composer still in his thirties who dwells not in the tents of Malipiero or Casella; prefers the Parisian chapels of Debussy; hears his music oftenest under the blues of the Riviera. There nearly two years ago an audience [illegible] applauded this symphonic poem of "Polyphemus." If in Greek folktale, Davico spied out the one-eyed giant; if in Ovid he read of him amorous for Galatea, vindictive upon Acis, if he conned all the Cyclopean "literature" from Theocritus of ancient Syracuse to Samain of modern Paris; yet remained he content with the mere outline of the fable. The youth discovers the abducted maid. Gently they speak and fondle. Afar Polyphemus sees, roars, casts his great stone of death and fate.

As brief relatively is the music, precise of pattern, fine of texture, quivering in rhythm, a-glow with soft colors pale-bright—miniature painting in tones even when the Cyclops crashes. A singular erotic sensibility threads the measures of the caressing pair. Subtle, almost secret, tremor stirs in pale timbres, twining modulations, sinuous harmonies, whispering rhythms. As singular upon ear and imagination are the shiver and shatter of doom. Only the rough, hoarse, clumping motiv for Polyhemus follows the rules. Davico may write a miniature music; yet—the Cyclops aside—through this little tone-poem, it is all and singularly his own. Suggestion, sinuous as its shape and motion, haunts it.

H. T. P.

TRANS-NOV-16

Fifth Program of Boston Symphony

The fifth program, played yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was as follows:

J. S. Bach, Suite No. 3 in D major.
Davico, Symphonic Poem, "Polyphemus."
D'Indy, Symphony No. 2 in B flat major.

Bach's Suite probably was never intended to be played by so large a number of players as that gathered together for its performance yesterday afternoon and for that reason it may have lost something of the intimate character in which it was originally conceived; yet for all that it gained, if anything, in nobility in the Overture, and the livelier dance tunes which succeeded were none the less graceful and spirited. Within a few days Ernest Hutcheson, the pianist, played the music of Bach in a dry, uninteresting way, with little attention to the character of the various dance forms in which the music was written, with only rare moments of expressiveness. How tiresome and dull did the music of the Leipzig Cantor then seem and how great was the contrast of yesterday afternoon. Mr. Monteux realizes that although Bach was the composer of the St. Matthew Passion and the B minor Mass, he also wrote much in a lighter vein and does not play this music of less serious mood with the shadow of the greater Bach always hanging over him. The dance tunes (and contrived with masterly skill as they are they still remain dance tunes) were played with grace, elegance and vivacity; the well-known Aria with feeling which nevertheless was far from sentimentality, the Overture was by turns stately and brilliant, and lo! the genius of the great Sebastian lost nothing thereby.

Davico's Symphonic Poem is program music in a form long out of date. Acis descends into the cave to the accompaniment of a descending figure in the basses. A noisy orchestral crash depicts the Cyclops as, "furious with mad jealousy, roaring with anger, he rolls a huge rock on the lovers." Acis and Galatea, singing together "the eternal hymn of love and life," are depicted by sugary phrases on the flute, clarinet, oboe, and English horn. Among all the modern Italians is there not music more worth while to be found? The pieces of Malipiero and Respighi which have been played here would lead one to think so. To be sure, this Symphonic Poem displays a certain aptitude for orchestral effect, but this is usually taken for granted in composers of the present day.

Once again D'Indy's Symphony in B flat excited admiration. It is music of the emotions and the intellect as well, broadly conceived and executed with the skill of a master. Mr. Monteux's interpretation of it is familiar, yet none the less remarkable. Clarity and sincerity distinguish it; strength and breadth of style are also among its qualities. Aided by the exceptionally fine playing of the orchestra, he brought it to memorable performance.

S. M.

MONITOR - NOV. 17

SYMPHONY PLAYS "POLYPHEMUS"

The feature of the concert given yesterday afternoon by the Symphony Orchestra was the symphonic poem, "Polyphemus," by Vincenzo Davico, played for the first time in this country. It is based on the story of Acis and Galatea. Acis finds the nymph, whom the Cyclops, Polyphemus, has stolen from him, sleeping on a bed of moss. Acis awakens her with caresses. Cyclops wakes, and roaring with anger, rolls a huge rock on the lovers. They are crushed.

Davico's dramatic music tells the story vividly. The orchestra gave an inspired performance.

The other numbers were Bach's suite in D major, No. 3, and D'Indy's Symphony in B flat major, No. 2, op. 57.

The unqualified success of the extra series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was started last season to meet the demand for concerts, has justified its repetition. Therefore the series will be given again on the following Monday evenings: Dec. 11, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 26 and April 23. Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will be heard in regular symphony [illegible] soloists will add to the interest of each

---

GERICKE BENEFIT CONCERT

A special concert will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its former conductor, whose means have been greatly reduced by the financial collapse in eastern Europe. Gericke conducted the orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1908.

TRAV.- NOV. 18.

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday

Next Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall at 8:15 o'clock the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano, as soloist, will make its bow for the season in Providence. Mr. Monteux has chosen an unusually interesting programme for the occasion, including the First Symphony of Brahms in C-minor, considered by many the most impressive and dramatic work of the composer, and called by Von Bulow, the logical successor to Beethoven's Ninth.

Another number of interest will be "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, who is remembered as the conductor of the orchestra in the season of 1918-1919, and who is a composer of note, having written operas and other symphonic works. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's overture, "1812," a battle piece celebrating the victory of the Russian hosts over Napoleon. In this score the Russian national anthem struggles with and finally triumphs over the Marseillaise in an overwhelming volume of sound.

Miss Hempel will sing two numbers, the aria "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and an aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz." Mme. Hempel has long been famous as an interpreter of Mozart melodies and lieder which have had prominent places on her programmes since she deserted grand opera for the recital and concert stage.

As for Symphony concerts of the past five seasons, student seats at a nominal sum may be had through the State Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Mary Cull 613 Jackson building, and Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, 270 Morris avenue, having charge of this branch of the work. Last year an average of 150 students attended each Symphony concert through the efforts of the federation. All music students, vocal or instrumental, up to the age of 25 years, are eligible.

* * *

© Underwood & Underwood

Frieda Hempel

Soprano Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday Night in Infantry Hall

---

Brahms' First Symphony Feature of Tuesday's Concert

BY WARREN STOREY-SMITH.
Of the Faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music.

In making his programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Mr. Monteux has followed his usual custom of combining in just proportion old and modern pieces. Most concert-goers cherish music made familiar through long acquaintance—provided it be music that gains, not loses interest on repeated hearing. Not a few, however, crave novel as well as accustomed pleasures, and in programme-making it is the concern of the conductor to suit, so far as may be possible, the individual tastes of all his auditors. This is a task of no small difficulty, and it may safely be said that in the 42 years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's existence none of its leaders has accomplished it so consistently and so skilfully as has Mr. Monteux.

For the Symphony—and in natural course the principal item—on Tuesday's programme, Mr. Monteux has chosen the First of Brahms, in the key of C minor and numbered 68 in his published works. Von Bulow, the pianist, had unbounded admiration for the music of Brahms, and a fondness for making epigrams concerning him. Placing Brahms in the company of Bach and Beethoven, he termed them the "three B's" that stood for music in its loftiest estate. And deeming it a worthy successor to the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven—than which there could be no higher praise—he called this First of Brahms the "Tenth Symphony."

Unlike many lesser composers whose vaulting ambition early lures them to the attempting of tasks beyond their powers, Brahms waited until he was in his 29th year before seriously undertaking the writing of a symphony, that most important and most exacting of musical forms. And while the piece might have been hastily finished in a few months' time, Brahms worked on it for a period of years, composing slowly, and patiently polishing what he had already written. Thus, although the idea of this symphony first entered his mind in 1855 (he was then 22), and work was actually begun on it in 1861, it was not until 1876 that it at last came to full completion.

How the symphony may have stood as first conceived we cannot know, but in its final form the piece is music, not of youth, but of ripe maturity. It is music of breadth and depth, of sombreness and ruggedness, of serene calm and of almost grave elation. In the matters of form and technique it may bear the closest scrutiny. Not a note is misplaced. Here is music of absolute mastery, if not, as some would claim, of unflagging inspiration. It has been urged, and with some justice, that in writing for the orchestra Brahms had but limited feeling for its color-possibilities, and that his instrumentation tends to harshness and opacity. Yet the instrumental dress is almost ideally suited to the thoughts it clothes . . . and that is art.

The first movement is darker in mood than what follows, with many pages of violent, rhythmic energy, terseness, and dramatic point. Then comes the Andante, perhaps the finest slow movement that Brahms ever wrote. With chords of peculiarly Brahmsian harmonies there are interwoven fragments of long drawn,- songful melody, which are unforgetable. The woodwind solo instruments take it up alternately—the oboe, clarinet and flute—but particularly the oboe. The sombre hues which pervade this symphony are not yet dispersed with Allegretto. Shortly after the last movement begins, the solo French horn pours forth a prolonged melody which is one of the most celebrated ever written for that instrument (one of the Brahms's favorites, by the way, as the most soft and effulgent-toned of the brass family). This movement abounds in contrast of mood—is perhaps the most sensational of the four. The climax is brought by a splendid folk melody, proclaimed broadly as a great outburst by the entire orchestra. The culmination is swift and mighty—it carries all before it.

For the closing number of the programme Mr. Monteux has selected Tchaikovsky's "Ouverture Solennelle, 1812." Only seven years younger than Brahms, Tchaikovsky seems a far more "modern" composer. He was indeed more an experimenter, especially in the domain of orchestration. And he was not—as Brahms undoubtedly was—a classicist born out of his time. Tchaikovsky felt the spirit of the age in which he lived; he was a Russian before he was a musician, and, the victim of his neurotic temperament, he let his moods, now morbid, now feverishly exhilarated, intrude upon his music—a most unclassical proceeding. This "1812" Overture celebrates and portrays the retreat of Napoleon's army from Russian soil. It was composed for the consecration of the Temple of Christ in Moscow in the summer of 1881, and was first performed in the square in front of the Cathedral, by an enormous orchestra reinforced with cannon. The Overture opens with a Russian hymn, "God Preserve Thy People," and this melody reappears at the end, followed by a sonorous proclamation of the Russian National Anthem. To suggest the French army Tchaikovsky has made use of the "Marseillaise," and the harassing Russians are represented by a folktune from Novgorod, a section of Russia. There are also two well defined themes of the composer's own inventing—the first a plaintive melody announced by the oboe after the first appearance of the Russian hymn, the second given out by the violins at the beginning of the main body of the overture.

In placing on the programme Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Mr. Monteux pays graceful and deserved tribute to the man who preceded him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As will be remembered, Mr. Rabaud occupied this post for but one season, yet in that time he made deep impression, both through his excellent qualities as musician and through the charm of his personality and the fine dignity of his bearing. On his return to France signal honor was in store for him, for on the death of Theodore Dubois M. Rabaud was made his successor as President of the Paris Conservatory. As composer M. Rabaud has won an estimable place among the writers of music in modern France. The more generally known of his works include opera "Marouf," frequently performe the Metropolitan, and his admirable ond Symphony.

This "Procession Nocturne" is base a poem by Lenau, which describes F travelling through the obscurity of a d forest, beneath the lowering sky o warm night of spring. It is the nigh St. John's Eve, and by the illumination a light not of this earth he beholds passing of a solemn procession—childr virgins, and monks grown old in the service of religion. Envying the happiness the faithful, Faust, left alone among shadows, weeps burning and bitter tea

For soloist comes Freida Hempel, fr the Metropolitan Opera Company, to two arias; the first, "Deh Vieni," f Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro;" the ond, "Agatha's Prayer," from Web "Der Freischutz." The "Marriage of Figaro," brightest and most sparkling of composer's operas, was written and produced in Vienna in 1786, and the "Deh Vieni" is an air long familiar to concert-goers. "Der Freischutz," completed in 1820, has achieved fame, not only through its intrinsic merits, but through its historical importance as the first realization in operatic form of the tendencies of the Romantic movement. Here the element of the supernatural, with all its thrilling potentialities, first found place in musical expression.

PROV JOURNAL-NOV 17

Extra Symphony Series

Monday Evening Concerts to Be Continued—Soloists Announced

The Extra Series of five Boston Symphony concerts which were started last year with such great success are to be continued. They will be given on Monday evenings as before and, indeed, have come to be popularly known as the "Monday Evening Concerts." They will take place on the following dates in Symphony Hall: Dec. 11, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 26, and April 23.

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will present regular symphony programmes at these concerts, giving prominence to the accepted masterpieces of the standard symphonic repertory. To each concert an additional interest will be given by the appearance of a soloist of note. The list will include Ernest Schelling, the brilliant pianist and composer, Magdeleine Brard, the talented young pianist, who appeared as a prodigy in Boston two years ago, when the surprising skill and maturity of her playing attracted much attention. There will be two singers, Ester Ferrabini Jacchia, the noted operatic soprano, and Florence Macbeth, a leading soprano of the Chicago Opera Company. There will be one violin soloist—Renee Chemet, an artist who has not yet been heard in Boston but whose concerts elsewhere are attracting increasing attention.

Beethoven Abbreviated

Next week Mr. Monteux is going to play three movements of Beethoven's 9th symphony without the great movemen for chorus and orchestra which brings the stupendous composition to its climax. Some will see in this an irreverence to Beethoven, a decapitation of a statue. It will be an interesting experiment, and, to look at it quite honestly, isn't the best part of the 9th symphony the orchestral part of the work? Let us find out, and not trouble too much about reverence to a great master. If the present time furnishes any lesson at all it is that great masters, as we said before, and great ideas can take care of themselves.

Symphony Programme

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Pierre Monteaux will conduct for the first time in a number of seasons the three instrumental movements of the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven in D minor.

The soloist will be Frieda Hempel, who will sing two arias of Mozart.

The remaining orchestral numbers will be Honneger's "Horatius Triumphant," called "A Mimed Symphony," to have its first performance in America on this occasion, and Brahms' "Academic Festival" overture.

GERICKE BENEFIT

A special concert will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its former conductor, in Symphony Hall, Tuesday evening, Dec. 5. Mr. Gericke's means have been greatly reduced by the financial collapse in Eastern Europe. Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and to his genius is largely attributed its rise to the state of perfection which has made it one of the greatest in the world. Gericke conducted the orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906.

POST- NOV. 19

FOUR ARTIS [illegible] EXTRA BOSTON

Her 11-19

LEFT TO RIGHT—ESTER FERRABINI JACCHIA, SOPRANO; FLORENCE MACBETH, SOPRANO; MAGDELEINE BRARD, PIANIST; RENEE CHEMET, VIOLINIST

GERICKE BENEFIT

A special concert will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its former conductor, whose means have been greatly reduced by the financial collapse in eastern Europe. Mr. Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. To his genius is largely attributed its rise to the state of perfection that has made it one of the greatest in the world. Mr. Gericke conducted the orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The Monday evening series of symphony concerts which were given last season with great success will be repeated and given at Symphony hall on the following dates: Dec. 11, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 26 and April 23. These concerts by the full Symphony orchestra under its conductor, Mr. Monteux, with regular Symphony programs and notable soloists, have proved a splendid opportunity for those who have not been able to obtain seats for the regular series to hear symphonic music to fine advantage.

The soloists to be heard at these concerts are: Ernest Schelling, pianist; Magdeleine Brard, the young French pianist, who first came to this country with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra in 1918, a pupil of Cortot and late Saint-Saens; Renee Chemet, violinist; Florence Macbeth of the Chicago

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the next Boston Symphony concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteaux will conduct for the first time in a number of seasons the three instrumental movements of the ninth symphony of Beethoven in D minor. The soloist at these concerts will be Frieda Hempel, who will sing two arias of Mozart. The remaining orchestral numbers will be Honneger's "Horatius Triumphant," called "A Mimed Symphony," which will have its first performance in America, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture.

HERALD NOV. 19.

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY SERIES

The Monday evening Symphony concerts, successfully started last season, are to be repeated this year at Symphony Hall on December 11, January 29, February 19, March 26, and April 23. These concerts are by the full Symphony orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, with regular Symphony programs and notable soloists.

The soloists this season are: Ernest Schelling, pianist and composer; Magdeleine Brard, the young French pianist; Renee Chemet, violinist; Florence Macbeth of the Chicago Opera Company and Esther Ferrabini Jacchia.

AMER-NOV. 19.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

BACH AND THE STRING CHOIR OF SYMPHONY HALL

Through the Tests of the Suite in D Major—Again the Deserts of Mr. Gericke—Well Chosen Music Well Played by the People's Orchestra—Incidents as They Pass

EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY music, above any other, tests the quality of a string-choir. Composers of the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries have searched and applied the possibilities of the wood-wind and the brass instruments in an orchestra. They are still discovering and utilizing the color, contrast, surprise, that instruments of percussion may lend. They have not spared inquiry and experiment upon the strings; yet with them, except in division and subdivision, they have not advanced far over the ancients. For Bach and Handel, for Haydn and Mozart, for Lulli, Purcell, Rameau, the strings were the essence of an orchestra. They had at command string-choirs no whit inferior—as it seems by contemporary record—to those assembed in bands of the present day. In the Cöthen and the Leipzig of Bach, in the London of Handel, in the Vienna of Mozart, writing for stringed instruments, playing upon stringed instruments, were already accepted, ripened arts. In eighteenth-century composers, moreover, went an intuitive and a practiced skill with string-choirs; imagination fed it; experiment broadened and deepened it. Else Haydn would hardly have gained the flick and flash of the strings through his swift finales; Mozart his lovely euphonies; Handel his refulgent sonorities; Bach his supple or sweeping stride.

Under such test went the present string-choir of the Symphony Orchestra through the Suite in D-major of Bach, played again on Saturday evening; while at almost every turn the outcome praised it. The tone of the violoncellos has seldom sounded ampler of body, richer in texture, warmer in color. The ten musicians who play them are indeed an expert and a fused group of virtuosi. The violas, still in the ripening, did not lack characteristic voice. The violins were precise without brittleness; vigorous without coarseness; lustrous without hardness. There was no questioning either the beauty or the sensibility of their tone. A singer versed in the arts of song, susceptible to eighteenth-century music, might hardly have excelled them in the sustaining, phrasing and cumulation of Bach's "celebrated air." Elsewhere through the Suite, they were as quick to rhythm as he, as supple with his interwoven design, as ringing in his full-voiced. concentrating ensembles. By a string-choir the music might hardly be more completely or vividly played

H. T. P.

Recalling Mr. Gericke

Noting the concert in Symphony Hall on Dec. 5 to relieve the necessities of Mr. Gericke in old age at Vienna and recalling the fund that his fellow-conductors are contributing for like purpose, Mr. Aldrich in The New York Times yesterday summarizes his signal services not only to the Boston Orchestra but to the whole course of symphonic music in America. The reviewer wrote:

> It is a question not of giving, but of paying a debt. Mr. Gericke gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, the two terms during which he was at the head of the Boston Orchestra, the years 1884-89 and 1898-1906. It was he who set the standard that the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally reached, and he who made the organization into the marvelous body of players that disclosed new possibilities of orchestral playing to American musicians and music lovers—a body of players that had no superior and only doubtfully an equal in the world.
>
> What the Boston Orchestra was, he made it. The character it had as an artistic instrument, and the style of its performances were as they were because they had been moulded exactly by his ideals and methods. They were high ideals and strenuous methods. He never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at. And still less did he spare himself. A "pasison for perfection" was at the foundation of Mr. Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he wreaked himself upon the orchestra to make it what he would have it.
>
> So near the achievement of an ideal, so measurably within reach of perfection, it is not given to many in this world to come. The wonderful instrument that Mr. Gericke made continued with minor and inconsiderable fluctuations to respond to the touch of his successors, till the consequences of war came so near to wrecking it, as they did other estimable things.
>
> The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first of the endowed or sustained orchestras that are now so numerous in all parts of the United States. Mr. Gericke's work, or his influence, may in some measure be seen in all of them. The standard that they are trying to reach may be said to be really the one that he set. And so the benefit of his work in America extended far beyond Boston.
>
> In like manner the gratitude of those who enjoyed that benefit, and in a way are still enjoying it, should extend far beyond Boston. The conductors have shown a chivalrous remembrance of their colleague in the work they are planning to collect funds, and in the generous contributions they themselves have made. It remains for the musical public to show that Wilhelm Gericke, his work, his gentleness and modesty are
>
> Writ in remembrance more than things long past.

Incidents and Announcements

For the first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York this autumn, on Thursday, Nov. 30, and Saturday, Dec. 2, Mr. Monteux has chosen these pieces out of the current repertory: Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; Brahms's Fourth Symphony; Strauss's tone-poem, "Zarathustra"; Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin"; Williams's "Tallis Fantasia" for string band; Griffes's little tone-pictures, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock"; Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant."

TRANS-NOV. 20

NOV. 23
Pawtucket Times

SYMPHONY GREETED BY GREAT AUDIENCE

Frieda Hempel in Glorious Voice as Soloist with Boston Orchestra.

A great audience welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening when the orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, opened its Providence series of concerts in Infantry Hall. It was an audience notable for its size and for the presence of many of the most prominent musicians and patrons of music in Rhode Island, and the splendid Boston orchestra's brilliant playing aroused unbounded enthusiasm.

Mme. Frieda Hempel, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, was the soloist, reaching a tremendous triumph in her two numbers. It was a truly notable opening of the symphony course, promising great things for the season to come. The programme follows

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" .... Mozart
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) .... Rabaud
Recitative, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz." Weber
Overture, Solennelle, "1812" in E-flat major, Op. 49 .... Tchaikovsky

The Brahms symphony, which opened the concert, was played with the smoothness and tonal beauty which patrons of these concerts have learned to expect from the Boston orchestra, and was interpreted by Conductor Monteux with complete sympathy. One of the conspicuous figures in the world of music today, M. Monteux has imparted his vigorous and thoroughly artistic personality to his organization, and the result is the gradual development of the orchestra until it is once more one of the few really great symphony orchestras. Not only in the symphony, but in the other orchestral numbers, the players responded with fine fire to the work in hand, and gave a splendid performance.

A thunder of applause was the response of the audience to Mme. Hempel's first number, and the massed approval grew into an ovation on her second appearance. Her voice, beautiful in quality and sustained power, made a great impression on her audience. She is a soprano of the first rank, a thorough artist, whose singing last evening was a joy and an inspiration to all who heard her.

NOV 23
Tribune

Standing Room Only at Symphony Concert

Freda Hempel, Soloist, with Bostonians, Strengthens Hold on Music Lovers.

When we are all dead and gone, our children and their children will be hearing a Boston Symphony playing in Providence. This perenial organization comes here year after year and never fails to satisfy the music lovers of this city, fulfilling the desire that inherent in most of us to have our cultural lives rounded. Last night the Boston Symphony gave its 174th concent in Providence in Infantry Hall to standing room only. Pierre Monteux conducted and the personnel contained the same familiar faces.

Frieda Hempel was the soloist and she continued, by her excellent singing last night in the good graces of local music lovers because of [illegible]

The [illegible]

....Brahms
Un poco sostenuto, Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" ....Mozart
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) ....Rabaud
Recitative, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," in E-flat major, Op. 49 ....Tchaikovsky

The Brahms symphony was a lovely thing. Although the first movement was rather dull and colorless, the andante and the adagio were well worth waiting for. In the second movement, the rising and falling of the violins throughout, the slow and rich opening, the thematic beauty of the horn, all conspired to send increase the artistic thrill. The last movement contained elements of rich beauty, the throwing of the notes around amongst the violins with the interspersion of the horn being of particular loveliness. So much has been written in praise of this famous symphony that these few words seem futile in comparison to the ecstacies into which veteran criotics have gone over it.

Frieda Hempel sang the aria, "Deh Vieni" from "Le Mozze di Figaro" and one felt that Mozart, in his grave, was grateful to her. Clarity and richness and that rarity of tonal quality which should be associated with Mozartian arias were here. Again in the somewhat time-chipped recitative from "Der Freischutz" Mme. Hempel proved the essential rightness of her voice and her singing of "Leise, leise," made one again glad that Hempel's quality is as constant as the pole star.

M. Rabaud's contribution to the program was negliible. Debussy and too much water, is a just estimate. Tchaikovsky's 1812 overture ended the program. It is almost time that M. Monteux let this bit of gimcrackery remain on the shelf for at least a decade as far as Providence is concerned.

BOSTON SYMPHONY NUMBERS ENTHUSE; HEMPEL IS SOLOIST

Playing before a larger audience than has attended a Boston Symphony concert in years, Pierre Monteux and his fine orchestra opened their Providence season last evening in Infantry Hall. It was not only a large, but also a very enthusiastic gathering, for M. Monteux had arranged an excellent programme, which received a brilliant presentation. The presence of Frieda Hempel as soloist made the occasion one of unusual interest.

The orchestra returns this season with its personnel practically intact. Few changes have been made and the men, fresh after their summer vacation, seem full of enthusiasm for their work. Technically their playing showed increased smoothness over that of last season. In fact, during the past few years under M. Monteux the orchestra has gradually been brought to a point of artistic excellence that measures up to the finest work in the organization's history. Last evening there was vigor without roughness, splendid responsiveness, and a perfection of technical detail in each instrumental section that made the conductor's work strictly one of interpretation.

Although Mme. Hempel has sung in concerts in this city on previous occasions, this was her first appearance here with the Boston orchestra. Her success last evening was overwhelming and at the close of her final aria she was given applause that amounted to an ovation.

This was the programme:

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68...Brahm
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" ....Mozart
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) ....Rabaud
Recitative, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" in E-flat major, Op. 49 ....Tchaikovsky

As interpreter of the classics, M. Monteux is successful in entering with sympathy and judgment into the spirit of the composer. His reading of the Brahms symphony last evening was one of dignity, breadth and beauty. The complex, wonderfully voiced score assumed delightful clearness and expressiveness under his scholarly direction. Brahms, accused in earlier days of being rather circuitous and incoherent in his musical speech, needs only sympathetic understanding on the part of his interpreter to make his works understandable to the layman as well as the musician. [illegible] It teems with melodic material, which is treated with the art of the master-craftsman. There is beauty, not only of theme but in everchanging and delightful instrumentation. M. Monteux's thoughtful presentation of the symphony was appreciated by the audience and both conductor and players shared in spontaneous and prolonged applause.

The second orchestral number, Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," is a colorful and imaginative piece in modern French style. The work, inspired by Lenau's poem, paints in sombre colors the shadowy mysteries of the night, a solemn, nocturnal procession and the unhappiness of the hero, Faust.

M. Rabaud, a former Boston Symphony conductor, is a composer of notable accomplishment in the orchestral and operatic fields. The delicacy and fragile beauty of portions of the score were brought out clearly by M. Monteux.

Mme. Hempel is a coloratura soprano, but she has not the limitations of that type of songbird. Her voice is full and rich, in addition to a remarkable flexibility. She can sing a song requiring dramatic delivery as well as astonish by vocal pyrotechnics. For her numbers last evening she selected two arias requiring more of the art of sustained vocalism than showy technique. Mme. Hempel is an artist to her finger tips, and her voice is undoubtedly one of the most beautiful on the concert stage. She handles it with perfect ease, and it is always true to pitch however difficult may be the demands upon it. "Deh Vieni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and her aria from "Der Freischutz" were sung with splendid artistry. The latter, with its rapturous, joyful ending, thrilled the audience, and the singer was required to return to the stage several times in response to tremendous applause.

The Tschaikowsky overture Solennelle, "1812," is a brilliant number and brought the concert to a stirring close. The overture commemorates Napoleon's famous retreat from Moscow and in it the composer has used fragments of the "Marseillaise" and the Russian national hymn with striking effect. In brilliantly scored style, the Russian tune finally triumphs over the French national hymn. The piece was played with great fire.

A. F. P.

PROV BULL-NOV 23

FOUR ARTIS[illegible] EXTRA BOSTON S[illegible] RCHESTRA CO[illegible]

Nov 11-19

LEFT TO RIGHT—ESTER FERRABINI JACCHIA, SOPRANO; FLORENCE MACBETH, SOPRANO; MAGDELEINE BRARD, PIANIST; RENEE CHEMET, VIOLINIST

GERICKE BENEFIT

A special concert will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its former conductor, whose means have been greatly reduced by the financial collapse in eastern Europe. Mr. Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra. To his genius is largely attributed its rise to the state of perfection that has made it one of the greatest in the world. Mr. Gericke conducted the orchestra from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The Monday evening series of symphony concerts which were given last season with great success will be repeated and given at Symphony hall on the following dates: Dec. 11, Jan. 29, Feb. 19, March 26 and April 23. These concerts by the full Symphony orchestra under its conductor, Mr. Monteux, with regular Symphony programs and notable soloists, have proved a splendid opportunity for those who have not been able to obtain seats for the regular series to hear symphonic music to fine advantage.

The soloists to be heard at these concerts are: Ernest Schelling, pianist; Magdeleine Brard, the young French pianist, who first came to this country with the Paris Conservatory Orchestra in 1918, a pupil of Cortot and late Saint-Saens; Renee Chemet, violinist; Florence Macbeth of the Chicago

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the next Boston Symphony concerts, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Mr. Monteaux will conduct for the first time in a number of seasons the three instrumental movements of the ninth symphony of Beethoven in D minor. The soloist at these concerts will be Frieda Hempel, who will sing two arias of Mozart. The remaining orchestral numbers will be Honneger's "Horatius Triumphant," called "A Mimed Symphony," which will have its first performance in America, and Brahms's "Academic Festival" overture.

HERALD NOV. 19.

MONDAY NIGHT SYMPHONY SERIES

The Monday evening Symphony concerts, successfully started last season, are to be repeated this year at Symphony Hall on December 11, January 29, February 19, March 26, and April 23. These concerts are by the full Symphony orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, with regular Symphony programs and notable soloists.

The soloists this season are: Ernest Schelling, pianist and composer; Magdeleine Brard, the young French pianist; Renee Chemet, violinist; Florence Macbeth of the Chicago Opera Company and Esther Ferrabini Jacchia.

AMER-NOV. 19.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

BACH AND THE STRING CHOIR OF SYMPHONY HALL

Through the Tests of the Suite in D Major—Again the Deserts of Mr. Gericke—Well Chosen Music Well Played by the People's Orchestra — Incidents as They Pass

EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY music, above any other, tests the quality of a string-choir. Composers of the nineteenth and the twentieth centuries have searched and applied the possibilities of the wood-wind and the brass instruments in an orchestra. They are still discovering and utilizing the color, contrast, surprise, that instruments of percussion may lend. They have not spared inquiry and experiment upon the strings; yet with them, except in division and subdivision, they have not advanced far over the ancients. For Bach and Handel, for Haydn and Mozart, for Lulli, Purcell, Rameau, the strings were the essence of an orchestra. They had at command string-choirs no whit inferior—as it seems by contemporary record—to those assembled in bands of the present day. In the Cöthen and the Leipzig of Bach, in the London of Handel, in the Vienna of Mozart, writing for stringed instruments, playing upon stringed instruments, were already accepted, ripened arts. In eighteenth-century composers, moreover, went an intuitive and a practiced skill with string-choirs; imagination fed it; experiment broadened and deepened it. Else Haydn would hardly have gained the flick and flash of the strings through his swift finales; Mozart his lovely euphonies; Handel his refulgent sonorities; Bach his supple or sweeping stride.

Under such test went the present string-choir of the Symphony Orchestra through the Suite in D-major of Bach, played again on Saturday evening; while at almost every turn the outcome praised it. The tone of the violoncellos has seldom sounded ampler of body, richer in texture, warmer in color. The ten musicians who play them are indeed an expert and a fused group of virtuosi. The violas, still in the ripening, did not lack characteristic voice. The violins were precise without brittleness; vigorous without coarseness; lustrous without hardness. There was no questioning either the beauty or the sensibility of their tone. A singer versed in the arts of song, susceptible to eighteenth-century music, might hardly have excelled them in the sustaining, phrasing and cumulation of Bach's "celebrated air." Elsewhere through the Suite, they were as quick to rhythm as he, as supple with his interwoven design, as ringing in his full-voiced, concentrating ensembles. By a string-choir the music might hardly be more completely or vividly played

H. T. P.

Recalling Mr. Gericke

Noting the concert in Symphony Hall on Dec. 5 to relieve the necessities of Mr. Gericke in old age at Vienna and recalling the fund that his fellow-conductors are contributing for like purpose, Mr. Aldrich in The New York Times yesterday summarizes his signal services not only to the Boston Orchestra but to the whole course of symphonic music in America. The reviewer wrote:

> It is a question not of giving, but of paying a debt. Mr. Gericke gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, the two terms during which he was at the head of the Boston Orchestra, the years 1884-89 and 1898-1906. It was he who set the standard that the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally reached, and he who made the organization into the marvelous body of players that disclosed new possibilities of orchestral playing to American musicians and music lovers—a body of players that had no superior and only doubtfully an equal in the world.
>
> What the Boston Orchestra was, he made it. The character it had as an artistic instrument, and the style of its performances were as they were because they had been moulded exactly by his ideals and methods. They were high ideals and strenuous methods. He never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at. And still less did he spare himself. A "pasison for perfection" was at the foundation of Mr. Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he wreaked himself upon the orchestra to make it what he would have it.
>
> So near the achievement of an ideal, so measurably within reach of perfection, it is not given to many in this world to come. The wonderful instrument that Mr. Gericke made continued with minor and inconsiderable fluctuations to respond to the touch of his successors, till the consequences of war came so near to wrecking it, as they did other estimable things.
>
> The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first of the endowed or sustained orchestras that are now so numerous in all parts of the United States. Mr. Gericke's work, or his influence, may in some measure be seen in all of them. The standard that they are trying to reach may be said to be really the one that he set. And so the benefit of his work in America extended far beyond Boston.
>
> In like manner the gratitude of those who enjoyed that benefit, and in a way are still enjoying it, should extend far beyond Boston. The conductors have shown a chivalrous remembrance of their colleague in the work they are planning to collect funds, and in the generous contributions they themselves have made. It remains for the musical public to show that Wilhelm Gericke, his work, his gentleness and modesty are
>
> Writ in remembrance more than things long past.

Incidents and Announcements

For the first concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York this autumn, on Thursday, Nov. 30, and Saturday, Dec. 2, Mr. Monteux has chosen these pieces out of the current repertory: Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony; Brahms's Fourth Symphony; Strauss's tone-poem, "Zarathustra"; Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin"; Williams's "Tallis Fantasia" for string band; Griffes's little tone-pictures, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock"; Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant."

TRANS-NOV. 20

NOV 23
[illegible] Times

SYMPHONY GREETED BY GREAT AUDIENCE

Frieda Hempel in Glorious Voice as Soloist with Boston Orchestra.

A great audience welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening when the orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, opened its Providence series of concerts in Infantry Hall. It was an audience notable for its size and for the presence of many of the most prominent musicians and patrons of music in Rhode Island, and the splendid Boston orchestra's brilliant playing aroused unbounded enthusiasm.

Mme. Frieda Hempel, soprano of the Metropolitan Opera, was the solist, reaching a tremendous triumph in her two numbers. It was a truly notable opening of the symphony course, promising great things for the season to come. The programme follows

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68 Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" .... Mozart
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) .... Rabaud
Recitative, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz," Weber
Overture, Solennelle, "1812" in E-flat major, Op. 49 .... Tchaikovsky

The Brahms symphony, which opened the concert, was played with the smoothness and tonal beauty which patrons of these concerts have learned to expect from the Boston orchestra, and was interpreted by Conductor Monteux with complete sympathy. One of the conspicuous figures in the world of music today, M. Monteux has imparted his vigorous and thoroughly artistic personality to his organization, and the result is the gradual development of the orchestra until it is once more one of the few really great symphony orchestras. Not only in the symphony, but in the other orchestral numbers, the players responded with fine fire to the work in hand, and gave a splendid performance.

A thunder of applause was the response of the audience to Mme. Hempel's first number, and the massed approval grew into an ovation on her second appearance. Her voice, beautiful in quality and sustained power, made a great impression on her audience. She is a soprano of the first rank, a thorough artist, whose singing last evening was a joy and an inspiration to all who heard her.

Tribune

Standing Room Only at Symphony Concert

Freda Hempel, Soloist, with Bostonians, Strengthens Hold on Music Lovers.

When we are all dead and gone, our children and their children will be hearing a Boston Symphony playing in Providence. This perenial organization comes here year after year and never fails to satisfy the music lovers of this city, fulfilling the desire that inherent in most of us to have our cultural lives rounded. Last night the Boston Symphony gave its 174th concert in Providence in Infantry Hall to standing room only. Pierre Monteux conducted and the personnel contained the same familiar faces.

Frieda Hempel was the soloist and she continued, by her excellent singing last night in the good graces of local music lovers because of her remarkable voice.

The program follows:

Sym[illegible] ....Brahms
Un poco sostenuto, Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" ....Mozart
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) ....Rabaud
Recitative, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812," in E-flac major, Op. 49 ....Tchaikovsky

The Brahms symphony was a lovely thing. Although the first movement was rather dull and colorless, the andante and the adagio were well worth waiting for. In the second movement, the rising and falling of the violins throughout, the slow and rich opening, the thematic beauty of the horn, all conspired to send increase the artistic thrill. The last movement contained elements of rich beauty, the throwing of the notes around amongst the violins with the interspersion of the horn being of particular loveliness. So much has been written in praise of this famous symphony that these few words seem futile in comparison to the ecstacies into which veteran criotics have gone over it.

Frieda Hempel sang the aria, "Deh Vieni" from "Le Mozze di Figaro" and one felt that Mozart, in his grave, was grateful to her. Clarity and richness and that rarity of tonal quality which should be associated with Mozartian arias were here. Again in the somewhat time-chipped recitative from "Der Freischutz" Mme. Hempel proved the essential rightness of her voice and her singing of "Leise, leise," made one again glad that Hempel's quality is as constant as the pole star.

M. Rabaud's contribution to the program was neglible. Debussy and too much water, is a just estimate. Tchaikovsky's 1812 overture ended the program. It is almost time that M. Monteux let this bit of gimcrackery remain on the shelf for at least a decade as far as Providence is concerned.

2

BOSTON SYMPHONY NUMBERS ENTHUSE; HEMPEL IS SOLOIST

Playing before a larger audience than has attended a Boston Symphony concert in years, Pierre Monteux and his fine orchestra opened their Providence season last evening in Infantry Hall. It was not only a large, but also a very enthusiastic gathering, for M. Monteux had arranged an excellent programme, which received a brilliant presentation. The presence of Frieda Hempel as soloist made the occasion one of unusual interest.

The orchestra returns this season with its personnel practically intact. Few changes have been made and the men, fresh after their summer vacation, seem full of enthusiasm for their work. Technically their playing showed increased smoothness over that of last season. In fact, during the past few years under M. Monteux the orchestra has gradually been brought to a point of artistic excellence that measures up to the finest work in the organization's history. Last evening there was vigor without roughness, splendid responsiveness, and a perfection of technical detail in each instrumental section that made the conductor's work strictly one of interpretation.

Although Mme. Hempel has sung in concerts in this city on previous occasions, this was her first appearance here with the Boston orchestra. Her success last evening was overwhelming and at the close of her final aria she was given applause that amounted to an ovation.

This was the programme:

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68...Brahm
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" ....Mozart
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) ....Rabaud
Recitative, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" in E-flat major, Op. 49 ....Tchaikovsky

As interpreter of the classics, M. Monteux is successful in entering with sympathy and judgment into the spirit of the composer. His reading of the Brahms symphony last evening was one of dignity, breadth and beauty. The complex, wonderfully voiced score assumed delightful clearness and expressiveness under his scholarly direction. Brahms, accused in earlier days of being rather circuitous and incoherent in his musical speech, needs only sympathetic understanding on the part of his interpreter to make his works understandable to the layman as well as the musician. The C-minor played last evening reveals Brahms at his best. It teems with melodic material, which i treated with the art of the master-craftsman. There is beauty, not only of them but in everchanging and delightful instrumentation. M. Monteux's thoughtful presentation of the symphony was appreciated by the audience and both conductor and players shared in spontaneous and prolonged applause.

The second orchestral number, Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," is a colorful and imaginative piece in modern French style. The work, inspired by Lenau's poem, paints in sombre colors the shadowy mysteries o the night, a solemn, nocturnal processior and the unhappiness of the hero, Faust.

M. Rabaud, a former Boston Symphony conductor, is a composer of notable accomplishment in the orchestral and operatic fields. The delicacy and fragile beauty of portions of the score were brought out clearly by M. Monteux.

Mme. Hempel is a coloratura soprano, but she has not the limitations of that type of songbird. Her voice is full and rich, in addition to a remarkable flexibility. She can sing a song requiring dramatic delivery as well as astonish by vocal pyrotechnics. For her numbers last evening she selected two arias requiring more of the art of sustained vocalism than showy technique. Mme. Hempel is an artist to her finger tips, and her voice i undoubtedly one of the most beautiful on the concert stage. She handles it with perfect ease, and it is always true to pitch however difficult may be the demands upon it. "Deh Vieni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and her aria from "Der Freischutz" were sung with splendid artistry. The latter, with its rapturous, joyful ending, thrilled the audience, and the singer was required to return to the stage several times in response to tremendous applause.

The Tschaikowsky overture Solennelle, "1812," is a brilliant number and brought the concert to a stirring close. The overture commemorates Napoleon's famous retreat from Moscow and in it the composer has used fragments of the "Marseillaise" and the Russian national hymn with striking effect. In brilliantly scored style, the Russian tune finally triumphs over the French national hymn. The piece was played with great fire.

A. F. P.

PROV. BULL-NOV 23

INFORMATION OBSCURED

PIERRE MONTEUX, FRIEDA HEMPEL AT BOSTON SYMPHONY

Pierre Monteux, the fiery but fully self-controlled conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, opened the forty-second season in Providence with a programme in Infantry Hall Tuesday night which brought out a great number of music lovers than at any time in many years. Nor was anyone dissappointed, either in the brilliancy of the leadership of this splendid group of musicians or in the singing of Mme. Frieda Hempel, who appeared with the Boston orchestra in this city for the first time, although it is by no means her introductory appearance before Providence audiences.

One cannot escape the idea, at the start, that Monteux's leadership of the Boston Symphony improves wonderfully. From that thought it is but a jump to the realization, more than pleasing, that here is a man whose technique, whose understanding of music, whose depth of interpretation, and whose control in spite of the fiery temperament which barely crops out now and then, is so far and way above that of the former conductor, Dr. Karl Muck, as to rank Monteux higher than ever in the estimation of music lovers.

Not in years has this famous orchestra had a conductor who appeals to the layman, as well as to the trained musician, as does Monteux. One senses the keen depth of feeling which lies behind every gesture, and one is lost in admiration at the easy self-control which dominates the musician's spirit at all times.

Of course, all this must be in direct praise of the brilliant playing of the orchestra as individuals and as a whole, for, as is the conductor, so must the orchestra be. Thus, as Monteux's influence develops over his musicians, so does the Boston Symphony improve.

Monteux gets out of Brahms' Symphony in C-minor all that wealth of tonal beauty which only one thoroughly in understanding sympathy could could obtain, in flat contradiction of the early critics, who branded this Brahms masterpiece as stilted and labored. It might be, without a conductor who could bring out the contrasts of melody, but under Monteux's guidance it passes from movement to movement with a stately grace which is delightful.

On the program was a symphonic poem by M. Rabaud, a farmer conductor of the orchestra, "La Procession Nocturne," played with a close application of the interpretative sense There is rich and beautiful tone coloring in this short piece. There is an opportunity for shadows and high lights which Monteux brings out with as much skill as a master brushman, painting on cavass. The story of Faust's dejection, when he realizes all that his wickedness has cost him, is thrilling.

Closing the programme is Tchaikow sky's "Overture Solonelle," (1812) in E-flat major, a descriptive piece, the theme of which is the triumph of the Russian national hymn over the French "Marseillaise," depicting the flight of Napoleon from Moscow.

Mme. Hempel, long recognized as one of the most accomplished songsters of the operatic stage, sang two arias. One was Mozart's "Deh Viene" from "Le Nozze di Figaro"; the other, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" and "Leise, Leise," from "Der Frieschutz." To her rich, clear coloratura soprano voice Mme. Hempel adds interpretive charm and a personality which compelled her return several times to bow because of the storm of applause which greeted her contributions. Both numbers gave her wide opportunities.

PROV. NEWS NOV 23.

Honegger, Flower of the Parisian "Six"

Mr. Monteux Tomorrow Presents to Boston a New Composer, Fearsome and Formidable

EXCEPT for the scattered songs and piano-pieces heard at Mme. Gauthier's recital here last January, Boston knows the music of but one of the Parisian "Six"—Darius Milhaud By virtue of seniority as well as through the skill he early exemplified, Milhaud was a composer of standing at a time when his five companions were virtually unknown. But with the passing of the years Milhaud, concerning himself with such exercises as the ballet, "The Ox on the Roof," and even smaller trivialities, has receded—if perhaps but temporarily—from the eminence that once was his; while Arthur Honegger has become the dominating figure in the band. It may be that Auric or Poulenc will later displace him, but by the testimony of more than one of his countrymen Honegger is today the hope of musical France.

Steadily developing as composer, the present crown of Honegger's work is, by general verdict, the Mimed Symphony, "Horace Triumphant"; and it is through it rather than through one of his earlier, more easily comprehended pieces, that we of this city will first make his acquaintance. Always alert towards contemporary happenings in music, Mr. Monteux at the Symphony Concerts of this week will give "Horace Victorieux" a first performance in America. Before touching on the nature and content of this admittedly formidable music, it is worth while to summarize Honegger's antecedents, his career and his leanings as composer. To do so, since even his published pieces are not readily available hereabouts, it is necessary to turn to those familiar with them for critical and appreciative comment.

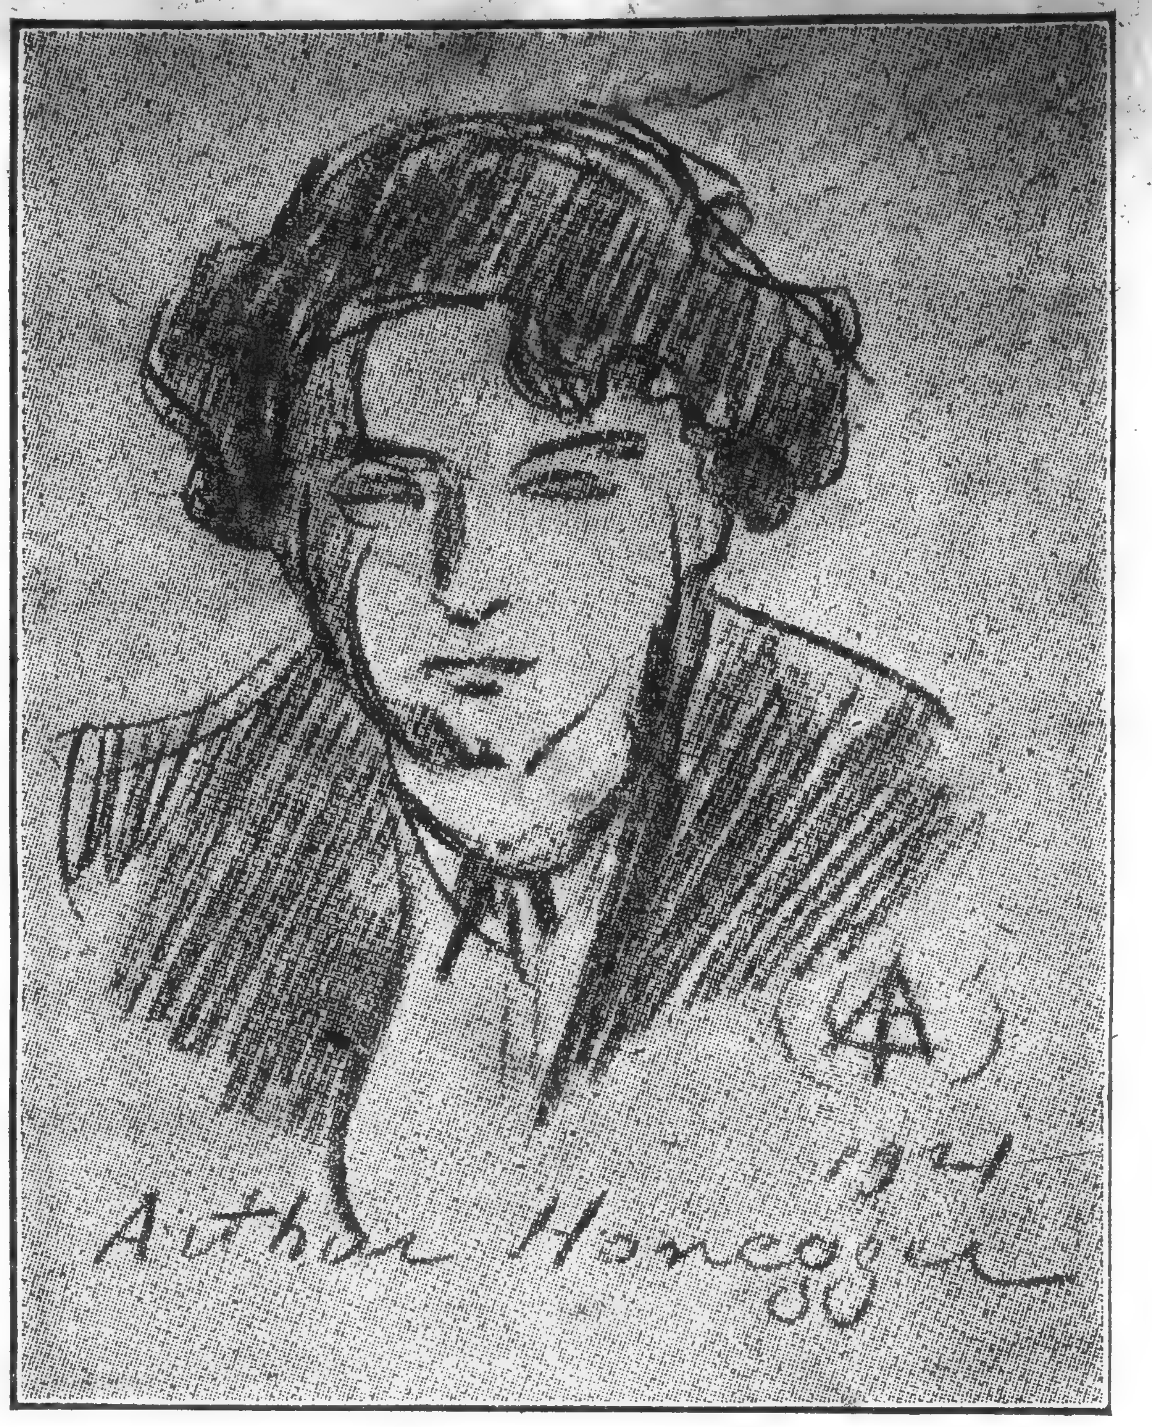
Mixed Bloods

On occasion the opinion has been ventured that the "great" composer of the future will be of mixed blood, uniting and crystallizing in himself divergent antecedents and dissimilar impulses. That such universal genius has not yet made recognizable appearance need hardly be said. Certainly the two composers of mixed race who first come to mind—Florent Schmitt and Wolf-Ferrari—may not be so designated. But the champions of Honegger rightly find in his German-Swiss ancestry and his French upbringing contributing factors in an exceptionally comprehensive musical personality. In an article appearing in The Chesterian of December, 1921, Milhaud himself speaks of Honegger's musical nature as an "offspring of German romanticism" and he says further: "Some ten years ago, when his fellow-pupils at Gedalge's class discovered 'Boris' or 'Pelléas' Honegger was the only one who read the scores of Richard Strauss, who took an interest in the works of Reger, and later, of Schoenberg, and who gave his preference, among French composers, to Florent Schmitt. He is perhaps one of the last musicians to have felt the spell of Wagner, and to have profitably assimilated it. One of the chief features of his music is, in fact, a certain chromaticism which is capable of leading to a rich polytonality." . . .

Again, writing in "La Révue Musicale" of the following month, Réné Chalupt thus couches the same thought in more elaborate terms:

> Honegger . . . is a German-Swiss born and brought up in France. In him are joined the characteristics of the two countries . . . To the virtues of solidity, strength, depth and discipline which pass as the appanage of the Germanic races—whose heaviness and encumbering sentimentality he seems so far to have avoided—are added the qualities of balance, lucidity, intelligence and the quickness of hearing acquired in the intimate contact with our culture. His music, purposely thick, powerful, and sombre as . . . a dense forest . . . is strewn with sunlit glades. His inflections then are tender, melodious, directly persuasive.
>
> But, despite these concessions to the Latin voluptuousness . . . despite his technical borrowings from the French and Slavic masters, he belongs to the line of Beethoven, Wagner and Richard Strauss, and among the contemporaries it is Schoenberg . . . rather than Debussy or Stravinsky . . . that he takes as model. Assuredly in his adolescence he could not escape the fascination of the author of "Pelléas" nor the almost dominating influence of Maurice Ravel. That of Florent Schmitt . . . was the pathway by which he could leave the way he had assumed to return to his natural bent. The dedication of his String Quartet to the composer of the "Tragedy of Salome" is something more than a cold testimony of deference. With a score of years dividing them, these two musicians offer striking analogies, and in them both is realized that fusion of two races and of two æsthetics of which the Alsacian Florent Schmitt furnished a first and brilliant example.

Honegger's parents, orginally of Zurich, had established themselves in Havre, and it was there that their talented son was born. At Havre also began the boy's musical studies, followed by a year at the Conservatory at Zurich. From Monsieur Capet he learned violin-playing, an accomplishment that has borne fruit in his many compositions for stringed instruments. Finally in the classes of Gédalge and Widor at the Conservatory in Paris his apprenticeship was completed.



Honegger of "Horatius"

Of and Above His Crew

As composer Honegger is distinctly a follower of the classical tradition. Except in the incidental music for a play or two, a ballet, songs, the choral piece, "King David," and the impending "Horace," his music is notably free from literary or other external influences. He has given no titles to his compostions for the piano; they are merely "pieces"; while he has shown his partiality for absolute music in a string quartet, a sonatina for two violins, a rhapsody for two flutes, clarinet and piano, and four sonatas—two for violin, one for viola and one for violoncello, all with piano. Even as a child he wrote piano-sonatas in the manner of Beethoven. A profound student of Bach, Honegger is eminently a contrapuntal writer; and he both respects and utilizes the classical form. He is not the first, nor will he be the last, to accomplish the supposedly impossible feat of pouring new wine into old bottles. Among the young composers of the day he is conspicuous as one who may establish a meeting-ground between the traditional and the revolutionary.

And herein lies the seeming inconsistency of his connection with the "Six," whose artistic creed has thus been stated by Georges Auric: "It should be known that no one of us ("The Six"), I believe, would be willing to figure—even by favor of some equivocation—among the defenders of . . . neo-classicism." In point of fact, however, the exact nature of the association of these young people has been too often misrepresented. For all their prating of common ideals, their alleged obeisance to Erik Satie, they united primarily as a means of self-advertising—"lancement à l'américaine" Chalupt ironically calls it. For, as Chalupt further says, "The Six" form a group of composers "having in common, aside from the approximate parity of their ages, only a feeling of reciprocal camaraderie and professional solidarity, but no real similarity of tendencies, admirations, aversions, technique or even æsthetic."

Of the beginnings of "The Six," Auric has written: "While Milhaud was acting as Paul Claudel's secretary in Brazil, Germaine Tailleferre, Arthur Honegger, Louis Durey and I got together our pieces and presented them freely. Each one of us tried at the same time to find that new musical expression of which we all felt the need." But it is possible to imagine that the subsequent notoriety which the group attained has been not altogether acceptable to Honegger's reserved temperament. And it is admitted that in certain respects his aims are antipodal to the iconoclastic tendencies with which "The Six" as a whole are commonly credited.

Writing of "Le Roi David" in Le Temps, Emile Vuillermoz, stressing the superiority of Honegger over his fellow-composers, says:

> Officially, ostensibly, aggressively, Arthur Honegger is one of a group of young composers who, with more good-will than modesty, have attempted to establish a French replica of the illustrious Russian school of "The Five," baptising themselves "The Six." . . . It is well known that, through a singular arithmetic fantasy, these "Six" are already but five, and that in talent the five are as . . . four . . . It is known, too, that they have succeeded, thanks to their magnificent assurance, in terrorizing the most of our music-critics and our editors always anxious lest they be caught in the very act of non-comprehension of the promises of the future. . . .
>
> . . . Moreover, one does not reproach these young composers for their ingratitude to the musicians who have marked the way for them; this sentiment belongs to their age and brutal ruptures are frequently one of the painful conditions of progress. And one tries not to smile at the tenderness they manifest towards Ambroise Thomas and Mendelssohn, and at their profound contempt for Ravel and Debussy, lest one be led to remark that the former evidently tread on their toes far less than do the last two named. . . .
>
> I believe that the composer who has written this work is a veritable chief among heretics. He betrays "the cause" of his associates. If these are sincere, the expulsion of brother Honegger from the congregation of "The Six" is but a question of days. You will find, in fact, no trace in this score of those sacred hates which should, according to the ritual, have inspired it. The style is that of an artist exempt from all partisanship, deeply impregnated with classical culture, ardent admirer of Bach, renouncing no one of the fortunate discoveries of the romantics or the moderns, using adroitly all the resources of the universal technique and the vocabulary which is slowly enriched through the ages. There is no disparity in this abundance. An amazing freedom, a supreme ease govern his drawing from these inexhaustible resources for his own work. . . . But what above all else in this music deserves our sympathetic attention is the incredible justness of accent in all its pages the evocative power of its strong yet supple style, its variety . . . and its personality so marked amid the strongest evidences of its author's musical erudition. One marvels at this melodic simplicity, so clear, so noble, so infallible in its prosody, at the care for detail which does not compromise the proportions of the whole, at the fine balance which obtains from one end of the piece to the other, at the grace and the vigor, the picturesqueness and the lyricism. From the artist who can project, with the same perfection, musical pictures so divergent as the psalm, "Oh, Had I the Wings of a Dove," the "Song of the Servant" the "Psalm of Penitence" and the "Song of Ephraim," surely we may expect great things.

"Horatius" and Heights

But if Honegger in his "King David' was traitor to his professed faith, in his "Horace" he has proved doubly false. Here he has employed the full modern orchestra—a thing abhorent to your "radical" composer—and he has taken the whole of the musical apparatus bequeathed him by his predecessors, though to use it for his own ends. "Horace" represents the present culmination of free orchestral polyphony, and the progress of the several voices is sustained with a relentless disregard for mere euphony. Like the latter music of Schoenberg, "Horace" must be heard "horizontally."

Originally conceived as music for miming, the piece has its basis in Livy's tale, which is scrupulously followed. For beginning there is a love duet, within sight of the ramparts of Alba and Rome, between Camilia, sister of the Horatii, and the one of the Curiatii to whom she is betrothed. Day breaks, the three Horatii appear, and with them is their father, who greets his daughter. All await the decision of the Senate concerning the settlement of the quarrel between the two cities. The crowd gathers and is impatient for the arrival of the heralds, who at last come solemnly to proclaim that the three Curiatii are to fight the three Horatii—and by the outcome shall the dispute be settled. There are preparations for the combat, and the young men receive their arms. Camilla and her betrothed exchange hasty farewells. The signal comes; two of the Horatii fall and the third is in flight but, returning against the scattered Curiatii, he puts all three to death amid the acclamations of his fellow-citizens. Then arises the sad lamentation of Camilla, who hurls despairing imprecations in the face of her hero-brother; and he is in anger thrusts his dagger in her heart.

For hint of the nature and content of the music in which Honegger has clothed this dramatic episode, we may turn once more to Monsieur Chalupt, who thus describes it:

> Honegger on this occasion has become a Roman in spirit. He is not present at a combat made diverting by the glitter of helmets or the clash of swords . . . but at a pitiless contest; he himself feels the anger stir in the heart of Horatius . . . he exults in his victory and puts a weapon in the hand that shall strike down the sister who curses him.

Roland-Manuel has made these illuminating comments on the manner and matter of the piece:

> "Horace Victorieux" will have, among other effects, that of constraining the m > maniacs to change at least the form > which they habitually couch their grie > ances: "No melody!" One might say th
> "Horace Victorieux" is woven entirely > melodies; long and flexible melodies ma > ing up the richest, firmest and most tran > parent of symphonies. The clearness of > concise orchestration enhances the limpi > ity of this polyphony, which is complete > dissociated from the turns of polytonality, but is very rigorously atonal.
>
> Let it be added that there is here presented for admiration neither a system nor a theory, but music tranquilly fearless and magnificently balanced, in which is affirmed the personality of a composer of twenty-nine who henceforth is indebted to no one but himself.

In his acocunt of the piece as heard in Switzerland under Ansermet, Robert Godet adds further testimony:

> If the subject does not permit the composer to disclose those precious qualities which distinguish him among his conte > poraries—serene grace, profound charm > it does demand all his power and gives h > opportunity to affirm it in masterly fashi > the combat . . . it is a striking exam > of concentrated force, and this climax > elementary explosions makes effects as > hement as does the Sacré du Printemp > but by very different means, for in Hon > ger all is animated by organic life, and > method of construction, which bear no r > tion to the patchwork of Stravinsky, wo > rather extol, it seems, the principles est > lished in this domain by Schoenberg. P > haps one might even regret that at the > ginning the influence of the latter mas > appears a trifle aggressively in the w > of the harmonic fabric, were it not > these initial pages . . . excel in cr > ing a singularly evocative atmosp > through the potent mystery of the ins > mental color. After the breath-ta > scene between Camilla and Curiace .
> the entrance of the Horatii with an h > motive, the . . . combat, the dyn > frenzy of which is so magnificently > trived, the piece culminates in the t > lament of Camilla . . . and thus fini > as it began, in poignant and intimate > tions, and the orchestra, renouncing its > midable picturing, is but the voice > soul.

Again in the article in The Cheste already quoted, Milhaud declares tha
"Horace Triumphant, we are face to with a work of great dramatic intens of profound tragic feeling and viol power, and the whole is realized with faultless technical surety." Finally, f contrast and balance may be appended o more opinion, that of Leigh Henry, usually in deep sympathy with contemp rary tendencies, who yet finds this pie
"while masterly in instrumentation, .
a trifle too cerebral and long drawn ou

Pickings

Regarding Honegger's skill in orchest tion there seems indeed to be little pute. Of the score of "Le Dit des Je du Monde," a "spectacle" mounted at t Vieux Columbier shortly after the armisti in 1918, Milhaud says that it "is writt for a very small body of players (dou string quartet, double bass, flute, trump and percussion), and a truly wonder orchestral intensity is gained by the restricted means, as in the part entitle "L'Homme et la Mer," where a doze instruments sound like the orchestra the most exciting pages in Wagner
music."

It seems likewise a matter of general acceptance that Honegger's preoccupation with technical matters has at times—notably in the fisrt violin-sonata and the string quartet—resulted in dryness, if not in actual pedantry. The other chamber-pieces are, however, far more genial and spontaneous, as well as richer in actual invention. Milhaud finds the Sonatina ( calls it Sonata) for two violins "mo charming in its melodic abundance a variety, and the fugal movement th ends it . . . so well balanced that o begins to think that a whole quartet playing."

The "Hymn" for ten strings, a curi composition, is thus described by An Coeuroy: "There is no talent among young composers so securely depende as that of Honegger: whether he compo a symphonic suite such as 'Horace umphant,' or whites a piece prompted circumstance, such as this 'Hymn,' signed to make known the value of the n instruments of Léo Sir, he is always at best. Rich in ideas, ingenious in his h monies, unfailing in his form and in t perfect handling of timbres. To the usu quartet Monsieur Sir adds six instrumen new in construction and unusual range; sursoprano (a fourth lower th the violin); the mezzo-soprano (the sa tuning as the violin); the contralto ( same tuning as the viola); the baryton a the tenor (a fifth lower than the violonce lo); and the sous-basse (a fourth low which, more human in quality than contra-bass, supports the ensemble wit warm and compact sonority the newn and usefulness of which is undoubted."

Besides "King David" and "Hora
Honegger's larger pieces include a Prel to Maeterlinck's "Aglavaine et Sélyse and a "Chant de Nigamon" that Milh considers "rather formal"; although latter piece, depicting the death-song an Iroquois chief burned by the Huro excites Chalupt's admiration as a sy phonic piece of the most brilliant char ter, "conceived, developed and orchestra with striking mastery." Again, accordi to Chalupt, the score of "La Mort Sainte-Alméenne," written to a myste play by Max Jacob, has a Tristanesq flavor. With the mention of a charmi
"Summer Pastoral" for small orches which in 1920 won the Verley prize, a l ballet, "Verité? Mensonge?" produced the Autumn Salon of the same year, of the amusing Funeral March Honegger contributed to "The Wed Party in the Eiffel Tower," a strange fr of Jean Cocteau and "The Six," the of Honegger's more important pieces complete.

Faith and Works

Since on the occasion of the first formance of his Sonata for violon
Honegger set forth aims and ideals w
Chalupt declares that he has also appl if on a larger scale, and in different idi in his 'Horace," this summary of his w may end with the composer's own c fession of faith.

> As always in a sonata there is > series of thematic inventions, but eac > protagonist moves in an individua > sphere and puts into action the element > proper to it. Each of them may be con > sidered as a tonal summing-up of a > orchestral group: the violoncello repr

REDUCTION RATIO
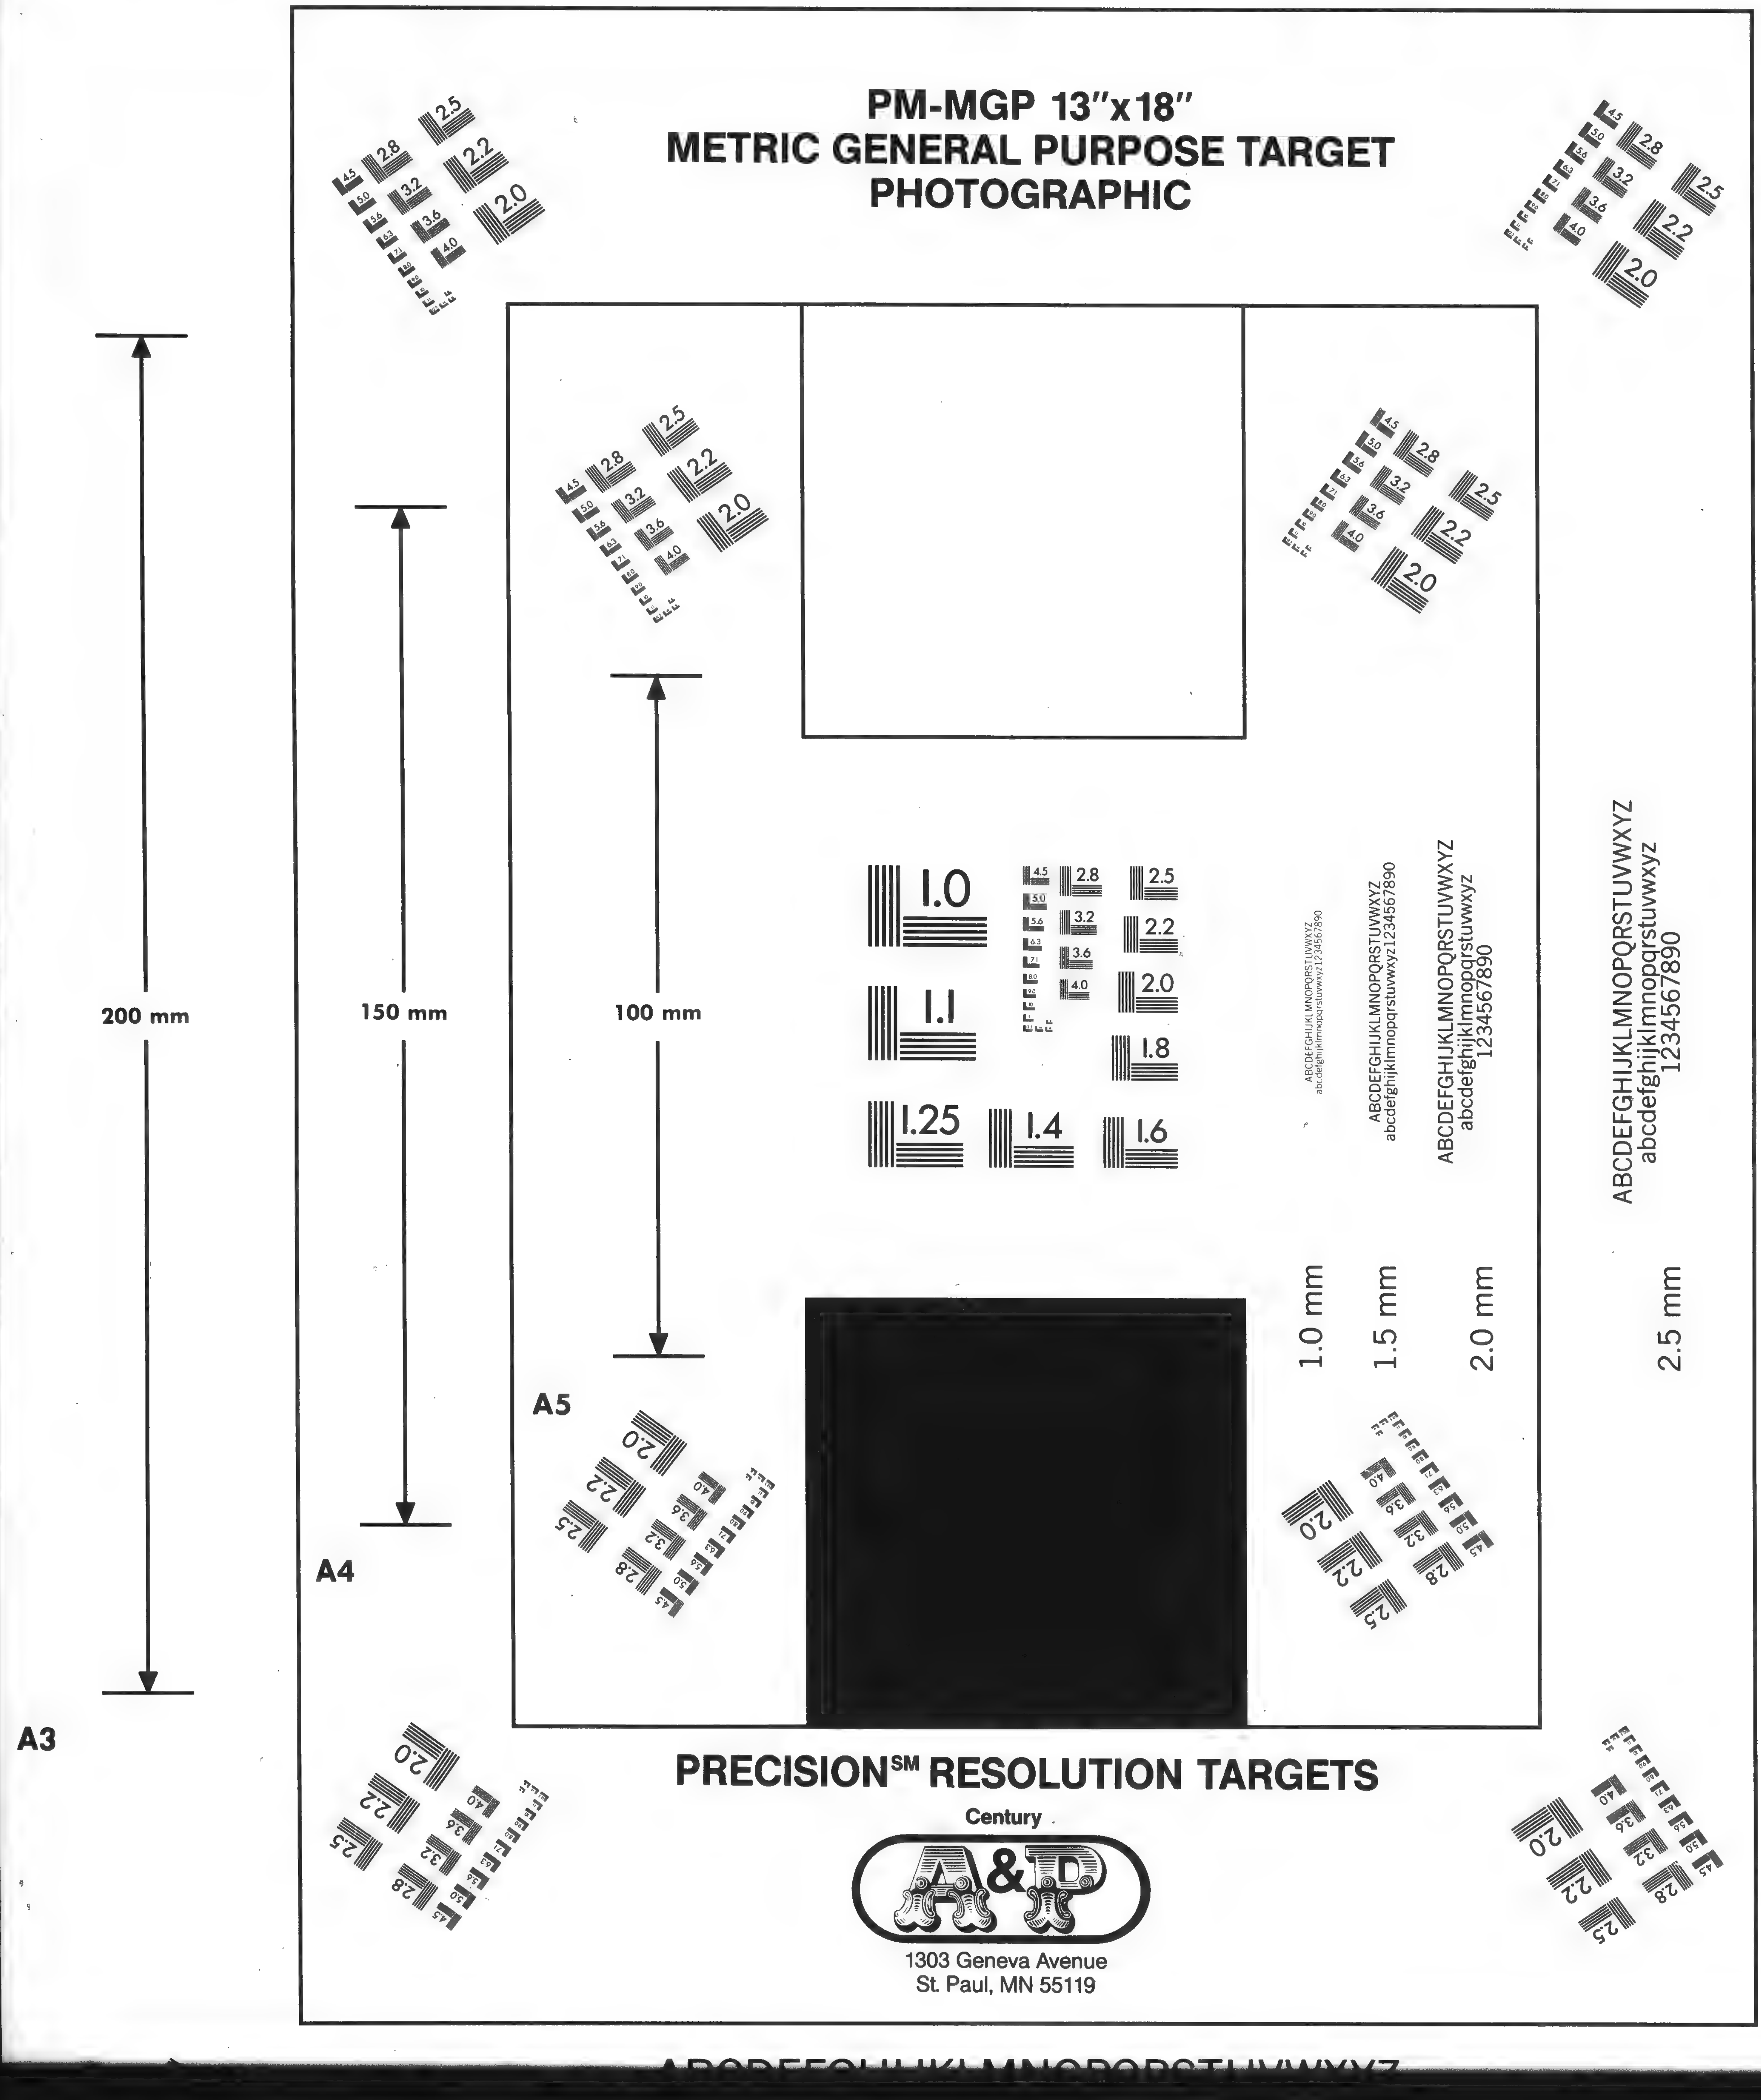
14x

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



2.5
2.8
2.2
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
3.2
3.6
4.0
2.0
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A5
A4
A3
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
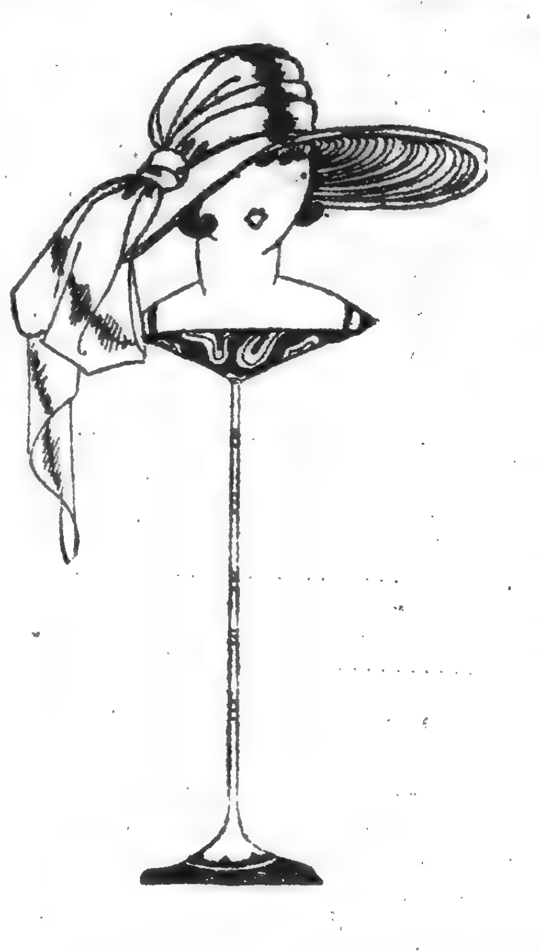
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
2.5 mm

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119



LADIES

CHOOSING YOUR EASTER HATS IS AN IMPORTANT TASK. PERMIT OUR CORPS OF EXPERT MILLINERS TO ASSIST YOU.

LOVELIEST

EASTER HATS

Waiting for you

Hats that will delight you of entrancing hues, trimmed with pert little buds and flowers or fashionable ribbons and ostrich, in varieties, shapes and colors to suit the most fastidious. In fact, it is for the most particular that our expert buyers have chosen these.

Buying your Easter Hat of us will not only assure you of authentic style. We go further, guaranteeing that through our chain stores outlet for immense quantities of millinery

YOU SAVE AT LEAST

$\frac{1}{3}$ to $\frac{1}{2}$ THE PROFITS OTHERS DEMAND

LET US PROVE IT TO YOU

BROADWAY

WHOLESALE MILLINERY CO.

158 MERRIMACK ST.

Directly Opposite Bon Marche Up One Short Flight

The Leading Direct to Wearer Wholesale Millinery Organization in New England

LACE CURTAINS

Called for, laundered by hand and delivered for 30c to 50c a pair.

FRENCH LINGERIE LAUNDRY

477 Merrimack Street Telephone 6620

WARREN BANK PRESIDENT LEAVES FOR BOSTON

CHICAGO, March 27.—Frank L. Taylor, the $50 a week president of the First National bank of Warren, Mass., for the partial wrecking of which Joseph Marcino, the barber-banker, is being sought, left today in custody for Boston. He is charged with conspiracy to embezzle funds of the bank, which was looted of nearly $250,000.

Abraham Goldman, Marcino's father-in-law, also charged with conspiracy, is at liberty on bonds for his appearance in Boston when summoned.

DEVOE

Paint and Varnish Products

Prevent Destruction

Baked from above Bombarded from below!

THE heat of the sun and the wheel-flung grit of the road crack and cut the finish of your car in thousands of places.

Into these wounds, like the germs of disease, creeps moisture. Then follows Rust, speeding your car on its journey to the junk pile.

Prevent this destruction! Give your auto a coat of Devoe Motor Car Finish to ward off ruin and to restore the "new car" look.

Duffy Brothers

311 Bridge St. Tel. 5840

Insure Your Car's Endurance! Use:

Devoe Motor Car Finish

Devoe Auto Leather Dressing

Devoe Auto Top Dressing

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES SECOND CONCERT

With Alice Nielsen as Soloist Noted Orchestra Entertains at Auditorium.

After the fashion of the Pop concerts in the summer time, the second of the season's programs by the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Memorial Auditorium under the local management of Albert Edmund Brown might have been designated as "Operatic Night."

Aside from the two movements of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony and the Spanish Rhapsody of Chabrier the music was of the theatre, a form in which Mr. Monteux is expert. There was the picturesque music of Berlioz' overture, "The Roman Carnival," for a beginning, the Tchaikowsky overture, Solennelle, for a close, midway in the program arias from Mozart's "Don Giovanni," with Alice Nielsen skilled in such music to sing them, and later on three excerpts from the Wagner music-dramas which always find the Boston orchestra on its mettle.

Depicting the changing scenes and merry incidents of a carnival, the Berlioz overture, with its spirited measures for the full orchestra and its more songful passages for the woodwind section of the orchestra was finely played. Berlioz knew well how to use the resources of the orchestra in music of the kind and Mr. Monteux brought the composer's effects to the fore with confidence and skill.

In the classic vein the two movements of the Schubert symphony brought out the artistic qualities of the orchestra, the more so, perhaps, from the contrast with amateur performances of the symphony in which some, at least, in the audience had participated. The solemn introductory measures for the basses and 'cellos in the open movement were beautifully sustained and the agitated passage which follows, and the subsequent melody for flute and clarinet were superbly played. Notably fine in quality was the melody for the 'cellos, perhaps the most familiar theme in the movement.

So, with beautiful tonal quality and exquisite shading the three principal melodies of the Andante, typically Schubertian music, were expressed by the various choirs of the orchestra, notably effective being the diminuendo which prepares the way for the second theme beautifully played by the clarinet. That the familiar and old-fashioned music has not lost its appeal was shown by the approval which the audience accordded.

Mozart's arias are scarcely music of the theatre as such music is written today, but rather gracefully molded songs which were interpolated in the dramatic action, as was the custom of the time, and lend themselves equally well to concert performance. They call for a voice even in quality, flexible for the quaint adornments and turns, smooth and velvety for the melody. These qualities Alice Nielsen, practiced and expert in the music of the master, brought to them with artistic feeling for the contour of the melody, for smooth and effective phrasing and shading of tone. Here is music of the delicate order. To overstress it would be to spoil its simple beauty. Such an error Miss Nielsen instinctively avoids. Few sopranos today surpass her in the qualities and in the artistic destraint which Mozart demands. The audience would gladly have heard her further, but the rules of these concerts forbids it.

Given at a previous concert here, there is little need for comment on the Spanish Rhapsody. To its tingling and changing dance measures Mr. Monteux summons in groups or in entirety all the splendid material of his band, infusing the whole with wonderful life and color.

Clearly, too, the audience heard once more the music of Wagner gladly. At rapid pace and with scintillating effect went the introduction to the third act of Lohengrin with its sonorous song for the brasses and the contrasting quieter melody midway in the piece. Here the strings proved their skill and their quality also.

As peculiarly appropriate to the Lenten season Mr. Monteux chose to give the Good Friday Spell from Parsifal, mystical music, rich in beautiful harmonies, subdued in effect, as the composer conceived it and as the orchestra played it.

By way of thrilling contrast, the Wagner group closed with the Ride of the Valkyries, descriptive music of the drama, with the thunder of the hoofbeats of the steeds and all the sonorities of brass and percussion for the accompaniment of the ride. It was Wagner in another mood from that which inspired him in Parsifal.

High-brow critics are inclined to belittle the Tchaikowsky 1812 overture as music written to order rather than inspired. Nevertheless, with its ingenious use of The Marseillaise, it is colorful and spirited music which we suspect, in the course of performance, at any rate, does not fail to thrill even the critical. Last night the audience frankly took pleasure in it and recalled Mr. Monteux and finally the orchestra to acknowledge the applause.

Throughout the program the audience warmed to the orchestra's playing. In view of the enterprise of Mr. Brown in arranging for a second concert here, with an eminent singer as soloist, the only regret was that the audience was not so large in numbers as at the first of the season's appearances.

S. R. F.

BRITISH STEAMER FIRED ON.

HONG KONG, March 27 (By The Associated Press).—The British steamer Kelin was fired at from the shore of the Canton river two miles from Canton. She reached Hong Kong undamaged.

The house you want to buy may be advertised in the "Houses for Sale"

More style in Talbot Hats

More quality too

HEADS up; if you wear a new Talbot Easter hat you will be correctly hatted. The new sand tones in young men's shapes predominate. Featured at $3.00 $3.50 $5.00

Extra values in the world's best hat—the Knox

at $7.00

The Talbot Clothing Co.

Money Cheerfully Refunded

GOOD HATS

Central cor. Warren St.

Serving You Since 1880

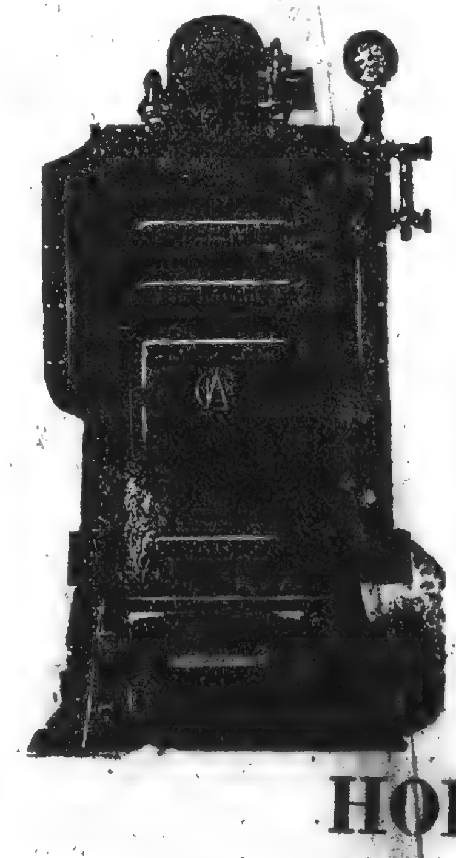
FREE PERFUME

With every box of Colgate's Talcum Powder (5 odors to choose from) a vial of exquisite perfume free.

HOWARD

APOTHECARY

197 Central Street



Are You a Victim of Lost Opportunities?

If you intend to heat your house by steam this year, you havealready LOST FIFTEEN DOLLARS; you can still save FIFTY DOLLARS if you order befor March 31st.. Until that time our price for:—

22 Inch Firepot Steam Boiler

300 Feet of Radiation

6 Radiator Valves

6 Hoffman No. 1 Air Valves

$265.00

CASH WITH ORDER.

This Price Does Not Include the Cost of Installation.

We can positively assure you that nobody will give you as low a price as this after March 31st.

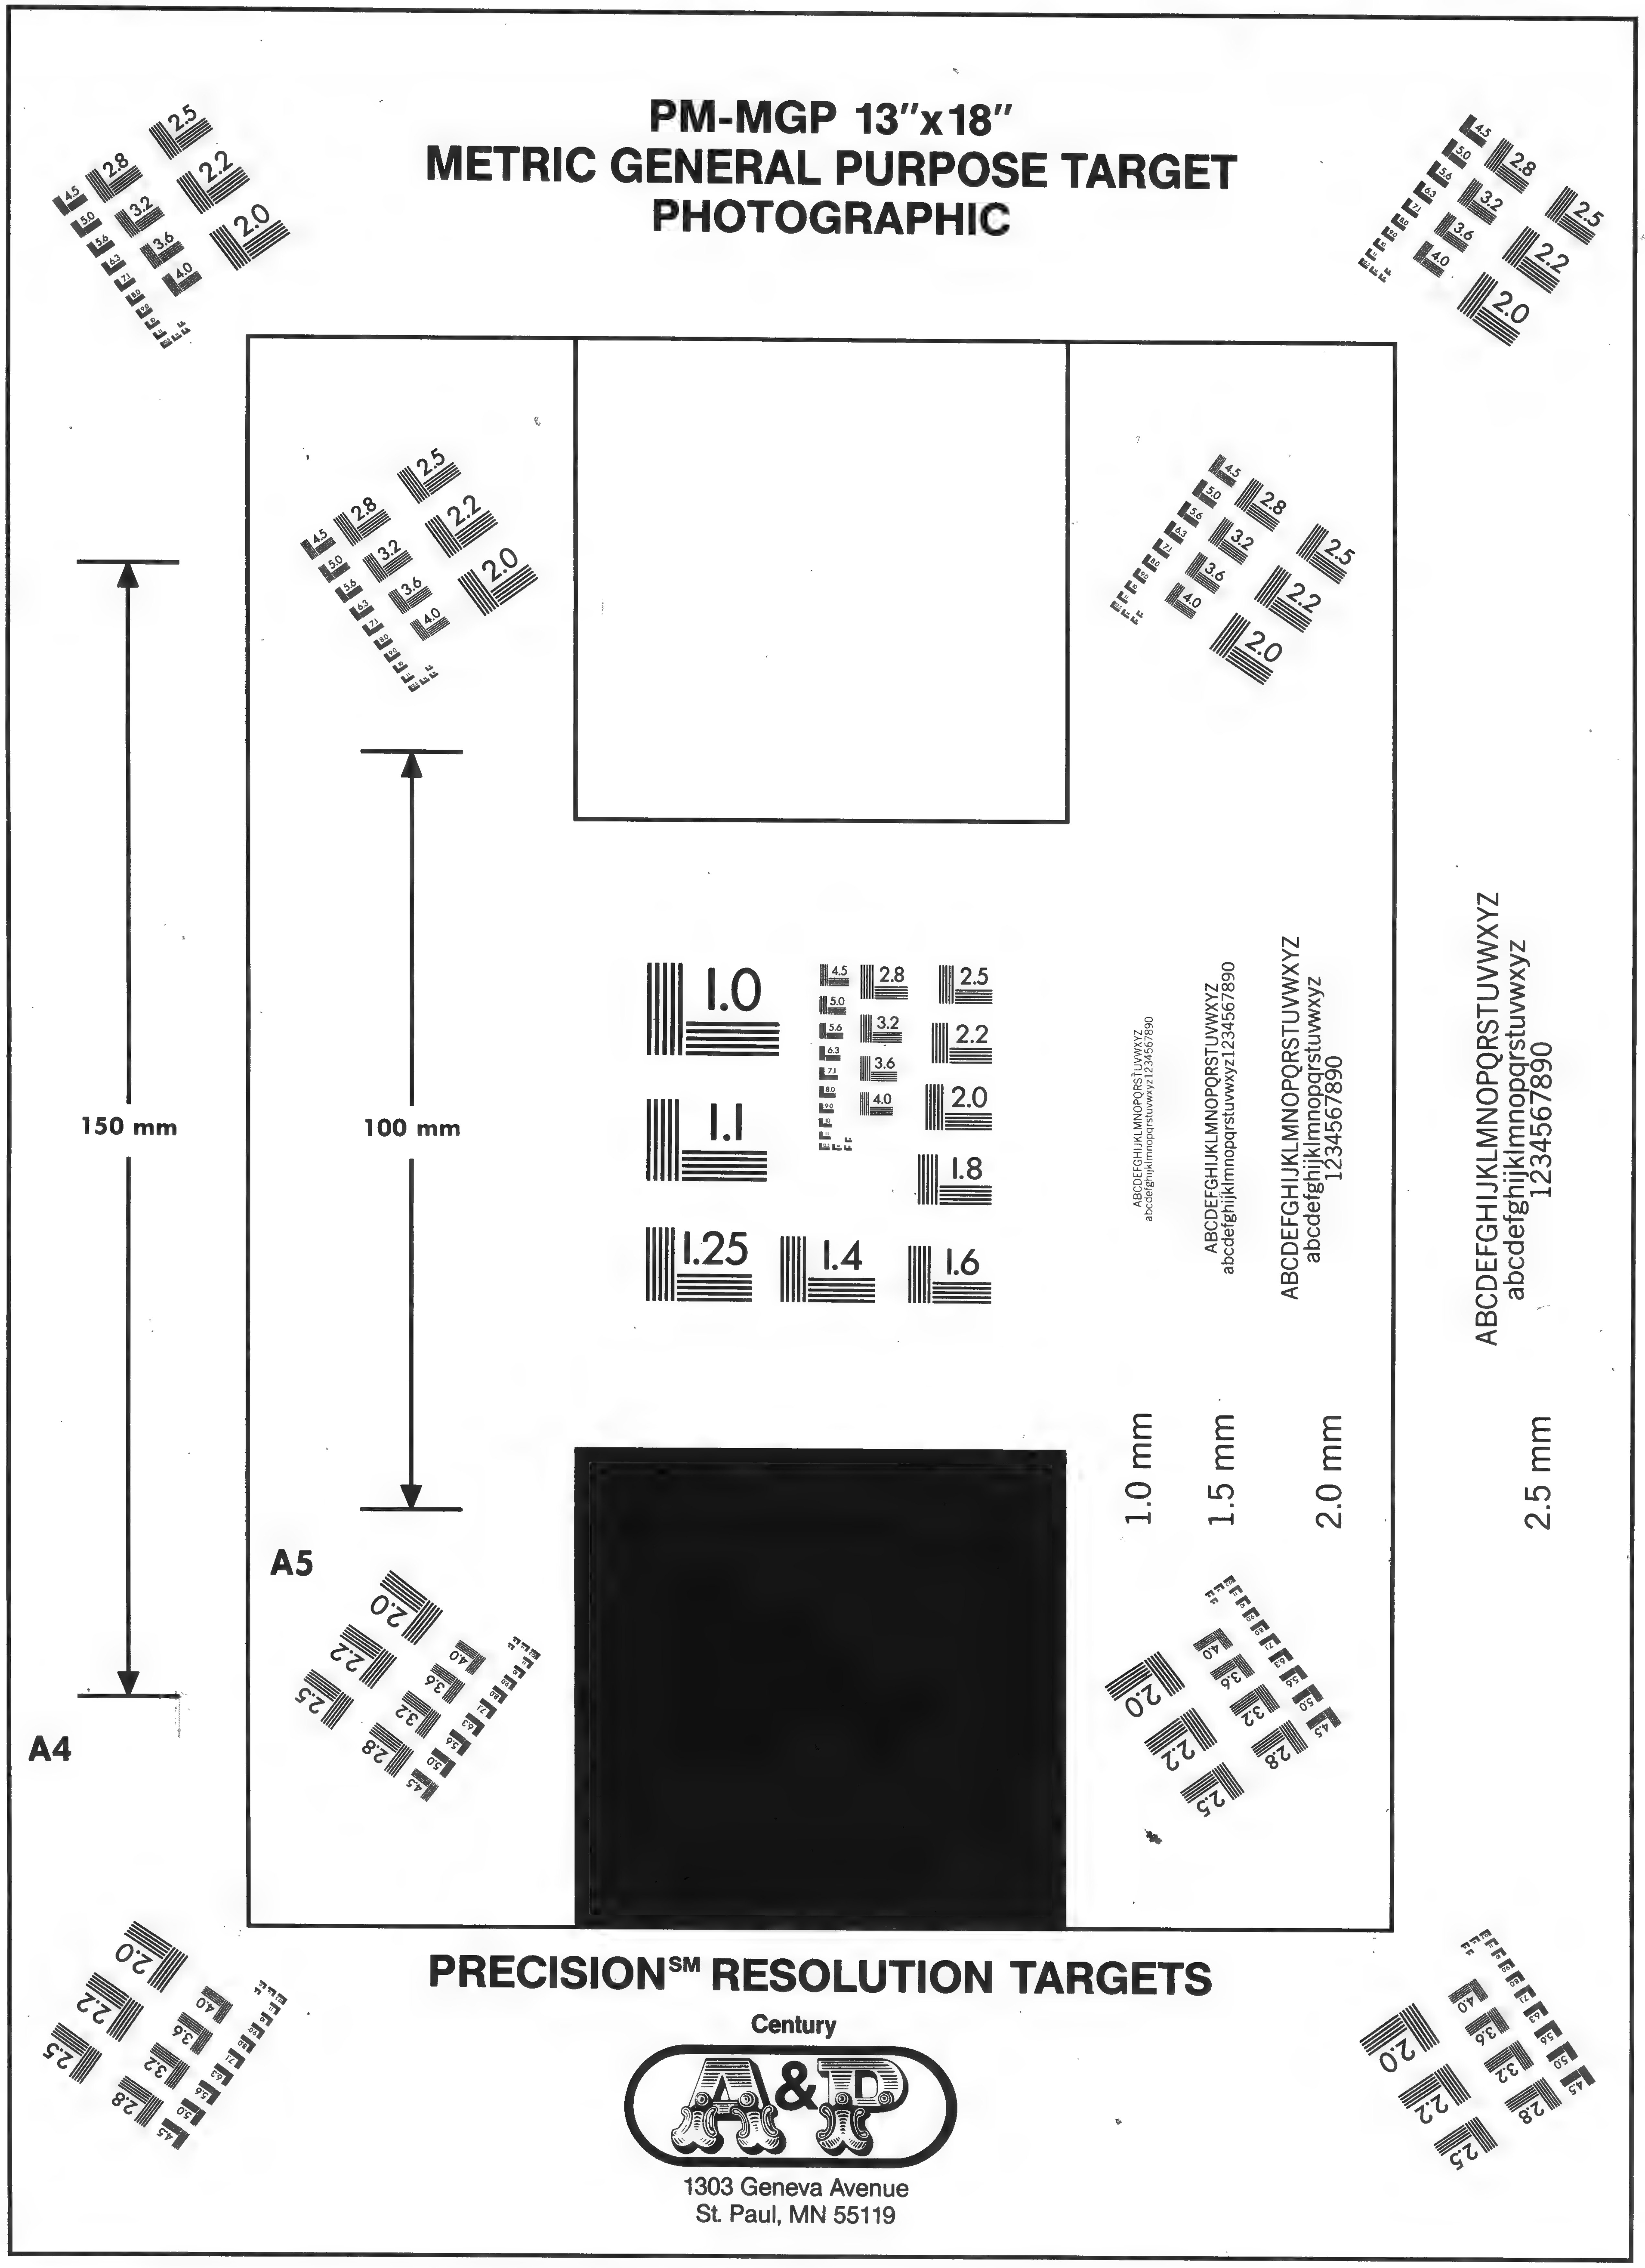
HOBSON & LAWLER CO.

153-170 MIDDLE STREET

REDUCTION

RATIO

12x



200 mm
150 mm
100 mm
A3
A4
A5
1.0
1.1
1.25
1.4
1.6
1.8
2.0
2.2
2.5
2.8
3.2
3.6
4.0
4.5
5.0
5.6
6.3
7.1
8.0
9.0
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890
1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm
2.5 mm

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

[illegible]sents the strings, the piano, the wood, the brass and the percussion. They move in general under the rule of complete separation of powers . . . . Although speaking the simpe idiom of music, the violoncello and the piano endeavor each to speak in the style appropriate to itself, in a syntax peculiar to it, and on subjects wholly musical.

W. S. S.

TRAN. NOV. 23,

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is a most interesting one. The orchestral pieces will be the first three movements of Beethoven's 9th Symphony; the "Horatius, Victor" of Honegger (first time in America), and Brahms's Academic Festival Overture. Frieda Hempel will sing two arias by Mozart. Arthur Honegger is one of "The Six" of Paris (now "Five," since the withdrawal of one from the radical group). His "Horatius" is music written for pantomimic action.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 5, should crowd Symphony Hall, for it is in aid of Wilhelm Gericke, who, as conductor, made the reputation of this orchestra.

HERALD-NOV. 23-

Next week brings no concerts in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra. To New York and other cities go conductor and band in the first trip of the season southward. At the succeeding pair of concerts at home Franck enters in and possesses the programme with his Symphony and his tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus"; and "The Accurst Huntsman." Franck, it seems, was born in Liège on Dec. 10, 1822. Hence this noting of a centenary before a public that has long taken joy of his music. For interlude at these Franckian concerts, Mme. Samaroff will play Schumann's Concerto for piano [illegible]

TRANS. NOV. 24

HEMPEL SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Soprano Excels in Mozart's "Deh Vieni Non Tardar"

Beethoven Ninth, Brahms' "Academic," Honegger Novelty Heard

Frieda Hempel chose two Mozart arias for her solos at yesterday's Symphony concert, "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Figaro," and Martern aller Arten" from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail." Miss Hempel sang "Deh vieni" with the requisite clarity, grace, tonal beauty and underlying archness of mood, achieving a feat rare nowadays despite its apparent simplicity.

Mozart inserted a florid air for soprano in "Die Entfuehrung" to please the singer who was to be the original Constanze by affording her an opportunity to display her skill in florid song. As music, this piece is almost the only really dull thing Mozart ever wrote.

Miss Hempel's voice has never been altogether suited to coloratura singing. Yesterday there was great effort and little achievement in her performance of this antiquated show piece. Her high notes were uncertain, strained in quality, not sustained. It was a mistaken choice, especially with a wealth of rarely sung Mozart arias of the calibre of "Deh vieni" available. Miss Hempel sang in Italian, though the original text of "Die Entfuehrung" is in German.

The first three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony began the concert. The choral finale on Schiller's "Ode to Joy" was omitted. It is not possible to give works requiring a large chorus at the regular Symphony concerts because the stage must be built out, and there is no place for the dispossessed subscribers for the front rows on the floor.

The scherzo was played adequately. The slow movement stirred Mr Monteux and his men to unusual restrained eloquence, which made the poignant beauty of the music felt. The first movement of this symphony is perhaps the most gigantic creative achievement of Beethoven. But nobody would have guessed that fact from yesterday's perfunctory, unsympathetic rendering.

The intense rhythmic driving power of a Muck, a Mengelberg, or a Toscanini is needed for such things as this. It is not Mr Monteux' fault that he lacks interpretive genius.

Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture, an amiable pot-pourri of German student songs, was played with a will.

"Horatius Victorious," a suite by the young Swiss composer Honegger, one of the Parisian group who call themselves "The Six," proved much more substantial and effective music than the suite by Milhaud which was the only work by "The Six" previously given at these concerts. "Horace Victorieux" was composed as a ballet in eight episodes. The lack of illustrative action was felt yesterday, though each of the connected episodes is compactly built.

Honegger's counterpoint is recognizably that of a Gedalge pupil by contrast with the ridiculous parodied fugue in Milhaud's suite. His harmony is dissonant, his orchestration fuses all the instruments into one as far as tone color is concerned. This battle scene had a grotesque resemblance to the "Battle of Prague," beloved of our great aunts. "Camilla's lamentations and imprecations" were most impressive. A rash guess is that the future will find Honegger rated as austere, earnest, and third class.

There are no Symphony concerts next week.

GLOBE-NOV. 25.

BIZARRE MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Honegger's "Horatius" Played—Frieda Hempel Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

An extraordinary piece, a piece of violent, grotesque music by the Frenchman, Honegger, was played for the first time in America at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This work, "Horatius Triumphant," is called by the composer a "mimed symphony," and the sub-title is explained by the fact that it was conceived as a ballet, with costumes and scenery, in which the actors, or dancers, represent the legendary fight between the three Horatii and the three Curiatii, for the mastery which should decide the triumph of the Roman or the Alban arms.

HEROIC AND FEROCIOUS

The scene is heroic and ferocious, when the last surviving Horatius, outnumbered, succeeds in killing his three foes, then puts to death his own sister, because she had mourned the sight of her betrothed among the slain.

How has this subject been treated by Arthur Honegger, one of the "six" who, in Paris, continue the attempt to outrival each other in novelty if not true originality, to make the bourgeois sit up, to evoke a fresh shudder in the breasts of the conservative, if not the police? There would have been the manner of ancient drama, with its laconic restraint, its evocation, by means of form rather than realism, of the spirit of heroic tragedy. But that is not Milhaud's method, nor is it the spirit of his music.

With the method we have no quarrel. Of course a given number of people will stick their fingers in their ears, and call the composer a discordant ignoramus or poseur. That is nonsense.

Writes With Virtuosity

This man writes with virtuosity. He is a daring, grinning, impudent "polyharmonist." Different words—not merely notes, but blocks of chords—and different keys collide in his music, or combine with haunting and momentarily beautiful effect, as, for example, the music for the scene between Camilla and her lover.

It is hard—not heroic—but hard and with no loftiness of spirit whatsoever. The Horatii are merely slayers. There is perverse portrayal of their cruelty, A fanfare that calls to battle ends in a howl of rage. One senses gluttony for the over-strained, the over-drawn, the bizarre. One moment which would be said to have beauty is the first "scene" —the music is for seven successive scenes on the stage—between Camilla and her lover Curiatius. It is, however, macabre, shudders, apprehensions, blackness are in it, and when this same music, expanded by the orchestra, returns—when Camilla laments the slain, horror itself is caricatured in a monstrous manner. The woman dies with a shriek and a squeal, after which terrific discords smash against each other to the conclusion.

On the whole, we rather detest this music. It is for us decadent, nervously exhausted art which causes one to wonder if it is not a spiritual aftermath of the fatigue and terror of the most atrocious of wars. Yes! There are those who point the finger of scorn at Johannes Brahms. It was very, very good to turn to the rousing, student spirit, and the open air, romantic quality of his "Academic overture, which followed Mr. Honegger.

Miss Hempel's Singing

Mme. Frieda Hempel sang Mozart. Her air from the "Marriage of Figaro" was a masterpiece of phrasing, of beauty of sustained tone. The second aria is one for virtuosi only. It found Miss Hempel not in the best voice, but a mistress of coloratura, and one who gave dramatic significance as well as bravura quality to the air.

The true capstone of the concert came at the beginning, with the three instrumental movements of Beethoven's 9th symphony. Mr. Monteux omitted the chorale finale. Comparing that work, so clear, so powerful, so beautiful and exalted in spirit, with the unhealthy music of Honegger, one recalls the remark of Taine in his "History of English Literature," that if a Shakspere lived today, in our puny, nervous, modern age, he would probably have neither the body nor the brains to endure the passions and visions that swept through the brain of William Shakspere.

It would require an infinitely stronger soul than Honegger to write six measures of the ninth symphony.

POST-NOV. 23

AN AFTERNOON OF VARIEGATED NEWNESS

Brahms's "Academic Overture" Goes Savorless — Mme. Hempel's Unwilling Voice—The Greater Glories of Beethoven, Even Truncated — Honegger's Engrossing Ways and Works

An agreeable sense of newness pervaded the Symphony Concert of yesterday. Not one item upon the programme was routine. True, Brahms's "Academic Overture" is hardly a novel piece. Yet, if recollection holds, for the first time since the end of the late war, it was played on Friday in Symphony Hall. Moreover a French—or, more truly, a cosmopolitan—conductor guided this potpourri of German student-songs. With Brahms more or less universal—as in the symphonies, the "Tragic Overture" or the "St. Antoni Variations"—Mr. Monteux succeeds well. He sets forth his own version of the music; it is not the version that a German or a German-schooled conductor would dispense. Yet it is recognizably and plausibly Brahms, who would not be the world-wide composer that he is, could not his music be taken stimulatingly from the Latin angle. Yet once and again, in his writing he was German to the core. He is so, for exaltation, in The Requiem; for various ends in his songs; for homeliness and gemuthlichkeit, in this "Academic Overture."

There Brahms has taken German student-songs as he found them. Only one from his choice, "Gaudeamus Igitur," is far-spread west of the Rhine. Out of these pieces, using his craftsman's hand, he has put together an overture not too much above the day's work, keeping place among standard pieces by the geniality aforesaid and by easy frankness of substance and form. Heard, the "Academic Overture" must sound with the homeliness, the heartiness, the openness, with which it was written. Otherwise the performance misses the mark and the music has no reason for being. In that hapless case stood both yesterday. Even Mr. Monteux's imagination is not receptive enough to absorb German student-songs. The chosen pace did not suit them; rhythm and accents did not characterize them. They came, they went, savorless. With reason, were hearers and even certain players restive under Mr. Monteux's way with pieces they had long known quite otherwise. None but a French conductor can make the most, say, of Gounod's "Faust." By similar tokens, Brahms's "Academic Overture" needs German or German-trained hands.

In turn, from Mme. Hempel's singing came measure of disappointment. High-placed and established singer though she is, she had part, for the first time, at a "regular" Symphony Concert. By "the tradition," rather than by pure reason, nervousness is the lot of those so placed. Under it, possibly, Mme. Hempel's voice suffered yesterday, experienced singer though she is, in the ways and fortunes of the concert-hall. Thus, her upper tones were strangely thin and meagre in Mozart's "Deh Vieni"; while in her show-piece out of "The Elopement from the Harem," her ornaments of song were neither limpid, supple nor effortless. With insight, she sang "Deh Vieni" in half-voice, kept to the fine threading of the melodic line; accented, shaded, it felicitously; caught the mood of moonlit, wistful musing, instinct in the music. Mme. Hempel perceives the sensibility, the serenity, the endless grace of Mozart in such a piece—that pervading loveliness for which there is no word but Mozartean. Within the restraints of voice, yesterday and untimely laid upon her, she conveyed it. The air from "Il Seraglio" is another sort of music. The obligated Mozart wrote it because the friendly singer desired such a number, and he could "turn it off" readily. Not much imagination, but plentiful skill, he put into this bouquet of the flowers of song, leaving the singer to bring them to bright bloom. Without such lustres this air of Constanze is of none effect. As dutiful as Mozart was Mme. Hempel; yet her voice for once denied her the essential glinting, cascading tones. Not even the incidental measures of flowing song could she, for the nonce, turn golden.

To better outcome went the other ventures of the day. Beethovens' Choral Symphony, in toto, has become virtually impossible in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. No chorus now supplements the orchestra. Under pressure of more immediate tasks, incessantly accumulating, even so diligent a conductor as Mr. Monteux could hardly find time and energy to guide and finish the work of an able chorus-master. An unpaid chorus, besides, is careless of necessary fidelities and disciplines; while the treasury of Symphony Hall hardly permits payment. A borrowed choir, moreover, could not find room upon the stage, unless it were outbuilt, displacing the seats of subscribers. Perish that thought! Out of course, then, must fall performances of the Ninth Symphony "in entirety"; while few and far between are they likely to be. Yet for fifteen years past, an unwarrantable "tradition," born of the unconscionable purists, has denied to the public of the Symphony Concerts the hearing of the three movements in which Beethoven was content with an orchestra. As Mr. Monteux has often and wisely done, he broke again yesterday with ill justified custom. Sufficient and more were the resulting satisfactions and applause.

Though there be no final excitements and grandeurs, though this Allegro, Scherzo and Adagio be but a truncated symphonic body, a thousand times over they justify isolated performance. To one sort of human nature at least, long familiarity lessens anticipation of the eight usual symphonies [illegible] but so rarely in [illegible]

[illegible] almost new [illegible] Moreover, beside even the glories of the Fifth and the Seventh Symphonies, [illegible] they not, in such writing, the summits of Beethoven's beauty and power? Except in one or another string quartet of these final years, nowhere has he invented instrumental song of such fathomless beauty, such unfolding power as that which springs from the first motiv of this slow movement. The voice of it touches sustained ecstasy; the heart of it beats high with both the intensities and the serenities of human emotion; the mind that guides it compasses design and expression no whit below such "great argument." Always, the matter and the means move in that inseparable unity which is sum of achievement in the arts.

In turn, the Scherzo is crown of the buoyant vigors, the rich fancy, the haunting or the whipping repetitions with which Beethoven could infuse such movements. The hearer does not bear with the persistent rhythm as he does in the toying of the Eighth Symphony. It goads him. Again, tossing and tumultuous stress of mood and emotion gaining voice in tones, pervades the first movement. Some may say that the tempests at the beginning of the Fifth Symphony more seize and stir the listening mind and heart. Possibly: but neither in storm nor in intervening serenities do they ascend to the might and the majesty of this final music. As the slow movement of the Ninth Symphony scales celestial ecstasies, so does this first movement lift high and grave yet other—and as deep—human passions and human poetries. Rarely have orchestra and conductor been so eloquently of Beethoven as they were in the Scherzo and the Adagio. In the Allegro—the more the pity—they fell appreciably short of stormy splendor.

And Honegger—Honegger of "Horatius Triumphant"—the one intruder, out of a Parisian "Six," and these very days, into the company of all these halos. At least he made contrast; quickened interest; set the hearer to many reflections, if not to many delights. Apart from impressions and opinions, the recordable facts in the case are relatively few. "Preliminary observations," as the old prefaces liked to say, have not been lacking in these columns. Suffice it to recall that "Horatius Triumphant" was written as illustrative and enhancing music to mimodrama —the one as yet unheard, the other as yet unseen in the theatre. The matter is Roman record or Roman tale of the duel between the three Horatii and the three Curiatii to end a petty war; of the loves between a Curatius and Camilla of the Horatian house; of her lament over the betrothed slain; of the vengeance of her brother, raging, bloody-minded. Livy sets down the story; Corneille's "Horaces" has long preserved it to the French stage; Macaulay's familiar English ballad recounts the fight, but not the murder.

To this tale for miming and picture—it is hardly a dramatized narrative—Honegger has written a music according to his faiths and practice. Time and again he has affirmed them—often to his detriment. There is not a reason to call him "insincere" except as trite, canting expression of the hearer's dislike to the music. It is as groundless reproach, except as voice of irritation to call him "degenerate." No excess of finicking self-conscious, semi-effeminate artifice is his pitfall. Far more threaten him rude, inchoate vigors, merely thickening and up-piled. By this faith and practice he writes a music that makes tireless use of massed chords in every sort of projection; that seeks out the higher and sharper voices of his instruments; that would make play with the orchestra as a whole rather than with individua timbres; that moves in parallel or interlocked planes with little regard to academically related keys; that admits an acrid, impinging melody; that rains blows of harmony—or oftener of dissonance.

So much, incidentally, for procedures. The listener, yesterday, was properly more interested in the play of the music upon perceptions and imagination. Beyond peradventure, Honegger has aimed at exceeding directness of concentrated delineation. He wreaks himself upon the measures of combat. No mere six, but whole tribes, might be battling. Like the vikings in the ballad, the Horatii and the Curiatii smote, rather than cut, with their swords; by the signs of the music, raining chordal tempest, might have used clubs or maces. When the victorious Horatius thrusts his sword into his imprecating sister, the elements might be dissolving in the tonal shrieks, sweeps, thunders. Here is power—and to spare; but in first impression a power used rudely, thickly, even clumsily, all in rough strokes, in blacks and whites solely. Its analogue in another art is a coarse, but vivid, print from a wood-block —now also so much the mode. There is no illumination, no vivid vibrancy in Honegger's tonal delineation. It falls mass upon mass, blow upon blow—a savagery, as it were, at once primitive and sophisticated; yet in degree tonic in a day and upon a public too long schooled, by Debussy and his chapel, to excess of vaporous, "very personal" finesse.

The counterpart of this violence is the piercing, wire-drawn music of the passion of Camilla and Curatius, of her lament for Curatius dead, her shrill invective upon the slayer. More relentless measures it were hard to imagine. They pierce to the very quick of an agony foreboding or fulfilled. The hearer, strange as are the acrid means, may not resist the poignancy of the impression. Therein is Honegger both piercing and puissant. The sophomore across the aisle would have him also "fierce."

H. T. P.

TRANS-NOV. 25.

HEMPEL IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Interesting Mozart Program Arranged for This Week by Mr. Monteux

Take it by and large, one of the most thoroughly enjoyable concerts of the Symphony Orchestra's present season was given by Mr. Monteux yesterday. With the exception of one number, the program was classical and the orchestra acquitted itself brilliantly.

Frieda Hempel, looking lovely as usual, was the soloist, and the audience greeted her with delight and relinquished her with evident regret. There are few soloists who appear with Mr. Monteux who are more popular than Miss Hempel. She sang two Mozart numbers, one an aria, the other an air, and in each her voice was a perfect joy. The tones were clear and true as a bell and the interpretation that of an artist of the very first rank.

The symphony was the Beethoven in D minor, only the first three movements were given. It was beautiful, especially the fast movement which sped along with rhythm so clear that it was sparkling.

The concluding number was the Brahms "Academic Festival," which has more joy in it than many of the other Brahms things and it left a pleasant memory in one's mind after the preceding number, "Horace Victorieux."

The fly in the ointment was this "Horace Victorieux" by Honegger, Honegger is a contemporary French composer who may have written some beautiful things, but the one selected for this pair of concerts left much to be desired. One felt that he was bizarre because he wanted to be original and that it was more of a striving for effect than anything else.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Following the first New York trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy the coming week, the next pair of symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 8 and 9.

The program will pay homage to the creative genius of Cesar Franck, this season being the centenary of his birth. Pierre Monteux will conduct the symphony of the great Belgian composer, also two symphonic poems, "Les Aeolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit."

The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who will play with the orchestra the pianoforte concerto of Schumann.

SYMPHONY EXTRAS

With a great demand for season tickets, there is every indication that he second season of the extra series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, will have crowded audiences. The concerts will take place on the following five Monday evenings: December 11, January 29, February 19, March 28 and April 23. The full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians, under Pierre Monteux, will present symphonic programs. The soloists to be heard at these concerts are Ernest Schelling, Renee Chemet, Florence Macbeth, Magdaleine Brard and Ester Ferrabini Jacchia.

AMER-NOV. 25

HEMPEL SINGS AT SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS

Frieda Hempel, most artistic coloratura soprano since the flawless Sembrich retired, is this week's Symphony soloist. Blond goddess of song, in a pearly white dress, all set off by an enormous sky-blue fan, she fairly triumphed at yesterday's matinee, which marked her first appearance at these historic Boston concerts. She sang two Mozart arias, the "Deh vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the song in which Constance defies the sultan, in "The Abduction from the Harem."

FREIDA HEMPEL

Brilliant as her technique is, no perfunctory singing doll is Miss Hempel. She sings with feeling and intelligence, but above all with the [illegible]

JAMES J. BENELISHA & CO.
Members Boston Curb Exchange
27 Exchange St., Boston, Mass.
Tel. Main 7691, 7692

ADV. NOV. 25

[30]

sents the strings, the piano, the wood, the brass and the percussion. They move in general under the rule of complete separation of powers . . . . Although speaking the simpe idiom of music, the violoncello and the piano endeavor each to speak in the style appropriate to itself, in a syntax peculiar to it, and on subjects wholly musical.

W. S. S.

TRAN. NOV. 23,

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is a most interesting one. The orchestral pieces will be the first three movements of Beethoven's 9th Symphony; the "Horatius, Victor" of Honegger (first time in America), and Brahms's Academic Festival Overture. Frieda Hempel will sing two arias by Mozart. Arthur Honegger is one of "The Six" of Paris (now "Five," since the withdrawal of one from the radical group). His "Horatius" is music written for pantomimic action.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 5, should crowd Symphony Hall, for it is in aid of Wilhelm Gericke, who, as conductor, made the reputation of this orchestra.

HERALD-NOV. 23

Next week brings no concerts in Boston by the Symphony Orchestra. To New York and other cities go conductor and band in the first trip of the season southward. At the succeeding pair of concerts at home Franck enters in and possesses the programme with his Symphony and his tone-poem, "The Daughters of Æolus"; and "The Accurst Huntsman." Franck, it seems, was born in Liège on Dec. 10, 1822. Hence this noting of a centenary before a public that has long taken joy of his music. For interlude at these Franckian concerts, Mme. Samaroff will play Schumann's Concerto for piano

TRANS. NOV. 24

HEMPEL SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Soprano Excels in Mozart's "Deh Vieni Non Tardar"

Beethoven Ninth, Brahms' "Academic," Honegger Novelty Heard

Frieda Hempel chose two Mozart arias for her solos at yesterday's Symphony concert, "Deh vieni non tardar" from "Figaro," and Martern aller Arten" from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail." Miss Hempel sang "Deh vieni" with the requisite clarity, grace, tonal beauty and underlying archness of mood, achieving a feat rare nowadays despite its apparent simplicity.

Mozart inserted a florid air for soprano in "Die Entfuehrung" to please the singer who was to be the original Cosanze by affording her an opportunity to display her skill in florid song. As music, this piece is almost the only really dull thing Mozart ever wrote.

Miss Hempel's voice has never been altogether suited to coloratura singing. Yesterday there was great effort and little achievement in her performance of this antiquated show piece. Her high notes were uncertain, strained in quality, not sustained. It was a mistaken choice, especially with a wealth of rarely sung Mozart arias of the calibre of "Deh vieni" available. Miss Hempel sang in Italian, though the original text of "Die Entfuehrung" is in German.

The first three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony began the concert. The choral finale on Schiller's "Ode to Joy" was omitted. It is not possible to give works requiring a large chorus at the regular Symphony concerts because the stage must be built out, and there is no place for the dispossessed subscribers for the front rows on the floor.

The scherzo was played adequately. The slow movement stirred Mr Monteux and his men to unusual restrained eloquence, which made the poignant beauty of the music felt. The first movement of this symphony is perhaps the most gigantic creative achievement of Beethoven. But nobody would have guessed that fact from yesterday's perfunctory, unsympathetic rendering.

The intense rhythmic driving power of a Muck, a Mengelberg, or a Toscanini is needed for such things as this. It is not Mr Monteux' fault that he lacks interpretive genius.

Brahm's "Academic Festival" overture, an amiable pot-pourri of German student songs, was played with a will.

"Horatius Victorious," a suite by the young Swiss composer Honegger, one of the Parisian group who call themselves "The Six," proved much more substantial and effective music than the suite by Milhaud which was the only work by "The Six" previously given at these concerts. "Horace Victorieux" was composed as a ballet in eight episodes. The lack of illustrative action was felt yesterday, though each of the connected episodes is compactly built.

Honegger's counterpoint is recognizably that of a Gedalge pupil by contrast with the ridiculous parodied fugue in Milhaud's suite. His harmony is dissonant, his orchestration fuses all the instruments into one as far as tone color is concerned. This battle scene had a grotesque resemblance to the "Battle of Prague," beloved of our great aunts. "Camilla's lamentations and imprecations" were most impressive. A rash guess is that the future will find Honegger rated as austere, earnest, and third class.

There are no Symphony concerts next week.

GLOBE-NOV. 25.

BIZARRE MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Honegger's "Horatius" Played—Frieda Hempel Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

An extraordinary piece, a piece of violent, grotesque music by the Frenchman, Honegger, was played for the first time in America at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This work, "Horatius Triumphant," is called by the composer a "mimed symphony," and the sub-title is explained by the fact that it was conceived as a ballet, with costumes and scenery, in which the actors, or dancers, represent the legendary fight between the three Horatii and the three Curiatii, for the mastery which should decide the triumph of the Roman or the Alban arms.

HEROIC AND FEROCIOUS

The scene is heroic and ferocious, when the last surviving Horatius, outnumbered, succeeds in killing his three foes, then puts to death his own sister, because she had mourned the sight of her betrothed among the slain.

How has this subject been treated by Arthur Honegger, one of the "six" who, in Paris, continue the attempt to outrival each other in novelty if not true originality, to make the bourgeois sit up, to evoke a fresh shudder in the breasts of the conservative, if not the police? There would have been the manner of ancient drama, with its laconic restraint, its evocation, by means of form rather than realism, of the spirit of heroic tragedy. But that is not Milhaud's method, nor is it the spirit of his music.

With the method we have no quarrel. Of course a given number of people will stick their fingers in their ears, and call the composer a discordant ignoramus or poseur. That is nonsense.

Writes With Virtuosity

This man writes with virtuosity. He is a daring, grinning, impudent "polyharmonist." Different words—not merely notes, but blocks of chords—and different keys collide in his music, or combine with haunting and momentarily beautiful effect, as, for example, the music for the scene between Camilla and her lover.

It is hard—not heroic—but hard and with no loftiness of spirit whatsoever. The Horatii are merely slayers. There is perverse portrayal of their cruelty. A fanfare that calls to battle ends in a howl of rage. One senses gluttony for the over-strained, the over-drawn, the bizarre. One moment which would be said to have beauty is the first "scene"—the music is for seven successive scenes on the stage—between Camilla and her lover Curiatius. It is, however, macabre, shudders, apprehensions, blackness are in it, and when this same music, expanded by the orchestra, returns—when Camilla laments the slain, horror itself is caricatured in a monstrous manner. The woman dies with a shriek and a squeal, after which terrific discords smash against each other to the conclusion.

On the whole, we rather detest this music. It is for us decadent, nervously exhausted art which causes one to wonder if it is not a spiritual aftermath of the fatigue and terror of the most atrocious of wars. Yes! There are those who point the finger of scorn at Johannes Brahms. It was very, very good to turn to the rousing, student spirit, and the open air, romantic quality of his "Academic overture, which followed Mr. Honegger.

Miss Hempel's Singing

Mme. Frieda Hempel sang Mozart. Her air from the "Marriage of Figaro" was a masterpiece of phrasing, of beauty of sustained tone. The second aria is one for virtuosi only. It found Miss Hempel not in the best voice, but a mistress of coloratura, and one who gave dramatic significance as well as bravura quality to the air.

The true capstone of the concert came at the beginning, with the three instrumental movements of Beethoven's 9th symphony. Mr. Monteux omitted the chorale finale. Comparing that work, so clear, so powerful, so beautiful and exalted in spirit, with the unhealthy music of Honegger, one recalls the remark of Taine in his "History of English Literature," that if a Shakspere lived today, in our puny, nervous, modern age, he would probably have neither the body nor the brains to endure the passions and visions that swept through the brain of William Shakspere.

It would require an infinitely stronger soul than Honegger to write six measures of the ninth symphony.

POST-NOV 23

AN AFTERNOON OF VARIEGATED NEWNESS

Brahms's "Academic Overture" Goes Savorless — Mme. Hempel's Unwilling Vcice—The Greater Glories of Beethoven, Even Truncated — Honegger's Engrossing Ways and Works

An agreeable sense of newness pervaded the Symphony Concert of yesterday. Not one item upon the programme was routine. True, Brahms's "Academic Overture" is hardly a novel piece. Yet, if recollection holds, for the first time since the end of the late war, it was played on Friday in Symphony Hall. Moreover a French—or, more truly, a cosmopolitan—conductor guided this pot-pourri of German student-songs. With Brahms more or less universal—as in the symphonies, the "Tragic Overture" or the "St. Antoni Variations"—Mr. Monteux succeeds well. He sets forth his own version of the music; it is not the version that a German or a German-schooled conductor would dispense. Yet it is recognizably and plausibly Brahms, who would not be the world-wide composer that he is, could not his music be taken stimulatingly from the Latin angle. Yet once and again, in his writing he was German to the core. He is so, for exaltation, in The Requiem; for various ends in his songs; for homeliness and gemuthlichkeit, in this "Academic Overture."

There Brahms has taken German student-songs as he found them. Only one from his choice, "Gaudeamus Igitur," is far-spread west of the Rhine. Out of these pieces, using his craftsman's hand, he has put together an overture not too much above the day's work, keeping place among standard pieces by the geniality aforesaid and by easy frankness of substance and form. Heard, the "Academic Overture" must sound with the homeliness, the heartiness, the openness, with which it was written. Otherwise the performance misses the mark and the music has no reason for being. In that hapless case stood both yesterday. Even Mr. Monteux's imagination is not receptive enough to absorb German student-songs. The chosen pace did not suit them; rhythm and accents did not characterize them. They came, they went, savorless. With reason, were hearers and even certain players restive under Mr. Monteux's way with pieces they had long known quite otherwise. None but a French conductor can make the most, say, of Gounod's "Faust." By similar tokens, Brahms's "Academic Overture" needs German or German-trained hands.

In turn, from Mme. Hempel's singing came measure of disappointment. High-placed and established singer though she is, she had part, for the first time, at a "regular" Symphony Concert. By "the tradition," rather than by pure reason, nervousness is the lot of those so placed. Under it, possibly, Mme. Hempel's voice suffered yesterday, experienced singer though she is, in the ways and fortunes of the concert-hall. Thus, her upper tones were strangely thin and meagre in Mozart's "Deh Vieni"; while in her show-piece out of "The Elopement from the Harem," her ornaments of song were neither limpid, supple nor effortless. With insight, she sang "Deh Vieni" in half-voice, kept to the fine threading of the melodic line; accented, shaded, it felicitously; caught the mood of moonlit, wistful musing, instinct in the music. Mme. Hempel perceives the sensibility, the serenity, the endless grace of Mozart in such a piece—that pervading loveliness for which there is no word but Mozartean. Within the restraints of voice, yesterday and untimely laid upon her, she conveyed it. The air from "Il Seraglio" is another sort of music. The obligated Mozart wrote it because the friendly singer desired such a number, and he could "turn it off" readily. Not much imagination, but plentiful skill, he put into this bouquet of the flowers of song, leaving the singer to bring them to bright bloom. Without such lustres this air of Constanze is of none effect. As dutiful as Mozart was Mme. Hempel; yet her voice for once denied her the essential glinting, cascading tones. Not even the incidental measures of flowing song could she, for the nonce, turn golden.

To better outcome went the other ventures of the day. Beethovens' Choral Symphony, in toto, has become virtually impossible in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts. No chorus now supplements the orchestra. Under pressure of more immediate tasks, incessantly accumulating, even so diligent a conductor as Mr. Monteux could hardly find time and energy to guide and finish the work of an able chorus-master. An unpaid chorus, besides, is careless of necessary fidelities and disciplines; while the treasury of Symphony Hall hardly permits payment. A borrowed choir, moreover, could not find room upon the stage, unless it were outbuilt, displacing the seats of subscribers. Perish that thought! Out of course, then, must fall performances of the Ninth Symphony "in entirety"; while few and far between are they likely to be. Yet for fifteen years past, an unwarrantable "tradition," born of the unconscionable purists, has denied to the public of the Symphony Concerts the hearing of the three movements in which Beethoven was content with an orchestra. As Mr. Monteux has often and wisely done, he broke again yesterday with ill justified custom. Sufficient and more were the resulting satisfactions and applause.

Though there be no final excitements and grandeurs, though this Allegro, Scherzo and Adagio be but a truncated symphonic body, a thousand times over they justify isolated performance. To one sort of human nature at least, long familiarity lessens anticipation of the eigh[illegible] usual symph[illegible] but so rarely in [illegible] ing almost new. Moreover, beside even the glories of Fifth and the Seventh Symphonies, [illegible] they not, in such writing, the summits of Beethoven's beauty and power? Except in one or another string quartet of these final years, nowhere has he invented instrumental song of such fathomless beauty, such unfolding power as that which springs from the first motiv of this slow movement. The voice of it touches sustained ecstasy; the heart of it beats high with both the intensities and the serenities of human emotion; the mind that guides it compasses design and expression no whit below such "great argument." Always, the matter and the means move in that inseparable unity which is sum of achievement in the arts.

In turn, the Scherzo is crown of the buoyant vigors, the rich fancy, the haunting or the whipping repetitions with which Beethoven could infuse such movements. The hearer does not bear with the persistent rhythm as he does in the toying of the Eighth Symphony. It goads him. Again, tossing and tumultuous stress of mood and emotion gaining voice in tones, pervades the first movement. Some may say that the tempests at the beginning of the Fifth Symphony more seize and stir the listening mind and heart. Possibly: but neither in storm nor in intervening serenities do they ascend to the might and the majesty of this final music. As the slow movement of the Ninth Symphony scales celestial ecstasies, so does this first movement lift high and grave yet other—and as deep—human passions and human poetries. Rarely have orchestra and conductor been so eloquently of Beethoven as they were in the Scherzo and the Adagio. In the Allegro—the more the pity—they fell appreciably short of stormy splendor.

And Honegger—Honegger of "Horatius Triumphant"—the one intruder, out of a Parisian "Six," and these very days, into the company of all these halos. At least he made contrast; quickened interest; set the hearer to many reflections, if not to many delights. Apart from impressions and opinions, the recordable facts in the case are relatively few. "Preliminary observations," as the old prefaces liked to say, have not been lacking in these columns. Suffice it to recall that "Horatius Triumphant" was written as illustrative and enhancing music to mimodrama—the one as yet unheard, the other as yet unseen in the theatre. The matter is Roman record or Roman tale of the duel between the three Horatii and the three Curiatii to end a petty war; of the loves between a Curatius and Camilla of the Horatian house; of her lament over the betrothed slain; of the vengeance of her brother, raging, bloody-minded. Livy sets down the story; Corneille's "Horaces" has long preserved it to the French stage; Macaulay's familiar English ballad recounts the fight, but not the murder.

To this tale for miming and picture—it is hardly a dramatized narrative—Honegger has written a music according to his faiths and practice. Time and again he has affirmed them—often to his detriment. There is not a reason to call him "insincere" except as trite, canting expression of the hearer's dislike to the music. It is as groundless reproach, except as voice of irritation to call him "degenerate." No excess of finicking self-conscious, semi-effeminate artifice is his pitfall. Far more threaten him rude, inchoate vigors, merely thickening and up-piled. By this faith and practice he writes a music that makes tireless use of massed chords in every sort of projection; that seeks out the higher and sharper voices of his instruments; that would make play with the orchestra as a whole rather than with individua timbres; that moves in parallel or interlocked planes with little regard to academically related keys; that admits an acrid, impinging melody; that rains blows of harmony—or oftener of dissonance.

So much, incidentally, for procedures. The listener, yesterday, was properly more interested in the play of the music upon perceptions and imagination. Beyond peradventure, Honegger has aimed at exceeding directness of concentrated delineation. He wreaks himself upon the measures of combat. No mere six, but whole tribes, might be battling. Like the vikings in the ballad, the Horatii and the Curiatii smote, rather than cut, with their swords; by the signs of the music, raining chordal tempest, might have used clubs or maces. When the victorious Horatius thrusts his sword into his imprecating sister, the elements might be dissolving in the tonal shrieks, sweeps, thunders. Here is power—and to spare; but in first impression a power used rudely, thickly, even clumsily, all in rough strokes, in blacks and whites solely. Its analogue in another art is a coarse, but vivid, print from a wood-block—now also so much the mode. There is no illumination, no vivid vibrancy in Honegger's tonal delineation. It falls mass upon mass, blow upon blow—a savagery, as it were, at once primitive and sophisticated; yet in degree tonic in a day and upon a public too long schooled, by Debussy and his chapel, to excess of vaporous, "very personal" finesse.

The counterpart of this violence is the piercing, wire-drawn music of the passion of Camilla and Curatius, of her lament for Curatius dead, her shrill invective upon the slayer. More relentless measures it were hard to imagine. They pierce to the very quick of an agony foreboding or fulfilled. The hearer, strange as are the acrid means, may not resist the poignancy of the impression. Therein is Honegger both piercing and puissant. The sophomore across the aisle would have him also "fierce."

H. T. P.

TRANS-NOV. 25.

[30]

HEMPEL IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Interesting Mozart Program Arranged for This Week by Mr. Menteux

Take it by and large, one of the most thoroughly enjoyable concerts of the Symphony Orchestra's present season was given by Mr. Monteux yesterday. With the exception of one number, the program was classical and the orchestra acquitted itself brilliantly.

Frieda Hempel, looking lovely as usual, was the soloist, and the audience greeted her with delight and relinquished her with evident regret. There are few soloists who appear with Mr. Monteux who are more popular than Miss Hempel. She sang two Mozart numbers, one an aria, the other an air, and in each her voice was a perfect joy. The tones were clear and true as a bell and the interpretation that of an artist of the very first rank.

The symphony was the Beethoven in D minor, only the first three movements were given. It was beautiful, especially the fast movement which sped along with rhythm so clear that it was sparkling.

The concluding number was the Brahms "Academic Festival," which has more joy in it than many of the other Brahms things and it left a pleasant memory in one's mind after the preceding number, "Horace Victorieux."

The fly in the ointment was this "Horace Victorieux" by Honegger. Honegger is a contemporary French composer who may have written some beautiful things, but the one selected for this pair of concerts left much to be desired. One felt that he was bizarre because he wanted to be original and that it was more of a striving for effect than anything else.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Following the first New York trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy the coming week, the next pair of symphony concerts in Symphony Hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, December 8 and 9.

The program will pay homage to the creative genius of Cesar Franck, this season being the centenary of his birth. Pierre Monteux will conduct the symphony of the great Belgian composer, alsa two symphonic poems, "Les Aeolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit."

The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who will play with the orchestra the pianoforte concerto of Schumann.

SYMPHONY EXTRAS

With a great demand for season tickets, there is every indication that he second season of the extra series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, will have crowded audiences. The concerts will take place on the following five Monday evenings: December 11, January 29, February 19, March 28 and April 23. The full Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians, under Pierre Monteux, will present symphonic programs. The soloists to be heard at these concerts are Ernest Schelling, Renee Chemet, Florence Macbeth, Magdaleine Brard and Ester Ferrabini Jacchia.

AMER-NOV. 25

HEMPEL SINGS AT SYMPHONY

By E. F. HARKINS

Frieda Hempel, most artistic colorature soprano since the flawless Sembrich retired, is this week's Symphony soloist. Blond goddess of song, in a pearly white dress, all set off by an enormous sky-blue fan, she fairly triumphed at yesterday's matinee, which marked her first appearance at these historic Boston concerts. She sang two Mozart arias, the "Deh vieni," from "The Marriage of Figaro," and the song in which Constance defies the sultan, in "The Abduction from the Harem."

FREIDA HEMPEL

Brilliant as her technique is, no perfunctory singing doll is Mme Hempel. She sings with feeling and intelligence, but above all with the utter gracefulness demanded by the Mozart melodies. There is beauty and warmth even in her highest notes. Her runs and trills are vocal perfection. It was a great pleasure to hear her again. The orchestra accompanied her superbly.

Mr. Monteux and his men had their own ovation after the beautiful performance of the first three movements from Beethoven's ninth symphony. They also deserve some special reward

Music and composers associated with he musical life of Vienna, the city which has claimed the larger part of Wilhelm Gericke's career, will predominate on the program which Pierre Monteux has made for the special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given for the benefit of its former conductor on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, in Symphony hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following the first New York trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy the coming week, the next pair of symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 8 and 9. The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff.

RLV. NOV. 26

Sixth Program of Boston Symphony

The sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was as follows:

Beethoven—Three movements from the Ninth Symphony.
Mozart—Arias from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Honegger—"Horace Victorieux."
Brahms—"Academic Festival" Overture.

Frieda Hempel was the soloist.

The novel piece of the afternoon was Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," which was played for the first time in America. It was originally intended to accompany dramatic action, and therefore its performance in concert form was not the original intention of the composer. Nevertheless, the composition was presented yesterday afternoon as music pure and simple, and as such it must be considered. From the opening measures to the last, the ear is shocked by an uninterrupted series of the harshest dissonances. More than this, the orchestration is noisy and during the calmer moments extravagant. There is no melodic outline in the commonly accepted meaning of that term. All the laws, all the conventions, which have governed musical art up to the present time seem to have been discarded. Yet the work is not formless. The composer is evidently endeavoring to express a definite thought although in a language as yet not wholly understood by himself, and most certainly unfamiliar to his audience of yesterday. Decidedly, this is no meretricious seeking for novel effect. It is music sincerely conceived and executed; this much is plain. Yet, it must be confessed that at the present time it leaves the hearer confused and puzzled.

The playing of the Ninth Symphony without the choral finale is a sad commentary on the state of musical art in Boston. To be sure it is better to hear this abbreviated version than none at all. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra presented a sane, unaffected reading of the three movements.

Mme. Hempel sang Mozart's "Deh Vieni" with rare skill. She succeeded in evoking the mood of the scene in the opera for which the aria was intended. In the air from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" she was brilliant, though the music itself is inconsequential. Mozart, like Homer, occasionally nodded. S. M.

MONITOR-NOV.25-

FAMOUS SYMPHONY TO VISIT NEW HAVEN

Richard Burgin Is Successor to Frank Kneisel, Founder of Kneisel Quartet.

New Haven, Nov. 24.—Richard Burgin, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at the concert by this famous organization, to be given in Woolsey hall, New Haven, Nov. 28 at 8:15, is concertmaster of the orchestra. He is one of the youngest and one of the most brilliant in the brilliant succession of concertmasters of which the Boston Symphony orchestra can boast. In these respects, and in still another, he resembles Franz Kneisel, who began his career in this country at the same post.

Richard Burgin has only been in America two years, and came to this country to become concertmaster of the orchestra. He studied four years with the famous producer of great violinists, Leopold Auer, as the fellow pupil and friend of Heifetz. Subsequently he gave recitals in large cities in Russia, and Scandinavia, and played as concertmaster and soloist with the five finest orchestras in that part of the world, appearing in this capacity under Richard Strauss and under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch. He is to appear as soloist in New Haven in the highly difficult and lyrically beautiful violin concerto of Tchaikovsky Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also be heard in the following program: Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture, and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

WATBUY-AMER-NOV.24

Thursday evening, Dec. 7, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the third of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mme. Samaroff will be the assisting pianist in Schumann's Concerto.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 8, in Symphony Hall, the seventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. A programme to signalize the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Franck includes his symphony and his tone-poems, "The Daughters of Aeolus" and "The Wild Huntsman." Mme. Samaroff wil repeat Schumann's Concerto.

Monday evening, Dec. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, enlisting the full orchestra, led by Mr. Monteux and traversing only standard pieces. Ernest Schelling, notable pianist long unheard in Boston, will be the "assisting artist." So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who are not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music.

TRANS-NOV.25.

Cesar Franck, whose music will be given centenary performances at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, was born Dec. 10, 1822, in Liege. He grew up in poverty, his musical gift commercialized in his early years by an unscrupulous father. He duly entered the Conservatoire, where he first astonished the professors by the rapidity and thoroughness with which he mastered his art, and then disconcerted everyone by a series of works which were not remotely understood by the professors or the public either of the day.

Franck was poor all the days of his life. He married, during the Commune, when the wedding party had to climb over the barricades in the street, a wife of whom he stood in fear and trembling. It is recorded that his trousers, like those of the renowned Johannes Brahms, were usually at half mast. He taught most of the day, when he was not practising or performing on the organ at St. Clotilde. In the very early morning he snatched some hours for composition, and of a late afternoon or evening gathered about him pupils, many of whom became leaders of the modern French musical art. Mr. d'Indy is the greatest of Franck's disciples, but there are many others whose compositions have influenced the development of French music.

FRANCK'S MODESTY

At these friendly gatherings Franck taught and showed his own compositions, with entire modesty, enthusiasm, and naivette, to the younger men. He lived his life incredibly unconscious of the world, never bitter because of his humble lot, affecting neither superiority nor condescension. He was profoundly religious, and died because of an accident in the street, caused probably by his own obliviousness to everything about him, when he was struck and fell. No great sensation was caused by his passing out. Years passed before Franck's surpassing genius was realized.

Yet it seems that no composer of his generation, certainly no composer of his generation and nationality, is more securely niched in the hall of fame. His fate, indeed, most exactly and beautifully fulfils the spirit and the promise of his music. This music was a humble prayer to God, a perpetual adoration. It foretells always one consummation. It expresses, always, the progress of one spiritual drama, the victory of the meek and lowly, who shall sit at the right hand of the Most High. This drama lies at the root of almost all the music Franck wrote, whether it is the great symphony, to be played by Mr. Monteux and his men this week, or the incomparable piano quintet, or the "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue for the piano, or the chorales, or certain songs. Franck's faith was that of a little child.

Unique Traits

Debussy, who in becoming one of the greatest of modern composers, certainly deprived the world of a very great music critic, observed of Franck that "a great deal has been said about his genius without ever mentioning its unique quality of ingenuousness. This man who was unfortunate, unrecognized, possessed the soul of a child, and one so ineradicably good that neither contradictory circumstances nor the wickedness of others could ever make him feel bitter. . . . He wrote, so to speak, face to face with the spirit of music, before which he would kneel, uttering at the same time the most profoundly touching prayer that ever fell from human lips. Cesar Franck served his art with steadfast devotion . . . He served music without ever asking it for renown."

That was the man, and it must be noted that such a spirit could exist in France in a time of political turmoil and an age of the most sceptical materialism. Also at a time when French music had far from high standards, and when symphonic composition, in spite of the efforts and the influence of Hector Berlioz, was in France almost an unknown thing. Franck—who, it should be remembered, was actually a Belgian by birth and by temperament—is the one great symphonist of the French school, before his pupil and disciple, Vincent d'Indy.

French Symphonists

Symphonies and symphonic poems were written in numbers by the late Camille Saint-Saens. They had not, with the single exception of the symphony by Saint-Saens in C minor, the truly symphonic spirit. Nor have they the grand architectural line which Franck achieves in the quintet and the D minor symphony, even though his ideas in themselves are inclined to be short-breathed. Franck was also the principal sponsor of the "cyclic" forms, and is equally successful in his treatment of them, whether for piano, chamber music or full orchestra. He lends a substance and an authenticity of inspiration to symphonic music which no French or Belgian composer had achieved before him, and the substantial quality of his workmanship in no wise detracts from its lucidness and transparency of style.

Franck felt form, but not as a German. Simplicity, clearness, economy of material remained his characteristic. As a harmonist he escaped the influence of Wagner, and in his chromatic and enharmonic progressions built much more on Liszt.

Franck never aped another school, and he never sought for an effect. His most subtle modulations are as logical and inevitable as Bach. What made him great was his spirit. His harmonic idiom, beautiful and distinctive as it is, has been long outdistanced in novelty and shock by dozens of his successors. It's the texture of his music, its sensibility, its beautiful and shadowy coloring. It's the soul underneath the notes, the agitated, imploring soul of the gentle mystic to whom the world of the flesh was a dream and the world of the spirit the sole reality, that perpetuates his message and speaks to us today. That, and his master's sense of form—form not unlike in its breath and justness of proportion, in finish and interest of detail, to the cathedrals in which he played the organ.

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

POST-NOV.26

PLAYS BRAHMS AND BEETHOVEN

Boston Symphony Program Also Includes Piece by Honegger

CONCERT SOLOIST IS FRIEDA HEMPEL

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, in Symphony hall last night, was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 9 (first three movements); Mozart, Arias: "Deh vie ni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Martern aller Arten" from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail" (Frieda Hempel); Honegger, "Horatius Triumphant" (first time in America); Brahms, Academic Festival.

Of late there has been a curious tendency in some quarters to underrate this symphony. The finale in spite of a few sublime pages is called barbarous by reason of its exactions on solo singers and chorus. The other movements have not escaped adverse criticism, although the Scherzo is recognized as, on the whole, worthy of enthusiastic admiration. In the Adagio, even the lovely and haunting second theme, is dismissed as "incongruous." Would that there were more incongruities of this nature!

Thus the pendulum swings. One decade this symphony is the greatest achievement in music, a work of plenary inspiration. In another decade it is amorphous, with a finale that has no possible relation to what precedes, so difficult of performance that perfection is impossible, nor is the labor worth the straining and the pains.

We do not find the performance of the symphony without the finale sacrilegious. Better this, than to see the straining throats and bulging eyes of the singers and to hear their ululations. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave a most eloquent interpretation, one that would have convinced even the most irreverent of the younger school that this symphony for its expression of doubt and foreboding; its sinister hints and dramatic outbursts; its titanic rage; its wild revery interrupted for a time by pastoral pipings; its sustained, ineffable song that only Beethoven could have written, stands alone and unapproachable.

Honegger wrote his "Horatius" as a ballad, with stage setting, costumes and pantomimic action. Whether this ballet was performed, we have been unable to learn; probably not; for the performances of the music recorded were in concert halls. (The first at Geneva, Switzerland, in the fall of 1921.) Honegger took for his subject the Roman legend of the three Horatii and the three Curiatii; how Horatius having slain the three Albans found his sister Camilla bewailing the fate of the Curiatius to whom she was betrothed, whereupon he killed her; the end of a perfect day. The subject has interested operatic composers—from 1720 to 1830—and there have been ballets. Many of the librettos were based on Corneille's tragedy.

As Honegger is one of "the Six" (now "Five"), to the conservative, especially to those who are loath to welcome any contemporaneous music unless it is academically dull or conventionally sentimental, [illegible] fore be a terrible fellow, [illegible] not a son of Belial. [illegible] tween the champions [illegible] and the Albans was not [illegible] the water affair. Honegger, [illegible] legend, evidently took for his motto: "Treat 'em rough." Even if one does not like this music, it is not necessary to call the composer a poseur. He is terribly in earnest.

This "Horatius" is first of all, music for the theatre, nevertheless it does not lose wholly by transference to the concert hall. There are connected episodes which correspond to the action; Camilla and her betrothed; entrance of the combatants, the crowd, the combat, the triumph of Horatius; then the wail of Camilla and her murder. Honegger had a definite plan; he carried it out with no hesitation. There is nothing tentative, nothing experimental. His battle music is free from commonplaces, while it would be difficult to find a keener expression of anguish and dread than the first pages describing the parting of the lovers. An unusually interesting work, even when it is taken from its home, the theatre. An audacious work that to some will seem chaotic and cacophonous, but we cannot always be lulled to sleep by sweet strains on reverence old formulas. Better shrieking dissonances when they tell a story than platitudes, though they be launched with the fury of a thunderbolt; or sluggish streams of musical molasses.

The florid air from Mozart's "Entfuehrung" was written to display the vocal agility of Katherina Calvalieri. Mozart wrote to his father that he had sacrificed a little to her "nimble throat." It is said of her that she was an excellent musician, a woman of fascinating manners rather than beautiful in face or figure. Her throat shortened her life, for, as the story goes, she over-exerted herself and was obliged to leave the stage. She died eight years afterward, only 40 years old. Some once applauded singers of marked agility do not leave the stage, nor do they die young. Mme. Hempel had thus an opportunity to display her technical facility. How beautifully she sang the air from "Figaro," one of the loveliest airs in the operatic literature! Here was a shining example of what "bel canto" may mean: Exquisite tonal quality, a firm control of breath, significant phrasing, the emotional expression that is an irresistible appeal. The last phases of the preceding recitative sung as Mme. Hampel sang them prove that the pure art of song is not lost; that there are still singers worthy of Mozart's airs.

The fact that Brahms did not attend any university probably inspired him to take a cheerful view of university life, as voiced in his overture.

There will be no concerts this week. The program of Dec. 8 and 9 will commemorate the centennial of Cesar Franck (born Dec. 10, 1822). Symphony, symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and the symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsmen." Mme. Samaroff will play Schumann's concerto.

HERALD-NOV.26.

GERICKE BENEFIT

The program of the special Boston Symphony concert to be given by the orchestra under Mr. Monteux for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke (the former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 13 seasons) in Symphony hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, will include the arrangement for orchestra by Mr. Gericke of the piano waltzes of Brahms, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The remaining numbers also figured prominently on Mr. Gericke's programs and the cirmustances of their composition are connected with the musical life of Vienna, the city which has claimed the larger part of his career—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Following the first New York trip of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week, the next concerts in Symphony Hall will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 8 and 9. The program will pay homage to Cesar Franck, as this season is the centenary of his birth. Mr. Monteux will conduct Franck's symphony, also "Les Aeolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit." The soloist will be Olga Samaroff, who will play Schuman's concerto.

HERALD NOV 26

Gericke Benefit Program

The program is announced for the special Boston Symphony concert which is to be given Dec 5, by the orchestra under Pierre Monteux for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, the former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 13 years.

It will include the arrangement for orchestra by Mr Gericke of the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms, and Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel," which Gericke was first to make known to the Boston public. The remaining numbers also figured prominently on Mr Gericke's programs and the circumstances of their composition are connected with the musical life of Vienna, the city which has claimed the larger part of his career. These are Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will begin its New York season Thursday and Saturday. For Dec 8 and 9, the concerts nearest the 100th anniversary of the birth of Cesar Franck, Mr Monteux has arranged a commemorative program, all from Franck's works, except for the Schumann concerto, to be played by Mme Samaroff.

GLOBE-NOV.26.

[31]

R[illegible] of the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening and received with as chilly bewilderment as on Friday afternoon, Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant" yet renewed upon sundry ears the [illegible] emotions of discovery. Not to be heard as "absolute" music self-contained is the Parisian's piece. It is music to enrich and enhance miming, and he is as much entitled to his background of imagined action as is Strauss, say, to his [illegible] for "Eulenspiegel" or "Quixote." It is courtesy, it is duty—the more imperative at a first performance—to give heed to what the music would affirm or imply. Mere railing distaste brings the listener nowhere—except deeper into the slough of narrow mindedness.

Agreed, then, that to many ears, the shrill, piercing, knife-like measures of Camilla farewelling her loved Curiatius, of Camilla imprecating her own brother who Camilla m recatin [illegible] at bottom, their validity, their poignancy, are matter of emotional experience and imagination. There is a passion so possessing that fiercely it must find outlet; a foreboding so carking that only acrid word or tone may speak it; a frenzy of [illegible] shriek or else eat away the heart within.

Of such was Camilla when she thus parted from her lover, when thus to the Roman heavens she cried her woe. With reason Honegger's writes for her music to rasp ears and nerves, yet music as it seemed to some, of questionless power and illusion upon the answering emotions. Moreover, this wire-drawn shrillness is the idiom of the younger moderns in the expression of high-pitched, searing passion. Before the winter is done we shall hear it again in Casella's "Alta Notte" and better understand. It is a new speech of music to be comprehended, felt, examined, tested—not mere rasping noise to be booted incontinent out of doors.

Jangling keys do move side by side, plane above plane, through Honegger's music of combat and murder. He flings chordal mass upon chordal mass. At no progression does he halt, if his will to delineate bids him use it. Yet hear how closely this music is knit strand into strand; how firmly rhythm binds it and gives it motion. Hear also how graphic it is of the mimed action, with that directness and concentration, harsh as they now seem, which may be the lasting contribution of these young lions to the ways and means of music. May any hearer, if he will but lend his imagination to what the mere ear finds repellent, doubt the presence of the ominous crowd, the fury of the combat, the murder like the veil of the temple rent, the details of delineation that leap across the tonal background like lurid flashes cleaving a louring sky? Here goes music alike of intrinsic and of depicting force—and it was such music, all mass and might, streak and fury, that Honegger would make. He has his right to his purpose. By accomplishment he clarifies and justifies his will. H. T. P.

TRANS. NOV 27.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Program Played in Splendid Spirit With Brilliant Effect.

After giving a rather dull and soggy rendition of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony at Parsons's Theater last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the rest of the program in splendid spirit and with brilliant effect. An audience that completely filled the Theater was present; the soloist, Edwin Nyiregyhazi, was loudly acclaimed and Mr. Monteux was recalled to the stage at the close of the concert.

It seems not at all unlikely that at this time of the year the Third Symphony of Beethoven may not have been very strenuously rehearsed by the orchestra. In any event last evening's performance, though it brought out some lovely tones, did not show a perfect putting together of the work—such as is expected in the Boston Orchestra's rendition of any of the standard symphonies. It may be that Mr. Monteux does not worship at the Beethoven shrine. Many of the modern conductors do not. They play him, but their joy is in the others. Of the playing last evening it may be said that the best was done in the first movement and the finale was the least satisfactory of all—rough and ready being the words, perhaps, that best describe it.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" was lovely in tone, in imaginative quality, in expression. Everything was there; the soft splendor of light, the rippling of nearby waters, the gentle sighing breeze. And exquisite tone pervaded all, suggested all, accomplished all.

Erwin Nyiregyhazi played with the orchestra the Liszt Concerto in A major, No. 2 and his work was followed with the closest attention and was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience. The player is very young, a tall slender boy with wonderful hands that he uses with tremendous power and that in the lighter passages suggest in their movement the perfect grace of the leading animal or the athlete as he is sometimes shown in the so-called "slow" motion pictures. The opening piano measures in this fearsome Concerto of Litszt's give ample opportunity for just this display of slow grace but soon the long facile hands are called upon for lightning motion in [illegible] staccato passages; then comes the lovely singing of the 'cello with the piano; then the building up of a tremendous climax that [illegible] way for some [illegible] solo [illegible]

GERICKE BENEFIT

Music and composers associated with the musical life of Vienna, the city which has claimed the larger part of Wilhelm Gericke's career, will predominate on the program which Pierre Monteux has made for the special concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given for the benefit of its former conductor on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, in Symphony hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following the first New York trip of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy the coming week, the next pair of symphony concerts in Symphony hall will take place a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 8 and 9. The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff.

RLV. NOV. 25

Sixth Program of Boston Symphony

The sixth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, was as follows:

Beethoven—Three movements from the Ninth Symphony.
Mozart—Arias from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Die Entführung aus dem Serail."
Honegger—"Horace Victorieux."
Brahms—"Academic Festival" Overture.

Frieda Hempel was the soloist.

The novel piece of the afternoon was Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," which was played for the first time in America. It was originally intended to accompany dramatic action, and therefore its performance in concert form was not the original intention of the composer. Nevertheless, the composition was presented yesterday afternoon as music pure and simple, and as such it must be considered. From the opening measures to the last, the ear is shocked by an uninterrupted series of the harshest dissonances. More than this, the orchestration is noisy and during the calmer moments extravagant. There is no melodic outline in the commonly accepted meaning of that term. All the laws, all the conventions, which have governed musical art up to the present time seem to have been discarded. Yet the work is not formless. The composer is evidently endeavoring to express a definite thought although in a language as yet not wholly understood by himself, and most certainly unfamiliar to his audience of yesterday. Decidedly, this is no meretricious seeking for novel effect. It is music sincerely conceived and executed; this much is plain. Yet, it must be confessed that at the present time it leaves the hearer confused and puzzled.

The playing of the Ninth Symphony without the choral finale is a sad commentary on the state of musical art in Boston. To be sure it is better to hear this abbreviated version than none at all. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra presented a sane, unaffected reading of the three movements.

Mme. Hempel sang Mozart's "Deh Vieni" with rare skill. She succeeded in evoking the mood of the scene in the opera for which the aria was intended. In the air from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail" she was brilliant, though the music itself is inconsequential. Mozart, like Homer, occasionally nodded. S. M.

MONITOR-NOV. 5-

FAMOUS SYMPHONY TO VISIT NEW HAVEN

Richard Burgin Is Successor to Frank Kneisel, Founder of Kneisel Quartet.

New Haven, Nov. 24.—Richard Burgin, who is to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at the concert by this famous organization, to be given in Woolsey hall, New Haven, Nov. 28 at 8:15, is concertmaster of the orchestra. He is one of the youngest and one of the most brilliant in the brilliant succession of concertmasters of which the Boston Symphony orchestra can boast. In these respects, and in still another, he resembles Franz Kneisel, who began his career in this country at the same post.

Richard Burgin has only been in America two years, and came to this country to become concertmaster of the orchestra. He studied four years with the famous producer of great violinists, Leopold Auer, as the fellow pupil and friend of Heifetz. Subsequently he gave recitals in large cities in Russia, and Scandinavia, and played as concertmaster and soloist with the five finest orchestras in that part of the world, appearing in this capacity under Richard Strauss and under two former conductors of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Max Fiedler and Arthur Nikisch. He is to appear as soloist in New Haven in the highly difficult and lyrically beautiful violin concerto of Tchaikovsky Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also be heard in the following program: Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, Brahms' "Academic Festival" Overture, and Wagner's Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

WATBUY-AMER-NOV 24.

Thursday evening, Dec. 7, in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge, the third of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. Mme. Samaroff will be the assisting pianist in Schumann's Concerto.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 8, in Symphony Hall, the seventh of the afternoon concerts of the Symphony Orchestra with Mr. Monteux conducting. A programme to signalize the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Franck includes his symphony and his tone-poems, "The Daughters of Aeolus" and "The Wild Huntsman." Mme. Samaroff wil repeat Schumann's Concerto.

Monday evening, Dec. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, enlisting the full orchestra, led by Mr. Monteux and traversing only standard pieces. Ernest Schelling, notable pianist long unheard in Boston, will be the "assisting artist." So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who are not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music.

TRANS-NOV.25.

Cesar Franck, whose music will be given centenary performances at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, was born Dec. 10, 1822, in Liege. He grew up in poverty, his musical gift commercialized in his early years by an unscrupulous father. He duly entered the Conservatoire, where he first astonished the professors by the rapidity and thoroughness with which he mastered his art, and then disconcerted everyone by a series of works which were not remotely understood by the professors or the public either of the day.

Franck was poor all the days of his life. He married, during the Commune, when the wedding party had to climb over the barricades in the street, a wife of whom he stood in fear and trembling. It is recorded that his trousers, like those of the renowned Johannes Brahms, were usually at half mast. He taught most of the day, when he was not practising or performing on the organ at St. Clotilde. In the very early morning he snatched some hours for composition, and of a late afternoon or evening gathered about him pupils, many of whom became leaders of the modern French musical art. Mr. d'Indy is the greatest of Franck's disciples, but there are many others whose compositions have influenced the development of French music.

FRANCK'S MODESTY

At these friendly gatherings Franck taught and showed his own compositions, with entire modesty, enthusiasm, and naivette, to the younger men. He lived his life incredibly unconscious of the world, never bitter because of his humble lot, affecting neither superiority nor condescension. He was profoundly religious, and died because of an accident in the street, caused probably by his own obliviousness to everything about him, when he was struck and fell. No great sensation was caused by his passing out. Years passed before Franck's surpassing genius was realized.

Yet it seems that no composer of his generation, certainly no composer of his generation and nationality, is more securely niched in the hall of fame. His fate, indeed, most exactly and beautifully fulfils the spirit and the promise of his music. This music was a humble prayer to God, a perpetual adoration It foretells always one consummation. It expresses, always, the progress of one spiritual drama, the victory of the meek and lowly, who shall sit at the right hand of the Most High. This drama lies at the root of almost all the music Franck wrote, whether it is the great symphony, to be played by Mr. Monteux and his men this week, or the incomparable piano quintet, or the "Prelude, Chorale and Fugue for the piano, or the chorales, or certain songs. Franck's faith was that of a little child.

Unique Traits

Debussy, who in becoming one of the greatest of modern composers, certainly deprived the world of a very great music critic, observed of Franck that "a great deal has been said about his genius without ever mentioning its unique quality of ingenuousness. This man who was unfortunate, unrecognized, possessed the soul of a child, and one so ineradicably good that neither contradictory circumstances nor the wickedness of others could ever make him feel bitter. . . . He wrote, so to speak, face to face with the spirit of music, before which he would kneel, uttering at the same time the most profoundly touching prayer that ever fell from human lips. Cesar Franck served his art with steadfast devotion . . . He served music without ever asking it for renown."

That was the man, and it must be noted that such a spirit could exist in France in a time of political turmoil and an age of the most sceptical materialism. Also at a time when French music had far from high standards, and when symphonic composition, in spite of the efforts and the influence of Hector Berlioz, was in France almost an unknown thing. Franck—who, it should be remembered, was actually a Belgian by birth and by temperament—is the one great symphonist of the French school, before his pupil and disciple, Vincent d'Indy.

French Symphonists

Symphonies and symphonic poems were written in numbers by the late Camille Saint-Saens. They had not, with the single exception of the symphony by Saint-Saens in C minor, the truly symphonic spirit. Nor have they the grand architectural line which Franck achieves in the quintet and the D minor symphony, even though his ideas in themselves are inclined to be short-breathed. Franck was also the principal sponsor of the "cyclic" forms, and is equally successful in his treatment of them, whether for piano, chamber music or full orchestra. He lends a substance and an authenticity of inspiration to symphonic music which no French or Belgian composer had achieved before him, and the substantial quality of his workmanship in no wise detracts from its lucidness and transparency of style.

Franck felt form, but not as a German. Simplicity, clearness, economy of material remained his characteristic. As a harmonist he escaped the influence of Wagner, and in his chromatic and enharmonic progressions built much more on Liszt.

Franck never aped another school, and he never sought for an effect. His most subtle modulations are as logical and inevitable as Bach. What made him great was his spirit. His harmonic idiom, beautiful and distinctive as it is, has been long outdistanced in novelty and shock by dozens of his successors. It's the texture of his music, its sensibility, its beautiful and shadowy coloring. It's the soul underneath the notes, the agitated, imploring soul of the gentle mystic to whom the world of the flesh was a dream and the world of the spirit the sole reality, that perpetuates his message and speaks to us today. That, and his master's sense of form—form not unlike in its breath and justness of proportion, in finish and interest of detail, to the cathedrals in which he played the organ.

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

POST-NOV.26

PLAYS BRAHMS AND BEETHOVEN

Boston Symphony Program Also Includes Piece by Honegger

CONCERT SOLOIST IS FRIEDA HEMPEL

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, in Symphony hall last night, was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 9 (first three movements); Mozart, Arias: "Deh vie ni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Martern aller Arten" from "Die Entfuehrung aus dem Serail" (Frieda Hempel); Honegger, "Horatius Triumphant" (first time in America); Brahms, Academic Festival.

Of late there has been a curious tendency in some quarters to underrate this symphony. The finale in spite of a few sublime pages is called barbarous by reason of its exactions on solo singers and chorus. The other movements have not escaped adverse criticism, although the Scherzo is recognized as, on the whole, worthy of enthusiastic admiration. In the Adagio, even the lovely and haunting second theme, is dismissed as "incongruous." Would that there were more incongruities of this nature!

Thus the pendulum swings. One decade this symphony is the greatest achievement in music, a work of plenary inspiration. In another decade it is amorphous, with a finale that has no possible relation to what precedes, so difficult of performance that perfection is impossible, nor is the labor worth the straining and the pains.

We do not find the performance of the symphony without the finale sacrilegious. Better this, than to see the straining throats and bulging eyes of the singers and to hear their ululations. Mr. Monteux and the orchestra gave a most eloquent interpretation, one that would have convinced even the most irreverent of the younger school that this symphony for its expression of doubt and foreboding; its sinister hints and dramatic outbursts; its titanic rage; its wild revery interrupted for a time by pastoral pipings; its sustained, ineffable song that only Beethoven could have written, stands alone and unapproachable.

Honegger wrote his "Horatius" as a ballad, with stage setting, costumes and pantomimic action. Whether this ballet was performed, we have been unable to learn; probably not; for the performances of the music recorded were in concert halls. (The first at Geneva, Switzerland, in the fall of 1921.) Honegger took for his subject the Roman legend of the three Horatii and the three Curiatii; how Horatius having slain the three Albans found his sister Camilla bewailing the fate of the Curiatius to whom she was betrothed, whereupon he killed her; the end of a perfect day. The subject has interested operatic composers—from 1720 to 1830—and there have been ballets. Many of the librettos were based on Corneille's tragedy.

As Honegger is one of "the Six" (now "Five"), to the conservative, especially to those who are loath to welcome any contemporaneous music unless it is academically dull or conventionally sentimental, he must therefore be a terrible fellow, an Anarch, if not a son of Belial. The combat between the champions of the Romans and the Albans was not a milk-and-water affair. Honegger, pondering the legend, evidently took for his motto: "Treat 'em rough." Even if one does not like this music, it is not necessary to call the composer a poseur. He is terribly in earnest.

This "Horatius" is first of all, music for the theatre, nevertheless it does not lose wholly by transference to the concert hall. There are connected episodes which correspond to the action; Camilla and her betrothed; entrance of the combatants, the crowd, the combat, the triumph of Horatius; then the wail of Camilla and her murder. Honegger had a definite plan; he carried it out with no hesitation. There is nothing tentative, nothing experimental. His battle music is free from commonplaces, while it would be difficult to find a keener expression of anguish and dread than the first pages describing the parting of the lovers. An unusually interesting work, even when it is taken from its home, the theatre. An audacious work that to some will seem chaotic and cacophonous, but we cannot always be lulled to sleep by sweet strains on reverence old formulas. Better shrieking dissonances when they tell a story than platitudes, though they be launched with the fury of a thunderbolt; or sluggish streams of musical molasses.

The florid air from Mozart's "Entfuehrung" was written to display the vocal agility of Katherina Calvalieri. Mozart wrote to his father that he had sacrificed a little to her "nimble throat." It is said of her that she was an excellent musician, a woman of fascinating manners rather than beautiful in face or figure. Her throat shortened her life, for, as the story goes, she over-exerted herself and was obliged to leave the stage. She died eight years afterward, only 40 years old. Some once applauded singers of marked agility do not leave the stage, nor do they die young. Mme. Hempel had thus an opportunity to display her technical facility. How beautifully she sang the air from "Figaro," one of the loveliest airs in the operatic literature! Here was a shining example of what "bel canto" may mean: Exquisite tonal quality, a firm control of breath, significant phrasing, the emotional expression that is an irresistible appeal. The last phases of the preecding recitative sung as Mme. Hampel sang them prove that the pure art of song is not lost; that there are still singers worthy of Mozart's airs.

The fact that Brahms did not attend any university probably inspired him to take a cheerful view of university life, as voiced in his overture.

There will be no concerts this week. The program of Dec. 8 and 9 will commemorate the centennial of Cesar Franck (born Dec. 10, 1822). Symphony, symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and the symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsmen." Mme. Samaroff will play Schumann's concerto.

HERALD-NOV.26.

GERICKE BENEFIT

The program of the special Boston Symphony concert to be given by the orchestra under Mr. Monteux for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke (the former conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for 13 seasons) in Symphony hall on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, will include the arrangement for orchestra by Mr. Gericke of the piano waltzes of Brahms, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel." The remaining numbers also figured prominently on Mr. Gericke's programs and the cirmustances of their composition are connected with the musical life of Vienna, the city which has claimed the larger part of his career—Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Following the first New York trip of the Boston Symphony orchestra this week, the next concerts in Symphony Hall will take place Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 8 and 9. The program will pay homage to Cesar Franck, as this season is the centenary of his birth. Mr. Monteux will conduct Franck's symphony, also "Les Aeolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit." The soloist will be Olga Samaroff, who will play Schuman's concerto.

HERALD-NOV.26

Gericke Benefit Program

The program is announced for the special Boston Symphony concert which is to be given Dec 5, by the orchestra under Pierre Monteux for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, the former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for 13 years.

It will include the arrangement for orchestra by Mr Gericke of the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms, and Strauss' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel," which Gericke was first to make known to the Boston public. The remaining numbers also figured prominently in Mr Gericke's programs and the circumstances of their composition are connected with the musical life of Vienna, the city which has claimed the larger part of his career. These are Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week, as the orchestra will begin its New York season Thursday and Saturday. For Dec 8 and 9, the concerts nearest the 100th anniversary of the birth of Cesar Franck, Mr Monteux has arranged a commemorative program, all from Franck's works, except for the Schumann concerto, to be played by Mme Samaroff.

GLOBE-NOV.26

[31]

REPEATED at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening and received with as chilly bewilderment as on Friday afternoon, Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant" yet renewed upon sundry ears the fine emotions of discovery. Not to be heard as "absolute" music self-contained is the Parisian's piece. It is music to enrich and enhance miming, and is as much entitled to his background of imagined action as is Strauss, say, to his background for "Eulenspiegel" or "Quixote." It is courtesy, it is duty—the more imperative at a first performance—to give heed to what the music would affirm or imply. Mere railing distaste brings the listener nowhere—except deeper into the slough of narrow mindedness.

Agreed, then, that to many ears, the shrill, piercing, knife-like measures of Camilla farewelling her loved Curiatius, of Camilla imprecating her onw brother who Camilla [illegible] at bottom, their validity, their poignancy, are matter of emotional experience and imagination. There is a passion so possessing that fiercely it must find outlet; a foreboding so carking that only acrid word or tone may speak it; a frenzy of hate that [illegible] shriek or else eat away the heart within.

Of such was Camilla when she thus parted from her lover, when thus to the Roman heavens she cried her woe. With reason Honegger's writes for her music to rasp ears and nerves, yet music as it seemed to some, of questionless power and illusion upon the answering emotions. Moreover, this wire-drawn shrillness is the idiom of the younger moderns in the expression of high-pitched, searing passion. Before the winter is done we shall hear it again in Casella's "Alta Notte" and better understand. It is a new speech of music to be comprehended, felt, examined, tested—not mere rasping noise to be booted incontinent out of doors.

Jangling keys do move side by side, plane above plane, through Honegger's music of combat and murder. He flings chordal mass upon chordal mass. At no progression does he halt, if his will to delineate bids him use it. Yet hear how closely this music is knit strand into strand; how firmly rhythm binds it and gives it motion. Hear also how genuinely it is of the mimed action, with that directness and concentration, harsh as they now seem, which may be the lasting contribution of these young lions to the ways and means of music. May any hearer, if he will but lend his imagination to what the mere ear finds repellent, doubt the presence of the ominous crowd, the fury of the combat, the murder like the veil of the temple rent, the details of delineation that leap across the tonal background like lurid flashes cleaving a louring sky? Here goes music alike of intrinsic and of depicting force—and it was such music, all mass and might, streak and fury, that Honegger would make. He has his right to his purpose. By accomplishment he clarifies and justifies his will. H. T. P.

TRANS-NOV.27

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

Program Played in Splendid Spirit With Brilliant Effect.

After giving a rather dull and soggy rendition of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony at Parsons's Theater last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra played the rest of the program in splendid spirit and with brilliant effect. An audience that completely filled the Theater was present; the soloist, Edwin Nyiregyhazi, was loudly acclaimed and Mr. Monteux was recalled to the stage at the close of the concert.

It seems not at all unlikely that at this time of the year the Third Symphony of Beethoven may not have been very strenuously rehearsed by the orchestra. In any event last evening's performance, though it brought out some lovely tones, did not show a perfect putting together of the work—such as is expected in the Boston Orchestra's rendition of any of the standard symphonies. It may be said that Mr. Monteux does not worship at the Beethoven shrine. Many of the modern conductors do not. They play him, but their joy is in the others. Of the playing last evening it may be said that the best was done in the first movement and the finale was the least satisfactory of all—rough and ready being the words, perhaps, that best describe it.

Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" was lovely in tone, in imaginative quality, in expression. Everything was there; the soft splendor of light, the rippling of nearby waters, the gentle sighing breeze. And exquisite tone pervaded all, suggested all, accomplished all.

Erwin Nyiregyhazi played with the orchestra the Liszt Concerto in A major, No. 2 and his work was followed with the closest attention and was thoroughly enjoyed by the audience. The player is very young, a tall, slender boy with wonderful hands that he uses with tremendous power and that in the lighter passages suggest in their movement the perfect grace of the leading animal or the athlete as he is sometimes shown in the so-called "slow" motion pictures. The opening piano measures in this fearsome Concerto of Litszt's give ample opportunity for just this display of slow grace but soon the long facile hands are called upon for lightning motion in the staccato passages; then comes the lovely singing of the 'cello with the piano; then the building up of a tremendous climax that makes way for some Chopin-like passages in the solo instrument that serve that ev[illegible] make one wis[illegible] young player's quality in [illegible] as well as Liszt. Mr. Monteux provided a splendid background of tone and the whole rendition was extremely interesting and finely effective.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

As the final number the Glazounov symphonic poem "Stenka Razin" was offered—colorful, brilliant, full of action, singing as with the sound of many voices at times, vivid in the expression of motion, tremendous in its climax. And superbly played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Parsons' again on the evening of January 8; Jean Bedetti, 'cello, will be the soloist.

HAMP-COURT-NOV. 28

Boston Orchestra Opens Season at Academy

Pierre Monteux's programme, opening the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-fifth Brooklyn season, at the Academy of Music last night, included Brahm's E minor symphony, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," and Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Frieda Hempel, soprano, was soloist, her numbers being the "Deh Vieni" aria from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and the "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" recitative, and "Leise, leise" aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz." The concert, first of the Boston's annual Brooklyn series of five, was held as heretofore under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, and attracted a very large attendance.

Appreciation is due Mr. Monteux for bringing to a Brooklyn audience the [illegible] so frequently heard E minor of Brahms (the symphonies in C minor and D major figuring more [illegible]ntly in the programme offerings [illegible] orchestras hereabouts), and [illegible]e for the finely sincere ex[illegible] the score received under his [illegible] An ardent student of the [illegible]es of Sophocles at the time he composed this symphony, Brahms (past the age of fifty) has by some commentators been [illegible] with having given voice to [illegible] melancholy of ancient tragedy, [illegible] musical pages. Max Kalbeck, [illegible] 2,138-page "Life of Brahms" [illegible] marvel of patient autobiographi[illegible] production, even sees the subject [illegible] Death in Brahms' finals, support[illegible] vision with a relevant quo[illegible] from a chorus in Sophocles' [illegible]pus Coloneus." But Lawrence [illegible]an, pre-eminent present-day [illegible]ican music commentator, gently [illegible]rmly upsets this grave inter[illegible]ion. "With due respect to [illegible] Kalbeck," writes Mr. Gilman, [illegible] exhibit the E minor Symphony [illegible] an exercise in pessimism is to [illegible]w it in a singularly misleading [illegible]t. Much of the first movement [illegible]nds to-day frankly cheerful, bal[illegible]-like, healthily vigorous, with [illegible]thing that even borders on trag[illegible]y. In the lovely Andante, with its [illegible]untingly beutiful coda, there is [illegible] emotion more sombre than a rich romantic melancholy. The Scherzo [illegible] anything but tragic; and the finale, despite its passionate earnestness and its occasional solemnity, is remote from the mood of Sophoclean tragedy."

Mr. Gilman's understanding of this Brahms' symphony was reflected in the Boston performance of last evening.

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of Debussy's "Faun" was notable because of regard for the ever varying subtleties of nuance and sensitive instrumental shadings; also for an exquisitely refined though vital ennunciation of its elusive impressionistic charm.

Not so terrifying a composition as in former years, Strauss' "Zarathustra" can yet show off the virtuosic capabilities of an orchestra. Mr. Monteux and his players gave it a powerful performance, outlining its many details with superb vision. The vertiginous orchestral altitudes, abysmal depths, sepulchral silences and final mystical conclusion (in two tonalities) were all presented quite magnificently. As music of philosophical import, however, Strauss' score falls flat.

It has upon numerous occasions in these columns been stated that the inclusion of vocal numbers as solos on a programme of orchestral music detracts from the dignity of the latter. But this dignity was sustained, rather than detracted, by the inclusion of Mme. Hempel's one recitative and two arias. Mme. Hempel is probably unsurpassed to-day in any [illegible]her qualifications as concert singer. Her voice is most beautiful [illegible] even through all the registers of [illegible] range. Its flexibility and vibrancy [illegible] outstanding characteristics. Moreover, Mme. Hempel has ac[illegible] a well-nigh perfect vocal technique and a genuine musical in[illegible]ence which makes this tech[illegible] a means to an end rather than [illegible]d in itself. She received re[illegible] in number, but, of course, no [illegible] could be permitted at a symphony concert.

BROOKLYN-UNION-DEC 2

[illegible] the con[illegible] [illegible] pair of re[illegible] [illegible] concerts to be given in [illegible] Hall next Fri- day a[illegible] [illegible]urday evening. Pierre M[illegible] [illegible] place the great symphony of the Belgian composer at the head of the program, and also include two of his symphonic poems, "The Aeolidae" and "The Wild Huntsman." This memorial concert will celebrate the centennial of the birth of the great Belgian master (December 10, 1922). The soloist will be Olga Samaroff.

A MONDAY SYMPHONY

The program for the first of the five extra Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now announced. The soloist will be Ernest Schelling, who is famous both as virtuoso and composer. He will play Liszt's pianoforte concert in E flat. Pierre Monteux will also present Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" and Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

GERICKE BENEFIT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give a program at the concert in Symphony Hall next Tuesday evening for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, a former conductor, who is now in want in Austria.

Two symphonies will be played, the "Unfinished" of Schubert and the famous Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor.

AMER-DEC 2.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The program for the first of the five extra Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now announced. The soloist will be Ernest Schelling, who is famous both as virtuoso and composer in the old world and the new. He will play with the orchestra Litzt's pianoforte concert in E flat. Pierre Monteux will also present Brahm's First Symphony in C minor, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," and Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

TRAV. DEC. 2.

At its concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra will honor the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Franck by the playing of his Symphony, long "standard piece" in the repertory, and of his two characteristic, if less known tone-poems, "The Daughters of Æolus" or "The Winds" and "The Wild Huntsman." For intermezzo, as it were in another key, Mme. Samaroff, now restored to the concert hall, will play the piano-part in Schumann's Concerto.

For Tuesday evening in Symphony Hall Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will undertake a concert in aid of Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor who first set the standards of the band and through years worked toward them—now, in his seventy-eighth year, a poor man in Vienna. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities and month by month the fall of the crown toward nothingness has stripped him of income. A year ago Mr. Monteux, quick-minded, generous, free from every prejudice, purposed such a concert. Now he brings it to pass. An elder generation of Bostonians knew Mr. Gericke's work at first hand; a younger still enjoys the fruit of it. Both have reason to requite him. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Beethoven's Fifth; Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Mr. Gericke's arrangement of Waltzes Brahms wrote for piano fill the programme.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Monteux will play in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge the three movements from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, lately heard in Boston as almost a novel music, and Franck's tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman." The middle number of the programme is Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with Mme. Samaroff to take the solo part.

Monday evening, Dec. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, enlisting the full orchestra, led by Mr. Monteux and traversing these pieces: Brahms's Symphony in C minor; Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne"; Chabrier's Rhapsody, "España"; Liszt's Concerto in E-flat for piano and orchestra. Ernest Schelling, notable pianist long unheard in Boston, will be the "assisting artist." So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who care not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music.

TRANS-DEC 2

Gericke Benefit Concert

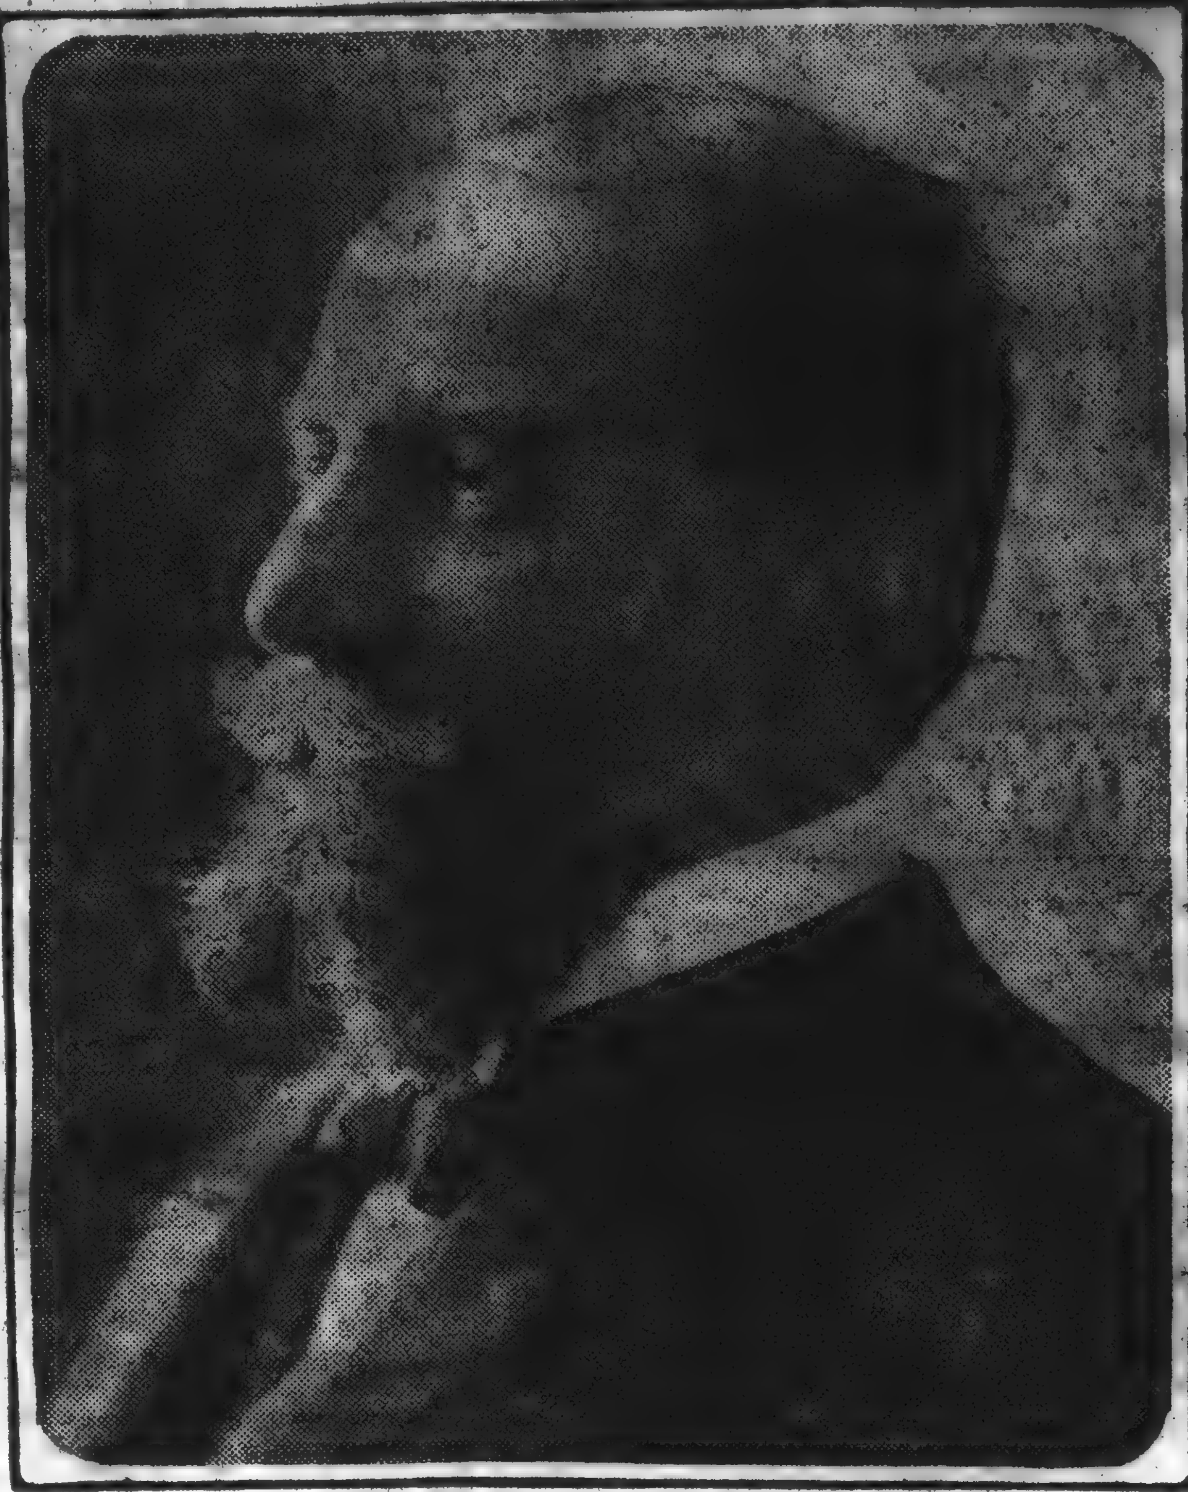
A factor in what is hoped will be the huge success of the Gericke Benefit concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening, Dec 5, at 8:15, in Symphony Hall, is the notable program which Pierre Monteux has made for the occasion. It will include Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor; also the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms which the former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arranged orchestra, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The gross receipts of this concert will be presented to the illustrious musician, to whom the eminence of the orchestra owes so much, and who is known to have been suddenly impoverished by the financial troubles in Austria, where he now resides. Contributions in excess of the price of tickets are being received.

GLOBE-DEC. 3.

SYM[illegible]
GERICKE, NOW WA[illegible]

Life Savings of Former Conductor Made Worthless by Fall of Austrian Money



WELHELM GERICKE

Why is the Boston Symphony Orchestra going to give a benefit concert Tuesday evening for Wilhelm Gericke, its conductor from 1884 to 1889, and again from 1898 to 1906? To answer that question one must realize two things: first, that it was Gericke who made the orchestra what it has been, musically speaking; and, secondly, that because of the present state of affairs in Vienna, for which he is not of course in any way personally responsible, Mr Gericke is today, at 78 and in poor health, poverty stricken.

Mr Gericke's achievement during his two terms as conductor has been authoritatively summarized in a letter written to him by the late Maj Higginson, founder and sustainer of the Symphony Orchestra, less than a year before his death, and after the present trustees had taken over the orchestra.

Under date of Dec 28, 1918, Maj Higginson wrote to Mr Gericke in part, as follows:

"Now that this war is finished I can write to you and express the hope that you all four are well and content. But first let me say this: When people speak of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of its beauty, its style, its perfection, they add, 'Gericke made the orchestra.' I have known and said this for many years past. Philip Hale repeated it at the Tavern Club dinner the other night. Dr Muck said it to me in Berlin in 1910 and has said it again. 'Gericke made the orchestra.'

"To me this means much, for do you know a better orchestra? Has any orchestra in existence played more concerts or more variety of music, or to more audiences? Has any orchestra done more to stimulate good music in any land, or given more peace and happiness? I know of none, and if this is so, Wilhelm Gericke has been a great benefactor to the men and women and children of our day."

Money of Almost No Value

The announcement that a fund was to be collected for Mr Gericke brought statements like that quoted above from nearly every writer on music in America. The leading New York reviewers in particular took lavish amounts of their valuable Sunday space to explain that Gericke made the orchestra and thereby put not merely Boston but all musical America in his debt.

It is not Mr Gericke's fault that he is poverty stricken today. To understand the circumstances back of this appeal for funds to aid him one must look a little into existing conditions in Vienna and all Central Europe.

The war among other disasters brought upon Austria and is now bringing upon Germany a complete and apparently almost irremediable collapse of the value of her currency. Gold and silver coins ceased to circulate, and paper money grew every day cheaper and more valueless. Hence all salaries and incomes of any sort payable in fixed sums of Austrian Kronen suffered automatic and drastic reductions. Suppose that your liberty bonds become worth [illegible] only about 35 cents per [illegible]

$300 For Car Ride

Like most thrifty men everywhere, Mr Gericke invested the savings of a lifetime in Government bonds and other "gilt-edge" securities. The exact amount does not matter. Had it represented wealth equivalent before the war to 1,000,000 American dollars, Gericke would still be poor today.

One street car fare in Vienna today costs what would before the war have meant $300. A cup of coffee costs $125. A woman has to pay $7500 to get her hair "undulated," as the Viennese hairdressers call it.

Street car conductors were paid $350,000 a year last year. University professors received $100,000 for the same period. Instructors in the universities were paid only a beggarly $9000 a year, about enough to keep an ordinary middle class household going for a single day—less than one dollar in real American money!

Meanwhile holders of Austrian stocks and bonds are receiving the usual dividends of from 3 to 7 percent on their original investment. Obviously, only a billionaire investor can make ends meet today. Capital is practically abolished, insofar as it represented the accumulations of the thrifty middle classes.

Those who own shares in more or less speculative industrial concerns are better off, because such concerns have been able to increase their nominal amount of capital stock so as to meet in part the decrease in the purchasing power of the kronen.

Those who invested in real estate are worst off of all, because by Government decree rents have been held at pre-war figures, which means that the working classes live practically rent free, while the property depreciates because repairs cannot be made.

Extravagant Better Off

Obviously, then, Mr Gericke's financial straits cannot be charged to improvidence on his part. If he is poor it is because in Austria today everyone in the professional and middle classes is poor. Only the profiteers and the manual laborers have found themselves relatively better off than before the war.

If Mr Gericke and his family had been extravagant instead of thrifty they would probably be better off today than they are. If his wife and daughters had dressed in furs, worn costly jewelry, purchased expensive rugs and furnishings for their home, collected objects of art, or done any one of these things with the money that was invested to safeguard them after Gericke's retirement from conducting, the Gerickes would have had in the hard times that the war brought to Vienna assets of more or less stable value which they could exchange for food and clothing.

The full details of their struggles during and since the war have not come to their friends in Boston. Miss Gericke wrote not long ago to a Boston woman who used to be a neighbor in Brookline that the family had had a hard time since 1916, mitigated chiefly by food, etc, sent them by American friends. She was trying to support the family by using her talent for painting in copying old masters in the Vienna museums, but [illegible]

[illegible] ity [illegible] two years past less absolute [illegible] of the first necessities of life in Vienna [illegible] before. Fuel of a sort and food of a sort are now almost always to be bought if one has money. Doles of both food and fuel are made to deserving cases by various charitable agencies, chief among them the Society of Friends or "Quaker relief."

Without aid from America the Gericke family probably cannot long avoid sinking from middle class standards of living to the hand-to-mouth existence of the Viennese proletariat, as so many thrifty Austrian families in the professional classes have already sunk, through no personal fault of their own.

Our debt to Gericke for the Symphony Orchestra is inescapable. Not merely this city, but the other American cities, which now boast of orchestras whose standards have in every case been influenced by the standard of the Boston Symphony in its best days, owe the man who made the Boston Symphony much more than the comparatively small amount of money needed to provide for him and his family can repay.

This debt is felt by the leading orchestral conductors in America, who have organised a committee to collect funds for Mr Gericke. Walter Damrosch is chairman of it. The original suggestion is said to have come from Mr Monteux, who with Messrs Damrosch, Stokowski and Stock has already made a generous personal contribution to the fund.

Tuesday night's Symphony concert has a program which should of itself attract a very large audience. It contains two of Maj Higginson's favorite symphonies, the Schubert "Unfinished" and Beethoven, Fifth, which were also favorites with Mr Gericke. Gericke's arrangement for orchestra of the Brahms waltzes and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" will also be played.

Mr Gericke's conducting of all this music will be remembered by many Bostonians. The orchestra ought to surpass itself in his honor.

Penfield Roberts.

GLOBE-DEC. 3

GERICKE BENEFIT

A factor in what is hoped will be the huge success of the Gericke benefit concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening, in Symphony Hall, is the notable program which Pierre Monteux has made for the occasion. It will include Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the fifth symphony of Beethoven, the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms, which Gericke arranged for orchestra, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Contributions in excess of the price of tickets are being received.

TRIBUTE TO FRANCK

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteaux will pay homage to Cesar Franck, who was born 100 years ago. The Franck symphony and two symphonic poems, "Les Folides" and "Le Chasseur," will be played. The soloist, Olga Samaroff, will be heard in Schumann's concerto in A minor.

SCHELLING SOLOIST AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given on December 11 at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux will present the first symphony of Brahms "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henry Rabaud and Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana." Mr. Schelling, one of the leading American pianists and composers, will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's first pianoforte concerto in E flat.

ADVTSR-Dec. 3

THE GERICKE PROGRAM

A factor in what is hoped will be the huge success of the Gericke benefit concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Tuesday evening at 8:15 in Symphony hall, is the program which Mr. Monteux has made. It will include Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and fifth symphony of Beethoven in C minor, piano waltzes of Brahms and Gericke arranged for orchestra, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The gross receipts of this concert will be presented to the illustrious musician to whom the eminence of the orchestra owes so much. He is known to have been suddenly impoverished by the financial troubles in Austria, where he now lives. Contributions in excess of the price of tickets are being received.

TRIBUTE TO FRANCK

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 8 and 9, Mr. Monteux will pay homage to the great Belgian composer Cesar Franck, born just 100 years ago (Dec. 10, 1822). The famous symphony of this master will head the program, and two of his symphonic poems will be played, "Les Eolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit." The [illegible] evening [illegible] one wish to hear the young player's quality in Chopin as well as Liszt. Mr. Monteux provided a splendid background of tone and the whole rendition was extremely interesting and finely effective.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

As the final number the Glazounov symphonic poem "Stenka Razin" was offered—colorful, brilliant, full of action, singing as with the sound of many voices at times, vivid in the expression of motion, tremendous in its climax. And superbly played.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play at Parsons' again on the evening of January 8: Jean Bedetti, 'cello, will be the soloist.

HATFD-COUR. N.V. 28

Boston Orchestra Opens Season at Academy

Pierre Monteux's programme, opening the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-fifth Brooklyn season, at the Academy of Music last night, included Brahm's E minor symphony, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," and Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Frieda Hempel, soprano, was soloist, her numbers being the "Deh Vieni" aria from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and the "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" recitative, and "Leise, leise" aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz." The concert, first of the Boston's annual Brooklyn series of five, was held as heretofore under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, and attracted a very large attendance.

Appreciation is due Mr. Monteux for bringing to a Brooklyn audience the not so frequently heard E minor of Brahms (the symphonies in C minor and D major figuring more constantly in the programme offerings of orchestras hereabouts), and likewise for the finely sincere exposition the score received under his baton. An ardent student of the tragedies of Sophocles at the time he composed this symphony, Brahms (past the age of fifty) has by some commentators been attributed with having given voice to the melancholy of ancient tragedy, in his musical pages. Max Kalbeck, whose 2,138-page "Life of Brahms" is a marvel of patient autobiographical production, even sees the subject of Death in Brahms' finals, supporting his vision with a relevant quotation from a chorus in Sophocles' Oedipus Coloneus." But Lawrence Gilman, pre-eminent present-day American music commentator, gently but firmly upsets this grave interpretation. "With due respect to Herr Kalbeck," writes Mr. Gilman, to exhibit the E minor Symphony as an exercise in pessimism is to show it in a singularly misleading light. Much of the first movement sounds to-day frankly cheerful, ballad-like, healthily vigorous, with nothing that even borders on tragedy. In the lovely Andante, with its hauntingly beutiful coda, there is no emotion more sombre than a rich romantic melancholy. The Scherzo is anything but tragic; and the finale, despite its passionate earnestness and its occasional solemnity, is remote from the mood of Sophoclean tragedy."

Mr. Gilman's understanding of this Brahms' symphony was reflected in the Boston performance of last evening.

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of Debussy's "Faun" was notable because of regard for the ever varying subtleties of nuance and sensitive instrumental shadings; also for an exquisitely refined though vital enunciation of its elusive impressionistic charm.

Not so terrifying a composition as in former years, Strauss' "Zarathusra" can yet show off the virtuosic capabilities of an orchestra. Mr. Monteux and his players gave it a powerful performance, outlining its many details with superb vision. The vertiginous orchestral altitudes, abysmal depths, sepulchral silences and final mystical conclusion (in two tonalities) were all presented quite magnificently. As music of philosophical import, however, Strauss' score falls flat.

It has upon numerous occasions in these columns been stated that the inclusion of vocal numbers as solos on a programme of orchestral music detracts from the dignity of the latter. But this dignity was sustained, rather than detracted, by the inclusion of Mme. Hempel's one recitative and two arias. Mme. Hempel is probably unsurpassed to-day in any of her qualifications as concert singer. Her voice is most beautiful and even through all the registers of its range. Its flexibility and vibrancy are outstanding characteristics. Moreover, Mme. Hempel has acquired a well-nigh perfect vocal technique and a genuine musical intelligence which makes this technique a means to an end rather than an end in itself. She received recalls in number, but, of course, no encores could be permitted at a symphony concert.

BROOKLYN-UNION-DEC. 2

[illegible] RAM

Ces[illegible] be the composer of hon[illegible] next pair of regular Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday [illegible] and Saturday evening. Pierre Monteux will place the great symphony of the Belgian composer at the head of the program, and also include two of his symphonic poems, "The Aeolidae" and "The Wild Huntsman." This memorial concert will celebrate the centennial of the birth of the great Belgian master (December 10, 1922). The soloist will be Olga Samaroff.

A MONDAY SYMPHONY

The program for the first of the five extra Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now announced. The soloist will be Ernest Schelling, who is famous both as virtuoso and composer. He will play Liszt's pianoforte concert in E flat. Pierre Monteux will also present Brahms' First Symphony in C minor, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne" and Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

GERICKE BENEFIT

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give a program at the concert in Symphony Hall next Tuesday evening for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, a former conductor, who is now in want in Austria.

Two symphonies will be played, the "Unfinished" of Schubert and the famous Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor.

AMER-DEC. 2.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The program for the first of the five extra Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now announced. The soloist will be Ernest Schelling, who is famous both as virtuoso and composer in the old world and the new. He will play with the orchestra Litzt's pianoforte concert in E flat. Pierre Monteux will also present Brahm's First Symphony in C minor, Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," and Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana."

TRAV. DEC. 2.

At its concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra will honor the hundredth anniversary of the birth of Franck by the playing of his Symphony, long "standard piece" in the repertory, and of his two characteristic, if less known tone-poems, "The Daughters of Æolus" or "The Winds" and "The Wild Huntsman." For intermezzo, as it were in another key, Mme. Samaroff, now restored to the concert hall, will play the piano-part in Schumann's Concerto.

For Tuesday evening in Symphony Hall Mr. Monteux and the orchestra will undertake a concert in aid of Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor who first set the standards of the band and through years worked toward them—now, in his seventy-eighth year, a poor man in Vienna. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities and month by month the fall of the crown toward nothingness has stripped him of income. A year ago Mr. Monteux, quick-minded, generous, free from every prejudice, purposed such a concert. Now he brings it to pass. An elder generation of Bostonians knew Mr. Gericke's work at first hand; a younger still enjoys the fruit of it. Both have reason to requite him. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony; Beethoven's Fifth; Strauss's "Til Eulenspiegel" and Mr. Gericke's arrangement of Waltzes Brahms wrote for piano fill the programme.

On Thursday evening, the Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Monteux will play in Sanders Theatre at Cambridge the three movements from Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, lately heard in Boston as almost a novel music, and Franck's tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman." The middle number of the programme is Schumann's Concerto for Piano and Orchestra with Mme. Samaroff to take the solo part.

Monday evening, Dec. 11, in Symphony Hall, the first of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, enlisting the full orchestra, led by Mr. Monteux and traversing these pieces: Brahms's Symphony in C minor; Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne"; Chabrier's Rhapsody, "España"; Liszt's Concerto in E-flat for piano and orchestra. Ernest Schelling, notable pianist long unheard in Boston, will be the "assisting artist." So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who care not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music.

TRANS-DEC. 2

Gericke Benefit Concert

A factor in what is hoped will be the huge success of the Gericke Benefit concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening, Dec 5, at 8:15, in Symphony Hall, is the notable program which Pierre Monteux has made for the occasion. It will include Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor; also the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms which the former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arranged orchestra, and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The gross receipts of this concert will be presented to the illustrious musician, to whom the eminence of the orchestra owes so much, and who is known to have been suddenly impoverished by the financial troubles in Austria, where he now resides. Contributions in excess the price of tickets are being received.

GLOBE-DEC. 3.

SYMPHONY CONC[illegible] GERICKE, NOW WAR-POOR

Globe 12/3

Life Savings of Former Conductor Made Worthless by Fall of Austrian Money

WELHELM GERICKE

Why is the Boston Symphony Orchestra going to give a benefit concert Tuesday evening for Wilhelm Gericke, its conductor from 1884 to 1889, and again from 1898 to 1906? To answer that question one must realize two things: first, that it was Gericke who made the orchestra what it has been, musically speaking; and, secondly, that because of the present state of affairs in Vienna, for which he is not of course in any way personally responsible, Mr Gericke is today, at 78 and in poor health, poverty stricken.

Mr Gericke's achievement during his two terms as conductor has been authoritatively summarized in a letter written to him by the late Maj Higginson, founder and sustainer of the Symphony Orchestra, less than a year before his death, and after the present trustees had taken over the orchestra.

Under date of Dec 28, 1918, Maj Higginson wrote to Mr Gericke in part, as follows:

"Now that this war is finished I can write to you and express the hope that you all four are well and content. But first let me say this: When people speak of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and of its beauty, its style, its perfection, they add, 'Gericke made the orchestra.' I have known and said this for many years past. Philip Hale repeated it at the Tavern Club dinner the other night. Dr Muck said it to me in Berlin in 1910 and has said it again. 'Gericke made the orchestra.'

"To me this means much, for do you know a better orchestra? Has any orchestra in existence played more concerts or more variety of music, or to more audiences? Has any orchestra done more to stimulate good music in any land, or given more peace and happiness? I know of none, and if this is so, Wilhelm Gericke has been a great benefactor to the men and women and children of our day."

Money of Almost No Value

The announcement that a fund was to be collected for Mr Gericke brought statements like that quoted above from nearly every writer on music in America. The leading New York reviewers in particular took lavish amounts of their valuable Sunday space to explain that Gericke made the orchestra and thereby put not merely Boston but all musical America in his debt.

It is not Mr Gericke's fault that he is poverty stricken today. To understand the circumstances back of this appeal for funds to aid him one must look a little into existing conditions in Vienna and all Central Europe.

The war among other disasters brought upon Austria and is now bringing upon Germany a complete and apparently almost irremediable collapse of the value of her currency. Gold and silver coins ceased to circulate, and paper money grew every day cheaper and more valueless. Hence all salaries and incomes of any sort payable in fixed sums of Austrian Kronen suffered automatic and drastic reductions. Suppose that your liberty bonds become worth all told only about 50 cents per $100 and you will see what has happened to gilt-edged Austrian securities as for [illegible]

$300 For Car Ride

Like most thrifty men everywhere, Mr Gericke invested the savings of a lifetime in Government bonds and other "gilt-edge" securities. The exact amount does not matter. Had it represented wealth equivalent before the war to 1,000,000 American dollars, Gericke would still be poor today.

One street car fare in Vienna today costs what would before the war have meant $300. A cup of coffee costs $125. A woman has to pay $7500 to get her hair "undulated," as the Vienese hairdressers call it.

Street car conductors were paid $350,000 a year last year. University professors received $100,000 for the same period. Instructors in the universities were paid only a beggarly $9000 a year, about enough to keep an ordinary middle class household going for a single day—less than one dollar in real American money!

Meanwhile holders of Austrian stocks and bonds are receiving the usual dividends off from 3 to 7 percent on their original investment. Obviously, only a billionaire investor can make ends meet today. Capital is practically abolished, insofar as it represented the accumulations of the thrifty middle classes.

Those who own shares in more or less speculative industrial concerns are better off, because such concerns have been able to increase their nominal amount of capital stock so as to meet in part the decrease in the purchasing power of the kronen.

Those who invested in real estate are worst off of all, because by Government decree rents have been held at pre-war figures, which means that the working classes live practically rent free, while the property depreciates because repairs cannot be made.

Extravagant Better Off

Obviously, then, Mr Gericke's financial straits cannot be charged to improvidence on his part. If he is poor it is because in Austria today everyone in the professional and middle classes is poor. Only the profiteers and the manual laborers have found themselves relatively better off than before the war.

If Mr Gericke and his family had been extravagant instead of thrifty they would probably be better off today than they are. If his wife and daughters had dressed in furs, worn costly jewelry, purchased expensive rugs and furnishings for their home, collected objects of art, or done any one of these things with the money that was invested to safeguard them after Gericke's retirement from conducting, the Gerickes would have had in the hard times that the war brought to Vienna assets of more or less stable value which they could exchange for food and clothing.

The full details of their struggles during and since the war have not come to their friends in Boston. Miss Gericke wrote not long ago to a Boston woman who used to be a neighbor in Brookline that the family had had a hard time since 1916, mitigated chiefly by food, etc, sent them by American friends. She was trying to support the family by using her talent for painting in copying old masters in the Vienna museums, but found it impossible to make ends meet. Her health had suffered as a result of nursing during the [illegible]

[illegible]

[illegible] stance can be explained as a [illegible] to the fact that owing largely to American and British charity there has been for two years past less absolute shortage of the first necessities of life in Vienna than before. Fuel of a sort and food of a sort are now almost always to be bought if one has money. Doles of both food and fuel are made to deserving cases by various charitable agencies, chief among them the Society of Friends or "Quaker relief."

Without aid from America the Gericke family probably cannot long avoid sinking from middle class standards of living to the hand-to-mouth existence of the Viennese proletariat, as so many thrifty Austrian families in the professional classes have already sunk, through no personal fault of their own.

Our debt to Gericke for the Symphony Orchestra is inescapable. Not merely this city, but the other American cities, which now boast of orchestras whose standards have in every case been influenced by the standard of the Boston Symphony in its best days, owe the man who made the Boston Symphony much more than the comparatively small amount of money needed to provide for him and his family can repay.

This debt is felt by the leading orchestral conductors in America, who have organised a committee to collect funds for Mr Gericke. Walter Damrosch is chairman of it. The original suggestion is said to have come from Mr Monteux, who with Messrs Damrosch, Stokowski and Stock has already made a generous personal contribution to the fund.

Tuesday night's Symphony concert has a program which should of itself attract a very large audience. It contains two of Maj Higginson's favorite symphonies, the Schubert "Unfinished" and Beethoven Fifth, which were also favorites with Mr Gericke. Gericke's arrangement for orchestra of the Brahms waltzes and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" will also be played.

Mr Gericke's conducting of all this music will be remembered by many Bostonians. The orchestra ought to surpass itself in his honor.

Penfield Roberts.

GLOBE-DEC. 3

GERICKE BENEFIT

A factor in what is hoped will be the huge success of the Gericke benefit concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening, in Symphony Hall, is the notable program which Pierre Monteux has made for the occasion. It will include Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the fifth symphony of Beethoven, the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms, which Gericke arranged for orchestra, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Contributions in excess of the price of tickets are being received.

TRIBUTE TO FRANCK

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Pierre Monteaux will pay homage to Cesar Franck, who was born 100 years ago. The Franck symphony and two symphonic poems, "Les Folides" and "Le Chasseur," will be played. The soloist, Olga Samaroff, will be heard in Schumann's concerto in A minor.

SCHELLING SOLOIST AT MONDAY SYMPHONY

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given on December 11 at Symphony Hall. Pierre Monteux will present the first symphony of Brahms "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henry Rabaud and Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana." Mr. Schelling, one of the leading American pianists and composers, will appear with the orchestra in Liszt's first pianoforte concerto in E flat.

ADVTSR-Dec. 3.

THE GERICKE PROGRAM

A factor in what is hoped will be the huge success of the Gericke benefit concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra next Tuesday evening at 8:15 in Symphony hall, is the program which Mr. Monteux has made. It will include Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony and fifth symphony of Beethoven in C minor, piano waltzes of Brahms and Gericke arranged for orchestra, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." The gross receipts of this concert will be presented to the illustrious musician to whom the eminence of the orchestra owes so much. He is known to have been suddenly impoverished by the financial troubles in Austria, where he now lives. Contributions in excess of the price of tickets are being received.

TRIBUTE TO FRANCK

At the Boston Symphony concerts in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 8 and 9, Mr. Monteux will pay homage to the great Belgian composer Cesar Franck, born just 100 years ago (Dec. 10, 1822). The famous symphony of this master will head the program, and two of his symphonic poems will be played, "Les Eolides and "Le Chasseur Maudit. The soloist at this concert will be Mme. Samaroff, who will play Schumann's Concerto.

HERALD-DEC. 3.

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Dec. 11 at Symphony hall.

The program will include the first symphony of Brahms; "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, the previous conductor of the orchestra; Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana," which utilizes the dance rhythms and songs of Spain in one of the most highly brilliant orchestral scores ever written. Mr. Schelling will play Liszt's first concerto in E flat. A few days still remain of the season sale of [illegible] for the five [illegible]

HERALD-DEC. 3.

William Gericke

The smallest payment that music lovers can make Wilhelm Gericke, the former conductor, and from the musical standpoint the real founder of the greatness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to attend and to subscribe as liberally as possible to the funds of the benefit concert which will be given for Mr. Gericke next Tuesday night in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Gericke, who was born in 1845, now lives in retirement and practical destitution near Vienna, such small fortune as he may have had having been totally depleted by the war, and his physical condition none of the best. He followed Mr. George Henschel, who conducted the first concerts of the Boston Symphony in 1883-84, in the fall of the later year.

Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1884 to 1889, and again, for a second term, from 1898 to 1906. It was his labors and his remarkably fine ear for orchestral tone which gave the Boston Symphony its standing and reputation among the greatest orchestras of the world. There was probably no orchestra equal to it in technical excellence and tonal quality—certain there was none superior to it—when Dr. Muck succeeded Mr. Gericke in 1906. Under Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler the orchestra lost somewhat in these respects. It is being rapidly brought back to its former status by Mr. Monteux.

There have been more brilliant conductors than Mr. Gericke, as witness Muck and Nikisch. There have been much better programme makers of late years—Fiedler, Rabaud and Monteux. But no leader in Symphony Hall brought a higher conscience or a more expert knowledge of the capacities of instruments and ability for sheer dogged labor that brought results than Gericke. He had an exquisitely fine ear. He worked with a passionate enthusiasm for his ends, when the orchestra was struggling upward and building step by step the reputation which was to encircle the world and make Boston famous wherever music was known.

He came to America, too, in days when great orchestral literature was only beginning to be appreciated. He labored for musical righteousness, and if he looked somewhat askance at the moderns, gave unforgettable performances of great works of the classic period. Today the musical public reaps the benefits of Mr. Gericke's labors. Without them it is difficult to imagine the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the place it has taken.

Everyone who realizes what it means to have such a symphony orchestra in Boston should feel it a privilege to subscribe to this concert and the fund it solicits.

The Gericke Programme

A factor in what is hoped will be the huge success of the Gericke Benefit Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, at 8:15 in Symphony Hall, is the notable programme which Pierre Monteux has made for the occasion. It will include Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor; also the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms, which the former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arranged for orchestra, and Richard Straus' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The gross receipts of this concert will be presented to the illustrious musician, to whom the eminence of the orchestra owes so much, and who is known to have been suddenly impoverished by the financial troubles in Austria, where he now resides. Contributions in excess of the price of tickets are being received.

[illegible] Monday Symphony

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given on Dec. 11 at Symphony Hall.

The First Symphony of Brahms will open the concert. It will be followed by "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, the previous conductor of the orchestra. The closing number will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana," which utilizes the dance rhythms and songs of Spain in one of the most highly brilliant orchestral scores ever written.

Mr. Schelling will play Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat.

Franck Programme by Boston Symphony

At the next regular pair of Boston Symphony Concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 8 and 9, Pierre Monteux will pay homage to the great Belgian composer, Cesar Franck, who was born 100 years ago (Dec. 10, 1822). The famous symphony of this master will head the programme, and two of his symphonic poems will also be played—"Les Eolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit." The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who will play with the orchestra Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

POST-DEC. 3.

Boston Symphony on Dec. 12

With Olga Samaroff, pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in Providence a week from next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Miss Samaroff will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this occasion a programme which should make it a repetition of the success of the opening concert. The great symphony in E-flat major of Mozart will be the opening number. A new score of interest will be played, the Fantasia by Vaughan Williams on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis, written for a double-stringed orchestra. Vaughan Williams, by virtue of this and other scores, is looked upon as probably the greatest English composer living. His London Symphony, played by the orchestra in Boston last year, and the Fantasia, played this year for the first time, disclose remarkable beauty and inspiration.

The closing number will be the symphonic poem of Cesar Franck, "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), which in a measure will pay tribute to the genius of the great Belgian master, the centennial of whose birth is being celebrated this season. Mr. Monteux is going to give during the coming week in Boston a Franck programme. "Le Chasseur Maudit" is considered one of the most rousing and brilliant of Franck's scores employing the hunting horns in a stirring manner.

* * *

PROV. JOURNAL-DEC 3.

AND lo! A strange new thing has happened in the land. On Thursday evening last, at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra were heard in New York for the first time this season. Their programme traversed Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony"; Vaughan Williams's "Variations for Two String Orchestras upon a Theme of Tallis"; Griffes's tone-pictures, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock"; Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin." On Saturday afternoon last, in the same room, followed the second concert of the Bostonians through the Fourth Symphony of Brahms; Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant" and Strauss's "Zarathustra." On both occasions befell the miracle. For the first times, as it seems, since the days of Dr. Muck, the abler reviewers for the newspapers praised the orchestra and praised the conductor. Nearly all of them agreed, for example, that in these days the "Fantastic Symphony" is a sterile music. Yet, for Mr. Krehbiel of The Tribune, "into it Mr. Monteux injected the vitalizing fluid of a sincere and graphic interpretation"; while "'The Scene in the Fields' in particular was made of a convincing and compelling beauty by the excellence of the performance." Mr. Taylor, for The World, was even better pleased. "It was a brilliant performance," he writes, "minutely thought out and given with the transcendent technical bravura and tonal limpidity of which the Boston Orchestra is capable when it is in the mood." Like-minded were The Evening Post and The Times; while in the ears of the latter journal the performance of the "Tallis Variations" was "truly fine."

Outside a reservation or two as to slow pace, Brahms at the hands of a French conductor gave hardly less pleasure to the assembled recorders. His Fourth Symphony, says The Herald, "received a clear, well-balanced and dignified reading from Mr. Monteux. There were a few sharp or heavy moments but on the whole it was a poetic interpretation." Hearing "Zarathustra," the same afternoon, loudly the reviewers clap their hands. "Mr. Monteux's players," The Times declares, "gave a great account of themselves in Honegger's piece and still greater in their superb performance of Strauss's tone-poem." The Herald waxes even warmer. It recalls "Zarathustra" as heard from Strauss himself a year ago, and finds it "safe to say" that "Mr. Monteux made the big score sound as well. The opening bars as others were played with fine sweep of tone." Now since 1917, many times as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has visited New York no such praises have been written of it and no such plaudits fallen to the valiant Monteux. They count also in Boston.

Horatius, Honegger, New York

The novel number of Saturday afternoon, as already said, was Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant," as new to New York as it had been a week ago to Boston. To the piece the reviewers give the major part of their articles on Sunday and not one denies the vivid impression it was sure to make. Says The Herald:

> The composition defies an adequate description after one hearing. It is bold and graphic music, not without conventional form, but with harmonic combinations, which resolve themselves, with rarely a suggestion of melody, into a maze of variegated colors, now shimmering as in a brilliant glow of light, or bursting into marvelous extravagant masses of harsh, powerful, discordant sounds, which baffle all proper description. The development of the score seems to far overleap the boundary set by the subject. The music should best be heard evidently with the stage-ballet as the composer originally purposed. The orchestra played the piece superbly. At the close the audience seemed at first dazed and gave but little applause, and then suddenly the applause became enthusiastic, but was perhaps meant for Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

The Times, according to custom, walks the middle way. Noting the Symphony of Brahms, "Honegger's Horatius,'" it proceeds, "is altogether a horse of another color; denial of harmony, of melody, even of motif—an orchestral 'daub,' indeed, but suggesting new ranges of delicacy or depth in tonal combinations as elusive and fleeting as the colors of molten gold over a cauldron of fusing metal. It is boldly done, irritating or fascinating, according as the listener's thought is on music of past or future. If Honegger has evolved a new language, he speaks it, or makes his orchestra speak it, fluently.

The Herald and Transcript are sufficiently characterized in triple combat. Still more plaintively recognizable is Horace's sister, Camilla. She weeps—two whining 'cellos for her eyes—over her enemy-lover. Horace draws his sword, and no greater thrusts ever sounded in full orchestra than when in Gilbert's phrase, he 'drew his snicker-snee.' For the startling sounds are indeed provocative of mirth, yet the fact remains that the composer has made his audience all but present at a killing."

This time The World sits in the seat of the smart scorner, saying:

> Only in the actual combat section did the music seem to bear any emotional relation to the plot, and even then the effect was achieved largely by the cumulative force of crescendo and acceleration. The piece as a whole is a series of deft juggling tricks with harmonics and whole tones, with here and there a suspicious trace of the "Rheingold" giants. Shrill, tremulous chromatics, harmonized in whole-toned fashion, delineated the triumph itself, and the subsequent lament of Camilla for her lover, together with her imprecations, were fabricated out of alternate snorings and neighings from the brass and musical meanderings up and down the treble in augmented steps on the part of the strings. Thus Camilla wept and cursed. Then Horatius, not without cause, ran her through with two or three peeping whistles, an election rattle, a rubble of drums telling how it was done. With a dull thud of the bass drum she fell to the ground (Camilla must have been a fat girl) and it was over. Mr. Monteux's muscular efforts were dutifuly applauded by the house. With the scenery, costumes and the choreography for which it was written the music might gain in appeal. As it was, standing alone, it was about as interesting as the gray voile curtain before which Isadora Duncan dances.

Gerickan Glories

To write these things of the Boston Orchestra, so restored to its whilom prestige, if not yet to its whilom audiences, in New York, is to recall and to anticipate the concert it will give to-morrow evening at home for the relief of Wilhelm Gericke, through thirteen seasons its conductor, now straitened in old age under the nearly universal penury of Vienna. The regaining of that prestige through the past five years has been slow and difficult. In measure it was so, because both the public and the reviewers in the capital of music in America, set high the standard for the orchestra. They insisted upon that height not only because Dr. Muck had maintained it beyond any of his immediate predecessors, but also because, long before, Mr. Gericke had determined it. "You have not an orchestra," the record makes him say, thirty-eight years ago this autumn on his first coming to Boston. "There are some musicians; but it is hardly an orchestra."

Through the next five years—by what care and pains, by what insistence and persistence!—Mr. Gericke made a "fortuitous aggregation" (as some wit called it) an expert and disciplined band. Then first New York knew it. Departing in 1889, he returned in 1898, to find his standards still prevailing. Through eight years more he deepened and refined them, adding a new and also lasting criterion: The repertory of the Boston Orchestra must be elastic and catholic. What Mr. Gericke builded, Dr. Muck perfected. What both conductors sought and maintained, Mr. Monteux, to the utmost of his abilities and against daunting odds, has striven to regain. Nearer than ever before is he now to the goal. Reconstituting, reschooling the orchestra, he naturally recalls Mr. Gericke as forerunner and exemplar. Hearing of his poverty—a poverty that denies almost the necessities of comfortable living—Mr. Monteux characteristically sets about relief. The concert of tomorrow is his eager doing. Two publics are in duty bound to seek it—the elder public still remembering Mr. Gericke; the younger public weekly applauding Mr. Monteux. In ninety-nine instances out of a hundred a concert for us auditors is question of pleasure. Here comes the hundredth when it becomes matter of obligation. Not noblesse oblige, but honor, memories, and reciprocal human warmth.

Incidents and Prospects

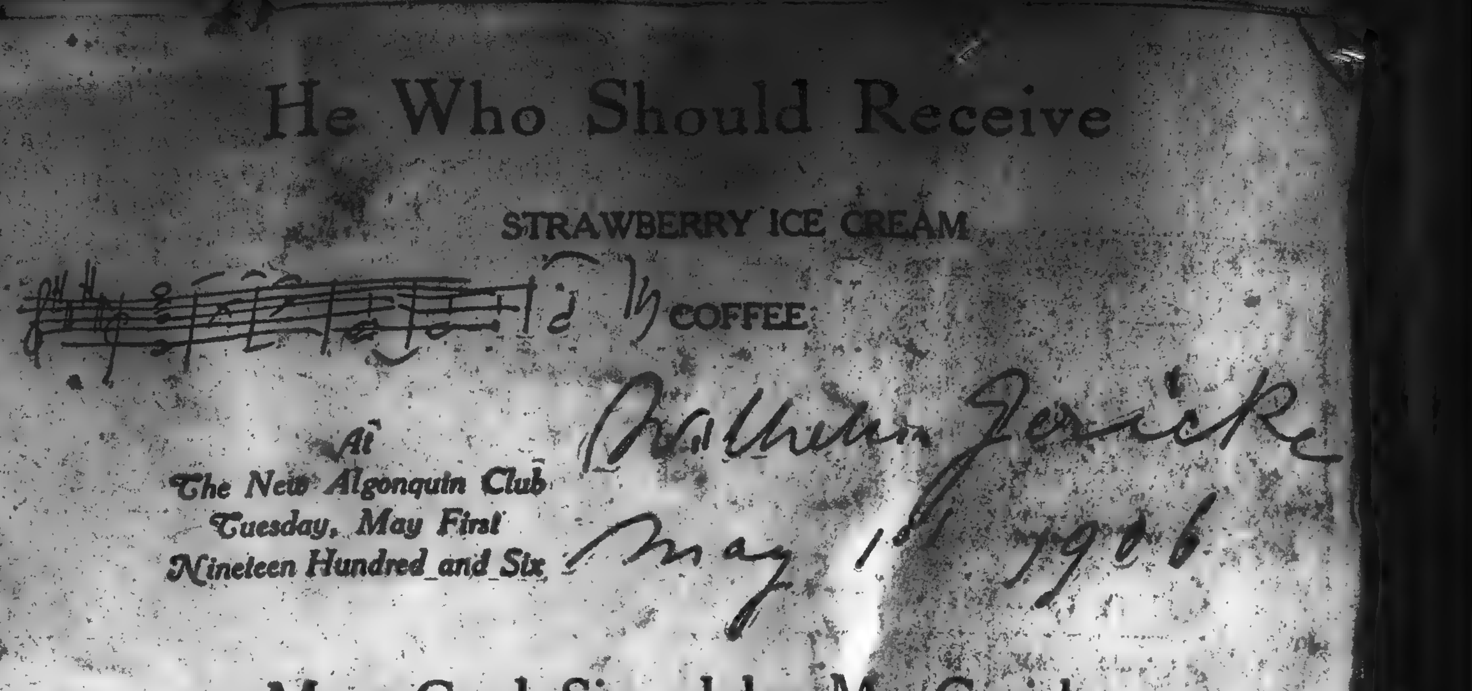
By report from Symphony Hall, somewhat less than $5000 is now in hand for aid and comfort to Mr. Gericke. The return, thus far, from tickets to the concert tomorrow approximates $3000. Private subscriptions have yielded also $1700. The larger the final sum the better.

The projected performances of Holst's Suite, "The Planets," anticipated above all others as the novel piece of the year, still await the arrival from London of the separate parts. The full score is on Mr. Monteux's table. Diligently he studies it, but cabled message upon cabled message will not hasten a dilatory publisher.

There is no truth in the gossip to be heard in this town and in New York as well about aggrieved subscribers to the Symphony Concerts whose ears were so outraged by "Horatius Triumphant" that they threatened withdrawal of their subscriptions. Of course there were protesting letters. There always are after the performance of any impressive piece in ultra-modern voice. Again, as always, the incurably conservative and incurious write them. It is the custom to receive them with a smile —and to take in hand another and very different piece by Honegger, a "Summer Pastoral."

H. T. P.

TRANS. DEC. 4.



He Who Should Receive

STRAWBERRY ICE CREAM

COFFEE

At
The New Algonquin Club
Tuesday, May First
Nineteen Hundred and Six

Wilhelm Gericke
May 1st 1906

Menu Card Signed by Mr. Gericke

From a Dinner of Farewell When He Left the Symphony Orchestra in 1906

Boston Symphony Cordially Greeted

The Boston Symphony orchestra, now fast regaining its prestige, which suffered during the war, appeared at Woolsey hall last evening under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

Mr. Monteux received a cordial greeting at his first appearance, a personal tribute, and one also to the visiting musicians. Some undoubtedly wished a different program, especially with respect to the symphony and the "Meistersinger" prelude, which almost every visiting orchestra thinks it necessary to play.

The "Symphonie Fantastique" also entitled by Berlioz, Episode in the Life of an Artist, was written while he was a student at the Paris Conservatory and his first attempt at program music. The music is bizarre and the composer displays his wonderful command of orchestral realism. He introduces an "edee fixe" which represents a young musician madly in love with an ideal woman and this motive appears in changing phases, according to the artist's gloomy experiences. This movement is filled with moods melancholy, ecstatic jealous and frenzied, made poignant and appealing by the orchestra last evening.

The second movement introduces a ball in which Berlioz's skill is shown in the symphonic treatment of a waltz rhythm, interrupted by the theme of the loved one. The haunting strains of the waltz were conveyed delightfully and its brilliancy revealed by finished eloquence on the part of the orchestra. The pastoral beauty of the third movement was impressive last evening. The peaceful repose of evening in the fields, with passages for oboe and horn played with extreme beauty, the rustic chant with the vision of the fair one, followed by darkening clouds. All these varied elements shone clearly through the orchestral structure. The impressive tonal picture of the fourth movement was given with all its gloomy and fateful effect. The march to the scaffold, with the chanting of the "Dies Irae," the tolling bells and the tramping feet of the crowd, were all pictured with tonal and technical emphasis, and the last movement, a continuation of the fourth, which portrays witches and demons in a wild orgy, was sonorous and highly colored.

The entire symphony was played with pulsing life and finished technique and an insight into the music itself while Mr. Monteux displayed a fine appreciation of the effects Berlioz aimed at. It was a performance in which the vivid instrumental effects and sonorous brilliancy shone resplendent. At its conclusion Mr. Monteux was recalled with enthusiasm.

Brahm's "Academic Overture" is breezy and jovial. It is built on themes taken from German student songs, many of them familiar to American colleges. Among these are "Wir hatten gebauet ein stattliches Haus;" "Der Landesvater;" the "Fox Song" and at the close "Gaudeamus igitur," given with sonorous force by the entire orchestra. It is serious music on popular, almost frivorous themes. The orchestra played with rich and vibrant tone and its fluent, energetic, hilarious style made a favorable impression, indicated by prolonged applause.

Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, played the Tchaikovsky concerto in D major. He has a fine, though not large tone, technical adequacy, sureness and brilliancy. It was a finely polished and graceful performance of the concerto, in which its many difficulties were not apparent. Mr. Burgin has a refined style and there was much beauty in tone, in all its shadings.

He was several times recalled and the audience expressed its approval in no uncertain manner.

The concert ended with a brilliant performance of the vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger." Its ingeniously interwoven motives stood out clearly, its rhythmic structure was defined and its instrumental eloquence made an imposing climax to a fine concert.

T. M. P.

N. HAVEN-JOURNAL-[illegible] 2

PAYS TRIBUTE TO GERICKE

Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert in Honor of Former Leader

PRESENTS SOME OF HIS OLD SCORES

It was a fine tribute to Wilhelm Gericke, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall last night for his benefit and in his honor. All honor also to the management, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra for the generous deed, for their recognition of the past services of a fellow musician who, by his untiring patience, his skill as a disciplinarian, his pure taste, his remarkable sense of emphasis and proportion in interpretation, gave this orchestra its international reputation.

It was at first proposed that the program should be identically the one arranged by Mr. Gericke for his first concert in Boston, Oct. 18, 1884: Beethoven, symphony No. 8; Vieuxtemps, concerto, A minor, for the violin (Leopold Lichtenberg); Bach-Bachrich, prelude, andante and gavotte, for strings (first time here); Volkmann, symphony No. 3, D minor (first time here.) This idea was abandoned.

A pleasing feature of the program last night was the including of waltzes written by Brahms for the piano (four hands), which Mr. Gericke scored in the course of his first visit to Boston for a small orchestra and for performance in a private house. When he brought out his arrangement at a concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 7, 1899, he added here and there parts for trumpets and trombones and kettle drums. Brahms wrote 16 of these waltzes. Mr. Gericke scored 14, omitting Nos. 7 and 16 and repeating No. 2 at the close.

Some may have wondered why one of Strauss's tone-poems was included in this program. It should be remembered that Mr. Gericke brought out Strauss's "From Italy," "Heldenleben," love scene from "Feuersnoth," "Burleske," "Don Quixote." It was characteristic of him that while he was not in sympathy with the Strauss of the later tone-poems, he nevertheless was anxious to give them a fitting interpretation. He believed that without regard to his personal likes or dislikes, new and important works of contemporaries should have a hearing. This he thought was his duty toward the public.

The other pieces on the program: Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Beethoven's fifth symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," are not particularly associated with Mr. Gericke. Strauss's Rondo was produced here by Mr. Paur.

The performance of the various compositions would have pleased Mr. Gericke, even if he had been a disinterested listener—and Mr. Gericke was a fastidious critic, not easily satisfied.

TRANS-DEC. 5

FOR WILHELM GERICKE

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO HIS AID

A Notable Concert for the Conductor Who Gave It Lasting Standards—Letters to and From Him Read—A Piece of His Music Replayed — Beethoven's Fifth Symphony at Height of Performance

THE concert given by Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall last evening, the proceeds of which are to relieve the present destitution of Wilhelm Gericke, not only served this worthy purpose but also paid deserved tribute to the former leader. For had not Mr. Gericke's need prompted this generous action the service that he rendered the Orchestra was of itself sufficient cause—had precedent permitted—for the holding of a concert in his honor. And last evening there was on the part of all concerned far less thought of an unfortunate man assisted than of a great man fittingly remembered. Already the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had eight conductors, and in the years to come many more will be called to lead it, yet, despite the service that each of these

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Dec. 11 at Symphony hall.

The program will include the first symphony of Brahms; "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, the previous conductor of the orchestra; Chabrier's "Rhapsody Espana," which utilizes the dance rhythms and songs of Spain in one of the most highly brilliant orchestral scores ever written. Mr. Schelling will play Liszt's first concerto in E flat. A few days still remain of the season sale of tickets for the five concerts.

HERALD-DEC.3.

William Gericke

The smallest payment that music lovers can make Wilhelm Gericke, the former conductor, and from the musical standpoint the real founder of the greatness of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is to attend and to subscribe as liberally as possible to the funds of the benefit concert which will be given for Mr. Gericke next Tuesday night in Symphony Hall.

Mr. Gericke, who was born in 1845, now lives in retirement and practical destitution near Vienna, such small fortune as he may have had having been totally depleted by the war, and his physical condition none of the best. He followed Mr. George Henschel, who conducted the first concerts of the Boston Symphony in 1883-84, in the fall of the later year.

Gericke was conductor of the Boston Symphony from 1884 to 1889, and again, for a second term, from 1898 to 1906. It was his labors and his remarkably fine ear for orchestral tone which gave the Boston Symphony its standing and reputation among the greatest orchestras of the world. There was probably no orchestra equal to it in technical excellence and tonal quality—certain there was none superior to it—when Dr. Muck succeeded Mr. Gericke in 1907. Under Dr. Muck and Mr. Fiedler the orchestra lost somewhat in these respects. It is being rapidly brought back to its former status by Mr. Monteux.

There have been more brilliant conductors than Mr. Gericke, as witness Muck and Nikisch. There have been much better programme makers of late years—Fiedler, Rabaud and Monteux. But no leader in Symphony Hall brought a higher conscience or a more expert knowledge of the capacities of instruments and ability for sheer dogged labor that brought results than Gericke. He had an exquisitely fine ear. He worked with a passionate enthusiasm for his ends, when the orchestra was struggling upward and building step by step the reputation which was to encircle the world and make Boston famous wherever music was known.

He came to America, too, in days when great orchestral literature was only beginning to be appreciated. He labored for musical righteousness, and if he looked somewhat askance at the moderns, gave unforgettable performances of great works of the classic period. Today the musical public reaps the benefits of Mr. Gericke's labors. Without them it is difficult to imagine the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the place it has taken.

Everyone who realizes what it means to have such a symphony orchestra in Boston should feel it a privilege to subscribe to this concert and the fund it solicits.

The Gericke Programme

A factor in what is hoped will be the huge success of the Gericke Benefit concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Tuesday evening, Dec. 5, at 8:15 in Symphony Hall, is the notable programme which Pierre Monteux has made for the occasion. It will include Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor; also the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms, which the former conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra arranged for orchestra, and Richard Straus' tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

The gross receipts of this concert will be presented to the illustrious musician, to whom the eminence of the orchestra owes so much, and who is known to have been suddenly impoverished by the financial troubles in Austria, where he now resides. Contributions in excess of the price of tickets are being received.

First Monday Symphony

Ernest Schelling will be the soloist at the first of the series of five Monday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will be given on Dec. 11 at Symphony Hall.

The First Symphony of Brahms will open the concert. It will be followed by "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, the previous conductor of the orchestra. The closing number will be Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana," which utilizes the dance rhythms and songs of Spain in one of the most highly brilliant orchestral scores ever written.

Mr. Schelling will play Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat.

Franck Programme by Boston Symphony

At the next regular pair of Boston Symphony Concerts, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 8 and 9, Pierre Monteux will pay homage to the great Belgian composer, Cesar Franck, who was born 100 years ago (Dec. 10, 1822). The famous symphony of this master will head the programme, and two of his symphonic poems will also be played—"Les Eolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit." The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who will play with the orchestra Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

POST-DEC.3.

Boston Symphony on Dec. 12

With Olga Samaroff, pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in Providence a week from next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Miss Samaroff will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this occasion a programme which should make it a repetition of the success of the opening concert. The great symphony in E-flat major of Mozart will be the opening number. A new score of interest will be played, the Fantasia by Vaughan Williams on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis, written for a double-stringed orchestra. Vaughan Williams, by virtue of this and other scores, is looked upon as probably the greatest English composer living. His London Symphony, played by the orchestra in Boston last year, and the Fantasia, played this year for the first time, disclose remarkable beauty and inspiration.

The closing number will be the symphonic poem of Cesar Franck, "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), which in a measure will pay tribute to the genius of the great Belgian master, the centennial of whose birth is being celebrated this season. Mr. Monteux is going to give during the coming week in Boston a Franck programme. "Le Chasseur Maudit" is considered one of the most rousing and brilliant of Franck's scores employing the hunting horns in a stirring manner.

* * *

PROV. JOURNAL DEC 3.

AND lo! A strange new thing has happened in the land. On Thursday evening last, at Carnegie Hall, Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra were heard in New York for the first time this season. Their programme traversed Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony"; Vaughan Williams's "Variations for Two String Orchestras upon a Theme of Tallis"; Griffes's tone-pictures, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock"; Glazunov's tone-poem, "Stenka Razin." On Saturday afternoon last, in the same room, followed the second concert of the Bostonians through the Fourth Symphony of Brahms; Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant" and Strauss's "Zarathustra." On both occasions befell the miracle. For the first times, as it seems, since the days of Dr. Muck, the abler reviewers for the newspapers praised the orchestra and praised the conductor. Nearly all of them agreed, for example, that in these days the "Fantastic Symphony" is a sterile music. Yet, for Mr. Krehbiel of The Tribune, "into it Mr. Monteux injected the vitalizing fluid of a sincere and graphic interpretation"; while " 'The Scene in the Fields' in particular was made of a convincing and compelling beauty by the excellence of the performance." Mr. Taylor, for The World, was even better pleased. "It was a brilliant performance,' he writes, "minutely thought out and given with the transcendent technical bravura and tonal limpidity of which the Boston Orchestra is capable when it is in the mood." Like-minded were The Evening Post and The Times; while in the ears of the latter journal the performance of the "Tallis Variations" was "truly fine."

Outside a reservation or two as to slow pace, Brahms at the hands of a French conductor gave hardly less pleasure to the assembled recorders. His Fourth Symphony, says The Herald, "received a clear, well-balanced and dignified reading from Mr. Monteux. There were a few sharp or heavy moments but on the whole it was a poetic interpretation." Hearing "Zarathustra," the same afternoon, loudly the reviewers clap their hands. "Mr. Monteux's players," The Times declares, "gave a great account of themselves in Honegger's piece and still greater in their superb performance of Strauss's tone-poem." The Herald waxes even warmer. It recalls "Zarathustra" as heard from Strauss himself a year ago, and finds it "safe to say" that "Mr. Monteux made the big score sound as well. The opening bars as others were played with fine sweep of tone." Now since 1917, many times as the Boston Symphony Orchestra has visited New York no such praises have been written of it and no such plaudits fallen to the valiant Monteux. They count also in Boston.

Horatius, Honegger, New York

The novel number of Saturday afternoon, as already said, was Honegger's "Horatius Triumphant," as new to New York as it had been a week ago to Boston. To the piece the reviewers give the major part of their articles on Sunday and not one denies the vivid impression it was sure to make. Says The Herald:

> The composition defies an adequate description after one hearing. It is bold and graphic music, not without conventional form, but with harmonic combinations, which resolve themselves, with rarely a suggestion of melody, into a maze of variegated colors, now shimmering as in a brilliant glow of light, or bursting into marvelous extravagant masses of harsh, powerful, discordant sounds, which baffle all proper description. The development of the score seems to far overleap the boundary set by the subject. The music should best be heard evidently with the stage-ballet as the composer originally purposed. The orchestra played the piece superbly. At the close the audience seemed at first dazed and gave but little applause, and then suddenly the applause became enthusiastic, but was perhaps meant for Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

The Times, according to custom, walks the middle way. Noting the Symphony of Brahms, "Honegger's Horatius,' " it proceeds, "is altogether a horse of another color; denial of harmony, of melody, even of motif—an orchestral 'daub,' indeed, but suggesting new ranges of delicacy or depth in tonal combinations as elusive and fleeting as the colors of molten gold over a cauldron of fusing metal. It is boldly done, irritating or fascinating, according as the listener's thought is on music of past or future. If Honegger has evolved a new language, he speaks it, or makes his orchestra speak it, fluently.

"The Horatii and Curatii are sufficiently characterized in triple combat. Still more plaintively recognizable is Horace's sister, Camilla. She weeps—two whining 'cellos for her eyes—over her enemy-lover Horace draws his sword, and no greater thrusts ever sounded in full orchestra than when in Gilbert's phrase, he 'drew his snicker-snee.' For the startling sounds are indeed provocative of mirth, yet the fact remains that the composer has made his audience all but present at a killing."

This time The World sits in the seat of the smart scorner, saying:

> Only in the actual combat section did the music seem to bear any emotional relation to the plot, and even then the effect was achieved largely by the cumulative force of crescendo and acceleration. The piece as a whole is a series of deft juggling tricks with harmonics and whole tones, with here and there a suspicious trace of the "Rheingold" giants. Shrill, tremulous chromatics, harmonized in whole-toned fashion, delineated the triumph itself, and the subsequent lament of Camilla for her lover, together with her imprecations, were fabricated out of alternate snorings and neighings from the brass and musical meanderings up and down the treble in augmented steps on the part of the strings. Thus Camilla wept and cursed. Then Horatius, not without cause, ran her through with two or three peeping whistles, an election rattle, a rubble of drums telling how it was done. With a dull thud of the bass drum she fell to the ground (Camilla must have been a fat girl) and it was over. Mr. Monteux's muscular efforts were dutifuly applauded by the house. With the scenery, costumes and the choreography for which it was written the music might gain in appeal. As it was, standing alone, it was about as interesting as the gray voile curtain before which Isadora Duncan dances.

Gerickan Glories

To write these things of the Boston Orchestra, so restored to its whilom prestige, if not yet to its whilom audiences, in New York, is to recall and to anticipate the concert it will give to-morrow evening at home for the relief of Wilhelm Gericke, through thirteen seasons its conductor, now straitened in old age under the nearly universal penury of Vienna. The regaining of that prestige through the past five years has been slow and difficult. In measure it was so, because both the public and the reviewers in the capital of music in America, set high the standard for the orchestra. They insisted upon that height not only because Dr. Muck had maintained it beyond any of his immediate predecessors, but also because, long before, Mr. Gericke had determined it. "You have not an orchestra," the record makes him say, thirty-eight years ago this autumn on his first coming to Boston. "There are some musicians; but it is hardly an orchestra."

Through the next five years—by what care and pains, by what insistence and persistence!—Mr. Gericke made a "fortuitous aggregation" (as some wit called it) an expert and disciplined band. Then first New York knew it. Departing in 1889, he returned in 1898, to find his standards still prevailing. Through eight years more he deepened and refined them, adding a new and also lasting criterion: The repertory of the Boston Orchestra must be elastic and catholic. What Mr. Gericke builded, Dr. Muck perfected. What both conductors sought and maintained, Mr. Monteux, to the utmost of his abilities and against daunting odds, has striven to regain. Nearer than ever before is he now to the goal. Reconstituting, reschooling the orchestra, he naturally recalls Mr. Gericke as forerunner and exemplar. Hearing of his poverty—a poverty that denies almost the necessities of comfortable living—Mr. Monteux characteristically sets about relief. The concert of tomorrow is his eager doing. Two publics are in duty bound to seek it—the elder public still remembering Mr. Gericke; the younger public weekly applauding Mr. Monteux. In ninety-nine instances out of a hundred a concert for us auditors is question of pleasure. Here comes the hundredth when it becomes matter of obligation. Not noblesse oblige, but honor, memories, and reciprocal human warmth.

Incidents and Prospects

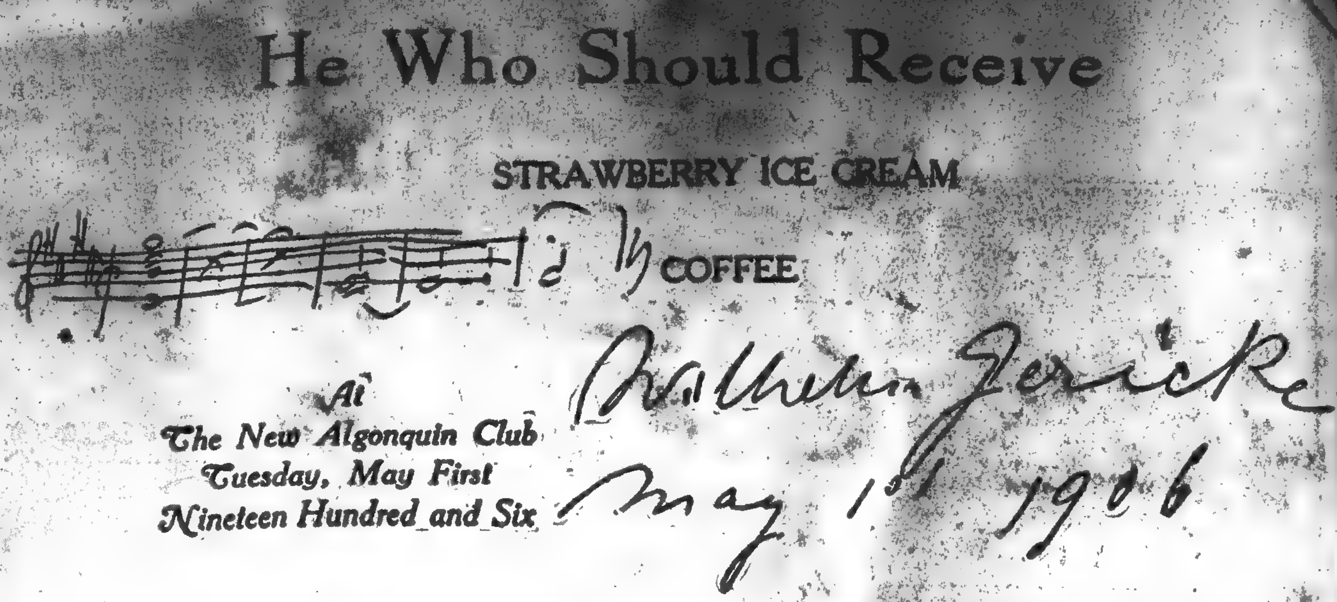
By report from Symphony Hall, somewhat less than $5000 is now in hand for aid and comfort to Mr. Gericke. The return, thus far, from tickets to the concert tomorrow approximates $3000. Private subscriptions have yielded also $1700. The larger the final sum the better.

The projected performances of Holst's Suite, "The Planets," anticipated above all others as the novel piece of the year, still await the arrival from London of the separate parts. The full score is on Mr. Monteux's table. Diligently he studies it, but cabled message upon cabled message will not hasten a dilatory publisher.

There is no truth in the gossip to be heard in this town and in New York as well about aggrieved subscribers to the Symphony Concerts whose ears were so outraged by "Horatius Triumphant" that they threatened withdrawal of their subscriptions. Of course there were protesting letters. There always are after the performance of any impressive piece in ultra-modern voice. Again, as always, the incurably conservative and incurious write them. It is the custom to receive them with a smile —and to take in hand another and very different piece by Honegger, a "Summer Pastoral."

H. T. P.

TRANS. DEC. 4.



He Who Should Receive

STRAWBERRY ICE CREAM

COFFEE

At
The New Algonquin Club
Tuesday, May First
Nineteen Hundred and Six

Wilhelm Gericke
May 1st 1906

Menu Card Signed by Mr. Gericke
From a Dinner of Farewell When He Left the Symphony Orchestra in 1906

Boston Symphony Cordially Greeted

The Boston Symphony orchestra, now fast regaining its prestige, which suffered during the war, appeared at Woolsey hall last evening under the auspices of the Yale School of Music.

Mr. Monteux received a cordial greeting at his first appearance, a personal tribute, and one also to the visiting musicians. Some undoubtedly wished a different program, especially with respect to the symphony and the "Meistersinger" prelude, which almost every visiting orchestra thinks it necessary to play.

The "Symphonie Fantastique" also entitled by Berlioz, Episode in the Life of an Artist, was written while he was a student at the Paris Conservatory and his first attempt at program music. The music is bizarre and the composer displays his wonderful command of orchestral realism. He introduces an "edee fixe" which represents a young musician madly in love with an ideal woman and this motive appears in changing phases, according to the artist's gloomy experiences. This movement is filled with moods melancholy, ecstatic jealous and frenzied, made poignant and appealing by the orchestra last evening.

The second movement introduces a ball in which Berlioz's skill is shown in the symphonic treatment of a waltz rhythm, interrupted by the theme of the loved one. The haunting strains of the waltz were conveyed delightfully and its brilliancy revealed by finished eloquence on the part of the orchestra. The pastoral beauty of the third movement was impressive last evening. The peaceful repose of evening in the fields, with passages for oboe and horn played with extreme beauty, the rustic chant with the vision of the fair one, followed by darkening clouds. All these varied elements shone clearly through the orchestral structure. The impressive tonal picture of the fourth movement was given with all its gloomy and fateful effect. The march to the scaffold, with the chanting of the "Dies Irae," the tolling bells and the tramping feet of the crowd, were all pictured with tonal and technical emphasis, and the last movement, a continuation of the fourth, which portrays witches and demons in a wild orgy, was sonorous and highly colored.

The entire symphony was played with pulsing life and finished technique and an insight into the music itself while Mr. Monteux displayed a fine appreciation of the effects Berlioz aimed at. It was a performance in which the vivid instrumental effects and sonorous brilliancy shone resplendent. At its conclusion Mr. Monteux was recalled with enthusiasm.

Brahm's "Academic Overture" is breezy and jovial. It is built on themes taken from German student songs, many of them familiar to American colleges. Among these are "Wir hatten gebauet ein stattliches Haus;" "Der Landesvater;" the "Fox Song" and at the close "Gaudeamus igitur," given with sonorous force by the entire orchestra. It is serious music on popular, almost frivolous themes. The orchestra played with rich and vibrant tone and its fluent, energetic, hilarious style made a favorable impression, indicated by prolonged applause.

Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra, played the Tchaikovsky concerto in D major. He has a fine, though not large tone, technical adequacy, sureness and brilliancy. It was a finely polished and graceful performance of the concerto, in which its many difficulties were not apparent. Mr. Burgin has a refined style and there was much beauty in tone, in all its shadings.

He was several times recalled and the audience expressed its approval in no uncertain manner.

The concert ended with a brilliant performance of the vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger." Its ingeniously interwoven motives stood out clearly, its rhythmic structure was defined and its instrumental eloquence made an imposing climax to a fine concert.

T. M. P.

N.HAVEN-JOURNAL-No2

PAYS TRIBUTE TO GERICKE

Symphony Orchestra Gives Concert in Honor of Former Leader

PRESENTS SOME OF HIS OLD SCORES

It was a fine tribute to Wilhelm Gericke, the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall last night for his benefit and in his honor. All honor also to the management, Mr. Monteux and the orchestra for the generous deed, for their recognition of the past services of a fellow musician who, by his untiring patience, his skill as a disciplinarian, his pure taste, his remarkable sense of emphasis and proportion in interpretation, gave this orchestra its international reputation.

It was at first proposed that the program should be identically the one arranged by Mr. Gericke for his first concert in Boston, Oct. 18, 1884: Beethoven, symphony No. 8; Vieuxtemps, concerto, A minor, for the violin (Leopold Lichtenberg); Bach-Bachrich, prelude, andante and gavotte, for strings (first time here); Volkmann, symphony No. 3, D minor (first time here.) This idea was abandoned.

A pleasing feature of the program last night was the including of waltzes written by Brahms for the piano (four hands), which Mr. Gericke scored in the course of his first visit to Boston for a small orchestra and for performance in a private house. When he brought out his arrangement at a concert of the Symphony Orchestra on Jan. 7, 1899, he added here and there parts for trumpets and trombones and kettle drums. Brahms wrote 16 of these waltzes. Mr. Gericke scored 14, omitting Nos. 7 and 16 and repeating No. 2 at the close.

Some may have wondered why one of Strauss's tone-poems was included in this program. It should be remembered that Mr. Gericke brought out Strauss's "From Italy," "Heldenleben," love scene from "Feuersnoth," "Burleske," "Don Quixote." It was characteristic of him that while he was not in sympathy with the Strauss of the later tone-poems, he nevertheless was anxious to give them a fitting interpretation. He believed that without regard to his personal likes or dislikes, new and important works of contemporaries should have a hearing. This he thought was his duty toward the public.

The other pieces on the program: Schubert's "Unfinished" symphony, Beethoven's fifth symphony and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," are not particularly associated with Mr. Gericke. Strauss's Rondo was produced here by Mr. Paur.

The performance of the various compositions would have pleased Mr. Gericke, even if he had been a disinterested listener—and Mr. Gericke was a fastidious critic, not easily satisfied.

TRANS-DEC.5

FOR WILHELM GERICKE

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA TO HIS AID

A Notable Concert for the Conductor Who Gave It Lasting Standards—Letters to and From Him Read—A Piece of His Music Replayed — Beethoven's Fifth Symphony at Height of Performance

THE concert given by Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall last evening, the proceeds of which are to relieve the present destitution of Wilhelm Gericke, not only served this worthy purpose but also paid deserved tribute to the former leader. For had not Mr. Gericke's need prompted this generous action the service that he rendered the Orchestra was of itself sufficient cause—had precedent permitted—for the holding of a concert in his honor. And last evening there was on the part of all concerned far less thought of an unfortunate man assisted than of a great man fittingly remembered. Already the Boston Symphony Orchestra has had eight conductors, and in the years to come many more will be called to lead it, and yet, despite the service that each of these men has rendered, or may render it, the name of Wilhelm Gericke will always oc-

He Who Set the Course

[34]

Wilhelm Gericke

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
~~1884~~—1889 1898—1906
(From a Photograph Dated 1890)

cupy a place apart. In a sense the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Mr. Gericke's orchestra. Though he was not its first conductor, it was he who made it an orchestra that stood apart from all other orchestras in this country and on a par with the finest in Europe; the qualities through which the orchestra became the wonder of the new world and the envy of the old were qualities with which Mr. Gericke had endowed it. If his standards were not original with him, they were at least unknown to this country before his coming to Boston and, as Mr. Aldrich has lately said, not only did Mr. Gericke's standards remain those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but they became the standards of every symphony orchestra in America.

In ordaining that Mr. Monteux should be the one to suggest, as well as to conduct a concert such as that of last evening, the hand of circumstance was guided by rare justice. If Mr. Gericke remade the orchestra when it was but imperfectly organized, Mr. Monteux rehabilitated it when it seemed threatened with total demoralization. And Mr. Monteux has gone about this task with as little outward demonstration as did his distinguished predecessor, yet, working as steadily as he has modestly, Mr. Monteux has finally brought the band to the state of technical perfection in which Mr. Gericke left it—a more nearly perfect state, so some make bold to think, than that in which he found it in the autumn of 1918.

Surely not since Mr. Gericke's time has there been a performance of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony comparable to that which began the concert of last evening. Though he found the rightful voice for the music of nearly every composer, Dr. Muck was for some reason baffled by that of Schubert, particularly in this symphonic fragment. Especially did the pellucid, the Elysian calm of the second movement evade him. After all, this music needs less to be interpreted than merely to be played as so much exquisitely moulded sound. Guided by the supersensitive ear of Wilhelm Gericke such goal might be reached, as it has again been attained through like fineness of perception in Mr. Monteux.

Thus suggested by direct comparison, not only in the playing of this Symphony but also in the performance of the other pieces of the programme, the memory of Mr. Gericke was further recalled by the inclusion of the concert of his transcription of Brahm's Waltzes, Opus 39. A composer in a modest way, Mr. Gericke was skilled in instrumentation, and he scored these waltzes soundly and at times imaginatively. If they proved a little tedious in the hearing last evening the fault was not that of the transcriber but of the composer, who permitted his engaging exercise to carry him too far. Whether played as piano-solo or by full symphony orchestra, half of these Waltzes make better entertainment than does the set as a whole.

From the first last evening orchestra and conductor were plainly on their mettle. One and all, no doubt, felt deeply the dual significance of the occasion. In the Unfinished Symphony, and also in Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," leader and band fairly outdid themselves. At each playing of a given piece Mr. Monteux betters his way with it, and last night "Till" sounded as it has not sounded here in many a day. Here was Strauss's music not only released but—if such a thing be possible—also glorified. Small wonder that at the end applause rang loud and long.

The close of the intermission, which followed the performance of Strauss's tone poem, brought to the orchestra's platform Judge Cabot, present head of the Board of Trustees. To the band itself in the tuning room he had read a letter in which Mr. Gericke expressed appreciation of the honor done him. This letter he now read to the audience, prefaced by the one which he, in his official capacity, had sent to Mr. Gericke. Both are herewith reproduced.

Boston, October 28, 1922
Mr. Wilhelm Gericke,
Beatrisegasse, 30
Vienna, Austria.
Dear Mr. Gericke:

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wish you to learn first from them that on Dec. 5th the Orchestra will give a benefit concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, in your honor. When they took up, in 1918, the responsibilities Major Higginson then laid down, they received from him not only a great opportunity for the artistic service of the public, but also the inheritance of a great tradition. In that tradition the memory of your work as the conductor who gave the Orchestra its preëminent place among organizations of its kind in America is cherished with a special feeling. It was constantly in the thought and on the lips of Major Higginson. It lives in his successors, who hold the same appreciation of all you did for the Orchestra that was held by him.

Conductors have come and gone since your years in Boston. It will doubtless interest you to know that the suggestion of the approaching concert had its origin with the present conductor, M. Monteux. The trustees heartily acceded to his plan, and look forward with the greatest pleasure to making you the beneficiary of the proceeds of the concert, in testimony to their remembrance of your unique contribution to the musical life of Boston and America.

With every good wish, believe me,
Always sincerely yours,
Frederick P. Cabot, President.

Vienna, November 20th, 1922.
To Frederick P. Cabot, Esq.,
President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Dear Sir:

Your letter of Oct. 28th has come to my hands, and I hasten to answer it in order to tell you how deeply touched I am by the way you recall the time I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It gives me great happiness to see that I, and what I did in my position as a conductor of the Orchestra, is not forgotten, in spite of the great changes which have come over the whole world, the work I did so many years ago is still in the minds of some Bostonians and of some members of the Boston Orchestra.

The way they are planning to express their remembrance of me, by doing me the unusual honor of giving a concert for my benefit, moves me beyond words; my gratitude to Mr. Monteux and the members of the Orchestra for their intention, as well as to you and the other Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing them to carry it out, is more than I can say.

Please will you for the present, accept my heartfelt thanks for the wonderfully kind letter you sent me, which, I must confess, made me almost as happy as the whole generous plan itself. And will you please for the present be the means of communicating to Mr. Monteux, as well as to the trustees and the members of the Orchestra, the expression of my most heartfelt emotion and thanks.

Respectfully yours,
Wilhelm Gericke.

Few might hear without emotion the simply eloquent words of Mr. Gerick least of all could Mr. Monteux and t players on the stage listen unmoved such recitation. And they could have mac no more fitting reply than the one that wa straightway given. Obviously stirred, co piece, which, [illegible] might so easily become mere routine, a performance that will long persist in the memories of those who heard it. Even when wholly devoid of suggestion of perfunctoriness, the giving of concerts is after all but the daily task of those whose trade is the making of music. But from time to time come moments of inspiration when, if the piece itself permit, musical performance

Companions and Profit

Memoranda from the Concert to Aid Mr. Gericke

PLAYING in the Symphony Orchestra at the concert last evening arranged by Mr. Monteux for the relief of Mr. Gericke were thirty-one musicians who in his days in Boston had worked with [illegible] are Messrs. W.Krafft, J. Hoffmann, F. Mahn, J. Mullaly, R. Kurth, S. Goldstein, H. Berger, B. Fiedler, F. Zahn, M. Kluge, J. Keller, C. Barth, K. Keller, M. Kunze, T. Seydel, G. Gerhardt, A. Brooke, G. Longy, C. Lenom, F. Muller, P. Mimart, A. Vannini, M. Hess, H. Lorbeer, F. Hain, L. Kloepfel, J. Mann, C. Hampe, A. Mausebach, L. Kenfield, C. Ludwig.

In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The proceeds from the concert, including contributions received by the trustees up to this time, amounts to $5,142.50.

TRANS-DEC. 6.

GERICKE BENEFIT CONCERT

$5142 Netted---Letter From Former Conductor Read

The proceeds of the benefit concert for Wilhelm Gericke, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last night in Symphony Hall, were $5142.50.

NOBLE WORKS PLAYED

The programme was certainly one to put men and leader on their mettle: Schubert's Unfinished Symphony opened the concert and Beethoven's Fifth closed it. It is not usual to hear such a pair of giant works of art on the same occasion. And, both were played last night as they have rarely been played, and as one scarcely suspected Mr. Monteux could play them.

The strings were ethereal, the woodwind and brass, save for a short spell in the Beethoven symphony, were all that one might hope for from mortals. From Schubert to Beethoven is a far cry from the point of view of emotional content and expression. But leader and men were equal to it, and one left the concert at the end of the Beethoven symphony feeling a curious sort of exultation that comes rarely to poor humans.

Between the two symphonies, Mr. Monteux had set Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a series of waltzes by Brahms (Opus 39), arranged for the piano by this very Mr. Gericke. The Strauss was played in the way that Mr. Monteux is capable of when he is at his best. The waltzes were brilliantly performed, and proved that Gericke knew the orchestra in more ways than one.

Mr. Gericke's Letter of Appreciation for Benefit Concert Idea

Following are the letters read by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its founder-conductor, at Symphony Hall last night:

"Boston, October 28, 1922.
"Mr. Wilhelm Gericke,
"Beatrisegasse, 30,
"Vienna, Austria.
Dear Mr. Gericke:

"The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wish you to learn first from them that on December 5th the orchestra will give a benefit concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, in your honor. When they took up in 1918 the responsibilities Major Higginson then laid down, they received from him not only a great opportunity for the artistic service of the public, but also the inheritance of a great tradition. In that tradition the memory of your work as the conductor who gave the orchestra its pre-eminent place among organizations of its kind in America is cherished with a special feeling. It was constantly in the thought and on the lips of Major Higginson. It lives in his successors, who hold the same appreciation of all you did for the orchestra that was held by him.

"Conductors have come and gone since your years in Boston. It will doubtless interest you to know that the suggestion of the approaching concert had its orgin with the present conductor, M. Monteux. The trustees heartily acceded to his plan, and look forward with the greatest pleasure to making you the beneficiary of the proceeds of the concert, in testimony to their remembrance of your unique contribution to the musical life of Boston and America.

"With every good wish, believe me,
"Always sincerely yours,
"FREDERICK P. CABOT,
"President."

Mr. Gericke's reply:

"Vienna, Nov. 20, 1922.
"To Frederick P. Cabot, Esq.,
"President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.
"Dear Sir:

"Your letter of Oct. 28th has come to my hands, and I hasten to answer it in order to tell you how deeply touched I am by the way you recall the time I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"It gave me great happiness to see that I, and what I did in my position as a conductor of the orchestra, is not forgotten, in spite of the great changes which have come over the whole world the work I did so many years ago is still in the minds of some Bostonians and of some members of the Boston orchestra.

"The way they are planning to ex- [illegible] tra, for their intention, [illegible] you and the other trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing them to carry it out, is more than I I can say.

"Please will you, for the present, accept my heartfelt thanks for the wonderfully kind letter you sent me, which, I must confess, made me almost as happy as the whole generous plan itself. And will you please for the present be the means of communicating to Mr. Monteaux as well as to the trustees and the members of the orchestra, the expression of my most heartfelt emotion and thanks.

"Respectfully yours,
"WILHELM GERICKE."

POST-DEC. 6.

SCHELLING THE SOLOIST

The opening Boston Symphony concert of the Monday evening series, to be given Monday at Symphony Hall, will be made additionally notable by the appearance as soloist of Ernest Schelling, who has not played in Boston for several seasons. Schelling is an American by birth and affiliation, although both as a piano virtuoso and as a composer he is known and admired throughout the musical world.

Ernest Schelling

This splendid artist, who has appeared on many memorable occasions as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in previous seasons, is to take the piano part on this occasion in Liszt's concerto in E flat.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius will be the principal number on the program for the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This latest work of the Finnish composer, introduced to Boston by Pierre Monteux last season, has aroused such interest as to warrant its repetition. The other numbers will be a Ballet Suite, music of the early French composer, Lully, arranged by Felix Mottl, "November Woods," a new score of the English composer, Arnold Bax, and Chadwick's Anniversary Over

---

AMER-DEC. 9.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

COMPOSERS AT HARVARD; SINGER IN BOSTON

Beethoven of the Ninth Symphony and Franck Following the Best Models—Mr. McCormack Departs—The Bettered Pieces He Now Assembles — Mr. Monteux's Next Novelties — The Burgin-Bedetti-Fox Trio—Mr. Rosing's Return

TO Cambridge last evening Mr. Monteux carried his courageous but well-considered performance of the first three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and in anticipation of the Franck Centenary Concerts of this afternoon and Saturday he commemorated that composer in Sanders Theatre with the tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman." Between these numbers Mme. Samaroff played the piano-concerto of Schumann, alco to receive immediate repetition in Boston. . . . A peculiar place is that held by the Ninth Symphony—a place shared hereabouts by Beethoven's own "Missa Solemnis" and the B minor Mass of Bach. Traditionally regarded as the crown of instrumental music, the Ninth Symphony is so seldom performed that its claim to such title is not too easily disputed. Even when the piece is actually heard there comes with it the feeling of a rite performed—of the lifting of the veil and the raising of the chalice. Now that Mr. Monteux has made bold to play independently those parts of the Symphony that have no need of chorus and solo singers, there is chance that in future the Ninth, in such curtailment, may be as frequently heard in Symphony Hall as any of its predecessors—a consummation devoutly to be desired. It is all very well to plead the ills of too oft-repeated performances of masterpieces, and to argue that some music should be reserved for occasions, kept from over-familiarity. But such ways are artistically false. No music is hallowed. No music deserves always to be reverenced and never to be criticised. This is fetichism, and a crime against æsthetic honesty.

With no will to disparage the remarkable qualities of the Ninth Symphony, it is not too much to assert that once the piece is brought into ready comparison with the other symphonies of Beethoven its superiority to them may no longer be taken for granted; it may even be questioned. Indisputably the piece does, in certain ways, mark a tremendous advance over anything that Beethoven had hitherto composed for orchestra. To commend first the least specifically musical aspect of the piece, the instrumentation is notably richer, more resourceful, more daring than that of any of Beethoven's other orchestral pieces. That the composer, with his growing deafness, should have continued to hear new sonorities, that under such hampering circumstance he should have written, not more cautiously but more and more unrestrainedly, will always remain one of the miracles of art.

During the last glorious decade of his

[34]

CKE

Gives of

OF ORES

Wilhelm on Symhall last this honor.
ent, Mr.
the genn of the cian who,
skill as a
, his reand pro-this ortation.
that the
the one his first 1884: Beet-euxtemps, olin (Leo-rich, preor strings symphony ere.) This program o'

of waltze piano (fou scored 1
to Boston perform-
When he at a conrchestra on and there mbones and 16 of these 14, omit-ating No. 2

why one of included in remembered t Strauss's leben," love
"Burleske," characteristic ot in sympa-later tone-anxious to retation. He rd to his per-w and imoraries should hought was le.
the program:
symphony,
mphony and gel," are not with Mr. Ger-was produced various com-ased Mr. Ger-a disinterested

e was a fassatisfied.

GERICKE
STRA TO HIS

Conductor Who ards—Letters to
—A Piece of His Beethoven's Fifth Performance

by Mr. Monteux ony Orchestra in last evening, the h are to relieve f Wilhelm Gericke, orthy purpose but ute to the former
Mr. Gericke's need action the service
Orchestra was of it-had precedent per-ng of a concert in vening there was on ned far less thought n assisted than of a emembered. Already Orchestra has had in the years to come alled to lead it, and ce that each of these r may render it, the ricke will always oc-

He Who Set the Course

Wilhelm Gericke
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra
884—1889
1898—1906
(From a Photograph Dated 1890)

cupy a place apart. In a sense the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Mr. Gericke's orchestra. Though he was not its first conductor, it was he who made it an orchestra that stood apart from all other orchestras in this country and on a par with the finest in Europe; the qualities through which the orchestra became the wonder of the new world and the envy of the old were qualities with which Mr. Gericke had endowed it. If his standards were not original with him, they were at least unknown to this country before his coming to Boston and, as Mr. Aldrich has lately said, not only did Mr. Gericke's standards remain those of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, but they became the standards of every symphony orchestra in America.

In ordaining that Mr. Monteux should be the one to suggest, as well as to conduct a concert such as that of last evening, the hand of circumstance was guided by rare justice. If Mr. Gericke remade the orchestra when it was but imperfectly organized, Mr. Monteux rehabilitated it when it seemed threatened with total demoralization. And Mr. Monteux has gone about this task with as little outward demonstration as did his distinguished predecessor, yet, working as steadily as he has modestly, Mr. Monteux has finally brought the band to the state of technical perfection in which Mr. Gericke left it—a more nearly perfect state, so some make bold to think, than that in which he found it in the autumn of 1918.

Surely not since Mr. Gericke's time has there been a performance of Schubert's Unfinished Symphony comparable to that which began the concert of last evening. Though he found the rightful voice for the music of nearly every composer, Dr. Muck was for some reason baffled by that of Schubert, particularly in this symphonic fragment. Especially did the pellucid, the Elysian calm of the second movement evade him. After all, this music needs less to be interpreted than merely to be played as so much exquisitely moulded sound. Guided by the supersensitive ear of Wilhelm Gericke such goal might be reached, as it has again been attained through like fineness of perception in Mr. Monteux.

Thus suggested by direct comparison, not only in the playing of this Symphony but also in the performance of the other pieces of the programme, the memory of Mr. Gericke was further recalled by the inclusion of the concert of his transcription of Brahm's Waltzes, Opus 39. A composer in a modest way, Mr. Gericke was skilled in instrumentation, and he scored these waltzes soundly and at times imaginatively. If they proved a little tedious in the hearing last evening the fault was not that of the transcriber but of the composer, who permitted his engaging exercise to carry him too far. Whether played as piano-solo or by full symphony orchestra, half of these Waltzes make better entertainment than does the set as a whole.

Companions and Profit

Memoranda from the Concert to Aid Mr. Gericke

PLAYING in the Symphony Orchestra at the concert last evening arranged by Mr. Monteux for the relief of Mr. Gericke were thirty-one musicians who in his days in Boston had worked with him. They are Messrs. W. Krafft, J. Hoffmann, F. Mahn, J. Mullaly, R. Kurth, S. Goldstein, H. Berger, B. Fiedler, F. Zahn, M. Kluge, J. Keller, C. Barth, K. Keller, M. Kunze, T. Seydel, G. Gerhardt, A. Brooke, G. Longy, C. Lenom, F. Muller, P. Mimart, A. Vannini, M. Hess, H. Lorbeer, F. Hain, L. Kloepfel, J. Mann, C. Hampe, A. Mausebach, L. Kenfield, C. Ludwig.

In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The proceeds from the concert, including contributions received by the trustees up to this time, amounts to $5,142.50.

From the first last evening orchestra and conductor were plainly on their mettle. One and all, no doubt, felt deeply the dual significance of the occasion. In the Unfinished Symphony, and also in Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," leader and band fairly outdid themselves. At each playing of a given piece Mr. Monteux betters his way with it, and last night "Till" sounded as it has not sounded here in many a day. Here was Strauss's music not only released but—if such a thing be possible—also glorified. Small wonder that at the end applause rang loud and long.

The close of the intermission, which followed the performance of Strauss's tone-poem, brought to the orchestra's platform Judge Cabot, present head of the Board of Trustees. To the band itself in the tuning room he had read a letter in which Mr. Gericke expressed appreciation of the honor done him. This letter he now read to the audience, prefaced by the one which he, in his official capacity, had sent to Mr. Gericke. Both are herewith reproduced

Boston, October 28, 1922

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke,
Beatrisegasse, 30
Vienna, Austria.

Dear Mr. Gericke:

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wish you to learn first from them that on Dec. 5th the Orchestra will give a benefit concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, in your honor. When they took up, in 1918, the responsibilities Major Higginson then laid down, they received from him not only a great opportunity for the artistic service of the public, but also the inheritance of a great tradition. In that tradition the memory of your work as the conductor who gave the Orchestra its preëminent place among organizations of its kind in America is cherished with a special feeling. It was constantly in the thought and on the lips of Major Higginson. It lives in his successors, who hold the same appreciation of all you did for the Orchestra that was held by him.

Conductors have come and gone since your years in Boston. It will doubtless interest you to know that the suggestion of the approaching concert had its origin with the present conductor, M. Monteux. The trusteees heartily acceded to his plan, and look forward with the greatest pleasure to making you the beneficiary of the proceeds of the concert, in testimony to their remembrance of your unique contribution to the musical life of Boston and America.

With every good wish, believe me,
Always sincerely yours,
Frederick P. Cabot, President.

Vienna, November 20th, 1922.

To Frederick P. Cabot, Esq.,
President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dear Sir:

Your letter of Oct. 28th has come to my hands, and I hasten to answer it in order to tell you how deeply touched I am by the way you recall the time I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It gives me great happiness to see that I, and what I did in my position as a conductor of the Orchestra, is not forgotten, in spite of the great changes which have come over the whole world, the work I did so many years ago is still in the minds of some Bostonians and of some members of the Boston Orchestra.

The way they are planning to express their remembrance of me, by doing me the unusual honor of giving a concert for my benefit, moves me beyond words; my gratitude to Mr. Monteux and the members of the Orchestra for their intention, as well as to you and the other Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing them to carry it out, is more than I can say.

Please will you for the present, accept my heartfelt thanks for the wonderfully kind letter you sent me, which, I must confess, made me almost as happy as the whole generous plan itself. And will you please for the present be the means of communicating to Mr. Monteux, as well as to the trustees and the members of the Orchestra, the expression of my most heartfelt emotion and thanks.

Respectfully yours,
Wilhelm Gericke.

Few might hear without emotion the simply eloquent words of Mr. Gerick least of all could Mr. Monteux and t players on the stage listen unmoved such recitation. And they could have mad no more fitting reply than the one that w straightway given. Obviously stirred, co ductor and men turned their attenti [illegible] thoven's Fifth Symphony, and [illegible] piece, which, through countless repetitions, might so easily become mere routine, a performance that will long persist in the memories of those who heard it. Even when wholly devoid of suggestion of perfunctoriness, the giving of concerts is after all but the daily task of those whose trade is the making of music. But from time to time come moments of inspiration when, if the piece itself permit, musical performanc

TRANS- DEC. 6.

GERICKE BENEFIT CONCERT

$5142 Netted---Letter From Former Conductor Read

The proceeds of the benefit concert for Wilhelm Gericke, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last night in Symphony Hall, were $5142.50.

NOBLE WORKS PLAYED

The programme was certainly one to put men and leader on their mettle. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony opened the concert and Beethoven's Fifth closed it. It is not usual to hear such a pair of giant works of art on the same occasion. And both were played last night as they have rarely been played, and as one scarcely suspected Mr. Monteux could play them.

The strings were ethereal, the woodwind and brass, save for a short spell in the Beethoven symphony, were all that one might hope for from mortals. From Schubert to Beethoven is a far cry from the point of view of emotional content and expression. But leader and men were equal to it, and one left the concert at the end of the Beethoven symphony feeling a curious sort of exaltation that comes rarely to poor humans.

Between the two symphonies, Mr. Monteux had set Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and a series of waltzes by Brahms (Opus 39), arranged for the piano by this very Mr. Gericke. The Strauss was played in the way that Mr. Monteux is capable of when he is at his best. The waltzes were brilliantly performed, and proved that Gericke knew the orchestra in more ways than one.

Mr. Gericke's Letter of Appreciation for Benefit Concert Idea

Following are the letters read by Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its founder-conductor, at Symphony Hall last night:

"Boston, October 28, 1922.

"Mr. Wilhelm Gericke,
"Beatrisegasse, 30,
"Vienna, Austria.

Dear Mr. Gericke:

"The Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wish you to learn first from them that on December 5th the orchestra will give a benefit concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, in your honor. When they took up in 1918 the responsibilities Major Higginson then laid down, they received from him not only a great opportunity for the artistic service of the public, but also the inheritance of a great tradition. In that tradition the memory of your work as the conductor who gave the orchestra its pre-eminent place among organizations of its kind in America is cherished with a special feeling. It was constantly in the thought and on the lips of Major Higginson. It lives in his successors, who hold the same appreciation of all you did for the orchestra that was held by him.

"Conductors have come and gone since your years in Boston. It will doubtless interest you to know that the suggestion of the approaching concert had its orgin with the present conductor, M. Monteux. The trustees heartily acceded to his plan, and look forward with the greatest pleasure to making you the beneficiary of the proceeds of the concert, in testimony to their remembrance of your unique contribution to the musical life of Boston and America.

"With every good wish, believe me,
"Always sincerely yours,
"FREDERICK P. CABOT,
"President."

Mr. Gericke's reply:

"Vienna, Nov. 20, 1922.

"To Frederick P. Cabot, Esq.,
"President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"Dear Sir:

"Your letter of Oct. 28th has come to my hands, and I hasten to answer it in order to tell you how deeply touched I am by the way you recall the time I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"It gave me great happiness to see that I, and what I did in my position as a conductor of the orchestra, is not forgotten, in spite of the great changes which have come over the whole world the work I did so many years ago is still in the minds of some Bostonians and of some members of the Boston orchestra.

"The way they are planning to express their remembrance of me, by doing me the unusual honor of giving me [illegible] benefit, moves me [illegible] words; my gratitude to Mr. Monteaux and the members of the orchestra for their intention, as well as to you and the other trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing them to carry it out, is more than I I can say.

"Please will you, for the present, accept my heartfelt thanks for the wonderfully kind letter you sent me, which, I must confess, made me almost as happy as the whole generous plan itself. And will you please for the present be the means of communicating to Mr. Monteaux as well as to the trustees and the members of the orchestra, the expression of my most heartfelt emotion and thanks.

"Respectfully yours,
"WILHELM GERICKE."

POST- DEC 6.

SCHELLING THE SCLOIST

The opening Boston Symphony concert of the Monday evening series, to be given Monday at Symphony Hall, will be made additionally notable by the appearance as soloist of Ernest Schelling, who has not played in Boston for several seasons. Schelling is an American by birth and affiliation, although both as a piano virtuoso and as a composer he is known and admired throughout the musical world.

Ernest Schelling

This splendid artist, who has appeared on many memorable occasions as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in previous seasons, is to take the piano part on this occasion in Liszt's concerto in E flat.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius will be the principal number on the program for the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

This latest work of the Finnish composer, introduced to Boston by Pierre Monteux last season, has aroused such interest as to warrant its repetition. The other numbers will be a Ballet Suite, music of the early French composer, Lully, arranged by Felix Mottl, "November Woods," a new score of the English composer, Arnold Bax, and Chadwick's Anniversary Overt [illegible]ER - DEC. 7.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

COMPOSERS AT HARVARD; SINGER IN BOSTON

Beethoven of the Ninth Symphony and Franck Following the Best Models—Mr. McCormack Departs—The Bettered Pieces He Now Assembles—Mr. Monteux's Next Novelties—The Burgin-Bedetti-Fox Trio—Mr. Rosing's Return

TO Cambridge last evening Mr. Monteux carried his courageous but well-considered performance of the first three movements of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony; and in anticipation of the Franck Centenary Concerts of this afternoon and Saturday he commemorated that composer in Sanders Theatre with the tone-poem, "The Wild Huntsman." Between these numbers Mme. Samaroff played the piano-concerto of Schumann, alco to receive immediate repetition in Boston. . . . A peculiar place is that held by the Ninth Symphony—a place shared hereabouts by Beethoven's own "Missa Solemnis" and the B minor Mass of Bach. Traditionally regarded as the crown of instrumental music, the Ninth Symphony is so seldom performed that its claim to such title is not too easily disputed. Even when the piece is actually heard there comes with it the feeling of a rite performed—of the lifting of the veil and the raising of the chalice. Now that Mr. Monteux has made bold to play independently those parts of the Symphony that have no need of chorus and solo singers, there is chance that in future the Ninth, in such curtailment, may be as frequently heard in Symphony Hall as any of its predecessors—a consummation devoutly to be desired. It is all very well to plead the ills of too oft-repeated performances of masterpieces, and to argue that some music should be reserved for occasions, kept from over-familiarity. But such ways are artistically false. No music is hallowed. No music deserves always to be reverenced and never to be criticised. This is fetichism, and a crime against æsthetic honesty.

With no will to disparage the remarkable qualities of the Ninth Symphony, it is not too much to assert that once the piece is brought into ready comparison with the other symphonies of Beethoven its superiority to them may no longer be taken for granted; it may even be questioned. Indisputably the piece does, in certain ways, mark a tremendous advance over anything that Beethoven had hitherto composed for orchestra. To commend first the least specifically musical aspect of the piece, the instrumentation is notably richer, more resourceful, more daring than that of any of Beethoven's other orchestral pieces. That the composer, with his growing deafness, should have continued to hear new sonorities, that under such hampering circumstance he should have written, not more cautiously but more, and more unrestrainedly, will always remain one of the miracles of art.

During the last glorious decade of his life Beethoven struck, right and left at [illegible] here and everywhere he [illegible] the shackles of classicism and [illegible] the way for the music that was to come. The first measures of this same Ninth Symphony throw wide a door the existence of which had never even been suspected—that of musical suggestion. Before these epoch-making bars were written music had been but music and it now became mood. And on this cornerstone what monuments have not been raised!

It is this first movement, this vast gray canvas of sky and sea, that is the glory of the Ninth Symphony. Pale beside it are the trumpetings and shoutings of the Finale with its ridiculously over-estimated "five finger" tune. Again the Scherzo, for all its fine vigor was no such daring stroke; nor was the Adagio of like significance, though it is based on the loveliest melody in all Beethoven's orchestral music. In these movements Beethoven was merely repeating, with a more resourceful harmonic contrapuntal and orchestral technique, the forms and practices that he had used in all his composing for orchestra. But to grant that technically these movements mark an advance, to find in them increased complexity, greater boldness, more variety, more outward effectiveness, is not necessarily to maintain that they may give a pleasure beyond that offered by the corresponding movements of the Third, Fifth, Seventh or Eights Symphony. The weakness of these three movements of the Ninth Symphony is monotony and diffuseness. Those impressive "fifths" that pervade the Allegro begin to pall long before the movement is done. There is a bit too much of the none too significant theme of the Scherzo, and lovely as are its two melodies, the Adagio is unduly prolonged.

Although in general music that is richer in texture is more engrossing in performance than simpler, more obvious compositions, yet to this rule there have always been and will always be exceptions. The Symphony in G-minor of Mozart is more absorbing to hear than the huge orchestral machines of such late nineteenth-century Germans as Noren, Bischoff, Hausegger, Boehe and their kind. And the same disparity between sheer invention and mere complexity of means is often present in the music of an individual composer. Some of Chopin's first Nocturnes and Mazurkas excel his Fantasie-Polonaise. In all the later music-dramas of Wagner are pages that fall below the better things in the earlier operas, even to "Rienzi." Strauss's "Heldenleben" is greatly inferior to his "Don Juan." The variations in Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 111, are less consistently enjoyable than those in his Opus 26. Honestly to prefer the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies to the sacrosanct Ninth, however unconventional such preference, is thus not without analogies.

Had Mr. Monteux in playing "The Wild Huntsman" thought only of paying tribute to Franck he would never have chosen so uncharacteristic a composition. The piece is an excellent example of the symphonic poem according to Liszt, better even than most that served it as models. But of the true voice of Franck it contains hardly a trace. He has written here programme-music, picture-music, and he goes about his task with skill and with the saving grace of imagination and distinction of utterance. Had any other composer attempted this tonal portrayal of such well worn tags as this Sabbath stillness, this sacrilegious Hunt, these accursed phantoms, he could have fared no better than did Franck in avoiding triteness and banality. In the performance, which was notably eloquent, rather than in the piece chosen, was Franck honored last evening. And that which Mr. Monteux did for him he had previously done for the orchestral portion of Schumann's Concerto. Comment on Mme. Samaroff's playing of this romantic music may well be deferred until tomorrow, that it may receive the somewhat unusual benefit of a second impression.

W. S. S.

Incidents and Prospects

The programme set by Mr. Monteux for the Symphony Concerts of next week teems with interesting pieces viz: the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in repetition from the notable performances of last spring; a new tone-poem, "November Woods," by the rising Irishman, Bax—piece lately well received in Chicago; Mr. Chadwick's "Anniversary Overture" as yet unheard here; and a Suite of ballet-airs drawn by Mottl from Lully's French operas of the seventeenth century, warmly applauded the other day in Philadelphia.

TRANS-DEC. 8.

SYMPHONY DOES FRANCK HONOR

Seventh Concert Is Celebration of 100th Birthday of Composer

ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PERFORMANCE

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was arranged with a view to celebrate the 100th birthday of Cesar Franck (Liege, Belgium, Dec. 10, 1822). His symphony and his symphonic poems, "The Aeoliae" and "The Wild Huntsman" were the selections. It was a pity that Franck's "Symphonic Variations," one of his finest works, were not in the repertoire of Mme. Samaroff. She would, no doubt, have given a noteworthy performance of them. As it was she played Schumann's concerto.

[illegible] us now praise famous men, [illegible] begat us.

The Lord hath wrought great glory by them,
Through his great power from the beginning.

✣ ✣ ✣

Such as found out musical tunes,
And recited verses in writing."

It was eminently fitting that the centennial of Franck should be celebrated in this city and by this orchestra. His music was not always high in favor here. The first time his name appeared in Boston on a program was at a song recital of Gardner Lamson's. The song, an early one, was "The Emir of Bengador." The date was March 9. 1892.

When Ysaye and Lachaume introduced Franck's violin sonata in 1895; when Ysaye, Marteau, Bendix, Gerardy and the pianist Lachaume introduced the magnificent piano quintet in 1898, leading musicians of this city shook wise heads and said with an air of finality: "This will never do." The string quartet was only tolerated, endured in the same year because it was produced at a Kneisel Quartet concert, and at that time the Kneisels could do no wrong. "The Wild Huntsman," produced here by Theodore Thomas in 1898, was looked on as the work of an eccentric and theatrical Frenchman.

When Mr. Gericke produced in 1899 the symphony so enthusiastically applauded yesterday, the storm broke loose. There were letters of angry protest. A leading critic characterized the symphony as "dismal." Several subscribers to the concerts called it "immoral" and vowed they would not attend any concert in which music by Franck was to be played.

Nor did Franck fare better for a time in New York. Even the broad-minded James Huneker dismissed him as a sort of Abbe Liszt, now in the heavily scented boudoir, now with self-conscious devotion in the church. Franck in the boudoir! Poor "Pere" Franck!

And so Franck had to make his way here, as in Paris, misunderstood, abused, regarded by some as an anarchist, by some as a bore. He shared the fate in Boston of Verdi (see Dwight's Journal of Music). Wagner, Richard Strauss (whose "Till Eulenspiegel" was described in a Boston newspaper as the work of a madman), Loeffler, Debussy, Ravel. This men and brethren, should make us all tolerant, even cautious, in passing judgment on contemporary composers whose idiom is as yet strange to us. Cocksure opinions are valuable chiefly to the one that expresses them. The lightning did not strike Symphony Hall when music by Milhaud was performed; nor was there any sign of divine wrath, there was no celestial disturbance, no perturbation of nature when the "Horatius Triumphant" of the Sieur Honegger was produced.

Le us hear what is going on in the musical world. Even if it is going on noisily and queerly to our ears. It is not enough to say: "I don't like it. Why does Mr. Monteux put such pieces on the program?" Inherently bad music will soon disappear of itself, unless it is so bad, with so obviously vulgar tunes, that it becomes popular; but music is not necessarily bad because it is of a strange and irregular nature. For audiences to have no curiosity about new works, no spur to hot discussion concerning them, is a sign of stagnation in art.

Thus Cesar Franck, a great teacher teaches us all indirectly a lesson. It is not necessary to eulogize him at this late day. He has his seat high among the immortals, and the muses and the saints hold converse with him.

The performance yesterday was a superb glorification of this modest man. Even "The Wild Huntsman," not one of his best works, was played under Mr. Monteux's brilliant direction as it had never been played here before.

Mme. Smrnoff gave a very musical reading of Schumann's concerta, a performance that might be called Schumannesque. She did not attempt, as many do, to turn this romantic composition into a thing of swollen proportions for a large hall; she succeeded in establishing an intimate relationship between Schumann and the hearers. In this she was aided by the exquisitely sympathetic playing of the orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 5; Lully-Mottl, Ballet Suite; Bax, "November Boughs" (first time in Boston); Chadwick, Anniversary Overture (new).

HERALD-DEC 9.

Franck Program Given by Boston Symphony

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was devoted, with the exception of Schumann's piano concerto, played by Olga Samaroff, to the music of César Franck in commemoration of his one hundredth anniversary. The works chosen by Mr. Monteux were the symphony in D minor; the symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and "Le Chasseur Maudit."

Almost an entire program of Franck's music cannot fail of being monotonous. The composer's style underwent so few conspicuous changes throughout his career that compositions chosen from widely separated periods of his creative activity offer little variety. Great as his music undoubtedly is, profoundly emotional, deeply mystical, the similarity of treatment, even of such dissimilar subjects as the "Wild Huntsman" and "Les Eolides," offers little contrast. Of the playing of the music, however, nothing but praise can be said. Almost never has the orchestra attained such pure beauty of tone as in "Les Eolides" or such expressive power as in the symphony.

Much interesting music has been composed for piano with orchestral accompaniment since the year 1845, in which Schumann completed his concerto; yet pianists [illegible] this, as well as other over familiar pieces of similar character, to the neglect of more novel music. To be sure the work of yesterday retains its well-known beauties, its romantic charm, even much of its first freshness and originality, and in the hands of a pianist of greater resource than Mme. Samaroff might still excite the emotions. The romanticism of the '40s must have been more ardent than that of Mme. Samaroff yesterday afternoon. She played with cold reserve in the first movement; the Intermezzo, playful and amorous by turns, was precise, almost stilted, and the brilliant passage work of the Finale was often indistinct. Was this the music of Schumann, the romantic lover of Clara Wieck, the creator of Florestan and Eusebius, the composer who translated into tones whimsical fancies of E. T. A. Hoffmann? Perish the thought!

S. M.

MONTR-DEC. 9.

THE programme set by Mr. Monteux for the Symphony Concerts of next week teems with interesting pieces viz: the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in repetition from the notable performances of last spring; a new tone-poem, "November Woods," by the rising Irishman, Bax—piece lately well received in Chicago; Mr. Chadwick's "Anniversary Overture" as yet unheard here; and a Suite of ballet-airs drawn by Mottl from Lully's French operas of the seventeenth century, warmly applauded the other day in Philadelphia.

On Monday evening, in Symphony Hall begins a new series of supplementary Symphony Concerts enlisting the full orchestra led by Mr. Monteux and traversing these pieces: Brahms's Symphony in C minor; Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne"; Chabrier's Rhapsody, "España"; Liszt's Concerto in E-flat for piano and orchestra. Ernest Schelling, notable pianist long unheard in Boston, will be the "assisting artist." So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who care not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music.

TRANS-DEC. 9.

SYMPHONY IN HOMAGE TO FRANCK

Centenary Observed by Orchestra—Mme. Samaroff Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

It was inevitable that the first composition on the programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in honor of the centenary of Cesar Franck, born Dec. 10, 1822, should be the D minor symphony. For this symphony towers over every work of Franck for orchestra, and for many it is higher than any other symphony since Beethoven, because of the strength and nobility of form, the mystical feeling and the spiritual power of the music.

CREATION OF GENIUS

Familiar as the symphony is now, it becomes greater with every repetition, and what makes its existence almost miraculous is the thought of the materialism and worldliness of the society in which Franck lived when he produced this masterwork.

Such a symphony would never have revelaled itself to a proud man, however gifted or sincere he might have been. It could not have been created by a thinker, philosopher or virtuoso. It required a being with the soul of a little child, one who asked of the world nothing, who did not dream of honors, fame, leadership, to bring such sounds into existence. In the face of this, art that is merely esthetic, "art for art's sake," etc., appears as the merest rubbish. What is in a man is the thing that appears, and counts, in his scores.

Stirs the Audience

There is no need to repeat the things that have now been said thousands of times about this symphony. It deeply stirred the audience yesterday. The performance was very brilliant. In some places it was great, and both conductor and orchestra were applauded to the echo.

It would have been far more appropriate for a soloist to play the "Symphonique Variations" of Franck for piano and orchestra in such a programme, than the Schumann concerto, lovely as that work is, and not unrelated to Franck in certain characteristics—as it is totally unrelated to him in others. Mme. Samaroff, for reasons of her own, we suppose, played Schumann, and she is a pianist to respect the modest proportions and intimate spirit of the A minor concerto. She was warmly received.

"Les Eolides" is a finer piece of music than "Le Chasseur Maudit," but the latter [illegible] and was so made by Mr. Monteux, while the former has passages of a seraphic sensuousness that, again, was a special and uncommunicable attribute of Cesar Franck.

POST-DEC. 9.

Mr. Monteux put on his Boston Symphony program Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, minus the choral finale. This is due to the fact that there is now no chorus connected with the orchestra.

NY. TIMES-DEC. 10

Schelling With Orchestra

Ernest Schelling will return to Boston after an absence of several seasons, to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at the first of the Monday evening series of concerts which will take place tomorrow in Symphony Hall at 8:15.

Mr. Monteux will conduct the first Symphony of Brahms in C minor; "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, a former conductor of the orchestra, and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

Symphony Programme

The eighth regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 15 and 16, at Symphony Hall.

The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in E flat, the latest work of the Finnish master, introduced to Boston last year, will be repeated. Pierre Monteux will also conduct a suite of ballet numbers from the works of the early French composer, Lully, arranged by Felix Mottl. They include Introduction, Nocturne, Minuet and Final March. Two new works will close the programme—"November Woods," a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, the English composer, and Chadwick's Anniversary Overture.

POST-DEC. 10.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The eighth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 15 and 16, in Symphony hall. The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in E flat, introduced to Boston last year, will be repeated. Mr. Monteux will also conduct a suite of ballet music from operas by Lully, arranged by Felix Mottl: Introduction, nocturne, minuet and final march. Two new works will close the program—"November Woods"—a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, and Chadwick's anniversary overture.

SCHELLING WITH ORCHESTRA

Ernest Schelling will return to Boston after an absence of several seasons to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, at the first of the Monday evening series of concerts tomorrow in Symphony hall at 8:15.

Mr. Schelling, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra many times in past years, will play on this occasion Liszt's Piano Concerto in E flat. Mr. Monteux will conduct the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor, "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem of Henri Rabaud, and Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

HERALD-DEC 10.

Schelling Soloist at First Monday Symphony

Ernest Schelling will return to Boston after an absence of several seasons to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at the first of the Monday evening series of concerts tomorrow in Symphony Hall at 8:15.

Although well known and admired all over Europe, both as pianist and composer, Schelling is an American, born in Belvidere, N. J. He studied at the Paris Conservatory at the age of seven and later with Leschitizky. At 17 he met Paderewski who immediately took him as his foremost pupil. When Paderewski was unable to appear at the Polish centennial celebration in honor of Chopin, he recommended Schelling as substitute, and telegraphed—"Once my pupil, now my colleague."

Schelling's original compositions in large and small forms have been played and applauded all over the world. He has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra many times in past years.

GLOBE-DEC. 10.

SYMPHONY IN EXTRA CONCERT

Liszt Concerto, with Ernest Schelling as Soloist, Pleases Audience

RABAUD, CHABRIER, BRAHMS PRESENTED

For the first concert of the extra series Mr. Monteux arranged this program: Brahms, Symphony No. 1, C minor; Raboud, "La Procession Nocturne"; Liszt, concerto for pianoforte in E flat (soloist, Ernest Schelling); Chabrier, rhapsody, "Espana."

The audience last night, though very large, failed quite to fill Symphony hall. It seems odd that outside the constant symphony concert public there should not be a second public, eager for perhaps four or five concerts of high quality, large enough to [illegible] hall. [illegible] concertgoing seems, after all, to be much a matter of routine, a case of "either, or." The greater the pity.

To judge by the test of applause, the Liszt concerto gave most pleasure last night; with genuine cordiality Mr. Schelling was recalled four times. This much-played work of perennial vitality may be all things to all men. Some players see in it music of romance, of poetry, others find it dramatic to the verge of that theatricalism that calls for a ranting type of performance; a third body of pianists, the largest by far, pounce on it when they want a dazzling showpiece to display what they can do. Mr. Schelling chose a high heroic vein, set off with patches of rather pallid virtuosity. His was an amply competent performance, but quite without the charm of Mr. Proctor's, the romantic beauty of Miss aus der Ohe's, or the dazzling brilliancy of Sofie Menter's. The loveliness of the accompaniment was done no more than justice to.

The whole concert, for the rest, was not precisely inspiring, though the rhapsody of Spain went with the rhythmic incisiveness its stirring measures demand, and beautiful playing did what it could for the gentle suavity of Mr. Rabaud's singularly unsuggestive Nocturnal Procession. For the surging storm and stress and finally the splendid exaltation of the Brahms C minor symphony, Mr. Monteux seemed last night unable to reach that highest pitch of eloquence which is needful to show forth this marvellous music in full glory. The last movement, nevertheless, the audience warmly applauded.

The second concert in this second series will be given Jan. 29, with Rene Chemet, violin, as soloist.

R. R. G.

HERALD-DEC. 12

Ernest Schelling Symphony Soloist

Liszt's E-flat major concerto for pianoforte and orchestra was played last evening by Ernest Schelling with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first of the five special Monday evening concerts of that organization. The young pianist handled the work with a meaningful decision which brought a pleasing emphasis to its value, and especially to its rhythmic charm.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Brahms' first symphony was realized to its full beauty by the orchestra, under Monteux's capable baton. The work was carried to its close of flashing fire in an artistically triumphant manner. Raboud's mournful "Procession Nocturne," and Chabrier's lively and familiar "Espana" rhapsody completed the program.

ADVTSR-DEC. 12

FIRST OF EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Schelling Pleases in a Concerto by Liszt

An audience that came near filling Symphony Hall for the first of the five extra Boston Symphony concerts showed unusual enthusiasm for the brilliant playing of Ernest Schelling in Liszt's E flat major piano concerto. In the finale he gave an exhibition of virtuosity that was genuinely extraordinary. This concerto is a show piece and nothing else, but Mr Schelling certainly managed to get out of it most of the rather facile thrills Liszt put there.

Mr Monteux put together a program as interesting and as severe in its musical standard as those of the regular series of Symphony concerts. If last year's precedent is followed, however, there will be no duplication of numbers between regular and extra series, so that those who subscribe to both will not suffer from repetitions.

Brahms' First Symphony, played with an eloquence that was a bit too restless, was cordially applauded. Times have changed since the days remembered by the elder generation when Boston audiences went away in droves during Brahms' pieces. It is now possible to admire both Brahms and Wagner without being exactly a partisan of either.

"La Procession Nocturne," by a former conductor of the orchestra, again proved that Henri Rabaud is one of the foremost living French composers. This music is written with delicate taste and considerable imaginative power.

Chabrier's "Espana," a piece common to the "Pops" repertory and that of the regular series of Symphony concerts, played with spirit and precision, obviously delighted the audience. One hopes Mr Monteux plans to end the other extra concerts with such familiar and well-liked standard pieces, less exacting than Brahms, but more worth while than most of Liszt.

Mme Renee Chemet, violinist, will be the soloist at the second extra concert Jan 29.

GLOBE-DEC. 12

tradition. Here, there and everywhere he broke the shackles of classicism and paved the way for the music that was to come. The first measures of this same Ninth Symphony throw wide a door the existence of which had never even been suspected—that of musical suggestion. Before these epoch-making bars were written music had been but music, and it now became mood. And on this cornerstone what monuments have not been raised!

It is this first movement, this vast gray canvas of sky and sea, that is the glory of the Ninth Symphony. Pale beside it are the trumpetings and shoutings of the Finale with its ridiculously over-estimated "five finger" tune. Again the Scherzo, for all its fine vigor was no such daring stroke; nor was the Adagio of like significance, though it is based on the loveliest melody in all Beethoven's orchestral music. In these movements Beethoven was merely repeating, with a more resourceful harmonic contrapuntal and orchestral technique, the forms and practices that he had used in all his composing for orchestra. But to grant that technically these movements mark an advance, to find in them increased complexity, greater boldness, more variety, more outward effectiveness, is not necessarily to maintain that they may give a pleasure beyond that offered by the corresponding movements of the Third, Fifth, Seventh or Eights Symphony. The weakness of these three movements of the Ninth Symphony is monotony and diffuseness. Those impressive "fifths" that pervade the Allegro begin to pall long before the movement is done. There is a bit too much of the none too significant theme of the Scherzo, and lovely as are its two melodies, the Adagio is unduly prolonged.

Although in general music that is richer in texture is more engrossing in performance than simpler, more obvious compositions, yet to this rule there have always been and will always be exceptions. The Symphony in G-minor of Mozart is more absorbing to hear than the huge orchestral machines of such late nineteenth-century Germans as Noren, Bischoff, Hausegger, Boehe and their kind. And the same disparity between sheer invention and mere complexity of means is often present in the music of an individual composer. Some of Chopin's first Nocturnes and Mazurkas excel his Fantasie-Polonaise. In all the later music-dramas of Wagner are pages that fall below the better things in the earlier operas, even to "Rienzi." Strauss's 'Heldenleben" is greatly inferior to his "Don Juan." The variations in Beethoven's Sonata, Opus 111, are less consistently enjoyable than those in his Opus 26. Honestly to prefer the Seventh and Eighth Symphonies to the sacrosanct Ninth, however unconventional such preference, is thus not without analogies.

Had Mr. Monteux in playing "The Wild Huntsman" thought only of paying tribute to Franck he would never have chosen so uncharacteristic a composition. The piece is an excellent example of the symphonic poem according to Liszt, better even than most that served it as models. But of the true voice of Franck it contains hardly a trace. He has written here programme-music, picture-music, and he goes about his task with skill and with the saving grace of imagination and distinction of utterance. Had any other composer attempted this tonal portrayal of such well worn tags as this Sabbath stillness, this sacrilegious Hunt, these accursed phantoms, he could have fared no better than did Franck in avoiding triteness and banality. In the performance, which was notably eloquent, rather than in the piece chosen, was Franck honored last evening. And that which Mr. Monteux did for him he had previously done for the orchestral portion of Schumann's Concerto. Comment on Mme. Samaroff's playing of this romantic music may well be deferred until tomorrow, that it may receive the somewhat unusual benefit of a second impression. W. S. S.

Incidents and Prospects

The programme set by Mr. Monteux for the Symphony Concerts of next week teems with interesting pieces viz: the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in repetition from the notable performances of last spring; a new tone-poem, "November Woods," by the rising Irishman, Bax—piece lately well received in Chicago; Mr. Chadwick's "Anniversary Overture" as yet unheard here; and a Suite of ballet-airs drawn by Mottl from Lully's French operas of the seventeenth century, warmly applauded the other day in Philadelphia.

TRANS-DEC 8.

SYMPHONY DOES FRANCK HONOR

Seventh Concert Is Celebration of 100th Birthday of Composer

ORCHESTRA GIVES FINE PERFORMANCE

By PHILIP HALE

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was arranged with a view to celebrate the 100th birthday of Cesar Franck (Liege, Belgium, Dec. 10, 1822). His symphony and his symphonic poems, "The Aeolilae" and "The Wild Huntsman" were the selections. It was a pity that Franck's "Symphonic Variations," one of his finest works, were not in the repertoire of Mme. Samaroff. She would, no doubt, have given a noteworthy performance of them. As it was she played Schumann's concerto.

"Let us now praise famous men,
And our Fathers that begat us.
The Lord hath wrought great glory by them,
Through his great power from the beginning.

✣ ✣ ✣

Such as found out musical tunes,
And recited verses in writing."

It was eminently fitting that the centennial of Franck should be celebrated in this city and by this orchestra. His music was not always high in favor here. The first time his name appeared in Boston on a program was at a song recital of Gardner Lamson's. The song, an early one, was "The Emir of Bengador." The date was March 9. 1892.

When Ysaye and Lachaume introduced Franck's violin sonata in 1895; when Ysaye, Marteau, Bendix, Gerardy and the pianist Lachaume introduced the magnificent piano quintet in 1898, leading musicians of this city shook wise heads and said with an air of finality: "This will never do." The string quartet was only tolerated, endured in the same year because it was produced at a Kneisel Quartet concert, and at that time the Kneisels could do no wrong. "The Wild Huntsman," produced here by Theodore Thomas in 1898, was looked on as the work of an eccentric and theatrical Frenchman.

When Mr. Gericke produced in 1899 the symphony so enthusiastically applauded yesterday, the storm broke loose. There were letters of angry protest. A leading critic characterized the symphony as "dismal." Several subscribers to the concerts called it "immoral" and vowed they would not attend any concert in which music by Franck was to be played.

Nor did Franck fare better for a time in New York. Even the broad-minded James Huneker dismissed him as a sort of Abbe Liszt, now in the heavily scented boudoir, now with self-conscious devotion in the church. Franck in the boudoir! Poor "Pere" Franck!

And so Franck had to make his way here, as in Paris, misunderstood, abused, regarded by some as an anarchist, by some as a bore. He shared the fate in Boston of Verdi (see Dwight's Journal of Music). Wagner, Richard Strauss (whose "Till Eulenspiegel" was described in a Boston newspaper as the work of a madman), Loeffler, Debussy, Ravel. This men and brethren, should make us all tolerant, even cautious, in passing judgement on contemporary composers whose idiom is as yet strange to us. Cocksure opinions are valuable chiefly to the one that expresses them. The lightning did not strike Symphony Hall when music by Milhaud was performed; nor was there any sign of divine wrath, there was no celestial disturbance, no perturbation of nature when the "Horatius Triumphant" of the Sieur Honegger was produced.

Let us hear what is going on in the musical world. Even if it is going on noisily and queerly to our ears. It is not enough to say: "I don't like it. Why does Mr. Monteux put such pieces on the program?" Inherently bad music will soon disappear of itself, unless it is so bad, with so obviously vulgar tunes, that it becomes popular; but music is not necessarily bad because it is of a strange and irregular nature. For audiences to have no curiosity about new works, no spur to hot discussion concerning them, is a sign of stagnation in art.

Thus Cesar Franck, a great teacher teaches us all indirectly a lesson. It is not necessary to eulogize him at this late day. He has his seat high among the immortals, and the muses and the saints hold converse with him.

The performance yesterday was a superb glorification of this modest man. Even "The Wild Huntsman," not one of his best works, was played under Mr Monteux's brilliant direction as it had never been played here before.

Mme. Smirnoff gave a very musical reading of Schumann's concerta, a performance that might be called Schumannesque. She did not attempt, as many do, to turn this romantic composition into a thing of swollen proportions for a large hall; she succeeded in establishing an intimate relationship between Schumann and the hearers. In this she was aided by the exquisitely sympathetic playing of the orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

The program of the concerts next week is as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 5; Lully-Mottl, Ballet Suite; Bax, "November Boughs" (first time in Boston); Chadwick, Anniversary Overture (new).

HERALD-DEC 9

Franck Program Given by Boston Symphony

The seventh program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was devoted, with the exception of Schumann's piano concerto, played by Olga Samaroff, to the music of César Franck in commemoration of his one hundredth anniversary. The works chosen by Mr. Monteux were the symphony in D minor; the symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and "Le Chasseur Maudit."

Almost an entire program of Franck's music cannot fail of being monotonous. The composer's style underwent so few conspicuous changes throughout his career that compositions chosen from widely separated periods of his creative activity offer little variety. Great as his music undoubtedly is, profoundly emotional, deeply mystical, the similarity of treatment, even of such dissimilar subjects as the "Wild Huntsman" and "Les Eolides," offers little contrast. Of the playing of the music, however, nothing but praise can be said. Almost never has the orchestra attained such pure beauty of tone as in "Les Eolides" or such expressive power as in the symphony.

Much interesting music has been composed for piano with orchestral accompaniment since the year 1845, in which Schumann completed his concerto; yet pianists continue to play this, as well as other over familiar pieces of similar character, to the neglect of more novel music. To be sure the work of yesterday retains its well-known beauties, its romantic charm, even much of its first freshness and originality, and in the hands of a pianist of greater resource than Mme. Samaroff might still excite the emotions. The romanticism of the '40s must have been more ardent than that of Mme. Samaroff yesterday afternoon. She played with cold reserve in the first movement; the Intermezzo, playful and amorous by turns, was precise, almost stilted, and the brilliant passage work of the Finale was often indistinct. Was this the music of Schumann, the romantic lover of Clara Wieck, the creator of Florestan and Eusebius, the composer who translated into tones whimsical fancies of E. T. A. Hoffmann? Perish the thought! S. M.

MONTR - DEC. 9.

THE programme set by Mr. Monteux for the Symphony Concerts of next week teems with interesting pieces viz: the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in repetition from the notable performances of last spring; a new tone-poem, "November Woods," by the rising Irishman, Bax—piece lately well received in Chicago; Mr. Chadwick's "Anniversary Overture" as yet unheard here; and a Suite of ballet-airs drawn by Mottl from Lully's French operas of the seventeenth century, warmly applauded the other day in Philadelphia.

On Monday evening, in Symphony Hall begins a new series of supplementary Symphony Concerts enlisting the full orchestra led by Mr. Monteux and traversing these pieces: Brahms's Symphony in C minor; Rabaud's tone-poem, "La Procession Nocturne"; Chabrier's Rhapsody, "España"; Liszt's Concerto in E-flat for piano and orchestra. Ernest Schelling, notable pianist long unheard in Boston, will be the "assisting artist." So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who care not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music.

TRANS-DEC. 9.

SYMPHONY IN HOMAGE TO FRANCK

Centenary Observed by Orchestra—Mme. Samaroff Soloist

BY OLIN DOWNES

It was inevitable that the first composition on the programme given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall in honor of the centenary of Cesar Franck, born Dec. 10, 1822, should be the D minor symphony. For this symphony towers over every work of Franck for orchestra, and for many it is higher than any other symphony since Beethoven, because of the strength and nobility of form, the mystical feeling and the spiritual power of the music.

CREATION OF GENIUS

Familiar as the symphony is now, it becomes greater with every repetition, and what makes its existence almost miraculous is the thought of the materialism and worldliness of the society in which Franck lived when he produced this masterwork.

Such a symphony would never have revealed itself to a proud man, however gifted or sincere he might have been. It could not have been created by a thinker, philosopher or virtuoso. It required a being with the soul of a little child, one who asked of the world nothing, who did not dream of honors, fame, leadership, to bring such sounds into existence. In the face of this, art that is merely esthetic, "art for art's sake," etc., appears as the merest rubbish. What is in a man is the thing that appears, and counts, in his scores.

Stirs the Audience

There is no need to repeat the things that have now been said thousands of times about this symphony. It deeply stirred the audience yesterday. The performance was very brilliant. In some places it was great, and both conductor and orchestra were applauded to the echo.

It would have been far more appropriate for a soloist to play the "Symphonique Variations" of Franck for piano and orchestra in such a programme, than the Schumann concerto, lovely as that work is, and not unrelated to Franck in certain characteristics—as it is totally unrelated to him in others. Mme. Samaroff, for reasons of her own, we suppose, played Schumann, and she is a pianist to respect the modest proportions and intimate spirit of the A minor concerto. She was warmly received.

"Les Eolides" is a finer piece of music than "Chasseur Maudit," but the later composition can be made very brilliant, and was so made by Mr. Monteux, while the former has passages of a seraphic sensuousness that, again, was a special and uncommunicable attribute of Cesar Franck.

POST-DEC-9.

Mr. Monteux put on his Boston Symphony program Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, minus the choral finale. This is due to the fact that there is now no chorus connected with the orchestra.

NY. TIMES-DEC 10

Schelling With Orchestra

Ernest Schelling will return to Boston after an absence of several seasons, to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at the first of the Monday evening series of concerts which will take place tomorrow in Symphony Hall at 8:15.

Mr. Monteux will conduct the first Symphony of Brahms in C minor; "La Procession. Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, a former conductor of the orchestra, and Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

Symphony Programme

The eighth regular pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 15 and 16, at Symphony Hall.

The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in E flat, the latest work of the Finnish master, introduced to Boston last year, will be repeated. Pierre Monteux will also conduct a suite of ballet numbers from the works of the early French composer, Lully, arranged by Felix Mottl. They include Introduction, Nocturne, Minuet and Final March. Two new works will close the programme—"November Woods," a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, the English composer, and Chadwick's Anniversary Overture.

POST-DEC. 10.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The eighth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra will take place next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 15 and 16, in Symphony hall. The Fifth Symphony of Sibelius in E flat, introduced to Boston last year, will be repeated. Mr. Monteux will also conduct a suite of ballet music from operas by Lully, arranged by Felix Mottl: Introduction, nocturne, minuet and final march. Two new works will close the program—"November Woods"—a symphonic poem by Arnold Bax, and Chadwick's anniversary overture.

SCHELLING WITH ORCHESTRA

Ernest Schelling will return to Boston after an absence of several seasons to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, at the first of the Monday evening series of concerts tomorrow in Symphony hall at 8:15.

Mr. Schelling, who has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra many times in past years, will play on this occasion Liszt's Piano Concerto in E flat. Mr. Monteux will conduct the First Symphony of Brahms in C minor. "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem of Henri Rabaud, and Chabrier's Rhapsody Espana.

HERALD-DEC 10.

Schelling Soloist at First Monday Symphony

Ernest Schelling will return to Boston after an absence of several seasons to appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, at the first of the Monday evening series of concerts tomorrow in Symphony Hall at 8:15.

Although well known and admired all over Europe, both as pianist and composer, Schelling is an American, born in Belvidere, N. J. He studied at the Paris Conservatory at the age of seven and later with Leschitizky. At 17 he met Paderewski who immediately took him as his foremost pupil. When Paderewski was unable to appear at the Polish centennial celebration in honor of Chopin, he recommended Schelling as substitute, and telegraphed—"Once my pupil, now my colleague."

Schelling's original compositions in large and small forms have been played and applauded all over the world. He has appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra many times in past years.

GLOBE-DEC. 10.

SYMPHONY IN EXTRA CONCERT

Liszt Concerto, with Ernest Schelling as Soloist, Pleases Audience

RABAUD, CHABRIER, BRAHMS PRESENTED

For the first concert of the extra series Mr. Monteux arranged this program: Brahms, Symphony No. 1, C minor; Raboud, "La Procession Nocturne"; Liszt, concerto for pianoforte in E flat. (soloist, Ernest Schelling); Chabrier, rhapsody, "Espana."

The audience last night, though very large, failed quite to fill Symphony hall. It seems odd that outside the constant symphony concert public there should not be a second public, eager for perhaps four or five concerts of high quality, large enough to pack the hall. But concertgoing seems, after all, to be much a matter of routine, a case of "either, or." The greater the pity.

To judge by the test of applause, the Liszt concerto gave most pleasure last night; with genuine cordiality Mr. Schelling was recalled four times. This much-played work of perennial vitality may be all things to all men. Some players see in it music of romance, of poetry, others find it dramatic to the verge of that theatricalism that calls for a ranting type of performance; a third body of pianists, the largest by far, pounce on it when they want a dazzling showpiece to display what they can do. Mr. Schelling chose a high heroic vein, set off with patches of rather pallid virtuosity. His was an amply competent performance, but quite without the charm of Mr. Proctor's, the romantic beauty of Miss aus der Ohe's, or the dazzling brilliancy of Sofie Menter's. The loveliness of the accompaniment was done no more than justice to.

The whole concert, for the rest, was not precisely inspiring, though the rhapsody of Spain went with the rhythmic incisiveness its stirring measures demand, and beautiful playing did what it could for the gentle suavity of Mr. Rabaud's singularly unsuggestive Nocturnal Procession. For the surging storm and stress and finally the splendid exaltation of the Brahms C minor symphony, Mr. Monteux seemed last night unable to reach that highest pitch of eloquence which is needful to show forth this marvellous music in full glory. The last movement, nevertheless, the audience warmly applauded.

The second concert in this second series will be given Jan. 29, with Renee Chemet, violin, as soloist. R. R. G.

HERALD-DEC. 1

Ernest Schelling Symphony Soloist

Liszt's E-flat major concerto for pianoforte and orchestra was played last evening by Ernest Schelling with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the first of the five special Monday evening concerts of that organization. The young pianist handled the work with a meaningful decision which brought a pleasing emphasis to its value, and especially to its rhythmic charm.

PIERRE MONTEUX

Brahms' first symphony was realized to its full beauty by the orchestra, under Monteux's capable baton. The work was carried to its close of flashing fire in an artistically triumphant manner. Raboud's mournful "Procession Nocturne," and Chabrier's lively and familiar "Espana" rhapsody completed the program.

ADVTSR-DE

FIRST OF EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Schelling Pleases in a Concerto by Liszt

An audience that came near filling Symphony Hall for the first of the five extra Boston Symphony concerts showed unusual enthusiasm for the brilliant playing of Ernest Schelling in Liszt's E flat major piano concerto. In the finale he gave an exhibition of virtuosity that was genuinely extraordinary. This concerto is a show piece and nothing else, but Mr Schelling certainly managed to get out of it most of the rather facile thrills Liszt put there.

Mr Monteux put together a program as interesting and as severe in its musical standard as those of the regular series of Symphony concerts. If last year's precedent is followed, however, there will be no duplication of numbers between regular and extra series, so that those who subscribe to both will not suffer from repetition.

Brahms' First Symphony, played with an eloquence that was a bit too restless, was cordially applauded. Times have changed since the days remembered by the elder generation when Boston audiences went away in droves during Brahms' pieces. It is now possible to admire both Brahms and Wagner without being exactly a partisan of either.

"La Procession Nocturne," by a former conductor of the orchestra, again proved that Henri Rabaud is one of the foremost living French composers. His music is written with delicate taste and considerable imaginative power.

Chabrier's "Espana," a piece common to the "Pops" repertory and that of the regular series of Symphony concerts, played with spirit and precision, obviously delighted the audience. One hopes Mr Monteux plans to end the other extra concerts with such familiar and well-liked standard pieces, less exacting than Brahms, but more worth while than most of Liszt.

Mme Renee Chemet, violinist, will be the soloist at the second extra concert, Jan 29.

GLOBE-DEC.

[35]

EVENING CONCERT

S ymphony Opens Ex- ra Season--Schelling as Soloist

e Boston Symphony Orchestra, P re Monteux, conductor, began last n t in Symphony Hall a series of fi Monday evening concerts.

he programme included Brahm's F st Symphony, Rabaud's "La Pro- sion Nocturne," Liszt's E-flat piano- e concerto and Chabrier's gorgeous psody, "Espanza." Mr. Ernest elling was the soloist.

he playing of the symphony was un- n: The first movement started with air performance. The slow move- t Mr. Monteux seemed to give as quate a reading as possible, consid- g its slender material. The third ement was well played, and the last ement, a very great piece of music, horribly forced. Mr. Monteux has a good deal better with Brahms e; was it because of his annoy- of so many latecomers that he d so badly on this occasion?

Mr. Schelling's Playing

baud's Symphonic Poem received a imaginative performance. The rto with Mr. Schelling at the went along at an amazing clip, in all was brilliantly played by orchestra and soloist. The piece is ery imaginative as far as musical s go, but it has some fine themes rtheless and makes very good ing even in these days. Because ered so few opportunities it was to gauge Mr. Schelling's perform- on the emotional side. But he t with marvellous style. In the nt passage work he matched the stra chord for chord, and his ssimo embroidery was simply im- e. At the close of the concerto pplause was very great and Mr. ling was recalled many times.

closing number, Chabrier's Rhap- found orchestra and leader on mettle. In modern dance music music suggestive in any way of the , Mr. Monteux probably has no in this country. His enthusiasm d to the players. They played highly accentuated rhythmical sing, with a Spanish flare and ndon that brought the concert to a iant close.

M BRAHMS TO LISZT; BACH B SCHOENBERG

Monteux and the Symphony Orchestr Their Other Audience, with M elling as Assisting Pianist—The Ol ster in Thin and Pale Modern Dress— grammes in Prospect—Incidents, Im sions, Opinions

B Y token of the assembled company the supplementary Symphony Con certs, renewed last evening in Sym phony Hall for a second season, giv rtunity and pleasure to many sorts o ners. To sift the audience was to dis r practiced musicians whose work an permit them no leisure for the longe s. Around them were those who, with and means amply at command, yet ive such concerts more agreeable than ty-four. Not far away, and easy to y, were the many who approach sym- ic music shyly, doubtingly. They d have pleasure; yet they mistrust the er and the means. Once they are pted, composers, conductor, orchestra, lly reassure and win them. Add to e, the students, half interested for nselves, half bidden by teachers to be rested; the casual comers whom one or other piece or Mr. Schelling as pianist racted; a little band of insatiates symphony concerts; and this assorting the audience may timely end. Obviously is quite different company to that which ny seated habits and diverse desires ather on Fridays and Saturdays. Yet it ems quite as stimulating upon Mr. Mon- ux and the band. Possibly, it occurs to hem that to relative strangers they are earing new, keen pleasures. Possibly, ey dimly foresee in them the practiced ublic of the future. Best and wisest, not e concerned in these concerts has been iggish over them. Nobody has said that ey were "educational," "communal," "al- uistic" or in any other way "beneficent." ey are, as they should be, occasions for giving and the taking of pleasure, ch, as everyone knows, are the twin-ful- ment of life.

s it happened, pleasure abounded last ning—first the fullest from Brahms's phony in C minor and from the cloth- and conveying voices. Men smiled in eighties when Bülow, mindful of thoven's Nine, called it the Tenth phony. Yet in those days, with reason t open-minded listeners have suspected deed to come when the first measures wed upon them. A little further for- , hearing Brahms's clarinets and s, they might as plausibly have dis- red a composer who could contrive a beauty of his own. Had they ears [illegible] might also have perceived [illegible] fulness of the music, even [illegible] ful, aloof from both [illegible] pleas[illegible] pretty condescensions. Even so, with the slow movement. "Ruminant," "abstruse," "rugged" were the ancient adjectives bestowed upon it. They are obsolete now, since the unacademic conductors through Nikisch and Muck to Toscanini and Monteux have here also opened Brahms's singing lips. Does anyone question nowadays the charm of the little Scherzo that is as smiling halt below the heights of the end?

Then those measures of transition, comparable even with the like bars of Beethoven's Fifth; then the whirring drum-beats, the proclaiming horns, the sweep into a finale that gives to music once and for all masculine resolution and elation even as in the final act of "Tristan," Wagner similarly enshrined the devotion of man to man. Fuller-throated than even Brahms's trombones, the first hearers of this "Tenth Symphony" might have published it as masterpiece. We of these days are surer and franker not only by the evidence of our own perceptions and emotions, not only by the siftings of time, but because also we have heard Brahms free-voiced. Too long the orthodox and the academic held him in undeserved, denying chains. The songful conductors released him and lo! Brahms was his songful self. "Only a German conductor may do justice to Brahms" went a comic shibboleth. The very Latins are now his truest mouthpieces and not least of them Pierre Monteux grown into the music and more and more eloquent therewith. A wealth of tone, alert to every course of the music, warm with its insistent song, gentle with its musing, tossing with its power, his orchestra now gives him.

After the classic—and a classic with many a romantic tinge—Mr. Monteux laid a bridge to such thorough-going romantics as Liszt and Chabrier. More particularly, the estimable Monsieur Rabaud was the bridge-builder—in his tone-poem, "The Midnight Procession." The merely cynica might say that he worked according t specifications prepared and recorded b Wagner in a certain "Tristan and Isolde. The peevish might complain that the mus is cut and wizened with delineative exac tude—not painting and suggestion, b photograph and enumeration in tone Yet it is possible to hear even music stencilling with charity. Be it said th Monsieur Rabaud has written an excee ingly accurate tone-poem and that it quite clear in every item from the hea spring night and the brooding Faust to advancing and receding procession, holy canticle of old men and maide Yet there is more stimulating reading t catalogues—in tones or print. Say, for ample, Chabrier's "España," with fre of rhythm, drive of motiv, flash upon o of color to give it the dissolute disor more to be desired than all the Rabaud prunes and prisms. For in Chabrier's gusts and glows go the mood and passion which are the spirit and the life of music, while within are the bone and muscle of invention and development. Agreed that in "España" Chabrier shouts and pounds and prances. Mr. Monteux knows the music too well, feels it too hotly to be fastidious. Chabrier never was.

Fortunately the two Parisians did not touch irritated elbows. Liszt of the first Concerto for Piano, with Mr. Schelling to play it, parted them. Of old, the pianist was pupil to Mr. Paderewski; he remains close friend. It may not, then, be wholly fanciful to note in his version of the beginning and the end of the Concerto a perceptible Paderewskian quality. In both Mr. Schelling sought and gained a ringing sonority, an austere brilliance of tone. He drove rhythm hard and high; made ornament diamond-like, cut modulations to the quick, stayed or stirred the pace as though rhapsodic impulse were whipping him. The music blazed and darted, as though orchestra and piano were blown in the fires of improvisation. All this was Paderewskian enough; but when Mr. Schelling passed to the slow division and Liszt fanciful, he was not so close to his Liszt fanceful, he was not so close to his master. The younger pianist chiselled and rounded Liszt's song; but it was no prism of softened colorings. He was adept in the scherzo, but not as one who tosses scintillant notes in sheer delight at the shower and sparkle. The Paderewskian power runs full and swift through Mr. Schelling; the Paderewskian poetry halts and thins.

TRANS DEC. 12

EXTRA CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

The first of the season's series of extra concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra manifestly delighted a large audience at Symphony Hall last evening. It is evident that the "extras" are welcomed and appreciated by many people, and may now be considered as important events of the musical season. Mr. Monteux presented a program of diversified interest; musicians and conductor were in perfect accord. Ernest Schelling, the piano soloist, gave a brilliant rendering of the Liszt concerto, and the audience was responsive—what more could one ask for an enjoyable concert?

There is ever something of the Christmas spirit in Brahms's orchestral music, and the choice of his First Symphony for the chief number was a happy one. As always, Brahms demonstrates that the highest beauty and originality in music may be attained while keeping strictly within established musical forms. Mr. Monteux's interpretation of this symphony displayed a structure of noble proportions, classic in outline, but rich in detail and throbbing with life and feeling.

TRAV. DEC. 12.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the first of its series of supplementary concerts in Symphony Hall last night, with Ernest Schelling, pianist, as soloist. The program was as follows:

Brahms, Symphony No. 1 in C minor.
Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne."
Liszt, Pianoforte Concerto in E flat.
Chabrier, Rhapsody, "España."

Each rehearing of this symphony serves to emphasize its wealth of musical material and the surpassing beauty of its construction. It was not composed in a day, and its composer did not win recognition in a year. But the growth of appreciation has been steady and seems certain to be permanent. Certainly such a performance as that of last night must strengthen Brahms' hold on the musical public. Evidently the symphony was a work of love for conductor and men, and their utterance was eloquent. Never was the power of the strings more impressive; never was there more poetic beauty of tone or more exquisite molding of phrase from Mr. Longy's oboe or Mr. Laurent's flute, and Mr. Monteux's keen sense of rhythm had opportunity for full play. Yet chiefly the orchestra shone as unified instrument, and through it the conductor spoke sincerely and understandingly the message of the composer. It is difficult to believe that the nobility of the final movement could be more stirringly voiced.

Mr. Rabaud suffered as few would not, by his place on the program. By comparison, his symphonic poem seemed but a half-filled container of music. Grant that the piece is well conceived, correctly executed; it yet lacks originality and individuality, does not bear repetition well.

Mr. Schelling, excellent pianist, won prolonged plaudits for his facile work in the concerto. This is a showpiece, of course, noisy and turbulent, yet there are cascades of tones in the quieter passages which fell exquisitely from Mr. Schelling's fingers. The Rhapsody brought the program liltingly to a close. The audience was of good size, and appreciative, but why should not the hall have been filled?

L. A. S.

MONITOR-DEC.12.

SECOND SYMPHONY LIGHTLY MELODIOUS

Mozart and Schumann Numbers Feature Programme Notable in Classic Restraint.

SAMAROFF IS APPRECIATED

Vaughan Williams Fantasia Interesting Exposition of Purely String Ensemble.—Cesar Franck Concluding Offering

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert at Infantry Hall last evening. An audience of not quite the large proportions that heard the opening concert here, but which, nevertheless, practically filled the hall, listened with evident pleasure to a programme that might be characterized as melodious and light rather than severely classic in outline.

This was due to the presence of the Mozart symphony in E-flat major, and the graceful and pleasing Schumann concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor, played by Olga Samaroff.

A fantasia for double-stringed orchestra by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, a work of rather pretentious style, considering its instrumental limitations, was played here for the first time. Mme. Samaroff scored a success by an artistic interpretation of the Schumann concerto, in which M. Monteux and his players gave admirable support.

The programme was as follows:

Mozart.......................................
Symphony in E-Flat Major (Koechel No. 543).......................................
Adagio; Allegro.
Andante.
Minuetto; Trio.
Finale; Allegro.
Vaughan Williams.......................................
Fantasia for Double Stringed Orchestra
Schumann.......................................
Concerto in A-Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54.......................
Allegro affettuoso.
Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
Allegro vivace.
Franck.......................................
Symphonic Poem: "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman")........

Although simple in structure and lacking the strength and instrumental color of more modern orchestral works, the Mozart symphonies are delightful old friends. They breathe sweetness and beauty. Their flow of melody and simple harmonic treatment provide restful enjoyment in these days of complex and noisy scores. The symphony in E-flat major contains music that charms by its spontaneity and freshness. With his usual artistic discernment, Mr. Monteux read it with appropriate delicacy and lightness of style. It was given with true Mozartian flavor, the orchestra exhibiting a polished ensemble both in its exacting requirements of phrasing and in its sparkling flights of ornamentation.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia is interesting particularly as an example of what can be accomplished in the way of tone coloring by strings alone. It is based on a theme by Thomas Tallis and the composer shows considerable ingenuity in handling the limited musical tools at his [illegible] passages and the evidence of [illegible] academicism in its structure, the work as a whole sounds labored rather than spontaneous. Mr. Monteux gave it a careful reading and received generous applause at its conclusion.

Mme. Samaroff, an artist of much imagination and fine technical skill, played the Schumann concerto with singing tone and graceful style. This work is not one in which the soloist is constantly obliged to battle for supremacy with the orchestra. Its smooth melodic flow does not invite technical display. It demands facile fingers and at times power in tonal effect, but the ever present artistic need is that of presenting lovely thematic material with its constantly changing, colorful variations. This Mme. Samaroff accomplished with charming ease of style. She possesses a splendid sense of rhythm and she is mistress of the art of phrasing. At the conclusion of her number she was recalled at least six times to acknowledge deserved applause.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," played for the programme's final number, follows the story of the mythical hunstman and portrays his punishment for indulging in the sport of the chase on the Sabbath. The piece ends with the flight of the sacrilegious Count, who is hotly pursued by a pack of demons. It was played with spirit and abandon.

A. F. P.

PROV. JOURNAL DEC. 13

SYMPHONY PRESENTS NOVELTIES

"Chadwick, Bax and Lully Share Honors With Sibelius

BY OLIN DOWNES

One listens to a work such as the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and wonders whether Mr. Lothrop Stoddard is right in claiming that civilization is in danger because there are left no young, barbaric, unexploited races to infuse fresh blood into an exhausted modern society. Here is the music of Sibelius, a composer of a primitive power and sincerity, due partly, at least, to racial and geographic backgrounds. The lament of this music seems the lament of some barbaric hero, strangely and perplexedly adrift in a world to which he does not belong.

CORDIALLY RECEIVED

The reception given this symphony, last year, when it was first produced in Boston, as well as yesterday afternoon, was very cordial. It has been received with more warmth than any other work of Sibelius we remember, and yet its idiom is that of the advanced Sibelius, much harder to understand than the Sibelius, for example, of the second symphony which was long in finding recognition here. It is another proof of the way in which the musical world moves, of the rapidity with which our ears adjust themselves to new impressions.

Perhaps it is also to be explained by the powerful and imaginative quality of music, which can no longer be denied.

Two Novelties Heard

Two novelties were included in yesterday's programme, Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "November Woods," and George W. Chadwick's "Anniversary" Overture. Between these works and the Sibelius symphony was the ballet suite of music by Lully, as arranged by Mottl, music of old world charm and polish, representing a period of art gone never to return, and a little the more precious on that account. The suite was interpreted with technical finish and in a worthy spirit by Monteux. It was well contrasted with the composition of Sibelius. Nothing could have been more dissimiliar.

Nothing could have brought into more impressive relief the different qualities of the two scores and apropos of Lully, the words of Romain Rolland, in the programme book, are worth quoting: "With all his vices, this crafty person, this archknave, this miser, this glutton, this rake, this cur—whatever name his companions were pleased to call him—with all his vices he was a great artist and a master of music in France."

Bax Not in Best Vein

Bax's symphonic poem, despite a poetic mood, was a disappointment to us. We find the music on preliminary acquaintance less distinguished than either "An Sluagh Sidhe," or "The Garden of Fand," heard before in this city. The orchestration is very beautiful and brilliant, if not unlike the [illegible] of other [illegible] probably not far from [illegible] place.

Mr. Chadwick's overture has no published programme. Doubtless there is a very definite one in the composer's mind. It was first performed at the concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union, Norfolk, Connecticut, on June 7 last. The opening is retrospective in mood, but this mood changes, and there is the humor that is native to Mr. Chadwick, a youthful gaiety and recklessness, and a certain simplicity of musical speech characteristic of the man. The performance was painstaking and eloquent. The overture was cordially applauded.

POST-DEC. 16.

BAX AGAIN TO BOSTON

ANOTHER PIECE BY THE RISEN BRITON

"November Woods," Impending Tone-Poem at the Symphony Concerts—Backgrounds and Foregrounds—The Compos as English Reviewers Judge Him—C Merit, Steady Progress

ONCE more there is room at the Symphony Concerts for a tone-poem by Arnold Bax, British composer, to whom conductors of orchestras in America lend kindly ear. This time the piece is autumnal revery, "November Woods," and Mr. Monteux has set it on his programme for Friday and Saturday next. Below follows some account of the music. For preface may stand a few paragraphs about Bax—larger and larger figure in English concert-halls—clipped from recent reviews in London. The occasion was a whole evening of the composer's music—quite as though he were a Chaikovsky or a Wagner. Mr. Dent, for example, wrote in The Athenaeum:

A generation ago our two leading schools of music in London represented two divergent tendencies in the training of composers. The venerable Royal Academy of Music stood for modernity, while the comparatively youthful Royal College of Music stood for academicism. The College was the home of the Brahms-Joachim cult; The Academy produced revolutionaries who admired Wagner and composed symphonic poems. From that throng of anti-academic composers there emerges one and only one of real distinction today—Arnold Bax. He alone has survived his early training, and it has taken him a considerable number of years to throw off its evil influences. He has survived it because he happens to be supremely endowed with natural musical gifts. Ever since his student days music has poured out of him, so that he has never had much inclination to practice economy or arrangement of musical material. He has often been classed with the pictorialists, because he gives his pieces titles. But I believe this judgment to be superficial. He may receive an initial stimulus from literature or other external impressions, but he always refuses to go into details of programme, and though his musical thought is only too often rambling, it always grows out of itself. He has the misfortune to be a fluent pianist and an exceptionally quick reader from orchestral scores; like Schubert, he is very susceptible to musical impressions; he absorbs everything, because nothing is any effort to him. His temperament has always led him more and more towards Celtic romanticism, and it is now fairly clear that this is the style of music which is most personal to him. Paradoxical as it may seem, the Celtic twilight has been a means of clarifying his style, for as he became more immersed in it he gradually learned to discriminate between the ideas which were his own and expressed his own thoughts, and those which he had brought with him from the schools. For years he has been deficient in sense of style, but he has always had a wonderful sense of beauty and a natural delicacy of thought; and these things should in time lead to the evolution of style, though it may take a long time. From a technical point of view much of Bax's music seems today almost reactionary. It is too soon to begin speaking of him as an elderly revolutionary, but his earlier works do not sound as modern as they once did. Their beauty survives. Today he contrasts oddly with the younger generation. It is not merely that he gives free play to sentiment and romance; his harmony and melody associate him definitely with the past rather than with the future. But for all that his music is individual and can afford to be indifferent to passing fashions. In his latest works he is finding style. And the proof of his genuine inspiration lies in the fact that when he does achieve style and a sense of formal beauty it results from his having had to grapple with a new technical problem. Then he eliminates superfluities and we can see and value the beauty that they masked.

In turn, apropos the recent concert filled wholly with Bax's pieces, Mr. Scholes of The Observer, sprinkled praises upon the composer. "The test," he says, "of such a concert is severe, but I think it is everywhere admitted that Bax passed it successfully. One characteristic of the composer that contributed to our satisfaction with the entertainment was his astonishing variety. Were it possible for us to weary of any one kind of Bax's music we had no time to do so, passing rapidly, as we did, from orchestral pieces to solo-songs, from these to a piano sonata, then to unaccompanied choral music, to a concerto for solo viola with orchestra, to more songs, to smaller numbers, to choral carols with unusual accompaniments of odd instruments, and finally to an orchestral piece in the lighter vein, 'Mediterranean.' Versatility is one of the marks of Bax and it was well illustrated that evening.

"Another characteristic is skilful technique. There was 'finish' in everything we heard. Musical composition is both an art and a craft, and Bax's craftsmanship is great and growing. It is impossible to look at a page of the later Bax and not to see that, apart altogether from any questions of 'inspiration,' in the material used, he knows his job in putting it together. . . . Sincerity [illegible] sure Bax means every note he writes. The Baxian commonplaces are [illegible]

MONDAY EVENING CONCERT

Symphony Opens Extra Season--Schelling as Soloist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, began last night in Symphony Hall a series of five Monday evening concerts.

The programme included Brahm's First Symphony, Rabaud's "La Pro- ession Nocturne," Liszt's E-flat piano- rte concerto and Chabrier's gorgeous hapsody, "Espanza." Mr. Ernest chelling was the soloist.

The playing of the symphony was un- en: The first movement started with fair performance. The slow move- ent Mr. Monteux seemed to give as equate a reading as possible, consid- ing its slender material. The third ovement was well played, and the last ovement, a very great piece of music, s horribly forced. Mr. Monteux has e a good deal better with Brahms ore; was it because of his annoy- ce of so many latecomers that he ed so badly on this occasion?

Mr. Schelling's Playing

abaud's Symphonic Poem received a hly imaginative performance. The ncerto with Mr. Schelling at the no went along at an amazing clip, in all was brilliantly played by h orchestra and soloist. The piece is very imaginative as far as musical ues go, but it has some fine themes ertheless and makes very good ening even in these days. Because offered so few opportunities it was d to gauge Mr. Schelling's perform- e on the emotional side. But he ed with marvelous style. In the liant passage work he matched the estra chord for chord, and his issimo embroidery was simply im- se. At the close of the concerto applause was very great and Mr. lling was recalled many times.

e closing number, Chabrier's Rhap- , found orchestra and leader on r mettle. In modern dance music music suggestive in any way of the ce, Mr. Monteux probably has no al in this country. His enthusiasm ead to the players. They played h highly accentuated rhythmical asing, with a Spanish flare and ndon that brought the concert to a liant close.

OM BRAHMS TO LISZT; BACH B SCHOENBERG

Monteux and the Symphony Orchestr Their Other Audience, with M chelling as Assisting Pianist—The Ol ster in Thin and Pale Modern Dress—ogrammes in Prospect—Incidents, Im essions, Opinions

BY token of the assembled company the supplementary Symphony Concerts, renewed last evening in Symphony Hall for a second season, giv ortunity and pleasure to many sorts o ners. To sift the audience was to di r practiced musicians whose work an permit them no leisure for the longe es. Around them were those who, with e and means amply at command, yet five such concerts more agreeable than nty-four. Not far away, and easy to ry, were the many who approach sym- nic music shyly, doubtingly. They ld have pleasure; yet they mistrust the tter and the means. Once they are pted, composers, conductor, orchestra, ally reassure and win them. Add to se, the students, half interested for mselves, half bidden by teachers to be erested; the casual comers whom one or other piece or Mr. Schelling as pianist racted; a little band of insatiates r symphony concerts; and this assorting the audience may timely end. Obviously is quite different company to that which any seated habits and diverse desires ther on Fridays and Saturdays. Yet it ems quite as stimulating upon Mr. Mon- ux and the band. Possibly, it occurs to hem that to relative strangers they are earing new, keen pleasures. Possibly, hey dimly foresee in them the practiced ublic of the future. Best and wisest, not e concerned in these concerts has been riggish over them. Nobody has said that ey were "educational," "communal," "al- istic" or in any other way "beneficent." ey are, as they should be, occasions for giving and the taking of pleasure, ch, as everyone knows, are the twin-ful- ent of life.

it happened, pleasure abounded last ing—first the fullest from Brahms's phony in C minor and from the cloth- and conveying voices. Men smiled in eighties when Bülow, mindful of thoven's Nine, called it the Tenth phony. Yet in those days, with reason t open-minded listeners have suspected deed to come when the first measures wed upon them. A little further for- , hearing Brahms's clarinets and s, they might as plausibly have dis- red a composer who could contrive a l beauty of his own. Had they ears ear, they might also have perceived ntrinsic songfulness of the music, even though Brahms w[illegible]nt and [illegible]ful, aloof from both sensuous pleas[illegible] and pretty condescensions. Even so, with the slow movement. "Ruminant," "abstruse," "rugged" were the ancient adjectives bestowed upon it. They are obsolete now, since the unacademic conductors through Nikisch and Muck to Toscanini and Monteux have here also opened Brahms's singing lips. Does anyone question nowadays the charm of the little Scherzo that is as smiling halt below the heights of the end?

Then those measures of transition, comparable even with the like bars of Beethoven's Fifth; then the whirring drum-beats, the proclaiming horns, the sweep into a finale that gives to music once and for all masculine resolution and elation even as in the final act of "Tristan," Wagner similarly enshrined the devotion of man to man. Fuller-throated than even Brahms's trombones, the first hearers of this "Tenth Symphony" might have published it as masterpiece. We of these days are surer and franker not only by the evidence of our own perceptions and emotions, not only by the siftings of time, but because also we have heard Brahms free-voiced. Too long the orthodox and the academic held him in undeserved, denying chains. The songful conductors released him and lo! Brahms was his songful self. "Only a German conductor may do justice to Brahms" went a comic shibboleth. The very Latins are now his truest mouthpieces and not least of them Pierre Monteux grown into the music and more and more eloquent therewith. A wealth of tone, alert to every course of the music, warm with its insistent song, gentle with its musing, tossing with its power, his orchestra now gives him.

After the classic—and a classic with many a romantic tinge—Mr. Monteux laid a bridge to such thorough-going romantics as Liszt and Chabrier. More particularly, the estimable Monsieur Rabaud was the bridge-builder—in his tone-poem, "The Midnight Procession." The merely cyni a might say that he worked according t specifications prepared and recorded b Wagner in a certain "Tristan and Isolde. The peevish might complain that the mus is cut and wizened with delineative exac tude—not painting and suggestion, b photograph and enumeration in tone Yet it is possible to hear even music stencilling with charity. Be it said th Monsieur Rabaud has written an excee ingly accurate tone-poem and that it quite clear in every item from the hea spring night and the brooding Faust to advancing and receding procession, holy canticle of old men and maide Yet there is more stimulating reading t catalogues—in tones or print. Say, for ample, Chabrier's "España," with fre of rhythm, drive of motiv, flash upon cl of color to give it the dissolute disor more to be desired than all the Rabaud prunes and prisms. For in Chabrier's gusts and glows go the mood and passion which are the spirit and the life of music, while within are the bone and muscle of invention and development. Agreed that in "España" Chabrier shouts and pounds and prances. Mr. Monteux knows the music too well, feels it too hotly to be fastidious. Chabrier never was.

Fortunately the two Parisians did not touch irritated elbows. Liszt of the first Concerto for Piano, with Mr. Schelling to play it, parted them. Of old, the pianist was pupil to Mr. Paderewski; he remains close friend. It may not, then, be wholly fanciful to note in his version of the beginning and the end of the Concerto a perceptible Paderewskian quality. In both Mr. Schelling sought and gained a ringing sonority, an austere brilliance of tone. He drove rhythm hard and high; made ornament diamond-like, cut modulations to the quick, stayed or stirred the pace as though rhapsodic impulse were whipping him. The music blazed and darted, as though orchestra and piano were blown in the fires of improvisation. All this was Paderewskian enough; but when Mr. Schelling passed to the slow division and Liszt fanciful, he was not so close to his Liszt fanceful, he was not so close to his master. The younger pianist chiselled and rounded Liszt's song; but it was no prism of softened colorings. He was adept in the scherzo, but not as one who tosses scintillant notes in sheer delight at the shower and sparkle. The Paderewskian power runs full and swift through Mr. Schelling; the Paderewskian poetry halts and thins.

TRANS DEC. 12

EXTRA CONCERT BY BOSTON SYMPHONY

The first of the season's series of extra concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra manifestly delighted a large audience at Symphony Hall last evening. It is evident that the "extras" are welcomed and appreciated by many people, and may now be considered as important events of the musical season. Mr. Monteux presented a program of diversified interest; musicians and conductor were in perfect accord. Ernest Schelling, the piano soloist, gave a brilliant rendering of the Liszt concerto, and the audience was responsive—what more could one ask for an enjoyable concert?

There is ever something of the Christmas spirit in Brahms's orchestral music, and the choice of his First Symphony for the chief number was a happy one. As always, Brahms demonstrates that the highest beauty and originality in music may be attained while keeping strictly within established musical forms. Mr. Monteux's interpretation of this symphony displayed a structure of noble proportions, classic in outline, but rich in detail and throbbing with life and feeling.

TRAV. DEC. 12.

"Extra" Sympho[illegible]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave the first of its series of supplementary concerts in Symphony Hall last night, with Ernest Schelling, pianist, as soloist. The program was as follows:

Brahms, Symphony No. 1 in C minor.
Rabaud, "La Procession Nocturne."
Liszt, Pianoforte Concerto in E flat.
Chabrier, Rhapsody, "España."

Each rehearing of this symphony serves to emphasize its wealth of musical material and the surpassing beauty of its construction. It was not composed in a day, and its composer did not win recognition in a year. But the growth of appreciation has been steady and seems certain to be permanent. Certainly such a performance as that of last night must strengthen Brahms' hold on the musical public. Evidently the symphony was a work of love for conductor and men, and their utterance was eloquent. Never was the power of the strings more impressive; never was there more poetic beauty of tone or more exquisite molding of phrase from Mr. Longy's oboe or Mr. Laurent's flute, and Mr. Monteux's keen sense of rhythm had opportunity for full play. Yet chiefly the orchestra shone as unified instrument, and through it the conductor spoke sincerely and understandingly the message of the composer. It is difficult to believe that the nobility of the final movement could be more stirringly voiced.

Mr. Rabaud suffered as few would not, by his place on the program. By comparison, his symphonic poem seemed but a half-filled container of music. Grant that the piece is well conceived, correctly executed; it yet lacks originality and individuality, does not bear repetition well.

Mr. Schelling, excellent pianist, won prolonged plaudits for his facile work in the concerto. This is a showpiece, of course, noisy and turbulent, yet there are cascades of tones in the quieter passages which fell exquisitely from Mr. Schelling's fingers. The Rhapsody brought the program liltingly to a close. The audience was of good size, and appreciative, but why should not the hall have bee filled?

L. A. S.

MONITOR-DEC. 12.

SECOND SYMPHONY LIGHTLY MELODIOUS

Mozart and Schumann Numbers Feature Programme Notable in Classic Restraint.

SAMAROFF IS APPRECIATED

Vaughan Williams Fantasia Interesting Exposition of Purely String Ensemble.—Cesar Franck Concluding Offering

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert at Infantry Hall last evening. An audience of not quite the large proportions that heard the opening concert here, but which, nevertheless, practically filled the hall, listened with evident pleasure to a programme that might be characterized as melodious and light rather than severely classic in outline.

This was due to the presence of the Mozart symphony in E-flat major, and the graceful and pleasing Schumann concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor, played by Olga Samaroff.

A fantasia for double-stringed orchestra by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, a work of rather pretentious style, considering its instrumental limitations, was played here for the first time. Mme. Samaroff scored a success by an artistic interpretation of the Schumann concerto, in which M. Monteux and his players gave admirable support.

The programme was as follows:

Mozart..........................
  Symphony in E-Flat Major (Koechel No. 543)
  Adagio; Allegro.
  Andante.
  Minuetto; Trio.
  Finale; Allegro.
Vaughan Williams..........................
  Fantasia for Double Stringed Orchestra
Schumann ....
  Concerto in A-Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54..........
  Allegro affettuoso.
  Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
  Allegro vivace.
Franck ....
  Symphonic Poem: "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman")........

Although simple in structure and lacking the strength and instrumental color of more modern orchestral works, the Mozart symphonies are delightful old friends. They breathe sweetness and beauty. Their flow of melody and simple harmonic treatment provide restful enjoyment in these days of complex and noisy scores. The symphony in E-flat major contains music that charms by its spontaneity and freshness. With his usual artistic discernment, Mr. Monteux read it with appropriate delicacy and lightness of style. It was given with true Mozartian flavor, the orchestra exhibiting a polished ensemble both in its exacting requirements of phrasing and in its sparkling flights of ornamentation.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia is interesting particularly as an example of what can be accomplished in the way of tone coloring by strings alone. It is based on a theme by Thomas Tallis and the composer shows considerable ingenuity in handling the limited musical tools at his disposal. [illegible] In spite of many undeniably effective passages and the evidence of thorough musicianship in its structure, the work as a whole sounds labored rather than spontaneous. M. Monteux gave it a careful reading and received generous applause at its conclusion.

Mme. Samaroff, an artist of much imagination and fine technical skill, played the Schumann concerto with singing tone and graceful style. This work is not one in which the soloist is constantly obliged to battle for supremacy with the orchestra. Its smooth melodic flow does not invite technical display. It demands facile fingers and at times power in tonal effect, but the ever present artistic need is that of presenting lovely thematic material with its constantly changing, colorful variations. This Mme. Samaroff accomplished with charming ease of style. She possesses a splendid sense of rhythm and she is mistress of the art of phrasing. At the conclusion of her number she was recalled at least six times to acknowledge deserved applause.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," played for the programme's final number, follows the story of the mythical hunstman and portrays his punishment for indulging in the sport of the chase on the Sabbath. The piece ends with the flight of the sacrilegious Count, who is hotly pursued by a pack of demons. It was played with spirit and abandon.

A. F. P.

PROV. JOURNAL DEC. 1

SYMPHONY PRESENTS NOVELTIES

"Chadwick, Bax and Lully Share Honors With Sibelius

BY OLIN DOWNES

One listens to a work such as the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, played at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, and wonders whether Mr. Lothrop Stoddard is right in claiming that civilization is in danger because there are left no young, barbaric, unexploited races to infuse fresh blood into an exhausted modern society. Here is the music of Sibelius, a composer of a primitive power and sincerity, due partly, at least, to racial and geographic backgrounds. The lament of this music seems the lament of some barbaric hero, strangely and perplexedly adrift in a world to which he does not belong.

CORDIALLY RECEIVED

The reception given this symphony, last year, when it was first produced in Boston, as well as yesterday afternoon, was very cordial. It has been received with more warmth than any other work of Sibelius we remember, and yet its idiom is that of the advanced Sibelius, much harder to understand than the Sibelius, for example, of the second symphony which was long in finding recognition here. It is another proof of the way in which the musical world moves, of the rapidity with which our ears adjust themselves to new impressions.

Perhaps it is also to be explained by the powerful and imaginative quality of music, which can no longer be denied.

Two Novelties Heard

Two novelties were included in yesterday's programme, Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "November Woods," and George W. Chadwick's "Anniversary" Overture. Between these works and the Sibelius symphony was the ballet suite of music by Lully, as arranged by Mottl, music of old world charm and polish, representing a period of art gone never to return, and a little the more precious on that account. The suite was interpreted with technical finish and in a worthy spirit by Monteux. It was well contrasted with the composition of Sibelius. Nothing could have been more dissimiliar.

Nothing could have brought into more impressive relief the different qualities of the two scores and apropos of Lully, the words of Romain Rolland, in the programme book, are worth quoting: "With all his vices, this crafty person, this archknave, this miser, this glutton, this rake, this cur—whatever name his companions were pleased to call him—with all his vices he was a great artist and a master of music in France."

Bax Not in Best Vein

Bax's symphonic poem, despite a poetic mood, was a disappointment to us. We find the music on preliminary acquaintance less distinguished than either "An Sluagh Sidhe," or "The Garden of Fand," heard before in this city. The orchestration is very beautiful and brilliant, if not unlike the instrumentation of other works by the same composer. It is [illegible] and the expression of melancholy not far from the [illegible] place.

Mr. Chadwick's overture has no published programme. Doubtless there is a very definite one in the composer's mind. It was first performed at the concert of the Litchfield County Choral Union, Norfolk, Connecticut, on June 7 last. The opening is retrospective in mood, but this mood changes, and there is the humor that is native to Mr. Chadwick, a youthful gaiety and recklessness, and a certain simplicity of musical speech characteristic of the man. The performance was painstaking and eloquent. The overture was cordially applauded.

POST. DEC. 16.

BAX AGAIN TO BOSTON

ANOTHER PIECE BY THE RISEN BRITON

"November Woods," Impending Tone-Poem at the Symphony Concerts—Backgrounds and Foregrounds—The Composer as English Reviewers Judge Him—Clear Merit, Steady Progress

ONCE more there is room at the Symphony Concerts for a tone-poem by Arnold Bax, British composer, to whom conductors of orchestras in America lend kindly ear. This time the piece is autumnal revery, "November Woods," and Mr. Monteux has set it on his programme for Friday and Saturday next. Below follows some account of the music. For preface may stand a few paragraphs about Bax—larger and larger figure in English concert-halls—clipped from recent reviews in London. The occasion was a whole evening of the composer's music—quite as though he were a Chaikovsky or a Wagner. Mr. Dent, for example, wrote in The Athenæum:

> A generation ago our two leading schools of music in London represented two divergent tendencies in the training of composers. The venerable Royal Academy of Music stood for modernity, while the comparatively youthful Royal College of Music stood for academicism. The College was the home of the Brahms-Joachim cult; The Academy produced revolutionaries who admired Wagner and composed symphonic poems. From that throng of anti-academic composers there emerges one and only one of real distinction today—Arnold Bax. He alone has survived his early training, and it has taken him a considerable number of years to throw off its evil influences. He has survived it because he happens to be supremely endowed with natural musical gifts. Ever since his student days music has poured out of him, so that he has never had much inclination to practice economy or arrangement of musical material. He has often been classed with the pictorialists, because he gives his pieces titles. But I believe this judgment to be superficial. He may receive an initial stimulus from literature or other external impressions, but he always refuses to go into details of programme, and though his musical thought is only too often rambling, it always grows out of itself. He has the misfortune to be a fluent pianist and an exceptionally quick reader from orchestral scores; like Schubert, he is very susceptible to musical impressions; he absorbs everything, because nothing is any effort to him. His temperament has always led him more and more towards Celtic romanticism, and it is now fairly clear that this is the style of music which is most personal to him. Paradoxical as it may seem, the Celtic twilight has been a means of clarifying his style, for as he became more immersed in it he gradually learned to discriminate between the ideas which were his own and expressed his own thoughts, and those which he had brought with him from the schools. For years he has been deficient in sense of style, but he has always had a wonderful sense of beauty and a natural delicacy of thought; and these things should in time lead to the evolution of style, though it may take a long time. From a technical point of view much of Bax's music seems today almost reactionary. It is too soon to begin speaking of him as an elderly revolutionary, but his earlier works do not sound as modern as they once did. Their beauty survives. Today he contrasts oddly with the younger generation. It is not merely that he gives free play to sentiment and romance; his harmony and melody associate him definitely with the past rather than with the future. But for all that his music is individual and can afford to be indifferent to passing fashions. In his latest works he is finding style. And the proof of his genuine inspiration lies in the fact that when he does achieve style and a sense of formal beauty it results from his having had to grapple with a new technical problem. Then he eliminates superfluities; and we can see and value the beauty that they masked.

In turn, apropos the recent concert filled wholly with Bax's pieces, Mr. Scholers of The Observer, sprinkled praises upon the composer. "The test," he says, "of such a concert is severe, but I think it is everywhere admitted that Bax passed it successfully. One characteristic of the composer that contributed to our satisfaction with the entertainment was his astonishing variety. Were it possible for us to weary of any one kind of Bax's music we had no time to do so, passing rapidly, as we did, from orchestral pieces to solo-songs, from these to a piano sonata, then to unaccompanied choral music, to a concerto for solo viola with orchestra, to more songs, to smaller piano numbers, to choral carols with unusual accompaniments of odd instruments, and finally to an orchestral piece in the lighter vein, 'Mediterranean.' Versatility is one of the marks of Bax and it was well illustrated that evening.

"Another characteristic is skilful technique. There was 'finish' in everything we heard. Musical composition is both an art and a craft, and Bax's craftsmanship is great and growing. It is impossible to look at a page of the later Bax and not to see that, apart altogether from any questions of 'inspiration,' in the material used, he 'knows his job' in putting it together. . . . Sincerity also marks him. I am sure Bax means every note he writes. The Baxian commonplaces are disguised commonplaces, and the composer himself [illegible] not penetrate their disguise. I do ... greater demand we ... of a composer than sincerity. His ... or lack of it, is a gift of the gods, ... for honest intention in the use of it ... hold him responsible. Finally ... a mystic. It is a curious thing that ... time when a great deal of Conti-... 'modernism' is affecting a greater ...ness of expression 'stark juxtaposi-...n of unrelated sonorities' and an 'ab-...ce of extra-musical emotion' we down-...ight, direct British continue to write 'subjectively' and even mystically. This is true, at any rate, of Vaughan Williams, Holst, Ireland and Bax—the four younger composers whose work already shows maturity and on whom, therefore, we at present most securely rest our hope."

"November Woods," the tone-poem to be played at Symphony Hall tomorrow and Saturday, dates from 1917, when Bax declared that by it he preferred to be judged as composer for orchestra. Of it, Edwin Evans, the English reviewer, who prepared two articles on Bax for the Musical Times, has written:

> "November Woods" is a picture of storms and drying leaves and the sere and dank atmosphere of autumn. Mingled with this is the mood of human loneliness and regret, which is finally absorbed in the restlessness and turmoil of nature.

On the occasion of the first performance—in Manchester, in England, on Nov. 8, 1920, a reviewer for the same journal also said:

> It is all to the good when a composer tells you that his work is not to be regarded as objective programme-music, but as an impresison of the dank and stormy ruin of nature in late autumn, and with these externals there would appear to be linked personal feelings, some affinity with the mood of the Buckinghamshire wood where he conceived the idea of this tone-poem.

For the present, at least, Bax is one of the moderns who has built upon the old, not discarded it for the wholly new. The score of "November Woods," harmonically ingenious, makes free use of dissonance but not of dissonance calculated to distress conservative ears. And in it are melodic phrases of recognizable pattern. In common with all present-day composers Bax uses the orchestra skilfully and imaginatively, and this particular score is replete with felicitous strokes of instrumentation. The phenomena of nature are, perhaps, dangerous things to meddle with in music. One thinks of the thunderstorm in the "Pastoral Symphony" with an indulgent smile, but Bax did not hesitate to follow in the path of many a fellow-composer who has sought to express the wind and the blinding rain in symphonic terms. "November Woods" is fine music in spite of, rather than because of, these attempts at realism.

From Mr. Chadwick

Bax's tone-poem, "November Woods," elsewhere noted on this page, is not the only new piece announced for the Symphony Concerts of this week. Mr. Monteux's programme also contains an "Anniversary Overture" by Mr. Chadwick, written recently at the comp'etion of his twenty-five years as director of the New England Conservatory of Music. It was first produced at the Norfolk Fes'ival last June, under the direction of the composer, at the same concert at which Vaughan Williams conducted through the first performance in America of his "Pastoral Symphony." For the performances of his Overture by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 27 and 28 last, M . Chadwick provided an analysis of the piece which concludes with these words: "The structure of the work is symphonic, but the atmosphere of it is romantic and at times dramatic. The e is no programme." The music adheres in the main to the accepted pattern of such concert overtures and abounds in scholarly devices, among them that of symmetrical inve sion, or the playing of the notes of t he theme in reverse order. But as in all Mr. Chadwick's more formal compositions, such scholarship goes hand in hand with geniality of mood and warmth of utterance. Never is learning paraded for its own sake.

TRANS. DEC 14.

SYMPHONY HAS INTERESTING PROGRAM

The program that Mr. Monteux offered to his audience at the eighth symphony concert was nothing if not diversified. He opened it with the Sibelius symphony in E-flat ... (the Fifth) and from that he took a long stride to the Lully Ballet Suite (arranged by Felix Mottl); then came the "November Woods," by Bax, played for the first time in Boston. The final number on the program was the Anniversary Overture by Chadwick.

Greater contrast than that between the austerity of both the Sibelius symphony and the "November Woods" with the delicate, whimsical and altogether charming ... Suite is seldom heard. Perhaps the latter was the most liked number on the program because it has a touch that is peculiarly quaint ... old-fashioned and was exquisitely given by conductor and ...

... composition by Mr. Chadwick ... to be decidedly interesting, ... full of life and color with ... that are fascinatingly well ... Mr. Monteux, in acknowl-... hearty applause at the ... this number, motioned ... was in the ...

... continued apprecia-tion ... the gathering.

... as to the symphony was divided—those who liked it liked it immensely. The others found little to enjoy, although much to praise.

AMER-DEC. 16.

BOSTON WORK IN SYMPHONY BILL

George W. Chadwick, dean of Boston composers, is represented on this week's Symphony program by his "Anniversary Overture."

The motto of the Symphony Orchestra seems to be, "Be not the first by whom the new is tried." The intensely lyrical and dramatic Chadwick piece was first heard at the Litchfield festival in Norfolk, Conn., last Spring and then in Chicago. The Chicago orchestra also gave the first American performance of Arnold Bax's new symphonic poem, "November Woods," which Boston heard for the first time yesterday.

Mr. Chadwick, who annually enjoys the plaudits of his Symphony admirers, does characteristic work in the "Anniversary Overture"—sound, scholarly and agreeable writing, dramatic, but never shocking. The Bax work, which pictures a mood rather than a forest, is piquant, but, like "Fairy Hills," played here two years ago, it leaves much to the listener's imagination—too much in fact. Bax is Neo-Celtic to the point of being cryptic.

A finer, clearer study of moods is to be found in the fifth Sibelius symphony, which heads the program. This master-work comprises some of the most impressive symphonic music written since Brahms laid down his pen. Here are lyric beauty and dramatic power woven into a tone epic—music suggesting the composer's native Finland, with its chill, sombre landscapes and people still sore from the Russian yoke.

For something like holiday diversion Mr. Monteux also offers an old French ballet suite by Lully.

ADVTSR-DEC. 16.

8TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Program Includes Pieces by Bax and Chadwick New to Hub Audiences

MORE PRETENTIOUS MUSIC IS SIBELIUS'S

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 5; Lully-Mottl, Ballet Suite; Bax, "November Woods" (first time in Boston); Chadwick, Anniversary Overture (first time in Boston).

Walter Savage Landor represented himself as saying to Archdeacon Hare with reference to his five volumes of "Imaginary Conversations": "I shall dine late, but the dining room will be well lighted, the guests few and select." A proud saying, but not a conceited or a foolish one.

Would the Sibelius of the later symphonies answer any objector in the same spirit? It is doubtful whether for some years to come this fifth symphony will please the many, for it lacks sensuousness, it is without an obvious and incisive appeal; nor has it beauty, as beauty in music is understood by the crowd; nor has it thunder-and-lightning climaxes with all the percussion instruments working overtime and the organ called in to swell the din in the apotheosis. It is a strange but not a baffling work. Those who yearn for "explanations" of music might find the first movement a seascape, with only screaming gulls to relieve the loneliness. "Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste."

Sibelius wrote this symphony for himself, and possibly, as Mozart said of one of his works, for a few friends. Whether he had any definite program in his mind is immaterial. A man of virile nature and of strong emotions, he expressed them in tones, in his own way, without thought of any school or chapel, ancient or modern. No one can say, this composer or that composer influenced him. Wild and sombre as are some of the pages, there is no taint of pessimism. Sibelius is not afraid to be alone with savage nature, and as there is beauty in the Alps, in spite of certain 18th century English travellers, in the desert, or in Thomas Hardy's Egdon Heath, so there is beauty in this symphony, nor is it always subtle and hidden.

This man of the North knows the exciting effect of oriental repetition in phrase and rhythm, and on these repetitions he rears imposing musical structures. The symphony is not always the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea"; there are measures to which dervishes might whirl, rays of the sun break through the clouds. We prefer Sibelius when his sky is leaden.

But will the great public ever love "to cope him in these sullen fits?"

Arnold Bax is one of the few English composers who is enriched with the gift of imagination. His November is a month of storm and stress, yet not the November of Thomas Hood, but the November of Clare's Shepherd:

> "At length it comes among the > forest oaks,
> With sobbing ebbs, and uproar > gathering high.
>
> * * * *
>
> While clouds above him in wild fury
> boil,
> And winds drive heavily the beat-> rain."

Did not some Frenchman say that in November respectable Englishmen went out and hanged themselves. Picturing the fury of the elements, Bax also expresses the reaction on mortal man; the month of a dying year without the shining ray of Bethlehem's star. A symphonic poem to be heard again in spite of a seeming prolixity.

As Mr. Monteux was the full and sympathetic interpreter of Sibelius and Bax in their moods and emotions, so he caught the spirit of Lully's 17th century dances. (How eloquently the orchestra aided their leader throughout the concert!) Mottl arranged this old music reverently, sparing any incongruous touch, refraining from "modernization. The beautiful Nocturne and the Prelude to the last movement reminded one of Handel, although there was French grace rather than Italian melody and German-English dignity. The dances, especially those in which the wood wind instruments, exquisitely played, were prominent, brought before one the noble dames who honored Lully in his ballets at Fontainebleau while Louis, the Grand Monarque, looked on encouragingly or took a royal part.

Mr. Chadwick's overture seemed to us a personal document, possibly autobiographical. The music is for the most part fresh and spontaneous. It shows sure construction, but is not too academic. Its seriousness is not oppressive; its gayety is not forced. Perhaps we are wrong, but we found in the more joyous measures hints at former and characteristic works of his.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts is as follows: Spontini, Overture to "The Vestal" (first time at these concerts); Stravinsky, Suite No. 1 from the ballet, "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi; first time in America); Dohnanyi, violin concerto (first time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Albert Spalding will be the solo violinist.

HERALD-DEC. 16.

NOVELTIES HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music by Bax and Chadwick Lacks Originality

Yesterday, for one of the few times in recent years, the second balconv rush seats at the Symphony concerts were not all taken. The weather and a none too promising program combined to keep people away. Many of the subscribers, too, seemed to have given their tickets to others. A program with no soloist and no music by a composer of the first rank, dead or living, is to many concert goers not attractive.

Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, first played here within a year, was given a distinctly careless and often ineffective performance. The orchestra did not keep together. Subordinate bits of musical filling were given undue prominence. This music is dignified, sincere, and emotional in the best sense of a much abused term. It sets an example much needed by some contemporary composers by eschewing superficial modernity of style.

One felt that Bax' "November Woods," played for the first time in Boston, was a horrible example of the duliness that results from a musician who would be quite happily at home in the musical idiom of Wagner's "Tannhauser" playing the sedulous ape to more recent masters. Others of the younger English composers have more to offer than this devotee of the Celtic renascence. "November Woods" contains the material for a pretty and up-to-date salon piece for piano solo stretched out into a long work for full orchestra. The performance was capable, if not brilliant.

An "Anniversary Overture" by George W. Chadwick of the New England Conservatory, played for the first time at these concerts, showed marked contrapuntal ingenuity spent lavishly upon mediocre musical material. The banality of some of this piece is beneath the dignity of a man capable of writing the "Melpomene" overture.

The one bright spot in a disappointing afternoon was a suite arranged by the late Felix Mottl from operas and ballets by Lully, chief music purveyor to the court of Louis XIV of France. These spirited and amusing numbers were excellently played, affording musical solace and diversion, if not requiring elaborate comment.

Next week the numbers scheduled are the first American performance of Stravinsky's "Polichinelle" suite, from a ballet with themes by Pergolese; Spontini's overture to "La Vestale," the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan, and the Dohnanyi violin concerto, with Albert Spalding as soloist.

GLOBE - DEC. 16.

ALBERT SPALDING -
SYMPHONY HALL

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Albert Spalding, the celebrated American violinist, will appear as soloist, playing the concerto by Dohnanyi. Spontini's overture to "La Vestale," a suite from the Stravinsky ballet, "Pulcinella," and the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" are the other numbers.

ADVTSR - DEC. 17.

Symphony Programme

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 22 and 23, in Symphony Hall, Albert Spalding, the celebrated American violinist, will appear as soloist with the Orchestra, playing in the concerto for that instrument by Dohnanyi, the noted Hungarian composer.

Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Spontini's Overture to the opera "La Vestale" and present, in lieu of a symphony, one of the latest scores of Stravinsky, which has hitherto not been heard in America—a suite from his ballet "Pulcinella" for small orchestra. This score is not in the advanced style by which Stravinsky is usually known but uses the themes and the manner of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer.

The closing number will be the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

POST - DEC. 17.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall, Albert Spalding, violinist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra, playing the concerto by Dohnanyi. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Spontini's Overture to the opera "La Vestale" (first time at these concerts) and present, in lieu of a symphony, one of the latest scores of Stravinsky which has hitherto not been heard in America—a suite from his ballet, "Pulcinella" for small orchestra. This score is not in the advanced style of Stravinsky, who here uses themes and the manner of Pergolesi. The closing number will be the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

HERALD - DEC. 17.

JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 15 1922

CONDUCTORS RAISE FUND FOR WILHELM GERICKE

Wilhelm Gericke, who as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, is now seventy-seven years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. Walter Damrosch has formed a conductors' committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. Among the subscriptions received so far are: Leopold Stokowski, $500; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, $500; Pierre Monteux, $500; Frederick Stock, $500; Walter Damrosch, $500. All those desiring to help the Fund may send their subscriptions to the treasurer, Walter Damrosch, No. 146 East Sixty-first street.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
NOV 15 1922

To Help a Famous Conductor

Wilhelm Gericke, who, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, is now seventy-seven years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. The war and the depreciation of values in Austria have swept away most of his savings. Walter Damrosch has formed a conductors' committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz, Arthur Bodansky, and Walter Damrosch, treasurer.

Among the subscriptions received so far are Leopold Stokowski, $500; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, $500; Pierre Monteux, $500; Frederick Stock, $500; Walter Damrosch, $500. All those desiring to help the fund may send their subscriptions to the ... Walter Damrosch, 146 E... Street.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
NOV 15 1922

For Wilhelm Gericke.

Wilhelm Gericke, who as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, is now seventy-seven years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. The war and the depreciation of values in Austria have swept away most of his savings. Walter Damrosch has formed a conductors' committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz, Artur Bodanzky, and Walter Damrosch, treasurer.

America owes an incalculable debt to Herr Gericke and his ministrations as a musician. It is intolerable to think that such a man should not be able to live the remaining years of his life in reasonable comfort. Among the subscriptions received so far are: Leopold Stokowski, $500; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, $500; Pierre Monteux, $500; Frederick Stock, $500; Walter Damrosch, $500.

All those desiring to help the fund may send their subscriptions to the treasurer, Walter Damrosch, 146 East Sixty-first street.

R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 1 1922

FRIEDA HEMPEL TO SING WITH SYMPHONY ARTISTS

Noted Colatura Soprano Will Accompany Boston Musicians Here.

Frieda Hempel, noted soprano of concert and opera fame, will be the soloist in the Boston Symphony concerts which will begin in this city on Tuesday, Nov. 21, in Infantry Hall. Miss Hempel has recently returned from Europe after a most successful series of concerts in London. She arrived in time to open her tour as a soloist with the Boston Symphony at its openings in Montreal and Toronto the early part of this week. Her singing and the beauty of the symphony orchestra's performance in those cities and in Buffalo, Rochester, Ithaca and Hanover provoked the highest enthusiasm and praise.

The other soloists who will appear with the symphony in this city and the interesting programmes which have been arranged by Pierre Monteux should make the Providence season a most successful one, the musicians feel: Clara Clemens, a concert soprano, whose recent recital in New York caused much enthusiasm and favorable comment, will be with the symphony. The pianists will be Olga Samaroff and Harold Bauer, and the 'cello soloist, Jean Bedetti.

The symphony will play in Providence on Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 10.

NOV 18 1922
Evening Sun
New York City

For Gericke's Benefit.

Wilhelm Gericke, who as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the best years of his life to music in America, is now 77 years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. The war and the depreciation of values in Austria have swept away most of his savings.

Walter Damrosch has formed a conductor's committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteaux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz, Artur Bodanzky and Walter Damrosch, treasurer. Several of these conductors have already contributed $500 apiece to a fund of which Mr. Damrosch is treasurer. Likewise, the Boston Symphony is to give in Boston a concert especially for Mr. Gericke's benefit. He was the second conductor of this famous orchestra, at its head from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 to 1908.

now what greater demand we may make on a composer than sincerity. His genius, or lack of it, is a gift of the gods, but for honest intention in the use of it we must hold him responsible. Finally, Bax is a mystic. It is a curious thing that at a time when a great deal of Continental 'modernism' is affecting a greater directness of expression 'stark juxtaposition of unrelated sonorities' and an 'absence of extra-musical emotion' we downright, direct British continue to write 'subjectively' and even mystically. This is true, at any rate, of Vaughan Williams, Holst, Ireland and Bax—the four younger composers whose work already shows maturity and on whom, therefore, we at present most securely rest our hope."

"November Woods," the tone-poem to be played at Symphony Hall tomorrow and Saturday, dates from 1917, when Bax declared that by it he preferred to be judged as composer for orchestra. Of it, Edwin Evans, the English reviewer, who prepared two articles on Bax for the Musical Times, has written:

> "November Woods" is a picture of storms and drying leaves and the sere and dank atmosphere of autumn. Mingled with this is the mood of human loneliness and regret, which is finally absorbed in the restlessness and turmoil of nature.

On the occasion of the first performance—in Manchester, in England, on Nov. 8, 1920, a reviewer for the same journal also said:

> It is all to the good when a composer tells you that his work is not to be regarded as objective programme-music, but as an impresison of the dank and stormy ruin of nature in late autumn, and with these externals there would appear to be linked personal feelings, some affinity with the mood of the Buckinghamshire wood where he conceived the idea of this tone-poem.

For the present, at least, Bax is one of the moderns who has built upon the old, not discarded it for the wholly new. The score of "November Woods," harmonically ingenious, makes free use of dissonance but not of dissonance calculated to distress conservative ears. And in it are melodic phrases of recognizable pattern. In common with all present-day composers Bax uses the orchestra skilfully and imaginatively, and this particular score is replete with felicitous strokes of instrumentation. The phenomena of nature are, perhaps, dangerous things to meddle with in music. One thinks of the thunderstorm in the "Pastoral Symphony" with an indulgent smile, but Bax did not hesitate to follow in the path of many a fellow-composer who has sought to express the wind and the blinding rain in symphonic terms. "November Woods" is fine music in spite of, rather than because of, these attempts at realism.

From Mr. Chadwick

Bax's tone-poem, "November Woods," elsewhere noted on this page, is not the only new piece announced for the Symphony Concerts of this week. Mr. Monteux's programme also contains an "Anniversary Overture" by Mr. Chadwick, written recently at the completion of his twenty-five years as director of the New England Conservatory of Music. It was first produced at the Norfolk Festival last June, under the direction of the composer, at the same concert at which Vaughan Williams conducted through the first performance in America of his "Pastoral Symphony." For the performances of his Overture by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 27 and 28 last, Mr. Chadwick provided an analysis of the piece which concludes with these words: "The structure of the work is symphonic, but the atmosphere of it is romantic and at times dramatic. There is no programme." The music adheres in the main to the accepted pattern of such concert overtures and abounds in scholarly devices, among them that of symmetrical inversion, or the playing of the notes of the theme in reverse order. But as in all Mr. Chadwick's more formal compositions, such scholarship goes hand in hand with geniality of mood and warmth of utterance. Never is learning paraded for its own sake.

TRANS. DEC 16.

SYMPHONY HAS INTERESTING PROGRAM

The program that Mr. Monteux offered to his audience at the eighth symphony concert was nothing if not diversified. He opened it with the Sibelius symphony in E-flat major (the Fifth) and from that he took a long stride to the Lully Ballet Suite (arranged by Felix Mottl); then came the "November Woods," by Bax, played for the first time in Boston. The final number on the program was the Anniversary Overture by Chadwick.

Greater contrast than that between the austerity of both the Sibelius symphony and the "November Woods" with the delicate, whimsical and altogether charming Ballet Suite is seldom heard. Perhaps the latter was the most liked number on the progam because it has a touch that is peculiarly quaint and old-fashioned and was exquisitely given by conductor and orchestra.

The composition by Mr. Chadwick proved to be decidedly interesting. It is full of life and color with rhythms that are fascinatingly well marked. Mr. Monteux, in acknowledging the hearty applause at the conclusion of this number, motioned [illegible] Chadwick, who was in the [illegible] the composer rose to accept the long continued appreciation of the gathering.

Opinion as to the symphony was divided—those who liked it liked it immensely. The others found little to enjoy, although much to praise.

AMER - DEC. 16.

BOSTON WORK IN SYMPHONY BILL

George W. Chadwick, dean of Boston composers, is represented on this week's Symphony program by his "Anniversary Overture."

The motto of the Symphony Orchestra seems to be, "Be not the first by whom the new is tried." The intensely lyrical and dramatic Chadwick piece was first heard at the Litchfield festival in Norfolk, Conn., last Spring and then in Chicago. The Chicago orchestra also gave the first American performance of Arnold Bax's new symphonic poem, "November Woods," which Boston heard for the first time yesterday.

Mr. Chadwick, who annually enjoys the plaudits of his Symphony admirers, does characteristic work in the "Anniversary Overture"—sound, scholarly and agreeable writing, dramatic, but never shocking. The Bax work, which pictures a mood rather than a forest, is piquant, but, like "Fairy Hills," played here two years ago, it leaves much to the listener's imagination—too much in fact. Bax is Neo-Celtic to the point of being cryptic.

A finer, clearer study of moods is to be found in the fifth Sibelius symphony, which heads the program. This master-work comprises some of the most impressive symphonic music written since Brahms laid down his pen. Here are lyric beauty and dramatic power woven into a tone epic—music suggesting the composer's native Finland, with its chill, sombre landscapes and people still sore from the Russian yoke.

For something like holiday diversion Mr. Monteux also offers an old French ballet suite by Lully.

ADVTSR - DEC. 16.

8TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Program Includes Pieces by Bax and Chadwick New to Hub Audiences

MORE PRETENTIOUS MUSIC IS SIBELIUS'S

By PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows: Sibelius, Symphony No. 5; Lully-Mottl, Ballet Suite; Bax, "November Woods" (first time in Boston); Chadwick, Anniversary Overture (first time in Boston).

Walter Savage Landor represented himself as saying to Archdeacon Hare with reference to his five volumes of "Imaginary Conversations": "I shall dine late, but the dining room will be well lighted, the guests few and select." A proud saying, but not a conceited or a foolish one.

Would the Sibelius of the later symphonies answer any objector in the same spirit? It is doubtful whether for some years to come this fifth symphony will please the many, for it lacks sensuousness, it is without an obvious and incisive appeal; nor has it beauty, as beauty in music is understood by the crowd; nor has it thunder-and-lightning climaxes with all the percussion instruments working overtime and the organ called in to swell the din in the apotheosis. It is a strange but not a baffling work. Those who yearn for "explanations" of music might find the first movement a seascape, with only screaming gulls to relieve the loneliness. "Old ocean's gray and melancholy waste."

Sibelius wrote this symphony for himself, and possibly, as Mozart said of one of his works, for a few friends. Whether he had any definite program in his mind is immaterial. A man of virile nature and of strong emotions, he expressed them in tones, in his own way, without thought of any school or chapel, ancient or modern. No one can say, this composer or that composer influenced him. Wild and sombre as are some of the pages, there is no taint of pessimism. Sibelius is not afraid to be alone with savage nature, and as there is beauty in the Alps, in spite of certain 18th century English travellers, in the desert, or in Thomas Hardy's Egdon Heath, so there is beauty in this symphony, nor is it always subtle and hidden.

This man of the North knows the exciting effect of oriental repetition in phrase and rhythm, and on these repetitions he rears imposing musical structures. The symphony is not always the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea"; there are measures to which dervishes might whirl, rays of the sun break through the clouds. We prefer Sibelius when his sky is leaden.

But will the great public ever love "to cope him in these sullen fits?"

Arnold Bax is one of the few English composers who is enriched with the gift of imagination. His November is a month of storm and stress, yet not the November of Thomas Hood, but the November of Clare's Shepherd:

"At length it comes among the
forest oaks,
With sobbing ebbs, and uproar gathering high.

* * *

While clouds above him in wild fury
boil,
And winds drive heavily the beat-rain."

Did not some Frenchman say that in November respectable Englishmen went out and hanged themselves. Picturing the fury of the elements, Bax also expresses the reaction on mortal man; the month of a dying year without the shining ray of Bethlehem's star. A symphonic poem to be heard again in spite of a seeming prolixity.

As Mr. Monteux was the full and sympathetic interpreter of Sibelius and Bax in their moods and emotions, so he caught the spirit of Lully's 17th century dances. (How eloquently the orchestra aided their leader throughout the concert!) Mottl arranged this old music reverently, sparing any incongruous touch, refraining from "modernization. The beautiful Nocturne and the Prelude to the last movement reminded one of Handel, although there was French grace rather than Italian melody and German-English dignity. The dances, especially those in which the wood wind instruments, exquisitely played, were prominent, brought before one the noble dames who honored Lully in his ballets at Fontainebleau while Louis, the Grand Monarque, looked on encouragingly or took a royal part.

Mr. Chadwick's overture seemed to us a personal document, possibly autobiographical. The music is for the most part fresh and spontaneous. It shows sure construction, but is not too academic. Its seriousness is not oppressive; its gayety is not forced. Perhaps we are wrong, but we found in the more joyous measures hints at former and characteristic works of his.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week's concerts is as follows: Spontini, Overture to "The Vestal" (first time at these concerts); Stravinsky, Suite No. 1 from the ballet, "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi; first time in America); Dohnanyi, violin concerto (first time in Boston); Wagner, Prelude and Love Death from "Tristan and Isolde." Albert Spalding will be the solo violinist.

HERALD - DEC. 16.

NOVELTIES HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Music by Bax and Chadwick Lacks Originality

Yesterday, for one of the few times in recent years, the second balcony rush seats at the Symphony concerts were not all taken. The weather and a none too promising program combined to keep people away. Many of the subscribers, too, seemed to have given their tickets to others. A program with no soloist and no music by a composer of the first rank, dead or living, is to many concert goers not attractive.

Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, first played here within a year, was given a distinctly careless and often ineffective performance. The orchestra did not keep together. Subordinate bits of musical filling were given undue prominence. This music is dignified, sincere, and emotional in the best sense of a much abused term. It sets an example much needed by some contemporary composers by eschewing superficial modernity of style.

One felt that Bax' "November Woods," played for the first time in Boston, was a horrible example of the dullness that results from a musician who would be quite happily at home in the musical idiom of Wagner's "Tannhauser" playing the sedulous ape to more recent masters. Others of the younger English composers have more to offer than this devotee of the Celtic renascence. "November Woods" contains the material for a pretty and up-to-date salon piece for piano solo stretched out into a long work for full orchestra. The performance was capable, if not brilliant.

An "Anniversary Overture" by George W. Chadwick of the New England Conservatory, played for the first time at these concerts, showed marked contrapuntal ingenuity spent lavishly upon mediocre musical material. The banality of some of this piece is beneath the dignity of a man capable of writing the "Melpomene" overture.

The one bright spot in a disappointing afternoon was a suite arranged by the late Felix Mottl from operas and ballets by Lully, chief music purveyor to the court of Louis XIV of France. These spirited and amusing numbers were excellently played, affording musical solace and diversion, if not requiring elaborate comment.

Next week the numbers scheduled are the first American performance of Stravinsky's "Polichinelle" suite, from a ballet with themes by Pergolese; Spontini's overture to "La Vestale," the Prelude and "Liebestod" from "Tristan, and the Dohnanyi violin concerto, with Albert Spalding as soloist.

GLOBE - DEC. 16.

ALBERT SPALDING - SYMPHONY HALL

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Albert Spalding, the celebrated American violinist, will appear as soloist, playing the concerto by Dohnanyi. Spontini's overture to "La Vestale," a suite from the Stravinsky ballet, "Pulcinella," and the prelude and love-death from "Tristan and Isolde" are the other numbers.

ADVTSR - DEC. 17.

Symphony Programme

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 22 and 23, in Symphony Hall, Albert Spalding, the celebrated American violinist, will appear as soloist with the Orchestra, playing in the concerto for that instrument by Dohnanyi, the noted Hungarian composer.

Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Spontini's Overture to the opera "La Vestale" and present, in lieu of a symphony, one of the latest scores of Stravinsky, which has hitherto not been heard in America—a suite from his ballet "Pulcinella" for small orchestra. This score is not in the advanced style by which Stravinsky is usually known but uses the themes and the manner of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer.

The closing number will be the Prelude and Love-Death from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde."

POST - DEC. 17.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall, Albert Spalding, violinist, will appear as soloist with the orchestra, playing the concerto by Dohnanyi. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Spontini's Overture to the opera "La Vestale" (first time at these concerts) and present, in lieu of a symphony, one of the latest scores of Stravinsky which has hitherto not been heard in America—a suite from his ballet, "Pulcinella" for small orchestra. This score is not in the advanced style of Stravinsky, who here uses themes and the manner of Pergolesi. The closing number will be the Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

HERALD - DEC. 17.

JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 15 1922

CONDUCTORS RAISE FUND FOR WILHELM GERICKE

Wilhelm Gericke, who as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, is now seventy-seven years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. Walter Damrosch has formed a conductors' committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague.. Among the subcriptions received so far are: Leopold Stokowski, $500; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, $500; Pierre Monteux, $500; Frederick Stock, $500; Walter Damrosch, $500. All those desiring to help the Fund may send their subscriptions to the treasurer, Walter Damrosch, No. 146 East Sixty-first street.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
NOV 15 1922

To Help a Famous Conductor

Wilhelm Gericke, who, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, is now seventy-seven years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. The war and the depreciation of values in Austria have swept away most of his savings. Walter Damrosch has formed a conductors' committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz, Arthur Bodanzky, and Walter Damrosch, treasurer.

Among the subscriptions received so far are Leopold Stokowski, $500; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, $500; Pierre Monteux, $500; Frederick Stock, $500; Walter Damrosch, $500. All those desiring to help the fund may send their subscriptions to the [illegible] Walter Damrosch, 146 [illegible] Street.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
NOV 15 1922

For Wilhelm Gericke.

Wilhelm Gericke, who as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, is now seventy-seven years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. The war and the depreciation of values in Austria have swept away most of his savings. Walter Damrosch has formed a conductors' committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz, Artur Bodanzky, and Walter Damrosch, treasurer.

America owes an incalculable debt to Herr Gericke and his ministrations as a musician. It is intolerable to think that such a man should not be able to live the remaining years of his life in reasonable comfort. Among the subscriptions received so far are: Leopold Stokowski, $500; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, $500; Pierre Monteux, $500; Frederick Stock, $500; Walter Damrosch, $500.

All those desiring to help the fund may send their subscriptions to the treasurer, Walter Damrosch, 146 East Sixty-first street.

R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 1[illegible] 1922

FRIEDA HEMPEL TO SING WITH SYMPHONY ARTISTS

Noted Colatura Soprano Will Accompany Boston Musicians Here.

Frieda Hempel, noted soprano of concert and opera fame, will be the soloist in the Boston Symphony concerts which will begin in this city on Tuesday, Nov. 21, in Infantry Hall. Miss Hempel has recently returned from Europe after a most successful series of concerts in London. She arrived in time to open her tour as a soloist with the Boston Symphony at its openings in Montreal and Toronto the early part of this week. Her singing and the beauty of the symphony orchestra's performance in those cities and in Buffalo, Rochester, Ithaca and Hanover provoked the highest enthusiasm and praise.

The other soloists who will appear with the symphony in this city and the interesting programmes which have been arranged by Pierre Monteux should make the Providence season a most successful one, the musicians feel. Clara Clemens, a concert soprano, whose recent recital in New York caused much enthusiasm and favorable comment, will be with the symphony. The pianists will be Olga Samaroff and Harold Bauer, and the 'cello soloist, Jean Bedetti.

The symphony will play in Providence on Nov. 21, Dec. 12, Jan. 23, Feb. 27 and April 10.

Evening Sun
New York City

For Gericke's Benefit.

Wilhelm Gericke, who as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the best years of his life to music in America, is now 77 years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. The war and the depreciation of values in Austria have swept away most of his savings.

Walter Damrosch has formed a conductor's committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteaux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz, Artur Bodanzky and Walter Damrosch, treasurer. Several of these conductors have already contributed $500 apiece to a fund of which Mr. Damrosch is treasurer. Likewise, the Boston Symphony is to give in Boston a concert especially for Mr. Gericke's benefit. He was the second conductor of this famous orchestra, at its head from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 to 1908.

From
Evening Sun
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY LOSES 187 BOTTLES

Liquor of Musicians Is Seized at the Border.

BOSTON, Nov. 18.—With the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its trip to Montreal, Toronto and other cities comes a story of how its members were relieved of some $1,560 worth of liquor as they crossed the Canadian border into the United States.

There was naturally talk of arrests, but when it came to rounding up 100 men and fixing the ownership of 187 bottles the officials decided it the better part of discretion to pass up the arresting part of the program and simply seize the liquor.

Evening Sun NOV 18 1922
New York City

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to begin a week from next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, November 30 and December 2.

Pierre Monteux will present at the Thursday concert Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony and two pictorial pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock." He will also conduct Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for String Orchestra on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, and Glazounov's "Stenka Razin."

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF

Boston Symphony Programmes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, November 30 and December 2. Pierre Monteux will conduct at the evening concert Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, two descriptive pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock"; Vaughn Williams's Fantasia for String Orchestra on a theme by the early English composer Thomas Tallis, and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

For the matinee the symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms in E minor. Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," will also be played. The other number will be "Horace Victorieux," by Honneger, a member of the Parisian "Six." This score is entitled "A Mimed Symphony," and, although heard and played in London and Paris, is on this occasion to have its first American performance.

The Week's Recitals

REVIEW NOV 18 1922
New York City

DAMROSCH IS COLLECTING FUND FOR MR. GERICKE

Former Boston Orchestra Conductor Is Now Destitute

Wilhelm Gericke, who, as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, is now seventy-seven years old and living in Vienna in straitened financial circumstances. The war and the depreciation of values in Austria have swept away most of his savings.

Walter Damrosch has formed a conductor's committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitsch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick Stock, Alfred Hertz and Artur Bodanzky, with Walter Damrosch as treasurer.

America owes much to Dr. Gericke and his ministrations as a musician, and his gentleness and modesty won him many friends. It is intolerable to think that, owing to the unfortunate results of the war, such a man should not be able to live the remaining years of his life in reasonable comfort.

Among the subscriptions received so far are Leopold Stokowski, $500; Ossip Gabrilowitsch, $500; Pierre Monteux, $500; Frederick Stock, $500; Walter Damrosch, $500.

All those desiring to help the fund may send their subscriptions to the treasurer, Walter Damrosch, 146 East Sixty-first street.

N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
NOV 19 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to open its Brooklyn season with a concert in the Academy, under Institute auspices, a week from next Friday evening, Dec. 1, with Frieda Hempel as soloist.

R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 10 1922

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Season in Providence This Week.—Titta Ruffo, Baritone, Makes First Appearance Here To-day

This week marks the opening of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's season in Providence for its usual series of five concerts, extending into the spring. For to-day there is the debut of Titta Ruffo, a singer new to Providence, but famed abroad, who comes as the chief artist of the second Steinert concert at the Shubert Majestic.

Ruffo will sing two arias in which he has gained plaudits wherever he has sung them, the Toreador song from "Carmen" and the "Largo al Factotum" from "The Barber of Seville." With Yvonne D'Arle of the Metropolitan Opera Company, he will sing the duet for baritone and soprano from "Don Giovanni." Miss D'Arle will be heard in solo numbers, as will Albert Sciaretti, pianist.

Ruffo has sung in practically every country in Europe and Latin-America and

---

Frieda Hempel

Soprano Soloist with Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday Night in Infantry Hall

---

R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 18 1922

Boston Symphony Next Tuesday

Next Tuesday evening at Infantry Hall at 8:15 o'clock the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Frieda Hempel, the coloratura soprano, as soloist, will make its bow for the season in Providence. Mr. Monteux has chosen an unusually interesting programme for the occasion, including the First Symphony of Brahms in C-minor, considered by many the most impressive and dramatic work of the composer, and called by Von Bulow, the logical successor to Beethoven's Ninth.

Another number of interest will be "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, who is remembered as the conductor of the orchestra in the season of 1918-1919, and who is a composer of note, having written operas and other symphonic works. The closing number will be Tchaikovsky's overture, "1812," a battle piece celebrating the victory of the Russian hosts over Napoleon. In this score the Russian national anthem struggles with and finally triumphs over the Marseillaise in an overwhelming volume of sound.

Miss Hempel will sing two numbers, the aria "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro," and an aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz." Mme. Hempel has long been famous as an interpreter of Mozart melodies and lieder which have had prominent places on her programmes since she deserted grand opera for the recital and concert stage.

As for Symphony concerts of the past five seasons, student seats at a nominal sum may be had through the State Federation of Music Clubs, Miss Mary Cull, 613 Jackson building, and Miss Virginia Boyd Anderson, 270 Morris avenue, having charge of this branch of the work. Last year an average of 150 students attended each Symphony concert through the efforts of the federation. All music students, vocal or instrumental, up to the age of 25 years, are eligible.

R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 19 1922

Brahms' First Symphony Feature of Tuesday's Concert

BY WARREN STOREY-SMITH.
Of the Faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music.

In making his programme for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, Mr. Monteux has followed his usual custom of combining in just proportion old and modern pieces. Most concert-goers cherish music made familiar through long acquaintance—provided it be music that gains, not loses interest on repeated hearing. Not a few, however, crave novel as well as accustomed pleasures, and in programme-making it is the concern of the conductor to suit, so far as may be possible, the individual tastes of all his auditors. This is a task of no small difficulty, and it may safely be said that in the 42 years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's existence none of its leaders has accomplished it so consistently and so skilfully as has Mr. Monteux.

For the Symphony—and in natural course the principal item—on Tuesday's programme, Mr. Monteux has chosen the First of Brahms, in the key of C minor and numbered 68 in his published works. Von Bulow, the pianist, had unbounded admiration for the music of Brahms, and a fondness for making epigrams concerning him. Placing Brahms in the company of Bach and Beethoven, he termed them the "three B's" that stood for music in its loftiest estate. And deeming it a worthy successor to the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven—than which there could be no higher praise—he called this First of Brahms the "Tenth Symphony."

Unlike many lesser composers whose vaulting ambition early lures them to the attempting of tasks beyond their powers, Brahms waited until he was in his 29th year before seriously undertaking the writing of a symphony, that most important and most exacting of musical forms. And while the piece might have been hastily finished in a few months' time, Brahms worked on it for a period of years, composing slowly, and patiently polishing what he had already written. Thus, although the idea of this symphony first entered his mind in 1855 (he was then 22), and work was actually begun on it in 1861, it was not until 1876 that it at last came to full completion.

How the symphony may have stood as first conceived we cannot know, but in its final form the piece is music, not of youth, but of ripe maturity. It is music of breadth and depth, of sombreness and ruggedness, of serene calm and of almost grave elation. In the matters of form and technique it may bear the closest scrutiny. Not a note is misplaced. Here is music of absolute mastery, if not, as some would claim, of unflagging inspiration. It has been urged, and with some justice, that in writing for the orchestra Brahms had but limited feeling for its color-possibilities, and that his instrumentation tends to harshness and opacity. Yet the instrumental dress is almost ideally suited to the thoughts it clothes . . . and that is art.

The first movement is darker in mood than what follows, with many pages of violent, rhythmic energy, terseness, and dramatic point. Then comes the Andante, perhaps the finest slow movement that Brahms ever wrote. With chords of peculiarly Brahmsian harmonies there are interwoven fragments of long drawn,-songful melody, which are unforgetable. The woodwind solo instruments take it up alternately—the oboe, clarinet and flute—but particularly the oboe. The sombre hues which pervade this symphony are not yet dispersed with Allegretto. Shortly after the last movement begins, the solo French horn pours forth a prolonged melody which is one of the most celebrated ever written for that instrument (one of the Brahms's favorites, by the way, as the most soft and effulgent-toned of the brass family). This movement abounds in contrast of mood—is perhaps the most sensational of the four. The climax is brought by a splendid folk melody, proclaimed broadly as a great outburst by the entire orchestra. The culmination is swift and mighty—it carries all before it.

For the closing number of the programme Mr. Monteux has selected Tchaikovsky's "Ouverture Solennelle, 1812." Only seven years younger than Brahms, Tchaikovsky seems a far more "modern" composer. He was indeed more an experimenter, especially in the domain of orchestration. And he was not—as Brahms undoubtedly was—a classicist born out of his time. Tchaikovsky felt the spirit of the age in which he lived; he was a Russian before he was a musician, and, the victim of his neurotic temperament, he let his moods, now morbid, now feverishly exhilarated, intrude upon his music—a most unclassical proceeding. This "1812" Overture celebrates and portrays the retreat of Napoleon's army from Russian soil. It was composed for the consecration of the Temple of Christ in Moscow in the summer of 1881, and was first performed in the square in front of the Cathedral, by an enormous orchestra reinforced with cannon. The Overture opens with a Russian hymn, "God Preserve Thy People," and this melody reappears at the end, followed by a sonorous proclamation of the Russian National Anthem. To suggest the French army Tchaikovsky has made use of the "Marseillaise," and the harassing Russians are represented by a folk-tune from Novgorod, a section of Russia. There are also two well defined themes of the composer's own inventing—the first a plaintive melody announced by the oboe after the first appearance of the Russian hymn, the second given out by the violins at the beginning of the main body of the overture.

In placing on the programme Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Mr. Monteux pays graceful and deserved tribute to the man who preceded him as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As will be remembered, Mr. Rabaud occupied this post for but one season, yet in that time he made deep impression, both [illegible] his excellent qualities as musician and through the charm of his personality and the fine dignity of his bearing. On his return to France signal honor was in store for him, for on the death of Theodore Dubois M. Rabaud was made his successor as President of the Paris Conservatory. As composer M. Rabaud has won an estimable place among the writers of music in modern France. The more generally known of his works include his opera "Marouf," frequently performed at the Metropolitan, and his admirable Second Symphony.

This "Procession Nocturne" is based on a poem by Lenau, which describes Faust travelling through the obscurity of a deep forest, beneath the lowering sky of a warm night of spring. It is the night of St. John's Eve, and by the illumination of a light not of this earth he beholds the passing of a solemn procession—children, virgins, and monks grown old in the service of religion. Envying the happiness of the faithful, Faust, left alone among the shadows, weeps burning and bitter tears.

For soloist comes Freida Hempel, from the Metropolitan Opera Company, to sing two arias; the first, "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro;" the second, "Agatha's Prayer," from Weber's "Der Freischutz." The "Marriage of Figaro," brightest and most sparkling of its composer's operas, was written and produced in Vienna in 1786, and the "Deh Vieni" is an air long familiar to concert-goers. "Der Freischutz," completed in 1820, has achieved fame, not only through its intrinsic merits, but through its historical importance as the first realization in operatic form of the tendencies of the Romantic movement. Here the element of the supernatural, with all its thrilling potentialities, first found place in musical expression.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
NOV

Boston Symphony Opening.

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to begin a week from next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall, November 30 and December 2.

Pierre Monteux will present at the Thursday concert Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony and two pictorial pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock." He will also conduct Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Glazounov's "Stenka Razin."

The matinee program is to include the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "Horatius Triumphant," a new score by Honneger, a member of the Parisian "Six." It is called a mimed symphony, and although heard and played in London and Paris, is to have on this occasion its first American performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Boston a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its former conductor, who is now living in Germany and whose means have been greatly reduced by the financial collapse there. Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was at its head from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 to 1906.

The extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was instituted last year, is to be continued. These concerts, patronized in large degree by people untutored in symphonic music, are the outgrowth of a demand for symphony concerts in Boston which exceeds the bounds of the regular forty-eight Friday and Saturday concerts. Pierre Monteux is to present regular symphony programs and the following soloists are to appear: Ernest Schelling, Ester Ferrabini-Jacchia, Florence Macbeth, Renee Chemet and Magdeleine Brard.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
NOV 19 1922

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week, November 30 and December 2.

Pierre Monteux will conduct at the evening concert Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, two descriptive pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock"; Vaughan Williams's fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, and Glazounoff's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

For the matinee the symphony will be the fourth of Brahms in E minor, Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zara-number will be "Horace Vic- [illegible] Honneger, a member of [illegible] though played in London and [illegible] is on this occasion to have its first American performance.

---

From NOV 19 1922
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

Freida Hempel will be the soloist at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy on Dec. 1. She will sing two arias from Mozart.

N. Y.
HERALD
NOV 19

Among scores announced as having their first performance in this country by the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season are: Honneger's "Horace Victorieux," Chausson's "Soir de Fete" and Stravinsky's suite from his "Pulcinella" (after Pergolese).

Also on the prospective list is the same composer's "Rites of Spring," which score was first introduced by the conductor at the Concerts Monteux in Paris.

Other Russian revivals will be Scriabine's third symphony, "The Divine Poem," and Great Britain will be represented by Eugene Goossens and Holst, whose "Planets" has not yet been played in Boston; Spain by Turina and Italy by Tommasini and Davico. Symphonies by Bruckner and Mahler will be added to the German list. The standard classics will compromise the bulk of the programs.

N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to give in Boston a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its former conductor, who is now living in Germany and whose means have been greatly reduced by the financial collapse there. Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and was at its head from 1884 to 1889, and again from 1898 to 1906.

At its first New York concerts, the Boston Orchestra will present, on Nov. 30, two descriptive pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and on Dec. 2, "Horace Victorieux," a so-called "mimed symphony" by Honegger, of the Paris "Six."

N. Y.
TIMES
NOV 19 1922

MUSIC NOTES AFIELD.

The extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was instituted last year, is to be continued. These concerts, patronized in large degree by people untutored in symphonic music, are the outgrowth of a demand for symphony concerts in Boston which exceeds the bounds of the regular forty-eight Friday and Saturday concerts. Pierre Monteux is to present regular symphony programs.

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 18 1922

The Boston Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, opens its series of ten concerts in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening, November 30 and Saturday afternoon, December 2. Berlioz's "Symphonie fantastique," two pieces by Charles T. Griffes, Vaughan Williams's fantasia for strings and Alexander Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" make up the first programme. The second will hold the Brahms Fourth Symphony and a first performance of the French radical, Alfred Honeggers "Horatius triomphant" as well as Strauss's "Also sprach carathustra."

The next pair of New York Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall, on Thursday afternoon and Friday evening, will feature Ossip Gabrilowitsch as soloist in the Brahms B flat piano concerto. Mr. Damrosch's other numbers will be Mozart's G minor symphony and Ildebrando Pizzetti's "Pisanella."

The Philharmonic Orchestra, tomorrow afternoon in Carnegie Hall, will give a Beethoven-Tschaikovsky-Wagner programme and on Friday afternoon will have Arthur Rubenstein as soloist in the A major Liszt piano concerto. Mr. Stransky will feature a first performance of Vaughan Williams's "Pastoral" symphony. The following evening there is to be a Wagner programme.

N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 19 1922

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

A PARAGRAPH on this page last Sunday told of the plight of Wilhelm Gericke, for thirteen years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in his seventy-eighth year and living in Vienna, as other artists and scholars are living there, in the pinch of poverty. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities and the collapse of the Austrian "valuta" has reduced the value of them and of the income derived/from them toward nothingness.

As was announced last Sunday, a concert will be given for Mr. Gericke's benefit in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 5. Other plans are also on foot to organize the giving of aid to a musician whom every American music lover will delight to honor. Walter Damrosch has formed a conductors' committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick A. Stock, Alfred Hertz, Artur Bodanzky and Walter Damrosch, Treasurer.

Among the subscriptions received so far are from Messrs. Stokowski, Gabrilowitch, Monteux, Stock and Damrosch, $500 each. It is announced that all those who desire to help this fund may send their subscriptions to the treasurer, Walter Damrosch.

It is a question not of giving, but of paying a debt. Mr. Gericke gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, the two terms during which he was at the head of the Boston Orchestra, the years 1884-89 and 1898-1906. It was he who set the standard that the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally reached, and he who made the organization into the marvelous body of players that disclosed new possibilities of orchestral playing to American musicians and music lovers—a body of players that had no superior and only doubtfully an equal in the world.

What the Boston Orchestra was, he made it. The character it had as an artistic instrument, and the style of its performances were as they were because they had been molded exactly by his ideals and methods. They were high ideals and strenuous methods. He never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at. And still less did he spare himself. A "passion for perfection" was at the foundation of Mr. Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he wreaked himself upon the orchestra to make it what he would have it.

So near the achievement of an ideal, so measurably within reach of perfection, it is not given to many in this world to come. The wonderful instrument that Mr. Gericke made continued with minor and inconsiderable fluctuations to respond to the touch of his successors, till the consequences of war came so near to wrecking it, as they did other estimable things.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first of the endowed or sustained orchestras that are now so numerous in all parts of the United States. Mr. Gericke's work, or his influence, may in some measure be seen in all of them. The standard that they are trying to reach may be said to be really the one that he set. And so the benefit of his work in America extended far beyond Boston.

In like manner the gratitude of those who enjoyed that benefit, and in a way are still enjoying it, should extend far beyond Boston. The conductors have shown a chivalrous remembrance of their colleague in the work they are planning to collect funds, and in the generous contributions they themselves have made. It remains for the musical public to show that Wilhelm Gericke, his work, his gentleness and modesty, are

Writ in remembrance more than things long past.

N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 20 1922

Boston Symphony Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 30 and Dec. 2. Pierre Monteux will conduct at the evening concert, Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, two descriptive pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock;" Vaughan Williams's "Fantasia" for string orchestra on a theme by the early English composed Thomas Tallis, and Galzounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

For the matenee, the symphony will be the fourth of Brahms in E minor. Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," will also be played. The other number will be "Horace Victorieux," by Honneger, a member of the Parisian "Six." This score is entitled "A Mimed Symphony" and will have its first American performance.

TELEGRAM NOV 21 1922
New York City

Boston Symphony Will Play Honneger Work

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to begin a week from next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week, in Carnegie Hall.

Pierre Monteux will present at the Thursday concert Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony and two pictorial pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds," and "The White Peacock." He will also conduct Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis (for string orchestra), and Glazounov's "Stenka Razin."

The matinee programme is to include the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "Horatius Triumphant," a new score of Honneger, a member of the Parsian "Six." It is called a mimed symphony, and although heard and played in London and Paris, his score is to have on this occasion its first American performance.

RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
ISSUE OF
NOV 21 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN PROVIDENCE SEASON TO-NIGHT

Frieda Hempel to be Soloist with Monteux Organization.

The Providence season of Boston symphony concerts is to begin to-night in Infantry Hall at 8:15. Pierre Monteux has arranged an unusual programme for this occasion and a splendid performance is anticipated at the hands of the conductor and the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians.

The opening of the Providence season does not coincide with the opening of the orchestra's seasons in other cities, for concerts have been given weekly in Boston since the middle of last month, and visits have been made to a number of other cities, principally in Canada and New York State. The New York season of Boston symphony concerts, however, is to follow the Providence season and begin next week. Wherever the orchestra has so far played, the public and press have praised the performances as touching the finest standards which have made the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra known throughout the world.

To-night's concert will bear additional importance in the appearance with the orchestra of Frieda Hempel, the renowned coloratura soprano. She will sing arias from Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," and Weber's opera, "Der Freischutz."

The purely symphonic portion of the programme is to include the first symphony of Brahms in C minor; and the symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," by Rabaud, the former conductor of the orchestra and likewise a composer of considerable celebrity; also Tschaikovsky's "1812" Overture, the battle piece descriptive of the triumph of Russia over the hosts of Napoleon in that year.

BALTIMORE,
MD.
NEWS
ISSUE OF
NOV 21 1922

~~Wherewith Shall~~ The Whistles Of Th Boston Symphony Now Be Whetted?

(Boston Dispatch to the New York Herald.)

With the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its trip to Dartmouth College, Montreal, Toronto and other cities comes a story of how its members were relieved of some $1560 worth of liquor as they crossed the Canadian border into the United States.

There was naturally talk of arrests, but when it came to rounding up 100 men and fixing the ownership of 187 bottles the officials decided it the better part of discretion to pass up the arresting part of the program and simply seize the liquor.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
ISSUE OF
NOV 22 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY NUMBERS ENTHUSE; HEMPEL IS SOLOIST

Playing before a larger audience than has attended a Boston Symphony concert in years, Pierre Monteux and his fine orchestra opened their Providence season last evening in Infantry Hall. It was not only a large, but also a very enthusiastic gathering, for M. Monteux had arranged an excellent programme, which received a brilliant presentation. The presence of Frieda Hempel as soloist made the occasion one of unusual interest.

The orchestra returns this season with its personnel practically intact. Few changes have been made and the men, fresh after their summer vacation, seem full of enthusiasm for their work. Technically their playing showed increased smoothness over that of last season. In fact, during the past few years under M. Monteux the orchestra has gradually been brought to a point of artistic excellence that measures up to the finest work in the organization's history. Last evening there was vigor without roughness, splendid responsiveness, and a perfection of technical detail in each instrumental section that made the conductor's work strictly one of interpretation.

Although Mme. Hempel has sung in concerts in this city on previous occasions, this was her first appearance here with the Boston orchestra. Her success last evening was overwhelming and at the close of her final aria she was given applause that amounted to an ovation.

This was the programme:

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68...Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" ....Mozart
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) ....Rabaud
Recitative, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" ....Weber
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" in E-flat major, Op. 49 ....Tchaikovsky

As interpreter of the classics, M. Monteux is successful in entering with sympathy and judgment into the spirit of the composer. His reading of the Brahms symphony last evening was one of dignity, breadth and beauty. The complex wonderfully voiced score assumed delightful clearness and expressiveness under his scholarly direction. Brahms, accused in earlier days of being rather circuitous and incoherent in his musical speech, needs only sympathetic understanding on the part of his interpreter to make his works understandable to the layman as well as the musician. The C-minor played last evening reveals Brahms at his best. It teems with melodic material, which is treated with the art of the master-craftsman. There is beauty, not only of theme but in everchanging and delightful instrumentation. M. Monteux's thoughtful presentation of the symphony was appreciated by the audience and both conductor and players shared in spontaneous and prolonged applause.

The second orchestral number, Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," is a colorful and imaginative piece in modern French style. The work, inspired by Lenau's poem, paints in sombre colors the shadowy mysteries of the night, a solemn, nocturnal procession and the unhappiness of the hero, Faust.

M. Rabaud, a former Boston Symphony conductor, is a composer of notable accomplishment in the orchestral and operatic fields. The delicacy and fragile beauty of portions of the score were brought out clearly by M. Monteux.

Mme. Hempel is a coloratura soprano, but she has not the limitations of that type of songbird. Her voice is full and rich, in addition to a remarkable flexibility. She can sing a song requiring dramatic delivery as well as astonish by vocal pyrotechnics. For her numbers last evening she selected two arias requiring more of the art of sustained vocalism than showy technique. Mme. Hempel is an artist to her finger tips, and her voice is undoubtedly one of the most beautiful on the concert stage. She handles it with perfect ease, and it is always true to pitch however difficult may be the demands upon it. "Deh Vieni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and her aria from "Der Freischutz" were sung with splendid artistry. The latter, with its rapturous, joyful ending, thrilled the audience, and the singer was required to return to the stage several times in response to tremendous applause.

The Tschaikowsky overture Solennelle, "1812," is a brilliant number and brought the concert to a stirring close. The overture commemorates Napoleon's famous retreat from Moscow and in it the composer has used fragments of the "Marseillaise" and the Russian national hymn with striking effect. In brilliantly scored style, the Russian tune finally triumphs over the French national hymn. The piece was played with great fire. A. F. P.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
NOV 24 1922

Town Hall—3 P. M., violin recital by Erika Morini.

Quite properly the Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Dec. 5, a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna, who is now old and needy. Herr Gericke was for two periods conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906. He is the man who took the orchestra when it had been described by a visiting European as a more or less fortuitous assembly of musicians playing at the same time and trained it to a surpassing technical perfection.

On the programme of this concert Mr. Monteux has placed Herr Gericke's own orchestral arrangement of the piano waltzes of Brahms, and he will further conduct the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, as works by composers peculiarly associated with the musical life of Vienna, and finally the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss, as a tribute to Mr. Gericke's early championing of Strauss' music in general and of this score in particular.

Evening Sun NOV 25 19
New York City

The Symphonies.

The "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz will be the first number at the opening of the Boston Symphony season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 30, at 8:15.

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also present on this program Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for Double Stringed Orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early English composer, the two numbers from the Roman Suite of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

For the opening Saturday matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place December 2 at 2:30, the symphony will be the Fourth by Brahms in E minor. A score new to New York, which had its first American performance in Boston yesterday, is "Horatius Triumphant," a "Mimed Symphony" by Honegger, looked upon as the foremost member of the Parisian "Six." The afternoon will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

EVENING MAIL 25
New York City

TWELVE ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

"FANTASTIC" Symphony of Berlioz will be the first number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme in Carnegie Hall next Thursday night. Pierre Monteux will also present Vaughan Williams' Fantasia for double-stringed orchestra two numbers by Charles T. Griffes—"Clouds" and the "White Peacock"—and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

Brahm's Fourth Symphony will be heard at the Saturday matinee of the Bostonians and a score new to New York by Honegger, "Horatius Triumphant," as well as Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" are on the programme.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF 5 1922

Boston Orchestra Next Thursday

The "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz will be the first number at the opening of the Boston Symphony season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 30, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will also present Vaughan Williams's fantasia for double-stringed orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the two numbers from the Roman suite of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and Glazunov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

For the opening Saturday matinée by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place December 2, the symphony will be the fourth by Brahms in E minor. A score new to New York, which had its first American performance in Boston, is "Horatius Triumphant," a "mimed symphony" by Honegger of the Parisian "Six." The afternoon will close with Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
NOV 25 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is late in opening its New York season this year. The first pair of concerts are set for Thursday evening, Nov. 30, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 2. The "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz will lead off the Thursday programme. Following it will come Vaughan Williams's fantasia for double stringed orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early English composer; two numbers from the "Roman Suite" of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and finally Galzounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

The Saturday concert will introduce to New York a "mimed symphony" by Arthur Honegger, a member of the Parisian "Group of Six" (now Five), entitled "Horatius Triumphant." On the programme will be two other numbers—Brahms's fourth symphony and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 25 1922

BOSTON BAND TO OPEN ITS SEASON HERE

To Play Thursday and Saturday —Notes on Local Orchestral and Other Concerts.

The Boston Orchestra, the last to open its local season, will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. A quasi novelty on Thursday to be presented by Pierre Monteux, who once more directs the visitors, will be two movements from the American Charles T. Griffes's "Roman" suite—"Clouds" and "The White Peacock," both heretofore known here only as piano pieces. The large work of the evening will be Belioz's "Symphonie fantastique," whilst the programme will also include Vaughan Williams's string fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Alexander Glazounov's "Stenka Razin."

The Saturday afternoon programme will introduce the "mimed" symphony, "Horatius triomphant," by Alfred Honegger, one of the radical "Groupe des six." The matinee will be opened with a performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony and closed with Richard Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra."

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF

Boston Symphony Opens This Week

The opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the New York season will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 30, and next Saturday afternoon, December 2.

The Thursday evening program will comprise the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, the Fantasia of Vaughan Williams based on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early English composer, and scored for double-stringed orchestra; also the two pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," from his Roman Suite, and Blazounov's symphonic poem on Slavic folk themes, "Stenka Razin."

For the first matinee the symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms in E minor. Pierre Monteux will also present for the first time in New York "Horace Victorieux" ("Horatius Triumphant"), by Honegger, a member of the Parisian "Six," which had its first American performance in Boston last week. The score has been well received in Europe and called the foremost production to date of this group of composers. It has a circumstantial program and is entitled "Symphonie Mimee." The closing number will be Strauss's Symphonic Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

N. Y.
TIMES

NOV 19 1922

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

A PARAGRAPH on this page last Sunday told of the plight of Wilhelm Gericke, for thirteen years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in his seventy-eighth year and living in Vienna, as other artists and scholars are living there, in the pinch of poverty. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities and the collapse of the Austrian "valuta" has reduced the value of them and of the income derived from them toward nothingness.

As was announced last Sunday, a concert will be given for Mr. Gericke's benefit in Boston by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Dec. 5. Other plans are also on foot to organize the giving of aid to a musician whom every American music lover will delight to honor. Walter Damrosch has formed a conductors' committee to assist in collecting funds for their colleague. This committee consists of Ossip Gabrilowitch, Leopold Stokowski, Pierre Monteux, Frederick A. Stock, Alfred Hertz, Artur Bodanzky and Walter Damrosch, Treasurer.

Among the subscriptions received so far are from Messrs. Stokowski, Gabrilowitch, Monteux, Stock and Damrosch, $500 each. It is announced that all those who desire to help this fund may send their subscriptions to the treasurer, Walter Damrosch.

It is a question not of giving, but of paying a debt. Mr. Gericke gave thirteen of the best years of his life to music in America, the two terms during which he was at the head of the Boston Orchestra, the years 1884-89 and 1898-1906. It was he who set the standard that the Boston Symphony Orchestra finally reached, and he who made the organization into the marvelous body of players that disclosed new possibilities of orchestral playing to American musicians and music lovers—a body of players that had no superior and only doubtfully an equal in the world.

What the Boston Orchestra was, he made it. The character it had as an artistic instrument, and the style of its performances were as they were because they had been molded exactly by his ideals and methods. They were high ideals and strenuous methods. He never spared his men any of the pains and labor that he considered requisite to obtain the exact effect he was aiming at. And still less did he spare himself. A "passion for perfection" was at the foundation of Mr. Gericke's work as an orchestral conductor, and he wreaked himself upon the orchestra to make it what he would have it.

So near the achievement of an ideal, so measurably within reach of perfection, it is not given to many in this world to come. The wonderful instrument that Mr. Gericke made continued with minor and inconsiderable fluctuations to respond to the touch of his successors, till the consequences of war came so near to wrecking it, as they did other estimable things.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was the first of the endowed or sustained orchestras that are now so numerous in all parts of the United States. Mr. Gericke's work, or his influence, may in some measure be seen in all of them. The standard that they are trying to reach may be said to be really the one that he set. And so the benefit of his work in America extended far beyond Boston.

In like manner the gratitude of those who enjoyed that benefit, and in a way are still enjoying it, should extend far beyond Boston. The conductors have shown a chivalrous remembrance of their colleague in the work they are planning to collect funds, and in the generous contributions they themselves have made. It remains for the musical public to show that Wilhelm Gericke, his work, his gentleness and modesty, are Writ in remembrance more than things long past.

N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 20 1922

Boston Symphony Programs

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 30 and Dec. 2. Pierre Monteux will conduct at the evening concert, Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, two descriptive pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock;" Vaughan Williams's "Fantasia" for string orchestra on a theme by the early English composed Thomas Tallis, and Galzounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

For the matenee, the symphony will be the fourth of Brahms in E minor. Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," will also be played. The other number will be "Horace Victorieux," by Honneger, a member of the Parisian "Six." This score is entitled "A Mimed Symphony" and will have its first American performance.

TELEGRAM NOV 27 1922
New York City

Boston Symphony Will Play Honneger Work

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to begin a week from next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of next week, in Carnegie Hall.

Pierre Monteux will present at the Thursday concert Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony and two pictorial pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds," and "The White Peacock." He will also conduct Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis (for string orchestra), and Glazounov's "Stenka Razin."

The matinee programme is to include the Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and "Horatius Triumphant," a new score of Honneger, a member of the Parsian "Six." It is called a mimed symphony, and although heard and played in London and Paris, his score is to have on this occasion its first American performance.

RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
ISSUE OF
NOV 21 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO OPEN PROVIDENCE SEASON TO-NIGHT

Frieda Hempel to be Soloist with Monteux Organization.

The Providence season of Boston symphony concerts is to begin to-night in Infantry Hall at 8:15. Pierre Monteux has arranged an unusual programme for this occasion and a splendid performance is anticipated at the hands of the conductor and the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 100 musicians.

The opening of the Providence season does not coincide with the opening of the orchestra's seasons in other cities, for concerts have been given weekly in Boston since the middle of last month, and visits have been made to a number of other cities, principally in Canada and New York State. The New York season of Boston symphony concerts, however, is to follow the Providence season and begin next week. Wherever the orchestra has so far played, the public and press have praised the performances as touching the finest standards which have made the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra known throughout the world.

To-night's concert will bear additional importance in the appearance with the orchestra of Frieda Hempel, the renowned coloratura soprano. She will sing arias from Mozart's opera, "The Marriage of Figaro," and Weber's opera, "Der Freischutz."

The purely symphonic portion of the programme is to include the first symphony of Brahms in C minor; and the symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," by Rabaud, the former conductor of the orchestra and likewise a composer of considerable celebrity; also Tschaikovsky's "1812" Overture, the battle piece descriptive of the triumph of Russia over the hosts of Napoleon in that year.

BALTIMORE,
MD.
NEWS
ISSUE OF
NOV 21 1922

Wherewith Shall The Whistles Of The Boston Symphony Now Be Whetted?

(Boston Dispatch in the New York Herald.)

With the return of the Boston Symphony Orchestra from its trip to Dartmouth College, Montreal, Toronto and other cities comes a story of how its members were relieved of some $1560 worth of liquor as they crossed the Canadian border into the United States.

There was naturally talk of arrests, but when it came to rounding up 100 men and fixing the ownership of 187 bottles the officials decided it the better part of discretion to pass up the arresting part of the program and simply seize the liquor.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
NOV 22 1922 ISSUE OF

BOSTON SYMPHONY NUMBERS ENTHUSE; HEMPEL IS SOLOIST

Playing before a larger audience than has attended a Boston Symphony concert in years, Pierre Monteux and his fine orchestra opened their Providence season last evening in Infantry Hall. It was not only a large, but also a very enthusiastic gathering, for M. Monteux had arranged an excellent programme, which received a brilliant presentation. The presence of Frieda Hempel as soloist made the occasion one of unusual interest.

The orchestra returns this season with its personnel practically intact. Few changes have been made and the men, fresh after their summer vacation, seem full of enthusiasm for their work. Technically their playing showed increased smoothness over that of last season. In fact, during the past few years under M. Monteux the orchestra has gradually been brought to a point of artistic excellence that measures up to the finest work in the organization's history. Last evening there was vigor without roughness, splendid responsiveness, and a perfection of technical detail in each instrumental section that made the conductor's work strictly one of interpretation.

Although Mme. Hempel has sung in concerts in this city on previous occasions, this was her first appearance here with the Boston orchestra. Her success last evening was overwhelming and at the close of her final aria she was given applause that amounted to an ovation.

This was the programme:

Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68...Brahms
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.
Andante sostenuto.
Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.
Aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze di Figaro" .... Mozart
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem (after Lenau) .... Rabaud
Recitative, "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer," and Aria, "Leise, leise," from "Der Freischutz" .... Weber
Ouverture Solennelle, "1812" in E-flat major, Op. 49 .... Tchaikovsky

As interpreter of the classics, M. Monteux is successful in entering with sympathy and judgment into the spirit of the composer. His reading of the Brahms symphony last evening was one of dignity, breadth and beauty. The complex, wonderfully voiced score assumed delightful clearness and expressiveness under his scholarly direction. Brahms, accused in earlier days of being rather circuitous and incoherent in his musical speech, needs only sympathetic understanding on the part of his interpreter to make his works understandable to the layman as well as the musician. The C-minor played last evening reveals Brahms at his best. It teems with melodic material, which is treated with the art of the master-craftsman. There is beauty, not only of theme but in everchanging and delightful instrumentation. M. Monteux's thoughtful presentation of the symphony was appreciated by the audience and both conductor and players shared in spontaneous and prolonged applause.

The second orchestral number, Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," is a colorful and imaginative piece in modern French style. The work, inspired by Lenau's poem, paints in sombre colors the shadowy mysteries of the night, a solemn, nocturnal procession and the unhappiness of the hero, Faust.

M. Rabaud, a former Boston Symphony conductor, is a composer of notable accomplishment in the orchestral and operatic fields. The delicacy and fragile beauty of portions of the score were brought out clearly by M. Monteux.

Mme. Hempel is a coloratura soprano, but she has not the limitations of that type of songbird. Her voice is full and rich, in addition to a remarkable flexibility. She can sing a song requiring dramatic delivery as well as astonish by vocal pyrotechnics. For her numbers last evening she selected two arias requiring more of the art of sustained vocalism than showy technique. Mme. Hempel is an artist to her finger tips, and her voice is undoubtedly one of the most beautiful on the concert stage. She handles it with perfect ease, and it is always true to pitch however difficult may be the demands upon it. "Deh Vieni" from "Le Nozze di Figaro," and her aria from "Der Freischutz" were sung with splendid artistry. The latter, with its rapturous, joyful ending, thrilled the audience, and the singer was required to return to the stage several times in response to tremendous applause.

The Tschaikowsky overture Solennelle, "1812," is a brilliant number and brought the concert to a stirring close. The overture commemorates Napoleon's famous retreat from Moscow and in it the composer has used fragments of the "Marseillaise" and the Russian national hymn with striking effect. In brilliantly scored style, the Russian tune finally triumphs over the French national hymn. The piece was played with great fire. A. F. P.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
NOV 24 1922

own Hall—3 P. M., violin recital by rika Morini.

Quite properly the Boston Symphony Orchestra is giving in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Dec. 5, a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke of Vienna, who is now old and needy. Herr Gericke was for two periods conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—from 1884 to 1889 and again from 1898 to 1906. He is the man who took the orchestra when it had been described by a visiting European as a more or less fortuitous assembly of musicians playing at the same time and trained it to a surpassing technical perfection.

On the programme of this concert Mr. Monteux has placed Herr Gericke's own orchestral arrangement of the piano waltzes of Brahms, and he will further conduct the "Unfinished" symphony of Schubert and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, as works by composers peculiarly associated with the musical life of Vienna, and finally the "Till Eulenspiegel" of Richard Strauss, as a tribute to Mr. Gericke's early championing of Strauss' music in general and of this score in particular.

Evening Sun NOV 25 19
New York City

The Symphonies.

The "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz will be the first number at the opening of the Boston Symphony season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 30, at 8:15.

Pierre Monteux and the orchestra will also present on this program Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for Double Stringed Orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early English composer, the two numbers from the Roman Suite of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

For the opening Saturday matinee by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place December 2 at 2:30, the symphony will be the Fourth by Brahms in E minor. A score new to New York, which had its first American performance in Boston yesterday, is 'Horatius Triumphant," a "Mimed Symphony" by Honegger, looked upon as the foremost member of the Parisian "Six." The afternoon will close with Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

EVENING MAIL
New York City

TWELVE ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS

"FANTASTIC" Symphony of Berlioz will be the first number of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme in Carnegie Hall next Thursday night. Pierre Monteux will also present Vaughan Williams' Fantasia for double-stringed orchestra two numbers by Charles T. Griffes—"Clouds" and the "White Peacock"—and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

Brahm's Fourth Symphony will be heard at the Saturday matinee of the Bostonians and a score new to New York by Honegger, "Horatius Triumphant," as well as Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" are on the programme.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF

Boston Orchestra Next Thursday

The "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz will be the first number at the opening of the Boston Symphony season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 30, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will also present Vaughan Williams's fantasia for double-stringed orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the two numbers from the Roman suite of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and Glazunov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

For the opening Saturday matinée by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to take place December 2, the symphony will be the fourth by Brahms in E minor. A score new to New York, which had its first American performance in Boston, is "Horatius Triumphant," a "mimed symphony" by Honegger of the Parisian "Six." The afternoon will close with Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
NOV 25 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is late in opening its New York season this year. The first pair of concerts are set for Thursday evening, Nov. 30, and Saturday afternoon, Dec. 2. The "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz will lead off the Thursday programme. Following it will come Vaughan Williams's fantasia for double stringed orchestra on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early English composer; two numbers from the "Roman Suite" of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and finally Galzounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

The Saturday concert will introduce to New York a "mimed symphony" by Arthur Honegger, a member of the Parisian "Group of Six" (now Five), entitled "Horatius Triumphant." On the programme will be two other numbers—Brahms's fourth symphony and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
NOV 25 1922

BOSTON BAND TO OPEN ITS SEASON HERE

To Play Thursday and Saturday—Notes on Local Orchestral and Other Concerts.

The Boston Orchestra, the last to open its local season, will give its first pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. A quasi novelty on Thursday to be presented by Pierre Monteux, who once more directs the visitors, will be two movements from the American Charles T. Griffes's "Roman' suite—"Clouds" and "The White Peacock," both heretofore known here only as piano pieces. The large work of the evening will be Belioz's "Symphonie fantastique," whilst the programme will also include Vaughan Williams's string fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis and Alexander Glazounov's "Stenka Razin."

The Saturday afternoon programme will introduce the "mimed' symphony, "Horatius triomphant," by Alfred Honegger, one of the radical "Groupe des six." The matinee will be opened with a performance of Brahms's Fourth Symphony and closed with Richard Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra."

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF

Boston Symphony Opens This Week

The opening pair of Boston Symphony concerts of the New York season will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening, November 30, and next Saturday afternoon, December 2.

The Thursday evening program will comprise the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, the Fantasia of Vaughan Williams based on a theme by Thomas Tallis, the early English composer, and scored for double-stringed orchestra; also the two pieces by the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," from his Roman Suite, and Blazounov's symphonic poem on Slavic folk themes, "Stenka Razin."

For the first matinee the symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms in E minor. Pierre Monteux will also present for the first time in New York "Horace Victorieux" ("Horatius Triumphant"), by Honegger, a member of the Parisian "Six," which had its first American performance in Boston last week. The score has been well received in Europe and called the foremost production to date of this group of composers. It has a circumstantial program and is entitled "Symphonie Mimee." The closing number will be Strauss's Symphonic Poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

LOBE

1922

Orchestra
York season of concerts
ning, Nov. 30,
Dec. 2. The Berlioz will programme.
aughan Will-le stringed
by Thomas composer;
man Suite,
T. Griffes, Peacock," symphonic introduce phony" by ber of the (now Five), hant." On two other symphony one poem

22

AND TS
RE

aturday hestral
ts.
the last will give in Car-
evening.
A quasi be pre-x, who ors, will he Amer-
'Roman'
White known
The will be tique," also in-string
Thomas ounov's proimed' phant,"
of the
The a per-
Sym-
Richard arathus-

s Week
Symphony season will Thurs-
next Satgram will phony of an Wills Tallis, scored also the Griffes

N. Y.
HERALD
NOV 1922
26

The program is announced for the Gericke Benefit Concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 5. Pierre Monteux will conduct Mr. Gericke's orchestral arrangement of the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms. Mr. Monteux has chosen other composers and pieces connected with the musical life of Vienna, where Mr. Gericke has been prominent as a conductor for many years. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, also Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," a composer and score of which Mr. Gericke was an early champion, will also be played. Wilhelm Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and held the post for thirteen seasons in two terms—1884-1889 and 1898-1906.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

Frieda Hempel, who began her tour as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Montreal and Toronto and the past week has been singing with that organization in Providence and in Boston, will give her first New York recital of the season in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday evening.

EAGLE NOV. 26.
Brooklyn, New York

Subscribers to Boxes at Boston Symphony Concerts.

Subscribers to boxes for the Boston Symphony concerts which begin Dec. 1 at the Academy of Music include: Frank L. Babbott, Mr. and Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Edward J. Dingee, Mr. and Mrs. Francis D. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Adams, Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Pray

---

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Frieda Hampel to Appear Here as First Soloist.

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, will open the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at its concert, under Institute auspices, in the Academy next Friday evening. Pierre Monteux will also present the celebrated score of his countryman, Debussy, "Prelude to the afternoon of a Faun," based on the verses of the impressionistic poet Mallarme. The part of the Faun is suggested by beautiful flute solo passages, to be played by Georges Laurent, the illustrious virtuoso of the orchestra.

Frieda Hempel will appear as the first solist. The great coloratura soprano sang with the orchestra in Canada, and also in Boston last week, with great success. Frieda Hempel will be heard in two notable arias of Mozart, "Deh 'Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Martern Aller Arten" from "The Abduction from the Harem."

The evening will close with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Also Sake Zarathustra" for organ and enlarged orchestra, which depicts in tones the philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche and is looked upon as one of Strauss' most impressive achievements.

N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

HEMPEL AT CARNEGIE HALL.

Frieda Hempel, who began her tour as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Montreal and Toronto, and the past week has been singing with that organization in Prividence and Boston, will give her first New York recital of the season in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 28. Miss Hempel will be assisted by Coenraad V. Bos at the piano, and Louis P. Fritze, flutist.

[40]

NEW YORK
N. Y.
HERALD
NOV 1922
26

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux will conduct at the evening concert Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, two descriptive pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock" Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis, and Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." For the matinee the symphony will be the fourth of Brahms. Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" will also be

---

N. Y.
HERALD
1922
26

The extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was instituted last year, is to be continued. These concerts, patronized in large degree by people untutored in symphonic music, are the outgrowth of a demand for symphony concerts in Boston which exceeds the bounds of the regular forty-eight Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Pierre Monteux is to present regular symphony programs and the following soloists are to appear: Ernest Schelling, Ester Ferrabini-Jacchia, Florence Macbeth, Renee Chemet and Magdeleine Brard.

From
EAGLE
NOV 26 1922
Brooklyn, New York

BROOKLYN NOTES

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor will open the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at its concert, under Institute auspices, in the Academy next Friday evening, Dec. 1, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will also present the celebrated score of his countryman, Debussy, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," based on the verses of the impressionistic poet Mallarme. The part of the faun is suggested by beautiful flute solo passages to be played by Georges Laurent. This music is by general opinion given a performance of the highest eloquence at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pierre Monteux.

Frieda Hempel will add much interest and importance to the occasion by appearing as the first soloist. The great coloratura soprano sang with the orchestra in Canada, and also in Boston last week, with the greatest success. Remembered by her wonderful interpretations of the leading roles in Mozart's operas, Frieda Hempel will be heard to the best advantage in two notable arias of that master, "Deh'Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Martern Aller Arten" from "The Abduction From the Harem."

N. Y.
AMERICAN
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening. Pierre Monteux will conduct "Fantastic" Symphony, by Berlioz; "Clouds" asd "White Peacocks," by Griffes; Fantasia, by Williams; "Stenka Razin," by Glazounow. At the Saturday afternoon concert, the orchestra will play Symphony No. 4, by Brahms; "Thus Spake Zarathrustra," by Strauss; Horatius Triumphant, by Honegger.

WORLD, NOV 26 1922
New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to open its Brooklyn season with a concert in the academy, under institute auspices, Dec. 1, with Frieda Hempel as soloist. Pierre Monteux has made a fine program for this occasion. The symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms, considered one of the finest works of that master. The modern French school will be represented by Debussy's most popular score, his Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun," based on the poem of Mallarme. This work is considered to have perhaps its finest living interpreter in Pierre Monteux, since the French conductor was a close friend of the late composer and a collaborator in the early production of his scores. The concert will close with Strauss's tone-poem of mighty proportions, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a musical presentation of the philosophy of Nietzsche, conceived for a huge [illegible]

[illegible] of double importance by the appearance as soloist of Frieda Hempel, the famous coloratura soprano. Mme. Hempel, remembered from the days before she had abandoned opera for the concert stage as a soprano singer of the immortal melodies of Mozart, is to sing two of these with the orchestra, the aria "Deh'-Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Martern aller Arten" from "The Abduction from the Harem."

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

Roman Legend Theme of New Work by Arthur Honegger

Arthur Honegger, whose "mimed symphony," entitled "Horace Victorieux," will be heard for the first time in New York, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on Saturday afternoon, is, though a Swiss, one of the "six" composers of the ultra-modern French school. When he composed the work in 1920 he used the term "mimed symphony," with a ballet in mind; but it has been heard in European cities only as a purely orchestral.

The Horace of the composition is the hero of the Roman legend of the combat between the three Curatii and three Horatii. The brothers of Horatius are both slain and he stands against three. He disposes of them one by one, and having thus saved his people returns to find his sister in tears over the death of her lover, who was one of the foe. Horatius, in anger at this exhibition of disloyalty and unsisterliness, stabs her likewise and is pardoned on the ground of patriotism.

N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
ISSUE OF

Boston Symphony Here Thursday

The "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz will be the first number at the opening of the Boston Symphony season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening.

Pierre Monteux will also present Vaughan Williams, Fantasia for Double-Stringed Orchastra on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, the early English composer; the two numbers from the Roman Suite of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be the Fourth by Brahms in E minor. A score new to New York, which had its first American performance in Boston yesterday, is "Horatius Triumphant," a "Mimed Symphony" by Honegger, looked upon as the foremost member of the Parisian "Six." The afternoon will close with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Times
DEC 1 1922
NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in New York this season in Carnegie Hall last evening. It was probably not the most fortunate evening of the year on which to begin a series of symphony concerts; and the audience seemed to show the effect of a counter attraction at home. However this may have been, the orchestra was in remarkably fine form and played a program in which older and the most recent music figured.

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" unquestionably now belongs to older music, and shows it more and more at each new hearing. It is some ninety-two years old and does not belie it. The paucity of specifically musical ideas in the composition is equalled only by the fullness of extant biographical and autobiographical details concerning it. The symphony has been much written about, and it is all interesting reading so long as there is no requirement to hear a performance of it. Then the interest completely collapses, swallowed up in musical dullness. As for the orchestration, that is of great historic importance; but it no longer impresses modern ears as extraordinary in and of itself.

The performance under Mr. Monteux's direction was a brilliant one that missed not one of Berlioz's points. The last two movements at least were actively applauded.

The symphony was followed by Vaughan Williams's "Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double string orchestra." The English composer wrote it a dozen years ago; it was first heard in New York last season, played by the New York Symphony Orchestra. It improved on further acquaintance, especially when that acquaintance was renewed in the truly fine performance that Mr. Monteux achieved.

Thomas Tallis, it will be recalled, was a sixteenth century English composer. The theme is a tune he wrote for a psalter of his time. It was, necessarily, in one of the ecclesiastical modes then in use. Mr. Williams has retained completely the modal characteristics in his harmonization of this fantasia, which [illegible] its name through the rich play [illegible] fancy that he has brought to bear on the great skill with which it is [illegible]

But the impression is now, as it was on the first performance of the fantasia, that Mr. Williams has carried it too far. The modal harmonies exclusively used produce an effect of monotony on modern ears sometime before the end is reached. The composer would undoubtedly have strengthened his effect by greater conciseness.

Two pieces by the late talented American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes, were played: "Clouds" and "The White Peacock." Both of these pieces have been previously heard in New York. Both were originally for the piano, in the composer's Op. 7, entitled "Roman Sketches." It is not stated whether the orchestration is by Mr. Griffes or not. By whomever it is, it is exceedingly subtle in its imaginative use of orchestral color to enhance the effect of musical ideas in themselves elusive but singularly full of suggestion. The pieces are both enchanting and were enchantingly played.

They were followed by the symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," written by Glazunow in his youth before he had become so reckless in his output of orchestral compositions.

NOV 30 1922
QUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Wilhelm Gericke in Destitute Circumstances

Every music lover who can remember the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its palmy days, when it held an unchallenged place as one of the finest if not the very finest body of its class, will learn with regret that Wilhelm Gericke, its former conductor, now in his seventy-eighth year, is living in Vienna in such destitute circumstances that his musician friends in this country, with the characteristic generosity of the artist profession, are raising a fund for his relief. This is a melancholy ending to a career of brilliant distinction during which Gericke was numbered among the four or five great orchestral conductors of the world. It was he who, as the successor of Georg Henschel, took hold of the Boston orchestra nearly forty years ago, and began to realize the possibilities which were brought within his reach by the unlimited funds which the munificence of the late Henry Lee Higginson placed at his disposal.

But while he could not have gone far without that indispensable assistance it was by his energy, his untiring devotion and his genius for constructive work that the orchestra was made what it ultimately became. He was an incomparable drill master, and while the severity of his discipline was from time to time the occasion for complaint by no other means could the object which he had in view have been accomplished. That object was to make of the orchestra an instrument for the interpretation of the finest music as nearly perfect as human limitations would permit. No one who ever heard the orchestra play when it was at its best, and who is competent to form an intelligent opinion, will deny that this object was accomplished, and that in all the essentials of good playing the Boston Symphony Orchestra was supreme.

It used to be the criticism of some hyper-critical commentators that Gericke himself could not use to the best advantage the superb instrument which he had created, that his performances were too coldly classical to be altogether satisfying, that in their academic correctness and technical brilliancy they failed to express the soul, or to communicate the emotion, of the music which was being interpreted. Perhaps there was at one time some justification for this view, but during his second engagement as conductor Gericke had outlived this fault, and the orchestra played with all the eloquence and feeling that the score suggested or required.

Sixteen years have elapsed since his last visit here, but many must still remember him, and some of these may feel inclined to follow Mr. Stokowski's example by contributing something to the fund for his relief.

From
DEC 1 1922
EVENING WORLD
New York City

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

By Frank H. Warren.

Our old friends, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose appearances here in former days were regarded as mile posts in the year's music journey, began their thirty-seventh season last evening in Carnegie Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, his fourth year as leader of the organization. Old friends, too, were on the program, the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, which Mr. Monteux can manage as well as anybody, a fantasia for double stringed orchestra on an old English theme by Vaughan Williams, two short pieces, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," by the lamented American, Charles Griffes, and Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

The orchestra sounded brilliant at times. The concert was something of a preparatory motion for to-morrow afternoon's performance, when a new composition, "Horatius Triumphant," a "mimed" symphony by Honegger, one of the famed band of French moderns. Honegger, later in the season, is to appear here personally with the new City Symphony Orchestra.

N.Y. TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
DEC 1 1922

MONTEUX OPENS IN FINE CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins New York Season at Carnegie Hall.

PLAYS WILLIAMS'S FANTASIA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening invaded Manhattan for the first time this season, drawing a [illegible]

Mc Gorl
Concert Advertising

For 81 Years
Brooklyn's Leading Newspaper
Exclusive Associated Press Service

Mr. Monteux opened the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night with Berlioz's rather faded "Fantastic Symphony"—considered "advanced" when it was written in 1830, but even the "Witches' Sabbath" is now more like a Sabbath School. Mr. Monteux conducted it with authority and evidently con amore. There was a quasi-novelty in the shape of Vaughan Williams' "Fantasie on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double Stringed Orchestra;" the composition was even longer than the title. There were interesting color effects from the two-string orchestra, but the music was rather dull and long drawn out. This was followed by two of Charles T. Griffes' orchestral paintings, "Clouds" (not so good as Debussy's) and "The White Peacock." Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" closed the concert. W. H. HUMISTON.

---

of the excellences, and a few of the peculiarities of his superior and always scholarly musicianship and his orchestra showed a spirit of enthusiasm and mutuality which for a time seemed to have lapsed. Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony (No. 1 in C major), which opened the program, demonstrated the poetic and dramatically imaginative faculties of both composer and Conductor Monteux, and proved a most generous appeal for the majority of the audience. [illegible]

GLOBE
OF 1922

Orchestra is York season of concerts
ing, Nov. 30,
Dec. 2. The Berlioz will programme.
Vaughan Will-le stringed
by Thomas composer;
man Suite"
T. Griffes, Peacock," symphonic ill introduce mphony" by mber of the (now Five), phant." On two other symphony tone poem

922

AND TS
RE

aturday hestral
ts.
the last will give in Car-evening
A quasi be pre-x, who ors, will e Amer-
'Roman'
White known
The will be tique," also in-string
Thomas zounov's promimed' phant,"
of the
The a per-
Sym-
Richard rathus-

This Week
Symphony season will next Thurs-
next Satgram will mphony of ghan Will-mas Tallis, and scored also the
T. Griffes,
Peacock," Glazounov's folk themes,
e symphony ahms in E ill also pre-
New York
ratius Tri-member of had its first Boston last well received oremost pro-our of com-tin program Mimee." The rauss's Symrathustra."

N. Y.
HERALD
NOV 27 1922

The program is announced for the Gericke Benefit Concert to be given in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on December 5. Pierre Monteux will conduct Mr. Gericke's orchestral arrangement of the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms. Mr. Monteux has chosen other composers and pieces connected with the musical life of Vienna, where Mr. Gericke has been prominent as a conductor for many years. Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, also Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," a composer and score of which Mr. Gericke was an early champion, will also be played. Wilhelm Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and held the post for thirteen seasons in two terms—1884-1889 and 1898-1906.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

Frieda Hempel, who began her tour as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Montreal and Toronto and the past week has been singing with that organization in Providence and in Boston, will give her first New York recital of the season in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday evening.

EAGLE Nov. 26.
Brooklyn, New York

Subscribers to Boxes at Boston Symphony Concerts.

Subscribers to boxes for the Boston Symphony concerts which begin Dec. 1 at the Academy of Music include: Frank L. Babbott, Mr. and Mrs. I. Sherwood Coffin, Edward J. Dingee, Mr. and Mrs. Francis D. Dodge, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Adams, Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Pray

---

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Frieda Hampel to Appear Here as First Soloist.

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor, will open the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at its concert, under Institute auspices, in the Academy next Friday evening. Pierre Monteux will also present the celebrated score of his countryman, Debussy, "Prelude to the afternoon of a Faun," based on the verses of the impressionistic poet Mallarme. The part of the Faun is suggested by beautiful flute solo passages, to be played by Georges Laurent, the illustrious virtuoso of the orchestra.

Frieda Hempel will appear as the first solist. The great coloratura soprano sang with the orchestra in Canada, and also in Boston last week, with great success. Frieda Hempel will be heard in two notable arias of Mozart, "Deh 'Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Martern Aller Arten" from "The Abduction from the Harem."

The evening will close with Richard Strauss' tone poem "Also Sake Zarathustra" for organ and enlarged orchestra, which depicts in tones the philosophy of Friedrich Nietzsche and is looked upon as one of Strauss' most impressive achievements.

N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
NOV

HEMPEL AT CARNEGIE HALL.

Frieda Hempel, who began her tour as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Montreal and Toronto, and the past week has been singing with that organization in Prividence and Boston, will give her first New York recital of the season in Carnegie Hall next Tuesday evening, Nov. 28. Miss Hempel will be assisted by Coenraad V. Bos at the piano, and Louis P. Fritze, flutist.

NEW YORK
N. Y.
HERALD
NOV 27 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its New York season at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. Pierre Monteux will conduct at the evening concert Berlioz's "Fantastic" Symphony, two descriptive pieces of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock" Vaughan Williams's Fantasia for string orchestra on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis, and Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin." For the matinee the symphony will be the fourth of Brahms. Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" will also be and organ. This concert will be made an event of double importance by the appearance as soloist of Frieda Hempel, the famous coloratura soprano. Mme. Hempel, remembered from the days before she had abandoned opera for the concert stage as a soprano singer of the immortal melodies of Mozart, is to sing two of these with the orchestra, the aria "Deh' Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Martern aller Arten" from "The Abduction from the Harem."

N. Y.
HERALD

The extra series of Monday evening concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was instituted last year, is to be continued. These concerts, patronized in large degree by people untutored in symphonic music, are the outgrowth of a demand for symphony concerts in Boston which exceeds the bounds of the regular forty-eight Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts. Pierre Monteux is to present regular symphony programs and the following soloists are to appear: Ernest Schelling, Ester Ferrabini-Jacchia, Florence Macbeth, Renee Chemet and Magdeleine Brard.

From
EAGLE
Brooklyn, New York

BROOKLYN NOTES

The Fourth Symphony of Brahms in E minor will open the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn at its concert, under Institute auspices, in the Academy next Friday evening, Dec. 1, at 8:15. Pierre Monteux will also present the celebrated score of his countryman, Debussy, "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun," based on the verses of the impressionistic poet Mallarme. The part of the faun is suggested by beautiful flute solo passages to be played by Georges Laurent. This music is by general opinion given a performance of the highest eloquence at the hands of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Pierre Monteux.

Frieda Hempel will add much interest and importance to the occasion by appearing as the first soloist. The great coloratura soprano sang with the orchestra in Canada, and also in Boston last week, with the greatest success. Remembered by her wonderful interpretations of the leading roles in Mozart's operas, Frieda Hempel will be heard to the best advantage in two notable arias of that master, "Deh'Vieni" from "The Marriage of Figaro," and "Martern Aller Arten" from "The Abduction From the Harem."

N. Y.
AMERICAN
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its season in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening. Pierre Monteux will conduct "Fantastic" Symphony, by Berlioz; "Clouds" asd "White Peacocks," by Griffes; Fantasia, by Williams; "Stenka Razin," by Glazounow. At the Saturday afternoon concert, the orchestra will play Symphony No. 4, by Brahms; "Thus Spake Zarathrustra," by Strauss; Horatius Triumphant, by Honeggar.

WORLD, NOV 26
New York City.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is to open its Brooklyn season with a concert in the academy, under institute auspices, Dec. 1, with Frieda Hempel as soloist. Pierre Monteux has made a fine program for this occasion. The symphony will be the Fourth of Brahms, considered one of the finest works of that master. The modern French school will be represented by Debussy's most popular score, his Prelude to the "Afternoon of a Faun," based on the poem of Mallarme. This work is considered to have perhaps its finest living interpreter in Pierre Monteux, since the French conductor was a close friend of the late composer and a collaborator in the early production of his scores. The concert will close with Strauss' tone-poem of mighty proportions, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," a musical presentation of the philosophy of Nietszche, conceived for a huge orchestra

---

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
NOV 26 1922

Roman Legend Theme of New Work by Arthur Honegger

Arthur Honegger, whose "mimed symphony," entitled "Horace Victorieux," will be heard for the first time in New York, at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on Saturday afternoon, is, though a Swiss, one of the "six" composers of the ultra-modern French school. When he composed the work in 1920 he used the term "mimed symphony," with a ballet in mind; but it has been heard in European cities only as a purely orchestral.

The Horace of the composition is the hero of the Roman legend of the combat between the three Curatii and three Horatii. The brothers of Horatius are both slain and he stands against three. He disposes of them one by one, and having thus saved his people returns to find his sister in tears over the death of her lover, who was one of the foe. Horatius, in anger at this exhibition of disloyalty and unsisterliness, stabs her likewise and is pardoned on the ground of patriotism.

N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
ISSUE OF

Boston Symphony Here Thursday

The "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz will be the first number at the opening of the Boston Symphony season in New York, which will take place in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening.

Pierre Monteux will also present Vaughan Williams, Fantasia for Double-Stringed Orchastra on a Theme by Thomas Tallis, the early English composer; the two numbers from the Roman Suite of the late Charles T. Griffes, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and Glazounov's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin."

For the Saturday matinee the symphony will be the Fourth by Brahms in E minor. A score new to New York, which had its first American performance in Boston yesterday, is "Horatius Triumphant," a "Mimed Symphony" by Honegger, looked upon as the foremost member of the Parisian "Six." The afternoon will close with Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

Times

NEW YORK CITY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its first appearance in New York this season in Carnegie Hall last evening. It was probably not the most fortunate evening of the year on which to begin a series of symphony concerts; and the audience seemed to show the effect of a counter attraction at home. However this may have been, the orchestra was in remarkably fine form and played a program in which older and the most recent music figured.

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" unquestionably now belongs to older music, and shows it more and more at each new hearing. It is some ninety-two years old and does not belie it. The paucity of specifically musical ideas in the composition is equalled only by the fullness of extant biographical and autobiographical details concerning it. The symphony has been much written about, and it is all interesting reading, so long as there is no requirement to hear a performance of it. Then the interest completely collapses, swallowed up in musical dullness. As for the orchestration, that is of great historic importance; but it no longer impresses modern ears as extraordinary in and of itself.

The performance under Mr. Monteux's direction was a brilliant one that missed not one of Berlioz's points. The last two movements at least were actively applauded.

The symphony was followed by R. Vaughan Williams's "Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double string orchestra." The English composer wrote it a dozen years ago; it was first heard in New York last season, played by the New York Symphony Orchestra. It improved on further acquaintance, especially when that acquaintance was renewed in the truly fine performance that Mr. Monteux achieved.

Thomas Tallis, it will be recalled, was a sixteenth century English composer. The theme is a tune he wrote for a psalter of his time. It was, necessarily, in one of the ecclesiastical modes then in use. Mr. Williams has retained completely the modal characteristics in his harmonization of this fantasia, which justifies its name through the rich play of fancy that he has brought to bear on the great skill with which it is wrought, and especially the fine and delicate effects of tone that he has by his ingenious division of the

But the impression is now, as it was on the first performance of the fantasia, that Mr. Williams has carried it too far. The modal harmonies exclusively used produce an effect of monotony on modern ears sometime before the end is reached. The composer would undoubtedly have strengthened his effect by greater conciseness.

Two pieces by the late talented American composer, Charles Tomlinson Griffes, were played: "Clouds" and "The White Peacock." Both of these pieces have been previously heard in New York. Both were originally for the piano, in the composer's Op. 7, entitled "Roman Sketches." It is not stated whether the orchestration is by Mr. Griffes or not. By whomever it is, it is exceedingly subtle in its imaginative use of orchestral color to enhance the effect of musical ideas in themselves elusive but singularly full of suggestion. The pieces are both enchanting and were enchantingly played.

They were followed by the symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin," written by Glazunow in his youth before he had become so reckless in his output of orchestral compositions.

FROM NOV 30 1922
INQUIRER
Philadelphia, Pa.

Wilhelm Gericke in Destitute Circumstances

Every music lover who can remember the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its palmy days, when it held an unchallenged place as one of the finest if not the very finest body of its class, will learn with regret that Wilhelm Gericke, its former conductor, now in his seventy-eighth year, is living in Vienna in such destitute circumstances that his musician friends in this country, with the characteristic generosity of the artist profession, are raising a fund for his relief. This is a melancholy ending to a career of brilliant distinction during which Gericke was numbered among the four or five great orchestral conductors of the world. It was he who, as the successor of Georg Henschel, took hold of the Boston orchestra nearly forty years ago, and began to realize the possibilities which were brought within his reach by the unlimited funds which the munificence of the late Henry Lee Higginson placed at his disposal.

But while he could not have gone far without that indispensable assistance it was by his energy, his untiring devotion and his genius for constructive work that the orchestra was made what it ultimately became. He was an incomparable drill master, and while the severity of his discipline was from time to time the occasion for complaint by no other means could the object which he had in view have been accomplished. That object was to make of the orchestra an instrument for the interpretation of the finest music as nearly perfect as human limitations would permit. No one who ever heard the orchestra play when it was at its best, and who is competent to form an intelligent opinion, will deny that this object was accomplished, and that in all the essentials of good playing the Boston Symphony Orchestra was supreme.

It used to be the criticism of some hyper-critical commentators that Gericke himself could not use to the best advantage the superb instrument which he had created, that his performances were too coldly classical to be altogether satisfying, that in their academic correctness and technical brilliancy they failed to express the soul, or to communicate the emotion, of the music which was being interpreted. Perhaps there was at one time some justification for this view, but during his second engagement as conductor Gericke had outlived this fault, and the orchestra played with all the eloquence and feeling that the score suggested or required.

Sixteen years have elapsed since his last visit here, but many must still remember him, and some of these may feel inclined to follow Mr. Stokowski's example by contributing something to the fund for his relief.

From DEC 1 1922
EVENING WORLD
New York City

IN THE REALM OF MUSIC

By Frank H. Warren.

Our old friends, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose appearances here in former days were regarded as mile posts in the year's music journey, began their thirty-seventh season last evening in Carnegie Hall, with Pierre Monteux conducting, his fourth year as leader of the organization. Old friends, too, were on the program, the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, which Mr. Monteux can manage as well as anybody, a fantasia for double stringed orchestra on an old English theme by Vaughan Williams, two short pieces, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," by the lamented American, Charles Griffes, and Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

The orchestra sounded brilliant at times. The concert was something of a preparatory motion for to-morrow afternoon's performance, when a new composition, "Horatius Triumphant," a "mimed" symphony by Honegger, one of the famed band of French moderns. Honegger, later in the season, is to appear here personally with the new City Symphony Orchestra.

N. Y. TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
DEC 1 1922

MONTEUX OPENS IN FINE CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Begins New York Season at Carnegie Hall.

PLAYS WILLIAMS'S FANTASIA

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening invaded Manhattan for the first time this season, drawing a fine audience and delivering a program of extraordinary interest beautifully played. Mr. Monteux has invested his fine organization with all of the excellences, and a few of the peculiarities of his superior and always scholarly musicianship and his orchestra showed a spirit of enthusiasm and mutuality which for a time seemed to have lapsed. Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony (No. 1 in C major), which opened the program, demonstrated the poetic and dramatically imaginative faculties of both composer and Conductor Monteux, and proved a most generous appetizer for the majority of the audience.

Vaughn Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double-stringed Orchestra, which followed, was a vital exhibition of the unified finesse and the understanding of the perfectly- Two numbers by and "The White Peacock" of the con-

---

Mc Bool
Concert Advertising

For 81 Years
Brooklyn's Leading Newspaper
Exclusive Associated Press Service

Mr. Monteux opened the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night with Berlioz's rather faded "Fantastic Symphony"—considered "advanced" when it was written in 1830, but even the "Witches' Sabbath" is now more like a Sabbath School. Mr. Monteux conducted it with authority and evidently con amore. There was a quasi-novelty in the shape of Vaughan Williams' "Fantasie on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double Stringed Orchestra;" the composition was even longer than the title. There were interesting color effects from the two-string orchestra, but the music was rather dull and long drawn out. This was followed by two of Charles T. Griffes' orchestral paintings, "Clouds" (not so good as Debussy's) and "The White Peacock." Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" closed the concert. W. H. HUMISTON.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 1 1922

MUSIC

By PITTS SANBORN.

Notable Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Other Music.

Thanksgiving and the Boston Symphony Orchestra both come from New England. They visited New York together yesterday, and however New York may have received Thanksgiving it did not turn out very numerously for the Boston orchestra's concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. It is an open secret that the New York concerts of this orchestra are not now fashionable—one more proof that fashion and taste may not always be synonymous.

The programme of yesterday's concert opened with the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz. Rightly or wrongly the "Fantastic" symphony is by no means a favorite with New York audiences, but it might conceivably become so if it were played here often as well as it was played last night. There was enough of applause after the movement entitled "March to the Scaffold" to justify Mr. Monteux in signalling the band to rise, and the entire work was received cordially.

The performance of the symphony was the most effective that I remember. Mr. Mengelberg led it at his first concert here as conductor of the New Symphony Orchestra, and his reading was notable, but Mr. Mengelberg was obliged, on that occasion, to struggle with an inferior orchestra. The masterly conducting of Mr. Monteux had a responsive instrument in the superb Boston band.

Never did the string bodies of that band sound richer than in Vaughan Williams's fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-stringed orchestra. This really fine composition, echoing cathedral pomp and ceremony, was played with an amazing variety of color and nuance, and in particular it displayed the admirable skill of Mr. Burgin, the concertmaster of the orchestra, and the gorgeous tone of Mr. Fourel, the first viola. "Clouds" and "The White Peacock" by the lamented Charles T. Griffes followed, lovely pieces both, and played beautifully.

The concluding number of the concert was Glazounoff's symphonic poem "Stenka Razin," which is so much more Russian and barbaric and imposing and generally worth while than most of its author's music. It [illegible]

From TELEGRAM
New York City
DEC 1 1922

Boston Orchestra in Berlioz Symphony

Coming from Boston for its first concert of the season, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, presented an unusual programme last night at Carnegie Hall. Berlioz's "Fantastic" symphony, which was the first offering of the Boston musicians, is almost a novelty here. Mr. Monteux is an authority on French music. He directs it very skillfully, and if the long works of Berlioz are to be heard here, no one is better qualified to do it. But the "Fantastic" symphony in spite of an excellent performance, did not make a deep impression. There was more applause for an English novelty, Vaughan Williams' Fantasia on a Theme of Tallis. Very appealing were two short works of Charles T. Griffes—"Clouds" and "The White Peacock." Orchestra and conductor were warmly applauded by a holiday audience.

From
EVENING MAIL
New York City

BOSTON SYMPHONY

NOT [illegible] the claims of Thanksgiving reunions (and turkeys) could prevent a typical Boston Symphony audience from filling Carnegie Hall last night to greet Pierre Monteux and his forces. The Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz, at once friend, forerunner and sometime rival of Richard the First, held premier place.

It does not always take a German to conduct Wagner, but it seems to take a Frenchman to interpret Berlioz. Mr. Monteux gave the great Hector's work a sympathetic reading that brought out many beauties where others have murmured "heavy" or turgid." This was especially notable in the "Scene in the Meadows."

Vaughn Williams' fantasia on a theme by Tallis for double stringed orchestra followed, dreaming its way through modulation after modulation, perpetually questioning, never answering. Mr. Monteux caught a wonder mood here and imprisoned it delightfully.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
DEC 1 1922

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Apparently all the musical organizations in this country are in the hands of Republicans, who did not feel as grateful and alive on Thanksgiving Day, and before, as they might have been. Elena Gerhardt and the City Orchestra on Wednesday edified their audience with Mahler's songs about three dead children. At the Metropolitan, in the evening, the opera was all about a man's dead wife; and last night, in Carnegie Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its New York season with Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," in the fourth part of which a lover takes poison with the intention of committing suicide, while in the last the demons gather to witness his burial. Cheer up ladies and gentlemen! The next election may not be so lugubrious.

It must be said that the Boston musicians, under Pierre Monteux, gave a vivid, virtuosic reproduction of Berlioz's gruesome tonal hallucinations. In Vaughan Williams's fantasia on a psalm tune by Tallis, composed in 1567, the wonderful warmth and euphony of the Boston strings made a thrilling impression. Williams shows to better advantage in this fantasia than in his overlong symphonies. To be sure, this piece, too, is not short. One man observed, as he got up to hurry back to the opera: "It has an end after all; I was beginning to lose hope."

N. Y.
HERALD
DEC 1 1922

BOSTON ORCHESTRA STARTS ITS SEASON

Plays Under Monteux at Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, began its New York season with a concert in Carnegie Hall last evening. A varied program of compositions was given. The first number was Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." Following this were the fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis, for strings, composed by Vaughan Williams; Charles T. Griffe's two descriptive pieces, "Clouds" and "The White Peacock," and Glazounov's symphonic poem, "Stenka Razin."

Mr. Monteux gave a very fine reading of Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony." It was one in which the virtuosity of his players was every where apparent. The scenes and moods of an artist's experience, as painted by Berlioz, were brilliantly reproduced by the orchestra. And, indeed, do a few portions of the score when played with the finish given them last night create the passing illusion that Berlioz was sometimes a creator.

The Williams fantasia on a psalm tune of Tallis (written in 1567), was given here at a concert of the Symphony Society last March. The fine composition of modern instrumentation, but preserving the ecclesiastic character, by means of old harmonies stood in very effective contrast to the Berlioz score which preceded it. The two pieces by the talented and lamented young American Griffes, his "Clouds" and "White Peacock," taken from his "Roman Sketches," written originally for the pianoforte, fitted well into Mr. Monteux's elaborate program scheme. Glazunov's poem, "Stenka Razin," which has for the chief theme the Volga bargeman's song, "Ay Ouchnem," was given here by Mr. Monteux on January 10, 1920. It is a well made, brilliant work, and served well to bring a change of routine among the tone poems so often played here at present.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
DEC 1 1922

Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" Revived By Boston Orchestra

Old and Seldom-Heard Composition That Influenced Composers of All Countries Is Finely Given

By H. E. Krehbiel

On glancing at the program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall last night one was tempted to credit Mr. Monteux with an act of daring in including Berlioz's "Fanstastic Symphony." True, the work has been heard periodically in New York during the last fifty-six years, it having received its first American performance at the hands of the Philharmonic Society under the direction of Carl Bergmann on January 27, 1866.

But the periods seem to have grown longer and longer and the effect produced by the work less and less as time has passed. Yet when Mr. Monteux injected the vitalizing fluid of a sincere and graphic interpretation into its veins last night we were helped to a new realization of what the composition stands for in symphonic history, especially of the influence which it exerted upon the composers of all countries since Beethoven back to whose day it almost reaches.

For the story of its composition, the motives which inspired it, its autobiographical ingredients, the sequence of incidents and passions which the composer told us were its poetical contents, we do not care a fig. To us they seem like poppycock and we are strongly tempted to believe that Berlioz was of the same opinion. But he certainly did put a feature which Beethoven had conceived in an ideal form into the symphonic form in so palpable a manner that it was copied by his successors and has endured ever since. It is still in process of growth, though the communal theme, which has its full stature in the "Fantastic," has, under the influence of Liszt, dwindled down to a "germ" which in the symphonies and symphonic poems of today develops into the strangest and most contradictory entities or does not grow at all, but contents itself with donning varied and motley harmonic and instrumental colors.

We confess that we do not quite understand why Berlioz chops off the head of his hero's sweetheart instead of the head of the lover who goes to the gallows for the murder and afterward transforms her into a hag participating in a witches' revel. But perhaps this is inquiring a little too curiously, and if he did nothing more in his final scene than suggest to Liszt that in his "Faust" symphony he might picture Mephistopheles as the spirit of negation by parodying the themes which stand for Faust and Gretchen (we think Gretchen is in it but we haven't time to think long) he at least showed the way to a device that has been industriously cultivated since. And in spite of all that is in the music (or only in the verbal program which is outside of it) the "Scene in the Fields" remains of compelling beauty, and was made convincingly so by the excellence of last night's performance.

After the symphony came Vaughan Williams's superb fantasy on a theme by Tallis, to which we were introduced by Mr. Damrosch last March and which evoked thoughts of the "consorts for viols" of the Elizabethan period; and then "Clouds" and "The White Peacock" (ingenious bits of post-Debussyism), by the late Charles T. Griffes and Glazounoff's "Stenka Razin," with its familiar Russian echoes.

From SUN
Address New York City
Date DEC 1 1922

Boston Orchestra Brings Much Fantasy to New York

Monteux Conducts First Program; Easton as Carmen, With Happy Debut for Queena Mario; Bori's Exquisite Traviata.

Thanksgiving had much fantasy to celebrate it last night, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra began in Carnegie Hall its thirty-seventh season of concerts in New York. To begin with—and for a long while—there was Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony. Then followed Vaughan-Williams's fantasia on a Tallis theme. Two Griffes sketches scattered fancy free, too, and Glazounov's "Stenka Razin" belongs among the dreams which Diaghlieff let loose upon the ballet stage. It was no evening for the literal minded. To those whose stomachs were with white turkey lined it offered nightmare and reverie without the necessity of mince pie.

Mr. Monteux and his men won a holiday welcome from a faithful crowd. In reply the Fantastic Symphony made sometimes hectic hearing. Even those romancers who are always looking for Berlioz's red haired lady must finally have been shooed away by the violent cineometography of these confessions of a symphony eater. The ballroom waltz was more tactfully in the mood than were the March to the Scaffold and the sheer shriek and gong, the Witches' Sabbath—although this last movement might, of course, be taken as a reminder of Thanksgiving in Salem, Mass., not so many centuries ago. The middle movement, the Scene in the Meadows, Mr. Monteux tried manfully to endow with breeze and sunlight, but it was impossible to dislodge the composer from his bed of daisies for many and many a bar.

Last season Mr. Damrosch introduced here Vaughan-Williams's Fantasia on a Theme by Thomas Tallis for Double Stringed Orchestra. It seemed then an interesting, occasionally beautiful experiment, carried out overlong. When Mr. Monteux took it up last night this much of its liabilities seemed to have lessened, and the musicianly skill, the tonal ingenuity that threads its dignity grew into more appreciable assets. It remains a noble enlargement of a small idea.

Of the late Charles Griffes no symphonic works have plucked the strings of the imagination as much as did his "Kubla Khan." But his shorter work, "The White Peacock," has become even more popular. Especially with dancers. One cannot hear that lovely strain which runs through it without facing the memory of a chalk faced girl in white tights and a feather duster tail, going through what vulgarians would call the motions. Yet "The White Peacock," which Mr. Monteux conducted last night, is a far more living work than is "Clouds," which preceded it. "Clouds" must suggest "Nuages" as much as Griffes, in this stage, frankly and devotedly suggests the composer of "Nuages." And the suggestion must beget a comparison.

The orchestra played with all that vigor and bigness which Mr. Monteux seems to consider its best foot forward. At the end of the Scaffold March, in the Berlioz, he bade the players rise and share the clapping.

TIMES DEC 2 1922
BROOKLYN, N. Y.

MUSIC EVENTS

BOSTON SYMPHONY

With Frieda Hempel as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first of a series of five Philharmonic concerts before a large and evidently pleased audience at the Academy of Music last evening. Directed with skill, intelligence and insight by Pierre Monteux, the orchestra gave a brilliant performance, always carefully thought out and with a combination of technical knowledge and skill, with an admirable tonal quality that made the entire program of a very high order of merit indeed.

The Symphony of the evening was Brahms' No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98, handled in a manner that brought out all the finest qualilties of the work. All of the four movements of the Symphony are interesting and highly effective pieces of musical workmanship, full of a fine variety and all admirably developed and scored. The last movement, in particular, made a particularly good impression under the sensitive handling of M. Monteux.

In many ways, however, the most interesting and appealing number of the evening was nothing less than that established favorite, Debussy's Prelude to "L'Apres Midi d'un Faun." Certainly this piece goes to show the falsity of the old belief, still widely held among the more pedantically minded, that a popular piece of music is of necessity a poor piece of music. Played with the orchestra's finest skill, the Debussy number proved the stirring and lovely thing it has always seemed under the sort of treatment it deserves.

Mme. Hempel was heard in the aria "Deh Vieni," from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and a recitative and a naria from Leber's "Der Freischutz." She was at her best in the Mozart number, which she sang with great charm, skill and beauty of tone. Her accompaniment in this piece was a model of understanding and co-operation on the part of the orchestra. Mme. Hempel was also in excellent form in her handling of the Weber numbers, which she sang with sympathy and knowledge. Incidentally her enunciation was admirable at all times.

Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," proved something of a disappointment. It is interesting and frequently effective, but somehow it seems less impressive and considerably less important than might be expecter. The fact that the number did not quite come up to expectations is certainly by no means due to the dork of the orchestra or the interpretation given by M. Monteux, for the playing throughout was of the highest order. Indeed, it may be said that the execution of the number brought out, perhaps, more values than the composer put into it. Certainly, the work of the Boston Symphony throughout the program showed that it is a most valuable addition to Brooklyn's musical season.

EAGLE DEC 2 1922
Brooklyn, New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY RETURNS

The Big Band Welcomed by a Big Brooklyn Audience.

The annual return of Boston Symphony Orchestra is one of the reddest of the redletter nights in Brooklyn music and last night Mr. Monteux and his men were welcomed by a house that reminded one of the days before the war and Karl Muck had worked this disintegration on hand and audience alike. Not every seat was occupied but so nearly so as to show that these concerts have resumed their old dominating place in the cultural life of Brooklyn.

And Mr. Monteux returned with a happy smile and the consciousness that his band was fine as mortal band can be in purity of tone, delicacy, and the sympathetic response to the conductor's lightest indication. He had proved it the night before by opening his season in Carnegie Hall with the great orchestral show piece Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony" and had won enthusiastic critical approval. His Brooklyn program had nothing so purely a "stunt" as the Berlioz music, but it had three pieces better worth hearing, and which in their combination of requirements made a finer test of the superb quality of this historic orchestra.

These included the Brahms Fourth Symphony—the one with the heavenly andante, its opening theme proclaimed by the Eiglish horn, and the noble last movement which marked the last sight of the composer by the Vienna public which had slowly learned to love him; the Debussy "Afternoon of a Faun," with its shimmering atmospheric effects which this public has learned to enjoy, and Strauss' bombastic but impressive "Thus Spake Zarathustra" with its wind machine, its glockenspiel and its portentous demands on the orchestra. Just how far up—or down—one rates Strauss every one must admit that his tone poems make all sorts of audiences sit up and take notice. The ingenuity and variety of his orchestration, the tax he makes on the resources of the best orchestra in the world intrigue the musicians, while if one sits in the outer fringe of mere music lovers it is not displeasing to sit in continual wonder as to what is coming next. In the "Zarathustra" the unexpected comes so thick and fast that the auditor who called the Brahms symphony "a long piece" could hardly have noted the flight of time.

But exquisite as the finish of the orchestra was—especially in Debussy—it was matched by the perfections of the soloist, Frieda Hempel, one of the few Mozart singers left to us. Last night she chose the Countess's lovely air from "Marriage of Figaro," which is associated by this public with those happy days when Sembrich and Eames combined to make the performance of that opera an unfailing delight. Even the auditors who remembered the last appearance of those singers on this very stage, when the "Deh Vieni" was supplemented by the opulent Eames beauty, could cavil at Mme. Hempel last evening. She has mastered that lost art of the Mozart singer, of making his music sound simple and easy. She was originally announced for one of that composer's show pieces from an opera unknown here, but we suspect she changed for the better when she sang the familiar "Agatha's Prayer" from "Der Freischutz." She sang the simple air beautifully as she had sung the Mozart, and she made a brave show with the bravura recitative, which has the great merit for public performance of sounding harder than it is just as the Mozartean legato sounds deceptively easy—when Madame Hempel sings it. H. O.

N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Series Inaugurated Here With Frieda Hempel as Soloist.

The first of a series of five Philharmonic concerts was given last evening by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, before a very large audience. The orchestra, and its accomplished conductor, Pierre Monteux, were warmly greeted by an appreciative audience on their return to Brooklyn to inaugurate their annual series of concerts, which music lovers here have come to look upon as an established institution. Conductor and orchestra both deepened the excellent impression made in this borough on other occasions.

The program was of particular interest and each number was thoroughly enjoyed. Brahm's Symphony No. 4, in E minor, was the opening number, and this was followed by Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." The latter is a delightful score based on the verses of the impressionistic poet, Mallarme. The part of the Faun was suggested by the beautiful flute solo passages played by Georges Laurent, the illustrious virtuoso of the orchestra.

The closing number was Straus' well-known tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," which won much favor.

Frieda Hempel, who sang with the orchestra in Boston last week, was the assisting artist. Miss Hempel is a coloratura soprano of high rank and her voice was in excellent form last evening. Her selections were Mozart's aria, "Deh Vieni," from "Le Nozze de Fiagro," and Weber's recitative, "Wie Nahte mir der Schlummer," and aria, "Leise, Leise," from "Der Freischutz."

N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 1922

Boston Orchestra Opens Season at Academy

Pierre Monteux's programme, opening the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-fifth Brooklyn season, at the Academy of Music last night, included Brahm's E minor symphony, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," and Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Frieda Hempel, soprano, was soloist, her numbers being the "Deh Vieni" aria from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and the "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" recitative, and "Leise, leise" aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz." The concert, first of the Boston's annual Brooklyn series of five, was held as heretofore under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, and attracted a very large attendance.

Appreciation is due Mr. Monteux for bringing to a Brooklyn audience the not so frequently heard E minor of Brahms (the symphonies in C minor and D major figuring more constantly in the programme offerings of orchestras hereabouts), and likewise for the finely sincere exposition the score received under his baton. An ardent student of the tragedies of Sophocles at the time he composed this symphony, Brahms (past the age of fifty) has by some commentators been attributed with having given voice to the melancholy of ancient tragedy, in his musical pages. Max Kalbeck, whose 2,138-page "Life of Brahms" is a marvel of patient autobiographical production, even sees the subject of Death in Brahms' finale, supporting his vision with a relevant quotation from a chorus in Sophocles' "Oedipus Coloneus." But Lawrence Gilman, pre-eminent present-day American music commentator, gently but firmly upsets this grave interpretation. "With due respect to Herr Kalbeck," writes Mr. Gilman, "to exhibit the E minor Symphony as an exercise in pessimism is to show it in a singularly misleading light. Much of the first movement sounds to-day frankly cheerful, ballad-like, healthily vigorous, with nothing that even borders on tragedy. In the lovely Andante, with its hauntingly beutiful coda, there is no emotion more sombre than a rich romantic melancholy. The Scherzo is anything but tragic; and the Finale, despite its passionate earnestness and its occasional solemnity, is remote from the mood of Sophoclean tragedy."

Mr. Gilman's understanding of this Brahms' symphony was reflected in the Boston performance of last evening.

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of Debussy's "Faun" was notable because of regard for the ever varying subtleties of nuance and sensitive instrumental shadings; also for an exquisitely refined though vital enunciation of its elusive impressionistic charm.

Not so terrifying a composition as in former years, Strauss' "Zarathustra" can yet show off the virtuosic capabilities of an orchestra. Mr. Monteux and his players gave it a powerful performance, outlining its many details with superb vision. The vertiginous orchestral altitudes, abysmal depths, sepulchral silences and final mystical conclusion (in two tonalities) were all presented quite magnificently. As music of philosophical import, however, Strauss' score falls flat.

It has upon numerous occasions in these columns been stated that the inclusion of vocal numbers as solos on a programme of orchestral music detracts from the dignity of the latter. But this dignity was sustained, rather than detracted, by the inclusion of Mme. Hempel's one recitative and two arias. Mme. Hempel is probably unsurpassed to-day in any of her qualifications as concert singer. Her voice is most beautiful and even through all the registers of its range. Its flexibility and vibrancy are outstanding characteristics. Moreover, Mme. Hempel has acquired a well-nigh perfect vocal technique and a genuine musical intelligence which makes this technique a means to an end rather than an end in itself. She received recalls in number, but, of course, no encores could be permitted at a symphony concert.

R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 3 1922

Boston Symphony on Dec. 12

With Olga Samaroff, pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in Providence a week from next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Miss Samaroff will play Schumann's Concerto in A minor.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this occasion a programme which should make it a repetition of the success of the opening concert. The great symphony in E-flat major of Mozart will be the opening number. A new score of interest will be played, the Fantasia by Vaughan Williams on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis, written for a double-stringed orchestra. Vaughan Williams, by virtue of this and other scores, is looked upon as probably the greatest English composer living. His London Symphony, played by the orchestra in Boston last year, and the Fantasia, played this year for the first time, disclose remarkable beauty and inspiration.

The closing number will be the symphonic poem of Cesar Franck, "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), which in a measure will pay tribute to the genius of the great Belgian master, the centennial of whose birth is being celebrated this season. Mr. Monteux is going to give during the coming week in Boston a Franck programme. "Le Chasseur Maudit" is considered one of the most rousing and brilliant of Franck's scores, employing the hunting horns in a stirring manner.

FROM Times
DEC 3 1922
NEW YORK CITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A NOVELTY

Honegger's 'Horace' an Orchestral 'Daub,' but Suggesting New Ranges in Tonal Combinations.

Johannes Brahms in some isle of the blest should have met his lifetime foes and critics during yesterday's matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, a day of contrasts, of prophecy and remembrance. For Arthur Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," here offered as first fruits of the Paris "Six," was paired with the now accepted Strauss "Zarathustra," and both together preceded by the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. How his old antagonists would have hastened to agree that the symphony was warp and woof of the substance of harmony, the pattern of melody, quite as present-century audiences long since came to regard it.

Honegger's "Horace" is altogether a horse of another color; denial of harmony, of melody, even of motif—an orchestral "daub," indeed, but suggesting new ranges of delicacy or depth in tonal combinations as elusive and fleeting as the colors of molten gold over a caldron of fusing metal. It is boldly done, irritating or fascinating, according as the listener's thought is on music of past or future. If Honegger has evolved a new language, he speaks it, or makes his orchestra speak it, fluently.

The Horatii and Curatii are sufficiently characterized in triple combat. Still more plaintively recognizable is Horace's sister, Camilla. She weeps—two whining 'cellos for her eyes—over her enemy lover. Horace draws his sword, and no greater thrusts ever sounded in full orchestra than when, in Gilbert's phrase, he "drew his snickersnee." For the startling sounds are indeed provocative of mirth, yet the fact remains that the composer has made his audience all but present at a killing.

Darius Milhaud is to bring here soon some more of the music of the "Six," and New York should be more hospitable to it than was Boston to Honegger, when subscribers threatened to withdraw if the orchestra should play any more of it. Mr. Monteux's players gave a great account of themselves in the novelty, and still greater in their superb performance of Strauss, which ended their first three days' visit to town this season.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
DEC 3 1922

BOSTONIANS PLAY ANOTHER NOVELTY

Conductor Monteux Gives Fine Performance of Honegger's Hitherto Unheard Piece.

CORTOT WITH PHILHARMONIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday gave its first matinee concert of the season here, Conductor Monteux adding to the interest of the event with a first-playing in New York of Arthur Honegger's new Symphonie Mimee, "Horace Victorieux," an orchestral discourse founded [illegible] variously illustrative of [illegible]

[illegible] title, "Symp[illegible] "Imitation Symphony," [illegible] attains the form or scope of a symphony, the work being merely divided into connected episodes, having been written for a ballet for the stage, with all of the visual accessories of characters, scenery and costumes. Although the composer was born in Havre, he is of Swiss parentage and, musically, at least, a good deal of a libertarian. Honegger studied violin in Paris with Capet, composition with Gedalge and Widor and orchestration with d'Indy, but early became one of the compositional revolutionists who disregarded most of the musical rules and conventions and set about "doing as they pleased."

Mr. Monteux yesterday read the new piece with full regard to the intentions of the youthful composer (Honegger is now in his thirty-first year), and probably with due deference to the program notes, which say that Honegger is an offspring of German romanticism, and also that he was influenced by Debussy, Moussorgsky, Strauss, Reger, Schonberg and Florent Schmitt (the Frenchman), adding naively: "Honegger is perhaps one of the last musicians to have felt the spell of Wagner and to have profitably assimilated it."

The piece itself, even as played yesterday by Mr. Monteux and his careful band, suggested the divagations of the inquisitive but undetermined mind of the young author. It excels in the sixth episode, in which the triumph of Horatius is nobly expressed, but seems to dwindle in spirit and orchestral importance through the final two motives which indicate the lamentations of Camilla and her murder by Horatius. The performance of the novelty was received with indifferent approval.

Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

The Bostonian wayfarers yesterday put their "best foot forward" in Brahms's fourth symphony, which opened the program and fixed the artistic and popular status of the matinee. In his virile, sanguine way, Mr. Monteux seems to have "read out" a good deal of what Dr. Hugo Riemann referred to as the pale, wan melancholy which is the E minor, or Autumnal, tonality of this symphony. Perhaps yesterday's audience best liked the third movement, in which old-fashioned harmonics are brought into play and the finale, wherein, too, the orchestra surpassed itself in unity and fervor of attack. Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," ended the concert.

N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 3 1922

Mr. Monteux Introduces Honegger Novelty to N. Y.

Faint-hearted applause with a few hisses therein mingled, followed the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of Arthur Honegger's mimed symphony, "Horace Victorieux," at Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon. The novelty for certainly such it proved, was given under the baton of Pierre Monteux, as a first New York hearing, although Boston audiences have already given the composition an ear, if not, perhaps an understanding.

Honegger though born of Swiss parents is identified as a "modern" French composer, being one of Paris' famous "the Six," that small group of independent composers who subscribed to no set principles either of their own or predecessor's making. In other words, though not deliberately intending to hurt the feelings of the music world at large, "the Six" do as they darned please.

"Horace Victorieux" is programme music, written as a ballet for the stage, with scenery and costumes, and based in story upon an old legend of the three Horatii and three Curiatii. In concert form its eight divisions, all connected episodes corresponding to the action, are separately devoted to a musical picturization of the characters Camilla and Curiatius; the entrance of the Haortii, the cro preceding heralds, preparations for combat, the combat itself, triumph of Horatius lamentations and imprecations of Camilla and her murder. Such is the "programme" of the Honegger composition.

The composer, of course, refuses to fashion his conception within the dominating confines of stereotyped regularity, or specific musical form, to him no longer "sine qua non." He is a writer of "modern music," a term which (save for an impression of distorted rhythms, high color and crashing harmonic dissonance, whether brutally realistic or subtly impressionistic) is a more or less misty concept in its implied divergence from the familiar antecedent musical formulas, now so easily recognized in their models of the Classical and Romantic periods.

Constantin von Sternberg, is an essay "Against Modern 'ism'" (appearing in the "Musica l Quarterly's" January, 1921, issue), points out that the human ear is a "defenseless and, therefore, a very complaisant organ. It is in one respect like the stomach. As the latter can become accustomed to poisons like arsenic or cocaine, so can the ear only too easily) become accustomed to any sound, from an alarm clock to a distonating vocalist." And so it was with Mr. Honegger's music heard yesterday, following which Richard Strauss' "Zarathustra" sounded as simple as the music of Gluck or Haydn. The Honegger mimed symphony exploits dissonance and shrill instrumental combination. At certain moments the composer deigns to use the time-honored device of polyphonic imitation. Otherwise, there seemed to be times when he splashed all the nat[illegible] derivative tones of the scale [illegible]

[illegible] "color."

And yet, terrible [illegible] might seem to be if listened to as music pure and simple, it nevertheless, held certain very graphic moments, even though separated from the stage action to which the "music" is wedded. Dissonance plied on very thickly, almost sounds like consonance. It even creates a consonance of its own.

As illustrative of the ever-interesting uses to which a symphony orchestra can be put (and the surface is, perhaps, but yet just scratched). "Horace Victorieux" proves a new study for students of orchestration and instrumentation. For this reason alone, if none other, it commands respect.

Not too hastily must "modern" music be accepted or rejected. If good, all the critics writing it down as bad will not take from it its worth; if bad, all the critics praising it as good shall not make it worthy.

Brahms' E Minor symphony (indeed real music) opened the afternoon's programme. The audience was of good number.

ESTABLISHED 1860
FROM DEC 3 1922
WORLD,
New York City.

MUSIC

Brahms's Fourth had a colorful, though slightly dragging reading yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony gave its second concert at Carnegie Hall. This work, although it was first heard here thirty-six years ago, still seems full of fresh, lyric youth and ebullient spirits, when the players will let them out. The best part of the performance yesterday was the second movement, andante moderato, which, unimpaired by the general tendency to retard, swelled like a series of long sea-waves, to the joy of the ear.

"Horatius Triumphant," the mimed symphony unloosed for the first time here, as part of the program appeared to represent largely the triumph of sound over sense. It is the work of Arthur Honegger, one of the "Six," the very young French school. Written primarily as music for a stage-ballet, it is based on the tale of the Horatius who, having killed his sister's alien-born betrothed in combat, in turn runs the errant girl through for loving the enmy and lamenting his death. The action covers a love scene, the combat, the lament and the punishment of the disloyal girl.

Only in the actual combat section did the music seem to bear any emotional relation to the plot, and even then the effect was achieved largely by the cumulative force of crescendo and acceleration. The work as a whole is a series of deft juggling tricks with harmonics and whole tones, with here and there a suspicious trace of the Rheingold giants Shrill, tremulous chromatics, harmonized in whole toned fashion, delineated the triumph itself, and the susequent lament of Camilla for her lover, together with her imprecations, were fabricated out of alternate snorings and neighings from the brass and musical meanderings up and down the treble in augmented steps on the part of the strings. Thus Camilla wept and cursed. Then Horatius, not without cause, ran her through with two or three peeping whistles, an election rattle, a rubble of drums telling how it was done. With a dull thud of the bass drum she fell to the ground (Camilla must have been a fat girl) and it was over. Mr. Monteux's muscular efforts were dutifully applauded by the house.

With the scenery, costumes and the choreography for which it was written the music might gain in appeal. As it was, standing alone, it was about as interesting as the gray voile curtain before which Isadora Duncan dances.

N. Y.
HERALD
DEC 3 1922

'MIMED SYMPHONY' IS BOLD AND VIVID MUSIC

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, Arthur Honegger's "Horace Victorieux" and the poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra" of Strauss.

The Honegger composition was new to the local concert hall. It was written by Honegger in 1920, and has been played in several Swiss cities and Paris and London. Mr. Monteux produced it in Boston on November 24 and 25 last. The composer of "Horatius Triumphant" described as the "Mimed Symphony," was born of Swiss parents in 1892 at Havre. He is a member of the Parisian "Six" and has written works in many forms. His score heard yesterday is said to be the l[illegible] word from the young group of [illegible] writers. Honegger wrote the music with a sta[illegible] in mind, and he terms his w[illegible] [illegible] description after one he[illegible] and vivid music, not wit[illegible] tional form, but with harmonic [illegible] tions, which resolve themselves [illegible] rarely a suggestion of melody. [illegible] maze of variagated colors, now glimmering as in a brilliant glow of light, [illegible] bursting into marvelous extrava[illegible] masses of harsh, powerful discordant sounds, which baffle all proper description. The development of the score seems to far overleap the boundary set by the subject. The music should best be heard evidently with the stage ballet as the composer originally purposed. The orchestra played the piece superbly.

At the close the audience seemed at first dazed and gave but little applause, and then suddenly the applause became enthusiastic, but was perhaps meant for Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

Brahms's E minor symphony received its second performance here from a visiting orchestra this season. The classic masterpiece, which stood in great contrast to the modern French score following it after the intermission, received in general a clear, well balanced and dignified reading from Mr. Monteux. There were a few sharp and heavy moments, but on the whole it was a poetic interpretation.

Strauss's poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—burdened with Nietzsche's philosophy of life—was conducted here at an orchestral concert given by the composer when he was in this country last season. It is pretty safe to say that Mr. Monteux made the big score sound as well yesterday as did the German visiting conductor. The splendid opening bars, as others, were played with an unusually fine sweep of tone by the Boston men.

N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 3 1922

The programme is announced for a special Wilhelm Gericke benefit concert which Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5. Mr. Monteux will conduct Mr. Gericke's orchestral arrangement of the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms. Mr. Monteux has chosen other composers and pieces connected with the musical life of Vienna, where Mr. Gericke has been prominent as a conductor for many years. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a composer and score of which Mr. Gericke was an early champion, will also be played. Wilhelm Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and held the post for thirten seasons in two terms. Mr. Gericke is now living in Eastern Europe, where the financial collapse has greatly reduced his circumstances.

EVENING MAIL
New York City
DEC. 4.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

PLAYING a "mimed symphony" by Honegger, one of the adventuring "Group of Six" (Paris), the Boston Symphony rather startled some of its conservative audience in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Telling the quaint story of Horatius, who slew Camilla because she had the bad taste to weep when her lover (of an enemy tribe) was slain, the music was less pictorial than it might have been. Merely making whispering sounds and muted whistles isn't enough to prove that radical composition is important.

But Mr. Monteux played the Brahms Fourth Symphony with lucid, direct beauty, and made Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" richly jeweled.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 4 1922

Saturday's Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, introduced to New York an exceedingly interesting "mimed symphony," by Arthur Honegger, one of the most gifted of the younger French composers. The other numbers on the programme were Brahms's fourth symphony (which seems to be the symphony of the season) and Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." In the same hall in the evening there was a Philharmonic concert, with Alfred Cortot as soloist in the Schumann piano concerto, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony to cheer the crowd.

In Aeolian Hall Saturday afternoon that interesting pianist, Victor Wittgenstein, played well an unconventional and effective programme.

N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 1922

Boston Orchestra Opens Season at Academy

Pierre Monteux's programme, opening the Boston Symphony Orchestra's thirty-fifth Brooklyn season, at the Academy of Music last night, included Brahm's E minor symphony, Debussy's "Prelude a l'Apres-Midi d'un Faune," and Richard Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra." Frieda Hempel, soprano, was soloist, her numbers being the "Deh Vieni" aria from Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro," and the "Wie nahte mir der Schlummer" recitative, and "Leise, leise" aria from Weber's "Der Freischutz." The concert, first of the Boston's annual Brooklyn series of five, was held as heretofore under auspices of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, and attracted a very large attendance.

Appreciation is due Mr. Monteux for bringing to a Brooklyn audience the not so frequently heard E minor of Brahms (the symphonies in C minor and D major figuring more constantly in the programme offerings of orchestras hereabouts), and likewise for the finely sincere exposition the score received under his baton. An ardent student of the tragedies of Sophocles at the time he composed this symphony, Brahms (past the age of fifty) has by some commentators been attributed with having given voice to the melancholy of ancient tragedy, in his musical pages. Max Kalbeck, whose 2,138-page "Life of Brahms" is a marvel of patient autobiographical production, even sees the subject of Death in Brahms' finals, supporting his vision with a relevant quotation from a chorus in Sophocles' "Oedipus Coloneus." But Lawrence Gilman, pre-eminent present-day American music commentator, gently but firmly upsets this grave interpretation. "With due respect to Herr Kalbeck," writes Mr. Gilman, "to exhibit the E minor Symphony as an exercise in pessimism is to show it in a singularly misleading light. Much of the first movement sounds to-day frankly cheerful, ballad-like, healthily vigorous, with nothing that even borders on tragedy. In the lovely Andante, with its hauntingly beutiful coda, there is no emotion more sombre than a rich romantic melancholy. The Scherzo is anything but tragic; and the Finale, despite its passionate earnestness and its occasional solemnity, is remote from the mood of Sophoclean tragedy."

Mr. Gilman's understanding of this Brahms' symphony was reflected in the Boston performance of last evening.

Mr. Monteux's interpretation of Debussy's "Faun" was notable because of regard for the ever varying subtleties of nuance and sensitive instrumental shadings; also for an exquisitely refined though vital enunciation of its elusive impressionistic charm.

Not so terrifying a composition as in former years, Strauss' "Zarathustra" can yet show off the virtuosic capabilities of an orchestra. Mr. Monteux and his players gave it a powerful performance, outlining its many details with superb vision. The vertiginous orchestral altitudes, abysmal depths, sepulchral silences and final mystical conclusion (in two tonalities) were all presented quite magnificently. As music of philosophical import, however, Strauss' score falls flat.

It has upon numerous occasions in these columns been stated that the inclusion of vocal numbers as solos on a programme of orchestral music detracts from the dignity of the latter. But this dignity was sustained, rather than detracted, by the inclusion of Mme. Hempel's one recitative and two arias. Mme. Hempel is probably unsurpassed to-day in any of her qualifications as concert singer. Her voice is most beautiful and even through all the registers of its range. Its flexibility and vibrancy are outstanding characteristics. Moreover, Mme. Hempel has acquired a well-nigh perfect vocal technique and a genuine musical intelligence which makes this technique a means to an end rather than an end in itself. She received recalls in number, but, of course, no encores could be permitted at a symphony concert.

R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 3 1922

Boston Symphony on Dec. 12

With Olga Samaroff, pianist, as soloist, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its second concert of the season in Providence a week from next Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. Miss Samaroff will play Schumann's Concerto in A-minor.

Pierre Monteux has arranged for this occasion a programme which should make it a repetition of the success of the opening concert. The great symphony in E-flat major of Mozart will be the opening number. A new score of interest will be played, the Fantasia by Vaughan Williams on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis, written for a double-stringed orchestra. Vaughan Williams, by virtue of this and other scores, is looked upon as probably the greatest English composer living. His London Symphony, played by the orchestra in Boston last year, and the Fantasia, played this year for the first time, disclose remarkable beauty and inspiration.

The closing number will be the symphonic poem of Cesar Franck, "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), which in a measure will pay tribute to the genius of the great Belgian master, the centennial of whose birth is being celebrated this season. Mr. Monteux is going to give during the coming week in Boston a Franck programme. "Le Chasseur Maudit" is considered one of the most rousing and brilliant of Franck's scores, employing the hunting horns in a stirring manner.

FROM Times
DEC 3 1922
NEW YORK CITY

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES A NOVELTY

Honegger's 'Horace' an Orchestral 'Daub,' but Suggesting New Ranges in Tonal Combinations.

Johannes Brahms in some isle of the blest should have met his lifetime foes and critics during yesterday's matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, a day of contrasts, of prophecy and remembrance. For Arthur Honegger's "Horace Victorieux," here offered as first fruits of the Paris "Six," was paired with the now accepted Strauss "Zarathustra," and both together preceded by the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. How his old antagonists would have hastened to agree that the symphony was warp and woof of the substance of harmony, the pattern of melody, quite as present-century audiences long since came to regard it.

Honegger's "Horace" is altogether a horse of another color; denial of harmony, of melody, even of motif—an orchestral "daub," indeed, but suggesting new ranges of delicacy or depth in tonal combinations as elusive and fleeting as the colors of molten gold over a caldron of fusing metal. It is boldly done, irritating or fascinating, according as the listener's thought is on music of past or future. If Honegger has evolved a new language, he speaks it, or makes his orchestra speak it, fluently.

The Horatii and Curatii are sufficiently characterized in triple combat. Still more plaintively recognizable is Horace's sister, Camilla. She weeps—two whining 'cellos for her eyes—over her enemy lover. Horace draws his sword, and no greater thrusts ever sounded in full orchestra than when, in Gilbert's phrase, he "drew his snickersnee." For the startling sounds are indeed provocative of mirth, yet the fact remains that the composer has made his audience all but present at a killing.

Darius Milhaud is to bring here soon some more of the music of the "Six," and New York should be more hospitable to it than was Boston to Honegger, when subscribers threatened to withdraw if the orchestra should play any more of it. Mr. Monteux's players gave a great account of themselves in the novelty, and still greater in their superb performance of Strauss, which ended their first three days' visit to town this season.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
DEC 3 1922

BOSTONIANS PLAY ANOTHER NOVELTY

Conductor Monteux Gives Fine Performance of Honegger's Hitherto Unheard Piece.

CORTOT WITH PHILHARMONIC

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday gave its first matinee concert of the season here, Conductor Monteux adding to the interest of the event with a first-playing in New York of Arthur Honegger's new Symphonie Mimee, "Horace Victorieux," an orchestral discourse founded upon, and vaguely illustrative of, Livy's ingenious account, or legend, of the fabled fight between the three Horatii [illegible] Curiatii, which [illegible] recited or heard of "Horatius at the Bridge," will remember.

Freely translated, the composer's subtitle, "Symphonie Mimee," should mean "Imitation Symphony," although it never attains the form or scope of a symphony, the work being merely divided into connected episodes, having been written for a ballet for the stage, with all of the visual accessories of characters, scenery and costumes. Although the composer was born in Havre, he is of Swiss parentage and, musically at least, a good deal of a libertarian. Honegger studied violin in Paris with Capet, composition with Gedalge and Widor and orchestration with d'Indy, but early became one of the compositional revolutionists who disregarded most of the musical rules and conventions and set about "doing as they pleased."

Mr. Monteux yesterday read the new piece with full regard to the intentions of the youthful composer (Honegger is now in his thirty-first year), and probably with due deference to the program notes, which say that Honegger is an offspring of German romanticism, and also that he was influenced by Debussy, Moussorgsky, Strauss, Reger, Schonberg and Florent Schmitt (the Frenchman), adding naively: "Honegger is perhaps one of the last musicians to have felt the spell of Wagner and to have profitably assimilated it."

The piece itself, even as played yesterday by Mr. Monteux and his careful band, suggested the divagations of the inquisitive but undetermined mind of the young author. It excels in the sixth episode, in which the triumph of Horatius is nobly expressed, but seems to dwindle in spirit and orchestral importance through the final two motives which indicate the lamentations of Camilla and her murder by Horatius. The performance of the novelty was received with indifferent approval.

Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

The Bostonian wayfarers yesterday put their "best foot forward" in Brahms's fourth symphony, which opened the program and fixed the artistic and popular status of the matinee. In his virile, sanguine way, Mr. Monteux seems to have "read out" a good deal of what Dr. Hugo Riemann referred to as the pale, wan melancholy which is the E minor, or Autumnal, tonality of this symphony. Perhaps yesterday's audience best liked the third movement, in which old-fashioned harmonics are brought into play and the finale, wherein, too, the orchestra surpassed itself in unity and fervor of attack. Strauss' tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," ended the concert.

N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF

Mr. Monteux Introduces Honegger Novelty to N. Y.

Faint-hearted applause with a few hisses therein mingled, followed the Boston Symphony Orchestra's performance of Arthur Honegger's mimed symphony, "Horace Victorieux," at Carnegie Hall, yesterday afternoon. The novelty for certainly such it proved, was given under the baton of Pierre Monteux, as a first New York hearing, although Boston audiences have already given the composition an ear, if not, perhaps an understanding.

Honegger though born of Swiss parents is identified as a "modern" French composer, being one of Paris' famous "the Six," that small group of independent composers who subscribed to no set principles either of their own or predecessor's making. In other words, though not deliberately intending to hurt the feelings of the music world at large, "the Six" do as they darned please.

"Horace Victorieux" is programme music, written as a ballet for the stage, with scenery and costumes, and based in story upon an old legend of the three Horatii and three Curiatii. In concert form its eight divisions, all connected episodes corresponding to the action, are separately devoted to a musical picturization of the characters Camilla and Curiatius; the entrance of the Haortii, the cro preceding heralds, preparations for combat, the combat itself, triumph of Horatius lamentations and imprecations of Camilla and her murder. Such is the "programme" of the Honegger composition.

The composer, of course, refuses to fashion his conception within the dominating confines of stereotyped regularity, or specific musical form, to him no longer "sine qua non." He is a writer of "modern music," a term which (save for an impression of distorted rhythms, high color and crashing harmonic dissonance, whether brutally realistic or subtly impressionistic) is a more or less misty concept in its implied divergence from the familiar antecedent musical formulas, now so easily recognized in their models of the Classical and Romantic periods.

Constantin von Sternberg, is an essay "Against Modern 'ism'" (appearing in the "Musical Quarterly's" January, 1921, issue), points out that the human ear is a "defenseless and, therefore, a very complaisant organ. It is in one respect like the stomach. As the latter can become accustomed to poisons like arsenic or cocaine, so can the ear only too easily) become accustomed to any sound, from an alarm clock to a distonating vocalist." And so it was with Mr. Honegger's music heard yesterday, following which Richard Strauss' "Zarathustra" sounded as simple as the music of Gluck or Haydn. The Honegger mimed symphony exploits dissonance and shrill instrumental combination. At certain moments the composer deigns to use the time-honored device of polyphonic imitation. Otherwise, there seemed to be times when he splashed all the natural and derivative tones of the scale on his orchestral canvas—all twelve [illegible] snare drum, tam tam and rattle were requ[illegible] to complement the tonal "effects" and "color."

And yet, terrible as the score might seem to be if listened to as music pure and simple, it nevertheless, held certain very graphic moments, even though separated from the stage action to which the "music" is wedded. Dissonance plied on very thickly, almost sounds like consonance. It even creates a consonance of its own.

As illustrative of the ever-interesting uses to which a symphony orchestra can be put (and the surface is, perhaps, but yet just scratched). "Horace Victorieux" proves a new study for students of orchestration and instrumentation. For this reason alone, if none other, it commands respect.

Not too hastily must "modern" music be accepted or rejected. If good, all the critics writing it down as bad will not take from it its worth; if bad, all the critics praising it as good shall not make it worthy.

Brahms' E Minor symphony (indeed real music) opened the afternoon's programme. The audience was of good number.

ESTABLISHED 1861
FROM DEC 3 1922
WORLD,
New York City.

MUSIC

Brahms's Fourth had a colorful, though slightly dragging reading yesterday afternoon when the Boston Symphony gave its second concert at Carnegie Hall. This work, although it was first heard here thirty-six years ago, still seems full of fresh, lyric youth and ebullient spirits, when the players will let them out. The best part of the performance yesterday was the second movement, andante moderato, which, unimpaired by the general tendency to retard, swelled like a series of long sea-waves, to the joy of the ear.

"Horatius Triumphant" the mimed symphony unloosed for the first time here, as part of the program appeared to represent largely the triumph of sound over sense. It is the work of Arthur Honegger, one of the "Six," the very young French school. Written primarily as music for a stage-ballet, it is based on the tale of the Horatius who, having killed his sister's alien-born betrothed in combat, in turn runs the errant girl through for loving the enmy and lamenting his death. The action covers a love scene, the combat, the lament and the punishment of the disloyal girl.

Only in the actual combat section did the music seem to bear any emotional relation to the plot, and even then the effect was achieved largely by the cumulative force of crescendo and acceleration. The work as a whole is a series of deft juggling tricks with harmonics and whole tones, with here and there a suspicious trace of the Rheingold giants Shrill, tremulous chromatics, harmonized in whole toned fashion, delineated the triumph itself, and the susequent lament of Camilla for her lover, together with her imprecations, were fabricated out of alternate snorings and neighings from the brass and musical meanderings up and down the treble in augmented steps on the part of the strings. Thus Camilla wept and cursed. Then Horatius, not without cause, ran her through with two or three peeping whistles, an election rattle, a rubble of drums telling how it was done. With a dull thud of the bass drum she fell to the ground (Camilla must have been a fat girl) and it was over. Mr. Monteux's muscular efforts were dutifully applauded by the house.

With the scenery, costumes and the choreography for which it was written the music might gain in appeal. As it was, standing alone, it was about as interesting as the gray voile curtain before which Isadora Duncan dances.

N. Y.
HERALD

'MIMED SYMPHONY' IS BOLD AND VIVID MUSIC

The first matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, Pierre Monteux conductor, took place yesterday in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of the Fourth Symphony of Brahms, Arthur Honegger's "Horace Victorieux" and the poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra" of Strauss.

The Honegger composition was new to the local concert hall. It was written by Honegger in 1920, and has been played in several Swiss cities and Paris and London. Mr. Monteux produced it in Boston on November 24 and 25 last. The composer of "Horatius Triumphant" described as the "Mimed Symphony," was born of Swiss parents in 1892 at Havre. He is a member of the Parisian "Six" and has written works in many forms. His score heard yesterday is said to be the latest word from the young group of "Six" writers. Honegger wrote the music with a staged ballet in mind, and he terms his work a "Mimed Symphony."

Mr. Hale, in his notes, gives the episodes concerning the brave Roman [illegible] which are depicted in the music [illegible] Camilla [illegible] the Horatii, the [illegible] preceding the heralds, the preparations for combat, the combat, Horatius's triumph, Camilla's lamentation and Camilla's murder.

The composition defies an adequate description after one hearing. It is bold and vivid music, not without conventional form, but with harmonic combinations, which resolve themselves, with rarely a suggestion of melody, into a maze of variagated colors, now shimmering as in a brilliant glow of light, or bursting into marvelous extravagant masses of harsh, powerful discordant sounds, which baffle all proper description. The development of the score seems to far overleap the boundary set by the subject. The music should best be heard evidently with the stage ballet as the composer originally purposed. The orchestra played the piece superbly.

At the close the audience seemed at first dazed and gave but little applause, and then suddenly the applause became enthusiastic, but was perhaps meant for Mr. Monteux's orchestra.

Brahms's E minor symphony received its second performance here from a visiting orchestra this season. The classic masterpiece, which stood in great contrast to the modern French score following it after the intermission, received in general a clear well balanced and dignified reading from Mr. Monteux. There were a few sharp and heavy moments, but on the whole it was a poetic interpretation.

Strauss's poem "Thus Spake Zarathustra"—burdened with Nietzsche's philosophy of life—was conducted here at an orchestral concert given by the composer when he was in this country last season. It is pretty safe to say that Mr. Monteux made the big score sound as well yesterday as did the German visiting conductor. The splendid opening bars, as others, were played with an unusually fine sweep of tone by the Boston men.

N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 3 1922

The programme is announced for a special Wilhelm Gericke benefit concert which Pierre Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Tuesday evening, Dec. 5. Mr. Monteux will conduct Mr. Gericke's orchestral arrangement of the pianoforte waltzes of Brahms. Mr. Monteux has chosen other composers and pieces connected with the musical life of Vienna, where Mr. Gericke has been prominent as a conductor for many years. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," a composer and score of which Mr. Gericke was an early champion, will also be played. Wilhelm Gericke was the second conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and held the post for thirten seasons in two terms. Mr. Gericke is now living in Eastern Europe, where the financial collapse has greatly reduced his circumstances.

EVENING MAIL
New York City
DEC 4.

as well as understanding.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

PLAYING a "mimed symphony" by Honegger, one of the adventuring "Group of Six" (Paris), the Boston Symphony rather startled some of its conservative audience in Carnegie Hall on Saturday afternoon. Telling the quaint story of Horatius, who slew Camilla because she had the bad taste to weep when her lover (of an enemy tribe) was slain, the music was less pictorial than it might have been. Merely making whispering sounds and muted whistles isn't enough to prove that radical composition is important. But Mr. Monteux played the Brahms Fourth Symphony with lucid, direct beauty, and made Strauss' "Thus Spake Zarathustra" richly jeweled.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF

Saturday's Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, introduced to New York an exceedingly interesting "mimed symphony," by Arthur Honegger, one of the most gifted of the younger French composers. The other numbers on the programme were Brahms's fourth symphony (which seems to be the symphony of the season) and Richard Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra." In the same hall in the evening there was a Philharmonic concert, with Alfred Cortot as soloist in the Schumann piano concerto, and Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony to cheer the crowd.

In Aeolian Hall Saturday afternoon that interesting pianist, Victor Wittgenstein, played well an unconventional and effective programme.

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
DEC 4 1922

One of the Terrible "Six."

Pierre Monteux, at the Saturday concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, hazarded a performance of some of the music of one of the members of the supposedly horrific "Groupe des six"—Arthur Honegger's "Horace victorieux," a "mimed" symphony. A very large quantity of printer's ink has been used to describe what terrible children (some of them are youngsters of forty) these six composers are—and judging from what one heard on Saturday a very considerable part of what has been printed is nonsense. Mr. Honegger's music is no more revolutionary than Richard Strauss at his middling worst and it is quite "old hat," as the French say, beside the later output of Igor Stravinsky and Arnold Schoenberg.

As a fact, "Horace victorieux" showed unmistakably the influence of both Strauss and Stravinsky and also of Alfredo Casella. One of its principal harmonic effects—even to the instrumentation—was precisely that employed in Casella's "A Notte alta" and some of its orchestral ideas were directly traceable to Strauss's "Salome" and his "Ein Heldenleben." Indeed, except for the climax of a combination of rattle and staccato-rolled cymbals to suggest the death of Horatius's sister at the hero's hands, there wasn't even an original bit of orchestration in the piece.

Paltry Invention.

One's total impression of this music was that it strained to be "different" and wasn't. Honegger is evidently well grounded in his craft and he will have difficulty separating himself from what has been written before him. His melodic invention is paltry and his harmonic flights are not greatly daring for what is being done in these days.

One concedes that a composer may get along without melody—it has been done, or almost done, by Debussy—but when he confessedly depends upon it, as Honegger does in the beginning of his piece, it should display some stamina and perhaps originality. Honegger's was as commonplace as Volkmann's. His whole illustration of the story of Horatius (the piece was originally written for a dance-pantomime) is commonplace except in two or three spots. The spots include an admirable suggestion of a mob, done with nothing more than strange harmonies in divided strings, and the rattling din of a finale already spoken of. But the unsixed oldsters do these things much better.

Mr. Monteux and his men gave the Honegger piece what seemed to be a thoroughly adequate performance—much more so than they did for Brahms's Fourth Symphony whose final movement, in instance the crux of the work) was badly distorted and went on leaden fee

---

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
ISSUE OF
DEC 9 - 1922

OLGA SAMAROFF, SOLOIST, TO APPEAR HERE ON TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Will Give Rare Programme for Second Concert.

Olga Samaroff, famous pianist, will be the soloist at the second concert of the Providence season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. She will appear with the orchestra in Schumann's pianoforte concerto.

Despite her Russian name, which is that of her maternal great-grandmother, Olga Samaroff is American by birth, training and tradition. Her father was a United States officer, and it was at the army post at Galveston, Tex., she was born and spent her childhood. To the open-air life of the West may be partly attributed her remarkable muscular strength in forte passages. Her courage and calibre as a musician induced her recently to undertake and carry through the 32 pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven in a series of public concerts in New York and elsewhere—regarded as a tremendous achievement and a remarkable act of memory in itself. Mme. Samaroff is in private life the wife of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's symphony in E-flat. The conductor will introduce to Providence the music of Vaughan Williams, the English composer, by performing his Fantasia for double-string orchestra on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis.

The evening will close with Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," a brilliant score in which calls of the hunting horns figure prominently. In its performance Pierre Monteux will pay tribute to the genius of the great Belgian composer, whose music is being played to a greater extent than usual this season in that to-morrow will

---

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 9 1922

OLGA SAMAROFF, SOLOIST, TO APPEAR HERE ON TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Will Give Rare Programme for Second Concert.

Olga Samaroff, famous pianist, will be the soloist at the second concert of the Providence season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. She will appear with the orchestra in Schumann's pianoforte concerto.

Despite her Russian name, which is that of her maternal great-grandmother, Olga Samaroff is American by birth, training and tradition. Her father was a United States officer, and it was at the army post at Galveston, Tex., she was born and spent her childhood. To the open-air life of the West may be partly attributed her remarkable muscular strength in forte passages. Her courage and calibre as a musician induced her recently to undertake and carry through the 32 pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven in a series of public concerts in New York and elsewhere—regarded as a tremendous achievement and a remarkable act of memory in itself. Mme. Samaroff is in private life the wife of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's symphony in E-flat. The conductor will introduce to Providence the music of Vaughan Williams, the English composer, by performing his Fantasia for double-string orchestra on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis.

The evening will close with Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," a brilliant score in which calls of the hunting horns figure prominently. In its performance Pierre Monteux will pay tribute to the genius of the great Belgian composer, whose music is being played to a greater extent than usual this season in that to-morrow will [illegible] the centenary of his birth.

Staats-Zeitung und Herold (S)
New Yorker Staats-Zeitung (M)
New Yorker Herold (E)

Issue of Dec. 10th 1922

Gericke-Konzert in Boſton.

In Boſton hat am verfloſſenen Montag abend in Symphony Hall das vom Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter unter Leitung von Herrn Pierre Monteux veranſtaltete große Benefiz-Konzert für Wilhelm Gericke, den zweiten Kapellmeiſter des berühmten Orcheſters in chronologiſcher Ordnung, mit durchſchlagendem Erfolg abgehalten. Der Reinertrag, der dem durch den materiellen Umſturz in Wien hart getroffenen Altmeiſter zugute kommen wird, beträgt die ſchöne Summe von $5377.50. Einundreißig jetzige Muſiker des Orcheſters haben noch unter Gericke gewirkt; im Publikum wohnten die Herren Daniel Kuntz und George Stewart dem Konzert bei, welche dem Orcheſter bei ſeiner Gründung 1881 angehört hatten. Das Programm enthielt Beethovens Fünfte Symphonie, Schuberts „Unvollendete" Symphonie, den Brahmsſchen Pianowalzer, für Orcheſter arrangiert von Gericke, und „Till Eulenſpiegel" von Richard Strauß.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 10 1922

Mr. Monteux put on his Boston Symphony program Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, minus the choral finale. This is due to the fact that there is now no chorus connected with the orchestra.

FRANCK HONORED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Program Pays Tribute to Centennial of Birth

Yesterday's Symphony program paid tribute to the centennial of Cesar Franck, born at Liege, Belgium, Dec 10, 1822, but commonly regarded as one of the greatest French composers. His only symphony, and two of his tone poems, "Les Eolides," and "Le Chasseur Maudit," were the numbers chosen by Mr Monteux.

It was in a way a pity that Olga Samaroff, the soloist, elected to play Schumann's piano concerto instead of Franck's "Variations Symphoniques," although her performance of the former number was accurately eloquent. She was very cordially applauded by audience and orchestra, who have had many previous opportunities of recognizing her great talent.

The stock critical comments upon Franck's symphony deal with its cyclical form and its germinating themes, which, as analyzed by his pupil and apostle, d'Indy, sprout from brief melodic cells. The first and last movements, which chiefly exemplify this process, have accordingly been the most discussed and the most praised. The view taken by Coquard, another of Franck's pupils, that the middle movement is really the finest, seems more just.

It can be shown that Franck's music is well knit, but nowhere in all his work does one feel the tremendous sweep and urge of Beethoven or Wagner.

Franck is after all an improviser of genius, pouring forth clear, coherent music in steady streams like those of Bach, but not possessed of dramatic imagination as Aristotle defined it. His climaxes are akin to [illegible]'s, not [illegible] simplicity of the allegretto in the symphony, and the nobility of its first theme make this movement his greatest achievement in orchestral music.

"Les Eolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit," based, one on a poem by Leconte de Lisle, the other on a ballad by Buerger, prove the individual poetic imagination of Franck. The first piece does not quite achieve the emotional delicacy at which it aims. "Le Chasseur Maudit" is melodramatic after the Lisztian manner, of less real power than his "Les Preludes" or even his "Mazeppa." Compared with the symphony or with the best of Franck's organ pieces, these tone poems are insignificant.

The performance of all these pieces showed a striving for an emotional sympathy with Franck which Mr Monteux, one imagines, does not completely and happily feel. The fact that the first violins, cellos and leading wood wind now play with far greater subtlety and more nuances than the rest of the orchestra was again pleasingly obvious.

For next week Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, a suite arranged from Lully, Bax' "November Woods" and Chadwick's "Anniversary Overture" are the numbers announced.

GLOBE - DEC. 9.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 10 1922

Several orchestras commemorated the hundredth anniversary of César Franck's birth, which fell on Dec. 10. The Boston Orchestra played his symphony, the two symphonic poems, "Les Eolides" and "The Wild Huntsman," the Philadelphia Orchestra the symphony and a program of Franck music; the Chicago Orchestra, "Les Eolides," "Psyche" and the "Variations Symphoniques" with Alfred Cortot.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 11 1922

From Boston comes news of a concert given recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its second conductor, who has been left destitute by the troubles in Austria, where he now lives. The proceeds from the concert, including contributions in excess of tickets, amounts to more than $5,000. Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

SUN
ess New York City
e DEC 12 192

raction.

Boston's Benefit for Gericke.

On Tuesday evening, December 5, at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its second conductor, who has been left destitute by the troubles in Austria, where he now resides. The proceeds from the concert were more than $5,000.

Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The programme consisted of Bethoven's Fifth Symphony and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Piano Waltzes of Brahms arranged for orchestra by Gericke, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 13 1922

SECOND SYMPHONY LIGHTLY MELODIOUS

Mozart and Schumann Numbers Feature Programme Notable in Classic Restraint.

SAMAROFF IS APPRECIATED

Vaughan Williams Fantasia Interesting Exposition of Purely String Ensemble.—Cesar Franck Concluding Offering

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert at Infantry Hall last evening. An audience of not quite the large proportions that heard the opening concert here, but which, nevertheless, practically filled the hall, listened with evident pleasure to a programme that might be characterized as melodious and light rather than severely classic in outline.

This was due to the presence of the Mozart symphony in E-flat major, and the graceful and pleasing Schumann concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor, played by Olga Samaroff.

A fantasia for double-stringed orchestra by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, a work of rather pretentious style, considering its instrumental limitations, was played here for the first time. Mme. Samaroff scored a success by an artistic interpretation of the Schumann concerto, in which M. Monteux and his players gave admirable support.

The programme was as follows:

Mozart
Symphony in E-Flat Major (Koechel No. 543)
Adagio; Allegro.
Andante.
Minuetto; Trio.
Finale: Allegro.
Vaughan Williams
Fantasia for Double Stringed Orchestra
Schumann
Concerto in A-Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54
Allegro affettuoso.
Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
Allegro vivace.
Franck
Symphonic Poem: "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman")

Although simple in structure and lacking the strength and instrumental color of more modern orchestral works, the Mozart symphonies are delightful old friends. They breathe sweetness and beauty. Their flow of melody and simple harmonic treatment provide restful enjoyment in these days of complex and noisy scores. The symphony in E-flat major contains music that charms by its spontaneity and freshness. With his usual artistic discernment, Mr. Monteux read it with appropriate delicacy and lightness of style. It was given with true Mozartian flavor, the orchestra exhibiting a polished ensemble both in its exacting requirements of phrasing and in its sparkling flights of ornamentation.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia is interesting particularly as an example of what can be accomplished in the way of tone coloring by strings alone. It is based on a theme by Thomas Tallis and the composer shows considerable ingenuity in handling the limited musical tools at his disposal. It abounds in strange harmonic progressions and variety is sought and obtained by frequent use of solo instrumental voices. In spite of many undeniably effective passages and the evidence of thorough musicianship in its structure, the work as a whole sounds labored rather than spontaneous. M. Monteux gave it a careful reading and received generous applause at its conclusion.

Mme. Samaroff, an artist of much imagination and fine technical skill, played the Schumann concerto with singing tone and graceful style. This work is not one in which the soloist is constantly obliged to battle for supremacy with the orchestra. Its smooth melodic flow does not invite technical display. It demands facile fingers and at times power in tonal effect, but the ever present artistic need is that of presenting lovely thematic material with its constantly changing, colorful variations. This Mme. Samaroff accomplished with charming ease of style. She possesses a splendid sense of rhythm and she is mistress of the art of phrasing. At the conclusion of her number she was recalled at least six times to acknowledge deserved applause.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," played for the programme's final number, follows the story of the mythical hunstman and portrays his punishment for indulging in the sport of the chase on the Sabbath. The piece ends with the flight of the sacrilegious Count, who is hotly pursued by a pack of demons. It was played with spirit and abandon.

A. F. P.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
ISSUE OF
DEC 13 1922

SYMPHONY CONCERT NOTABLE FOR ITS CLASSIC RESTRAINT

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert at Infantry Hall last evening. An audience of not quite the large proportions that heard the opening concert here, but which, nevertheless, practically filled the hall, listened with evident pleasure to a programme that might be characterized as melodious and light rather than severely classic in outline.

This was due to the presence of the Mozart symphony in E-flat major, and the graceful and pleasing Schumann concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor, played by Olga Samaroff.

A fantasia for double-stringed orchestra by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, a work of rather pretentious style, considering its instrumental limitations, was played here for the first time. Mme. Samaroff scored a success by an artistic interpretation of the Schumann concerto, in which M. Monteux and his players gave admirable support.

The programme was as follows:

Mozart
Symphony in E-Flat Major (Koechel No. 543)
Adagio; Allegro.
Andante.
Minuetto; Trio.
Finale: Allegro.
Vaughan Williams
Fantasia for Double Stringed Orchestra
Schumann
Concerto in A-Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54
Allegro affettuoso.
Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
Allegro vivace.
Franck
Symphonic Poem: "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman")

Although simple in structure and lacking the strength and instrumental color of more modern orchestral works, the Mozart symphonies are delightful old friends. They breathe sweetness and beauty. Their flow of melody and simple harmonic treatment provide restful enjoyment in these days of complex and noisy scores. The symphony in E-flat major contains music that charms by its spontaneity and freshness. With his usual artistic discernment, Mr. Monteux read it with appropriate delicacy and lightness of style. It was given with true Mozartian flavor, the orchestra exhibiting a polished ensemble both in its exacting requirements of phrasing and in its sparkling flights of ornamentation.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia is interesting particularly as an example of what can be accomplished in the way of tone coloring by strings alone. It is based on a theme by Thomas Tallis and the composer shows considerable ingenuity in handling the limited musical tools at his disposal. It abounds in strange harmonic progressions and variety is sought and obtained by frequent use of solo instrumental voices. In spite of many undeniably effective passages and the evidence of thorough musicianship in its structure, the work as a whole sounds labored rather than spontaneous. M. Monteux gave it a careful reading and received generous applause at its conclusion.

Mme. Samaroff, an artist of much imagination and fine technical skill, played the Schumann concerto with singing tone and graceful style. This work is not one in which the soloist is constantly obliged to battle for supremacy with the orchestra. Its smooth melodic flow does not invite technical display. It demands facile fingers and at times power in tonal effect, but the ever present artistic need is that of presenting lovely thematic material with its constantly changing, colorful variations. This Mme. Samaroff accomplished with charming ease of style. She possesses a splendid sense of rhythm and she is mistress of the art of phrasing. At the conclusion of her number she was recalled at least six times to acknowledge deserved applause.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," played for the programme's final number, follows the story of the mythical hunstman and portrays his punishment for indulging in the sport of the chase on the Sabbath. The piece ends with the flight of the sacrilegious Count, who is hotly pursued by a pack of demons. It was played with spirit and abandon.

A. F. P.

WASHINGTON
D. C.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 14 192

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its only concert in Washington this season and this, too, is hailed with delight, as the concert last season is one that will long be remembered.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
DEC 14 1922

Gericke Benefit Concert

On Tuesday evening, December 5, at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its second conductor, who has been left destitute by the troubles in Austria, where he now resides. The proceeds from the concert, including contributions in excess of the price of tickets, amounts to $5,377.50.

Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The programme, consisting of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, piano waltzes of Brahms arranged for orchestra by Gericke, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," was received by the great audience with much enthusiasm.

The program of the Symphony concerts this week contains an interesting work by Arnold Bax, "November Woods," which will be heard here for the first time. Two of his symphonic poems have been played here. They pleased greatly. Mr. Chadwick's "Anniversary" overture will be performed here for the first time; also a charming suite arranged by Mottl from old Lully's ballets. The symphony will be Sibelius's fifth.

Next week the Symphony program will include the overture to Spontini's once famous opera, "The Vestal"; a suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella" (first time in America); a violin concerto by Dohnanyi played by Albert Spalding, and the prelude and love death from "Tristan and Isolde."

HERALD - JAN. 14.

SUN
ss New York City
DEC 16 1922

When Albert Spalding appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston on December 22 and 23, he will present for the first time in America a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernst Dohnanyi. The work has been heard several times in Europe and is said to be one of the most difficult concertos ever written for the violin.

[43]

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
DEC 4 1922

One of the Terrible "Six."

Pierre Monteux, at the Saturday concert of the Boston Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, hazarded a performance of some of the music of one of the members of the supposedly terrific "Groupe des six"—Arthur Honegger's "Horace victorieux," a "mimed" symphony. A very large quantity of printer's ink has been used to describe what terrible children (some of them are youngsters of forty) these six composers are—and judging from what one heard on Saturday a very considerable part of what has been printed is nonsense. Mr. Honegger's music is no more revolutionary than Richard Strauss at his middling worst and it is quite "old hat," as the French say, beside the later output of Igor Stravinsky and Arnold Schoenberg.

As a fact, "Horace victorieux" showed unmistakably the influence of both Strauss and Stravinsky and also of Alfredo Casella. One of its principal harmonic effects—even to the instrumentation—was precisely that employed in Casella's "A Notte alta" and some of its orchestral ideas were directly traceable to Strauss's "Salome" and his "Ein Heldenleben." Indeed, except for its climax of a combination of rattle and staccato-rolled cymbals to suggest the death of Horatius's sister at the hero's hands, there wasn't even an original bit of orchestration in the piece.

Paltry Invention.

One's total impression of this music was that it strained to be "different" and wasn't. Honegger is evidently well grounded in his craft and he will have difficulty separating himself from what has been written before him. His melodic invention is paltry and his harmonic flights are not greatly daring for what is being done in these days.

One concedes that a composer may get along without melody—it has been done, or almost done, by Debussy—but when he confessedly depends upon it, as Honegger does in the beginning of his piece, it should display some stamina and perhaps originality. Honegger's was as commonplace as Volkmann's. His whole illustration of the story of Horatius (the piece was originally written for a dance-pantomime) is commonplace except in two or three spots. The spots include an admirable suggestion of a mob, done with nothing more than strange harmonies in divided strings, and the rattling din of a finale already spoken of. But the unsixed oldsters do these things much better.

Mr. Monteux and his men gave the Honegger piece what seemed to be a thoroughly adequate performance—much more so than they did for Brahms's Fourth Symphony whose final movement, in instance the crux of the work) was badly distorted and went on leaden fee

---

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
ISSUE OF
DEC 9 - 1922

OLGA SAMAROFF, SOLOIST, TO APPEAR HERE ON TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Will Give Rare Programme for Second Concert.

Olga Samaroff, famous pianist, will be the soloist at the second concert of the Providence season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. She will appear with the orchestra in Schumann's pianoforte concerto.

Despite her Russian name, which is that of her maternal great-grandmother, Olga Samaroff is American by birth, training and tradition. Her father was a United States officer, and it was at the army post at Galveston, Tex., she was born and spent her childhood. To the open-air life of the West may be partly attributed her remarkable muscular strength in forte passages. Her courage and calibre as a musician induced her recently to undertake and carry through the 32 pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven in a series of public concerts in New York and elsewhere—regarded as a tremendous achievement and a remarkable act of memory in itself. Mme. Samaroff is in private life the wife of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's symphony in E-flat. The conductor will introduce to Providence the music of Vaughan Williams, the English composer, by performing his Fantasia for double-string orchestra on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis.

The evening will close with Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," a brilliant score in which calls of the hunting horns figure prominently. In its performance Pierre Monteux will pay tribute to the genius of the great Belgian composer, whose music is being played to a greater extent than usual this season in that to-morrow will [illegible] birth.

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 9 1922

OLGA SAMAROFF, SOLOIST, TO APPEAR HERE ON TUESDAY

Boston Symphony Will Give Rare Programme for Second Concert.

Olga Samaroff, famous pianist, will be the soloist at the second concert of the Providence season to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Tuesday evening in Infantry Hall. She will appear with the orchestra in Schumann's pianoforte concerto.

Despite her Russian name, which is that of her maternal great-grandmother, Olga Samaroff is American by birth, training and tradition. Her father was a United States officer, and it was at the army post at Galveston, Tex., she was born and spent her childhood. To the open-air life of the West may be partly attributed her remarkable muscular strength in forte passages. Her courage and calibre as a musician induced her recently to undertake and carry through the 32 pianoforte sonatas of Beethoven in a series of public concerts in New York and elsewhere—regarded as a tremendous achievement and a remarkable act of memory in itself. Mme. Samaroff is in private life the wife of Leopold Stokowski, conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra.

Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Mozart's symphony in E-flat. The conductor will introduce to Providence the music of Vaughan Williams, the English composer, by performing his Fantasia for double-string orchestra on a theme by the early English composer, Thomas Tallis.

The evening will close with Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," a brilliant score in which calls of the hunting horns figure prominently. In its performance Pierre Monteux will pay tribute to the genius of the great Belgian composer, whose music is being played to a greater extent than usual this season in that to-morrow will [illegible] centenary of his birth.

Staats Zeitung und Herold (S)
New Yorker Staats Zeitung (M)
New Yorker Herold (E)
Issue of Dec. 10th 1922

Gericke=Konzert in Boſton.

In Boſton hat am verfloſſenen Montag abend in Symphony Hall das vom Boſtoner Symphonie=Orcheſter unter Leitung von Herrn Pierre Monteux veranſtaltete große Benefiz=Konzert für Wilhelm Gericke, den zweiten Kapellmeiſter des berühmten Orcheſters in chronologiſcher Ordnung, mit durchſchlagendem Erfolg abgehalten. Der Reinertrag, der dem durch den materiellen Umſturz in Wien hart getroffenen Altmeiſter zugute kommen wird, beträgt die ſchöne Summe von $5377.50. Einunddreißig jetzige Muſiker des Orcheſters haben noch unter Gericke gewirkt; im Publikum wohnten die Herren Daniel Kuntz und George Stewart dem Konzert bei, welche dem Orcheſter bei ſeiner Gründung 1881 angehört hatten. Das Programm enthielt Beethovens Fünfte Symphonie, Schuberts „Unvollendete" Symphonie, den Brahmsſchen Pianowalzer, für Orcheſter arrangiert von Gericke, und „Till Eulenſpiegel" von Richard Strauß.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 10 1922

Mr. Monteux put on his Boston Symphony program Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, minus the choral finale. This is due to the fact that there is now no chorus connected with the orchestra.

FRANCK HONORED AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Program Pays Tribute to Centennial of Birth

Yesterday's Symphony program paid tribute to the centennial of Cesar Franck, born at Liege, Belgium, Dec 10, 1822, but commonly regarded as one of the greatest French composers. His only symphony, and two of his tone poems, "Les Eolides," and "Le Chasseur Maudit," were the numbers chosen by Mr Monteux.

It was in a way a pity that Olga Samaroff, the soloist, elected to play Schumann's piano concerto instead of Franck's "Variations Symphoniques," although her performance of the former number was accurately eloquent. She was very cordially applauded by audience and orchestra, who have had many previous opportunities of recognizing her great talent.

The stock critical comments upon Franck's symphony deal with its cyclical form and its germinating themes, which, as analyzed by his pupil and apostle, d'Indy, sprout from brief melodic cells. The first and last movements, which chiefly exemplify this process, have accordingly been the most discussed and the most praised. The view taken by Coquard, another of Franck's pupils, that the middle movement is really the finest, seems more just.

It can be shown that Franck's music is well knit, but nowhere in all his work does one feel the tremendous sweep and urge of Beethoven or Wagner.

Franck is after all an improviser of genius, pouring forth clear, coherent music in steady streams like those of Bach, but not possessed of dramatic imagination as Aristotle defined it. His climaxes are akin to [illegible]'s, not [illegible]. Hence the [illegible]urative simplicity of the allegretto in the symphony, and the nobility of its first theme make this movement his greatest achievement in orchestral music.

"Les Eolides" and "Le Chasseur Maudit," based, one on a poem by Leconte de Lisle, the other on a ballad by Buerger, prove the individual poetic imagination of Franck. The first piece does not quite achieve the emotional delicacy at which it aims. "Le Chasseur Maudit" is melodramatic after the Lisztian manner, of less real power than his "Les Preludes" or even his "Mazeppa." Compared with the symphony or with the best of Franck's organ pieces, these tone poems are insignificant.

The performance of all these pieces showed a striving for an emotional sympathy with Franck which Mr Monteux, one imagines, does not completely and happily feel. The fact that the first violins, cellos and leading wood wind now play with far greater subtlety and more nuances than the rest of the orchestra was again pleasingly obvious.

For next week Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, a suite arranged from Lully, Bax' "November Woods" and Chadwick's "Anniversary Overture" are the numbers announced.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 10 1922

Several orchestras commemorated the hundredth anniversary of César Franck's birth, which fell on Dec. 10. The Boston Orchestra played his symphony with two symphonic poems, "Les Eolides" and "The Wild Huntsman," the Philadelphia Orchestra the symphony and a program of Franck music; the Chicago Orchestra, "Les Eolides," "Psyche" and the "Variations Symphoniques" with Alfred Cortot.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 11 1922

From Boston comes news of a concert given recently by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its second conductor, who has been left destitute by the troubles in Austria, where he now lives. The proceeds from the concert, including contributions in excess of tickets, amounts to more than $5,000. Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

---

h SUN
ess New York City
te DEC 12 192

raction.

Boston's Benefit for Gericke.

On Tuesday evening, December 5, at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its second conductor, who has been left destitute by the troubles in Austria, where he now resides. The proceeds from the concert were more than $5,000.

Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The programme consisted of Bethoven's Fifth Symphony and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Piano Waltzes of Brahms arranged for orchestra by Gericke, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 13 1922

SECOND SYMPHONY LIGHTLY MELODIOUS

Mozart and Schumann Numbers Feature Programme Notable in Classic Restraint.

SAMAROFF IS APPRECIATED

Vaughan Williams Fantasia Interesting Exposition of Purely String Ensemble.—Cesar Franck Concluding Offering

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert at Infantry Hall last evening. An audience of not quite the large proportions that heard the opening concert here, but which, nevertheless, practically filled the hall, listened with evident pleasure to a programme that might be characterized as melodious and light rather than severely classic in outline.

This was due to the presence of the Mozart symphony in E-flat major, and the graceful and pleasing Schumann concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor, played by Olga Samaroff.

A fantasia for double-stringed orchestra by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, a work of rather pretentious style, considering its instrumental limitations, was played here for the first time. Mme. Samaroff scored a success by an artistic interpretation of the Schumann concerto, in which M. Monteux and his players gave admirable support.

The programme was as follows:

Mozart....................................
Symphony in E-Flat Major (Koechel No. 543)....................................
Adagio; Allegro.
Andante.
Minuetto; Trio.
Finale: Allegro.
Vaughan Williams....................................
Fantasia for Double Stringed Orchestra
Schumann ....
Concerto in A-Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54....................
Allegro affettuoso.
Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
Allegro vivace.
Franck ....
Symphonic Poem: "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman")........

Although simple in structure and lacking the strength and instrumental color of more modern orchestral works, the Mozart symphonies are delightful old friends. They breathe sweetness and beauty. Their flow of melody and simple harmonic treatment provide restful enjoyment in these days of complex and noisy scores. The symphony in E-flat major contains music that charms by its spontaneity and freshness. With his usual artistic discernment, Mr. Monteux read it with appropriate delicacy and lightness of style. It was given with true Mozartian flavor, the orchestra exhibiting a polished ensemble both in its exacting requirements of phrasing and in its sparkling flights of ornamentation.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia is interesting particularly as an example of what can be accomplished in the way of tone coloring by strings alone. It is based on a theme by Thomas Tallis and the composer shows considerable ingenuity in handling the limited musical tools at his disposal. It abounds in strange harmonic progressions and variety is sought and obtained by frequent use of solo instrumental voices. In spite of many undeniably effective passages and the evidence of thorough musicianship in its structure, the work as a whole sounds labored rather than spontaneous. M. Monteux gave it a careful reading and received generous applause at its conclusion.

Mme. Samaroff, an artist of much imagination and fine technical skill, played the Schumann concerto with singing tone and graceful style. This work is not one in which the soloist is constantly obliged to battle for supremacy with the orchestra. Its smooth melodic flow does not invite technical display. It demands facile fingers and at times power in tonal effect, but the ever present artistic need is that of presenting lovely thematic material with its constantly changing, colorful variations. This Mme. Samaroff accomplished with charming ease of style. She possesses a splendid sense of rhythm and she is mistress of the art of phrasing. At the conclusion of her number she was recalled at least six times to acknowledge deserved applause.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," played for the programme's final number, follows the story of the mythical hunstman and portrays his punishment for indulging in the sport of the chase on the Sabbath. The piece ends with the flight of the sacrilegious Count, who is hotly pursued by a pack of demons. It was played with spirit and abandon.

A. F. P.

PROVIDENCE
RHODE ISLAND
BULLETIN
ISSUE OF
DEC 13 1922

SYMPHONY CONCERT NOTABLE FOR ITS CLASSIC RESTRAINT

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its second concert at Infantry Hall last evening. An audience of not quite the large proportions that heard the opening concert here, but which, nevertheless, practically filled the hall, listened with evident pleasure to a programme that might be characterized as melodious and light rather than severely classic in outline.

This was due to the presence of the Mozart symphony in E-flat major, and the graceful and pleasing Schumann concerto for pianoforte and orchestra in A-minor, played by Olga Samaroff.

A fantasia for double-stringed orchestra by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, a work of rather pretentious style, considering its instrumental limitations, was played here for the first time. Mme. Samaroff scored a success by an artistic interpretation of the Schumann concerto, in which M. Monteux and his players gave admirable support.

The programme was as follows:

Mozart....................................
Symphony in E-Flat Major (Koechel No. 543)....................................
Adagio; Allegro.
Andante.
Minuetto; Trio.
Finale: Allegro.
Vaughan Williams....................................
Fantasia for Double Stringed Orchestra
Schumann ....
Concerto in A-Minor for Pianoforte and Orchestra, Op. 54....................
Allegro affettuoso.
Intermezzo; Andantino grazioso.
Allegro vivace.
Franck ....
Symphonic Poem: "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman")........

Although simple in structure and lacking the strength and instrumental color of more modern orchestral works, the Mozart symphonies are delightful old friends. They breathe sweetness and beauty. Their flow of melody and simple harmonic treatment provide restful enjoyment in these days of complex and noisy scores. The symphony in E-flat major contains music that charms by its spontaneity and freshness. With his usual artistic discernment, Mr. Monteux read it with appropriate delicacy and lightness of style. It was given with true Mozartian flavor, the orchestra exhibiting a polished ensemble both in its exacting requirements of phrasing and in its sparkling flights of ornamentation.

The Vaughan Williams Fantasia is interesting particularly as an example of what can be accomplished in the way of tone coloring by strings alone. It is based on a theme by Thomas Tallis and the composer shows considerable ingenuity in handling the limited musical tools at his disposal. It abounds in strange harmonic progressions and variety is sought and obtained by frequent use of solo instrumental voices. In spite of many undeniably effective passages and the evidence of thorough musicianship in its structure, the work as a whole sounds labored rather than spontaneous. M. Monteux gave it a careful reading and received generous applause at its conclusion.

Mme. Samaroff, an artist of much imagination and fine technical skill, played the Schumann concerto with singing tone and graceful style. This work is not one in which the soloist is constantly obliged to battle for supremacy with the orchestra. Its smooth melodic flow does not invite technical display. It demands facile fingers and at times power in tonal effect, but the ever present artistic need is that of presenting lovely thematic material with its constantly changing, colorful variations. This Mme. Samaroff accomplished with charming ease of style. She possesses a splendid sense of rhythm and she is mistress of the art of phrasing. At the conclusion of her number she was recalled at least six times to acknowledge deserved applause.

Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," played for the programme's final number, follows the story of the mythical hunstman and portrays his punishment for indulging in the sport of the chase on the Sabbath. The piece ends with the flight of the sacrilegious Count, who is hotly pursued by a pack of demons. It was played with spirit and abandon.

A. F. P.

WASHINGTON
D. C.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 14 192

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its only concert in Washington this season and this, too, is hailed with delight, as the concert last season is one that will long be remembered.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
DEC 14 192

Gericke Benefit Concert

On Tuesday evening, December 5, at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its second conductor, who has been left destitute by the troubles in Austria, where he now resides. The proceeds from the concert, including contributions in excess of the price of tickets, amounts to $5,377.50.

Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The programme, consisting of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, piano waltzes of Brahms arranged for orchestra by Gericke, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," was received by the great audience with much enthusiasm.

The program of the Symphony concerts this week contains an interesting work by Arnold Bax, "November Woods," which will be heard here for the first time. Two of his symphonic poems have been played here. They pleased greatly. Mr. Chadwick's "Anniversary" overture will be performed here for the first time; also a charming suite arranged by Mottl from old Lully's ballets. The symphony will be Sibelius's fifth.

Next week the Symphony program will include the overture to Spontini's once famous opera, "The Vestal"; a suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella" (first time in America); a violin concerto by Dohnaynl played by Albert Spalding, and the prelude and love death from "Tristan and Isolde."

HERALD - JAN. 10.

SUN
ss New York City
DEC 16 1922

When Albert Spalding appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston on December 22 and 23, he will present for the first time in America a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernst Dohnanyi. The work has been heard several times in Europe and is said to be one of the most difficult concertos ever written for the violin.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

December 14, 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES BENEFIT CONCERT FOR GERICKE

Proceeds and Contributions Net $5,142.50

Boston, Mass., December 10.—Tuesday evening, December 5, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave a concert which was arranged to relieve the present financial distress in Vienna of Wilhelm Gericke, the former conductor of this celebrated organization. The proceeds from this concert, including contributions received by the trustees, amounted to $5,142.50. The program included Schubert's Unfinished symphony, the fifth symphony of Beethoven, Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel and piano waltzes by Brahms arranged for orchestra by Gericke. Towards the close of the intermission, and immediately preceding an eloquent performance of the C minor symphony, Judge Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees, came to the front of the platform and read a letter which he had sent to Mr. Gericke, followed by Mr. Gericke's answer expressing his appreciation and gratitude. Both letters are worthy of reproduction here:

Boston, October 28, 1922.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke,
Beatrisegasse, 30,
Vienna, Austria.

Dear Mr. Gericke:

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wish you to learn first from them that on December 5 the Orchestra will give a benefit concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, in your honor. When they took up, in 1918, the responsibilities Major Higginson then laid down, they received from him not only a great opportunity for the artistic service of the public, but also the inheritance of a great tradition. In that tradition the memory of your work as the conductor who gave the Orchestra its preëminent place among organizations of its kind in America is cherished with a special feeling. It was constantly in the thought and on the lips of Major Higginson. It lives in his successors, who hold the same appreciation of all you did for the orchestra that was held by him.

Conductors have come and gone since your years in Boston. It will doubtless interest you to know that the suggestion of the approaching concert had its origin with the present conductor, M. Monteux. The trustees heartily acceded to his plan, and look forward with the greatest pleasure to making you the beneficiary of the proceeds of the concert, in testimony to their remembrance of your unique contribution to the musical life of Boston and America.

With every good wish, believe me,

Always sincerely yours,
FREDERICK P. CABOT, President.

Vienna, November 20, 1922.

To Frederick P. Cabot, Esq.,
President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dear Sir:

Your letter of October 28 has come to my hands, and I hasten to answer it in order to tell you how deeply touched I am by the way you recall the time I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It gives me great happiness to see that I, and what I did in my position as a conductor of the orchestra, are not forgotten, in spite of the great changes which have come over the whole world, the work I did so many years ago is still in the minds of some Bostonians and of some members of the Boston Orchestra.

The way they are planning to express their remembrance of me, by doing me the unusual honor of giving a concert for my benefit, moves me beyond words; my gratitude to Mr. Monteux and the members of the Orchestra for their intention, as well as to you and the other trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing them to carry it out, is more than I can say.

Please will you for the present, accept my heartfelt thanks for the wonderfully kind letter you sent me, which, I must confess, made me almost as happy as the whole generous plan itself. And will you please for the present be the means of communicating to Mr. Monteux, as well as to the trustees and the members of the orchestra, the expression of my most heartfelt emotion and thanks.

Respectfully yours,
WILHELM GERICKE.

Judge Cabot voiced the opinion of everybody familiar with the history of the Boston Orchestra when he said that it was Mr. Gericke's work as conductor that gave the orchestra its preëminent place in America. Although this organization has had eight conductors, it was the industry, skill, taste and profound musical knowledge of Mr. Gericke which set the standard for other American orchestras and placed the Boston Symphony on a par with the finest orchestras of Europe. It was therefore gratifying to witness the magnificent response of the Boston public Tuesday evening, the results being a credit to Mr. Monteux, the orchestra, the management and the trustees.

J. C.

N. Y.
HERALD
DEC 17 1922

Leo Blech to Act as Conductor of Wagner Festival

'Ring' to Be Revived for First Time Since the War.

WHEN Albert Spalding appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston on December 22 and 23 he will present for the first time in America a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Dohnanyi. The work has been heard several times in Europe, and it is said to be one of the most difficult concertos ever written for the violin.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 17

WILHELM GERICKE BENEFIT.

The proceeds from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Boston for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, now destitute in Vienna, amounted to $5,377.50, including contributions in excess of the price of tickets.

Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The program consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, piano waltzes of Brahms arranged for orchestra by Gericke, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

A letter recently received from Mr. Gericke, in answer to the letter from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was read to the audience. Mr. Gericke, writing from Vienna Nov. 20, addressed Judge Cabot as follows:

"Dear Sir:

"Your letter of October 28th has come to my hands and I hasten to answer it in order to tell you how deeply touched I am by the way you recall the time I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It gives me great happiness to see that I, and what I did in my position as a conductor of the orchestra, am not forgotten. In spite of the great changes which have come over the whole world, the work I did so many years ago is still in the minds of some Bostonians and of some members of the Boston Orchestra.

"The way they are planning to express their rememberance of me, by doing me the unusual honor of giving a concert for my benefit, moves me beyond words; my gratitude to Mr. Monteux and to the members of the orchestra for their intention, as well as to you and the other Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing them to carry it out, is more than I can say.

"Please will you, for the present, accept my heartfelt thanks for the wonderfully kind letter you sent me, which, I must confess, made me almost as happy as the whole generous plan itself. And will you please, for the present, be the means of communicating to Mr. Monteux as well as to the Trustees and the members of the orchestra, the expression of my most heartfelt emotion and thanks.

"Respectfully yours,
"WILHELM GERICKE."

A FULL WEEK-END VARIOUSLY HARVESTED

From Sibelius to Bax and from Lully to Chadwick with Mr. Monteux and the Orchestra as Equal Voice—Chopin Hard Pressed by Mr. Hutcheson—The Contradictory Mme. de Horvath—"The Messiah" as Usual

THESE are the days of distractions—imperative on time, exacting upon the purse. Therefore, perhaps, the slenderest second balcony, within the longest memory, awaited the Symphony Concert of last Friday afternoon; while many a subscriber's seat stood empty at the repetition on Saturday evening. The more the pity—since the assembled pieces were interesting and impressive from beginning to end; while Mr. Monteux has not often shown wider range as conductor or the orchestra better maintained its present quality. The rigors and the frenzies of Sibelius in his Fifth Symphony first engaged them; then the stately progress or the measured fancy of preludes and dances assembled from Lully's seventeenth-century operas; next the soughings and the shiverings, the pent, restless melancholies of Bax through a tone-poem. "November Woods"; finally, an "Anniversary Overture" in which Mr. Chadwick making music, is eager and warm again. To each of these pieces the conductor gave character, eloquence. The composers—as the Parisian cynics like to say—were clearly audible and in their own voices.

Answering them and Mr. Monteux as well, the orchestra achieved the singular texture of Sibelius's Symphony wherein over whirring web of the strings, the wind choir in voice after voice rises and falls; achieved also his stern progressions to power, his drooping, shadowed song. They sustained Lully's courtly pomps of tone and rhythm; they remembered that when he was fanciful, he was also polite. They flung themselves upon Bax's storm-tossed woods; while their tone deepened his melancholy. They missed none of Mr. Chadwick's keen-set detail. They kept also his high spirits. To do these things—and with equal resource, skill and sensibility—is to be orchestra from which each composer hears both his notes and his imaginings.

The clearer then were the deserts of all four. With reason Mr Monteux repeated this Symphony of Sibelius, first heard here and measurably mistrusted last spring. Now stood clearer that austerity and economy of means with which the music is fashioned in the power of concentration and concision in the beauty that may dwell in such reticence and choice. Sibelius summons power till it goads—witness the frenzied dance of the imagination to folk-tune rhythm into which he flings; or the clangors upon clangors heaped through the final periods Sibelius summons beauty till it haunts—witness the beginning in old, forgotton, far-off things; the broken song of flute and clarinet and horn through the mists of the strings; the eerie fantasy into which of a sudden the song of the slow movement winds groping, restless, strangely sounding. A music like no other written in these days, cutting deep, lingering long, a music yet again to be repeated.

Beside such a symphony Bax's tone-picturing, grapic as it was, seemed almost too fluent, too craftsman-like, too ready of both imagination and means. Music indeed wells out of this Irishman; yet clearly he is beginning to measure these outpourings. A mood, an emotion, a genuine impulse to musical speech lie behind and give life; better controlled are the uttering means; firmer and more abiding the impression. The stress, the storm, of "November Woods" answers to both shows without and mood within. The foil was Mr. Chadwick, looking forward with cheerful ardor and back in no unhappy retrospect, which should be the way of Anniversary Overtures: or Lully of the tonal pomps for Louis XIV.'s ballets—and the tonal poetry (as in the Night-Piece) for proof against the centuries.

H. T. P.

TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 21 1922

RAISES FUND IN AID OF STRICKEN MUSICIAN

Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor who first set the standards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and through years worked toward them, is now in his seventy-eighth year, a poor man in Vienna. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities, and month by month the fall of the crown toward nothingness has stripped him of income.

To relieve his necessities the Symphony Orchestra announces a special concert for Tuesday evening. Private subscriptions are already swelling the fund to be so established. In particular, various conductors now working in the United States are pledging an annual subscription to it.

THIS week, as last, at the Symphony Concerts, the "first times" outnumber the repetitions. No "new" piece is Spontini's Overture to his half-forgotten opera "La Vestale," produced at Paris a hundred and fifteen years ago, yet Mr. Monteux is the first conductor of the Boston Orchestra to set this Overture on a programme. And "new" in fact as well as through circumstance are Dohnányi's Concerto for Violin, to be played by Albert Spalding, and an orchestral suite drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet, "Pulcinella." The stage-piece was first produced at the Opéra in Paris, May 15, 1920, by Dyághilev's Russian Ballet. Ostensibly, Stravinsky adapted the music from the eighteenth-century pages of Pergolesi. Actually and largely it is his own—and characteristic—handiwork. Massine staged the ballet; Picasso set it—each according to his lights. Paris and London saw, heard and debated. More recently Stravinsky has assembled from the music two Suites for the concert-hall.

The source of "Pulcinella" and the outline of the action can be no better set forth than by quoting the following note that appears, in French, upon the flyleaf of Stravinsky's score.

> The subject of "Pulcinella" is drawn from a manuscript found at Naples and dating from the year 1700. This manuscript contains a large number of comedies revolving around the traditional personage of the Neapolitan popular theatre. The episode chosen as basis for the ballet is entitled: "Four Like Punchinellos."
>
> All the young girls are enamored of Pulcinella. The young men, piqued by jealousy, seek to kill him. Believing that they have seen the accomplishment of their project, they borrow the dress of Pulcinella, to present themselves to their sweethearts. But Pulcinella had craftily caused his place to be taken by a double, who had but feigned death beneath the blows of his enemies. Pulcinella himself, dressed as a musician, comes to resuscitate his double. Just as the young men, believing themselves free of him, are seeking the maidens, the true Pulcinella makes his appearance and arranges all the marriages. He himself espouses Pimpinella, with the blessing of his double (Fourbo), and the latter, in his turn, assumes the aspect of a magician.

A reading of the music does not separate too readily the share of Pergolesi from the share of Stravinsky, especially in the invention and the choice of motivs. Pergolesi, who was born in 1710, and lived but a brief twenty-six years, helped materially to set the new fashion (as it was then) of harmonically rather than contrapuntally accompanied melody. Superficially considered, the music of "Pulcinella" might have come from Pergolesi's own hand, but a closer inspection of it reveals a use of dissonance—diatonic more than chromatic—that belongs to the twentieth rather than to the eighteenth century. And if Pergolesi was chary of counterpoint, Stravinsky, outwardly imitating his manner, employs polyphonic devices freely and with a mastery that the ancient contrapuntists might envy. In orchestration Stravinsky has again attempted to be imitative in the broader sense, yet he has permitted himself to be original in detail. With true historical accuracy he eschews clarinets in his score, and restricts himself to these wind-instruments employed sparingly—two flutes, piccolo, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, trumpet and trombone. Besides the regular string-band there is required a quartet, or rather a quintet, of soloists—two violins, viola, 'cello and bass—that is often treated as an independent choir. Here, of course, is a typically modern device, yet one that excellently lends itself to the aping of eighteenth-century slenderness and intimacy. . . . The suite as it will be played here consists of an introductory Sinfonia (or Overture), a Serenata, a Scherzino (with accessory movements) and Finale. As the Serenata is a "slow piece," the general plan befits the imagined time.

Contrasting Dohnanyi

No such artifice as Stravinsky seeks is to be found in Dohnányi's Concerto, a frank, straightforward, firm-set piece of music, written as skilfully as sincerely. Dohnányi the composer, like Dohnányi the pianist, is indifferent to the ways of the ultra-moderns. Enough for him that he write ingeniously and use the solo-violin boldly, unconventionally. His Concerto, indeed, reaches almost the proportions of a symphony. A fourth movement is added to the three usual in such pieces; while the orchestral accompaniment, calling for an English horn, contra-bassoon, three trombones and harp, is in consequence much heavier than that of the older violin concertos. The texture of the music, moreover, is of purpose symphonic. Here the Violin Concerto of Brahms is recalled and Dohnányi's devotion to that composer is also suggested in other ways. The chief theme of the last movement, for example, has a distinctly Brahmsian flavor.

The demands made upon the soloist are [illegible] much of the [illegible]

N. Y.
HERALD
DEC 17 1922

enefit Concert Given By Boston Orchestra

On Tuesday evening, December 5, at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its second conductor, who has been left destitute by the troubles in Austria, where he resides. The proceeds from the concert, including contributions in excess of the price of tickets, amounts to $5,877.

Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The program, consisting of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Piano Waltzes of Brahms arranged for Orchestra by Gericke, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," was received by the great audience with much enthusiasm.

A letter recently received from Mr. Gericke, written November 20 in Vienna in answer to the letter from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was read to the audience. In it he expressed great gratitude for the efforts of his Boston friends in his be-

---

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
DEC 17 1922

TO PLAY NEW CONCERTS

When Albert Spalding appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston on December 22 and 23, he will present for the first time in America a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernst Dohnonyi. The work has been heard several times in Europe and is said to be one of the most difficult concertos ever written for the violin

---

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
DEC 17 1922

Albert Spalding will give the first American performance of a new violin concerto by Erno Dohnanyi on his appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston next Friday and Saturday. The concerto, which has been played several times in Europe, has the reputation of being one of the most difficult ever written for the violin.

TRANS-DEC. 18

Friday afternoon, Dec. 22, and Saturday evening, Dec. 23, in Symphony Hall, the ninth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Albert Spalding will be the soloist. The program follows:

Spontini, Overture to "Vestale"
Stravinsky, Suite No. 1 from the ballet, "Pulcinella," for small orchestra (after Pergolesi). (First time in America.)
Dohnányi, Concerto for violin and orchestra. (First time in Boston.)
Wagner, Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"

MONITR-DEC. 18

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is an unusual one. The overture to Spontini's once famous opera, "The Vestal," has not been performed at these concerts. It was first played here at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association in 1869. A suite for small orchestra, "Pulcinella," a ballet based by Stravinsky on music by Pergolesi, will be performed for the first time in America. Albert Spalding will play Dohnanyi's violin concerto, as yet unknown here. For good measure Mr. Monteux adds Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

HERALD-DEC. 21.

MUSICAL COURIER
Weekly Review of the World's Music

Issue of

December 14, 1922

BOSTON SYMPHONY GIVES BENEFIT CONCERT FOR GERICKE

Proceeds and Contributions Net $5,142.50

Boston, Mass., December 10.—Tuesday evening, December 5, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, gave a concert which was arranged to relieve the present financial distress in Vienna of Wilhelm Gericke, the former conductor of this celebrated organization. The proceeds from this concert, including contributions received by the trustees, amounted to $5,142.50. The program included Schubert's Unfinished symphony, the fifth symphony of Beethoven, Strauss' Til Eulenspiegel and piano waltzes by Brahms arranged for orchestra by Gericke. Towards the close of the intermission, and immediately preceding an eloquent performance of the C minor symphony, Judge Cabot, president of the Board of Trustees, came to the front of the platform and read a letter which he had sent to Mr. Gericke, followed by Mr. Gericke's answer expressing his appreciation and gratitude. Both letters are worthy of reproduction here:

Boston, October 28, 1922.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke,
Beatrisegasse, 30,
Vienna, Austria.

Dear Mr. Gericke:

The trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra wish you to learn first from them that on December 5 the Orchestra will give a benefit concert in Symphony Hall, Boston, in your honor. When they took up, in 1918, the responsibilities Major Higginson then laid down, they received from him not only a great opportunity for the artistic service of the public, but also the inheritance of a great tradition. In that tradition the memory of your work as the conductor who gave the Orchestra its preëminent place among organizations of its kind in America is cherished with a special feeling. It was constantly in the thought and on the lips of Major Higginson. It lives in his successors, who hold the same appreciation of all you did for the orchestra that was held by him.

Conductors have come and gone since your years in Boston. It will doubtless interest you to know that the suggestion of the approaching concert had its origin with the present conductor, M. Monteux. The trustees heartily acceded to his plan, and look forward with the greatest pleasure to making you the beneficiary of the proceeds of the concert, in testimony to their remembrance of your unique contribution to the musical life of Boston and America.

With every good wish, believe me,

Always sincerely yours,
FREDERICK P. CABOT, President.

Vienna, November 20, 1922.

To Frederick P. Cabot, Esq.,
President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Dear Sir:

Your letter of October 28 has come to my hands, and I hasten to answer it in order to tell you how deeply touched I am by the way you recall the time I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It gives me great happiness to see that I, and what I did in my position as a conductor of the orchestra, are not forgotten, in spite of the great changes which have come over the whole world, the work I did so many years ago is still in the minds of some Bostonians and of some members of the Boston Orchestra.

The way they are planning to express their remembrance of me, by doing me the unusual honor of giving a concert for my benefit, moves me beyond words; my gratitude to Mr. Monteux and the members of the Orchestra for their intention, as well as to you and the other trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing them to carry it out, is more than I can say.

Please will you for the present, accept my heartfelt thanks for the wonderfully kind letter you sent me, which, I must confess, made me almost as happy as the whole generous plan itself. And will you please for the present be the means of communicating to Mr. Monteux, as well as to the trustees and the members of the orchestra, the expression of my most heartfelt emotion and thanks.

Respectfully yours,
WILHELM GERICKE.

Judge Cabot voiced the opinion of everybody familiar with the history of the Boston Orchestra when he said that it was Mr. Gericke's work as conductor that gave the orchestra its preëminent place in America. Although this organization has had eight conductors, [illegible] was the industry, skill, taste and profound musical knowledge of Mr. Gericke which set the standard for other American orchestras and placed the Boston Symphony on a par [illegible] finest orchestras of Europe. It was therefore gratifying to witness the magnificent response of the Boston public Tuesday evening, the results being a credit to Mr. Monteux, the orchestra, the management and the trustees.

J. C.

N. Y.
HERALD
DEC 17 192

~~Benefit Concert Given~~ By Boston Orchestra

On Tuesday evening, December 5, at Symphony Hall, Boston, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, gave a concert for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, its second conductor, who has been left destitute by the troubles in Austria, where he resides. The proceeds from the concert, including contributions in excess of the price of tickets, amounts to $5,377.

Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, who were members of the Orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The program, consisting of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Piano Waltzes of Brahms arranged for Orchestra by Gericke, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel," was received by the great audience with much enthusiasm.

A letter recently received from Mr. Gericke, written November 20 in Vienna in answer to the letter from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, president of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was read to the audience. In it he expressed great gratitude for the efforts of his Boston friends in his behalf.

N. Y.
HERALD
DEC 17 1922

Leo Blech to Act as Conductor of Wagner Festival

'Ring' to Be Revived for First Time Since the War.

WHEN Albert Spalding appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston on December 22 and 23 he will present for the first time in America a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernest Dohnanyi. The work has been heard several times in Europe, and it is said to be one of the most difficult concertos ever written for the violin.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF

WILHELM GERICKE BENEFIT.

The proceeds from the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert in Boston for the benefit of Wilhelm Gericke, now destitute in Vienna, amounted to $5,377.50, including contributions in excess of the price of tickets.

Thirty-one of the musicians now in the Boston Symphony Orchestra were also members in Mr. Gericke's time. In the audience were Daniel Kuntz and George Stewart, who were members of the orchestra when it was founded in 1881.

The program consisted of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony and Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, piano waltzes of Brahms arranged for orchestra by Gericke, and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

A letter recently received from Mr. Gericke, in answer to the letter from Judge Frederick P. Cabot, President of the Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was read to the audience. Mr. Gericke, writing from Vienna Nov. 20, addressed Judge Cabot as follows:

"Dear Sir:

"Your letter of October 28th has come to my hands and I hasten to answer it in order to tell you how deeply touched I am by the way you recall the time I spent with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It gives me great happiness to see that I, and what I did in my position as a conductor of the orchestra, am not forgotten. In spite of the great changes which have come over the whole world, the work I did so many years ago is still in the minds of some Bostonians and of some members of the Boston Orchestra.

"The way they are planning to express their rememberance of me, by doing me the unusual honor of giving a concert for my benefit, moves me beyond words; my gratitude to Mr. Monteux and to the members of the orchestra for their intention, as well as to you and the other Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for allowing them to carry it out, is more than I can say.

"Please will you, for the present, accept my heartfelt thanks for the wonderfully kind letter you sent me, which, I must confess, made me almost as happy as the whole generous plan itself. And will you please, for the present, be the means of communicating to Mr. Monteux as well as to the Trustees and the members of the orchestra, the expression of my most heartfelt emotion and thanks.

"Respectfully yours,
"WILHELM GERICKE."

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF 17 1922

TO PLAY NEW CONCERTS

When Albert Spalding appears as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall in Boston on December 22 and 23, he will present for the first time in America a new concerto for violin and orchestra by Ernst Dohnonyi. The work has been heard several times in Europe and is said to be one of the most difficult concertos ever written for the violin

---

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
DEC 17 1922

Albert Spalding will give the first American performance of a new violin concerto by Erno Dohnanyi on his appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston next Friday and Saturday. The concerto, which has been played several times in Europe, has the reputation of being one of the most difficult ever written for the violin.

CONCE

A FULL WEEK-END VARIOUSLY HARVESTED

From Sibelius to Bax and from Lully to Chadwick with Mr. Monteux and the Orchestra as Equal Voice—Chopin Hard Pressed by Mr. Hutcheson—The Contradictory Mme. de Horvath—"The Messiah" as Usual

THESE are the days of distractions—imperative on time, exacting upon the purse. Therefore, perhaps, the slenderest second balcony, within the longest memory, awaited the Symphony Concert of last Friday afternoon; while many a subscriber's seat stood empty at the repetition on Saturday evening. The more the pity—since the assembled pieces were interesting and impressive from beginning to end; while Mr. Monteux has not often shown wider range as conductor or the orchestra better maintained its present quality. The rigors and the frenzies of Sibelius in his Fifth Symphony first engaged them; then the stately progress or the measured fancy of preludes and dances assembled from Lully's seventeenth-century operas; next the soughings and the shiverings, the pent, restless melancholies of Bax through a tone-poem. "November Woods"; finally, an "Anniversary Overture" in which Mr. Chadwick making music, is eager and warm again. To each of these pieces the conductor gave character, eloquence. The composers—as the Parisian cynics like to say—were clearly audible and in their own voices.

Answering them and Mr. Monteux as well, the orchestra achieved the singular texture of Sibelius's Symphony wherein over whirring web of the strings, the wind choir in voice after voice rises and falls; achieved also his stern progressions to power, his drooping, shadowed song. They sustained Lully's courtly pomps of tone and rhythm; they remembered that when he was fanciful, he was also polite. They flung themselves upon Bax's storm-tossed woods; while their tone deepened his melancholy. They missed none of Mr. Chadwick's keen-set detail. They kept also his high spirits. To do these things—and with equal resource, skill and sensibility—is to be orchestra from which each composer hears both his notes and his imaginings.

The clearer then were the deserts of all four. With reason Mr Monteux repeated this Symphony of Sibelius, first heard here and measurably mistrusted last spring. Now stood clearer that austerity and economy of means with which the music is fashioned in the power of concentration and concision in the beauty that may dwell in such reticence and choice. Sibelius summons power till it goads—witness the frenzied dance of the imagination to folk-tune rhythm into which he flings; or the clangors upon clangors heaped through the final periods Sibelius summons beauty till it haunts—witness the beginning in old, forgotton, far-off things; the broken song of flute and clarinet and horn through the mists of the strings; the eerie fantasy into which of a sudden the song of the slow movement winds groping, restless, strangely sounding. A music like no other written in these days, cutting deep, lingering long, a music yet again to be repeated.

Beside such a symphony Bax's tone-picturing, grapic as it was, seemed almost too fluent, too craftsman-like, too ready of both imagination and means. Music indeed wells out of this Irishman: yet clearly he is beginning to measure these outpourings. A mood, an emotion, a genuine impulse to musical speech lie behind and give life; better controlled are the uttering means; firmer and more abiding the impression. The stress, the storm, of "November Woods" answers to both shows without and mood within. The foil was Mr. Chadwick, looking forward with cheerful ardor and back in no unhappy retrospect, which should be the way of Anniversary Overtures: or Lully of the tonal pomps for Louis XIV.'s ballets—and the tonal poetry (as in the Night-Piece) for proof against the centuries.

H. T. P.

TRANS-DEC. 18.

Friday afternoon, Dec. 22, and Saturday evening, Dec. 23, in Symphony Hall, the ninth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor. Albert Spalding will be the soloist. The program follows:

Spontini, Overture to "Vestale"
Stravinsky, Suite No. 1 from the ballet, "Pulcinella," for small orchestra (after Pergolesi). (First time in America.)
Dohnányi, Concerto for violin and orchestra. (First time in Boston.)
Wagner, Prelude and Love-Death ~~from~~ "Tristan and Isolde"

MONITR-DEC. 18

The program of the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening is an unusual one. The overture to Spontini's once famous opera, "The Vestal," has not been performed at these concerts. It was first played here at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association in 1869. A suite for small orchestra, "Pulcinella," a ballet based by Stravinsky on music by Pergolesi, will be performed for the first time in America. Albert Spalding will play Dohnanyi's violin concerto, as yet unknown here. For good measure Mr. Monteux adds Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

HERALD-DEC. 21.

WASHINGTON
D. C.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 21 1922

RAISES FUND IN AID OF STRICKEN MUSICIAN

Wilhelm Gericke, the conductor who first set the standards of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and through years worked toward them, is now in his seventy-eighth year, a poor man in Vienna. His fortune was invested in Austrian securities, and month by month the fall of the crown toward nothingness has stripped him of income.

To relieve his necessities the Symphony Orchestra announces a special concert for Tuesday evening. Private subscriptions are already swelling the fund to be so established. In particular, various conductors now working in the United States are pledging an annual subscription to it.

THIS week, as last, at the Symphony Concerts, the "first times" outnumber the repetitions. No "new" piece is Spontini's Overture to his half-forgotten opera "La Vestale," produced at Paris a hundred and fifteen years ago, yet Mr. Monteux is the first conductor of the Boston Orchestra to set this Overture on a programme. And "new" in fact as well as through circumstance are Dohnányi's Concerto for Violin, to be played by Albert Spalding, and an orchestral suite drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet, "Pulcinella." The stage-piece was first produced at the Opéra in Paris, May 15, 1920, by Dyághilev's Russian Ballet. Ostensibly, Stravinsky adapted the music from the eighteenth-century pages of Pergolesi. Actually and largely it is his own—and characteristic—handiwork. Massine staged the ballet; Picasso set it—each according to his lights. Paris and London saw, heard and debated. More recently Stravinsky has assembled from the music two Suites for the concert-hall.

The source of "Pulcinella" and the outline of the action can be no better set forth than by quoting the following note that appears, in French, upon the flyleaf of Stravinsky's score.

> The subject of "Pulcinella" is drawn from a manuscript found at Naples and dating from the year 1700. This manuscript contains a large number of comedies revolving around the traditional personage of the Neapolitan popular theatre. The episode chosen as basis for the ballet is entitled: "Four Like Punchinellos."
>
> All the young girls are enamored of Pulcinella. The young men, piqued by jealousy, seek to kill him. Believing that they have seen the accomplishment of their project, they borrow the dress of Pulcinella, to present themselves to their sweethearts. But Pulcinella had craftily caused his place to be taken by a double, who had but feigned death beneath the blows of his enemies. Pulcinella himself, dressed as a musician, comes to resuscitate his double. Just as the young men, believing themselves free of him, are seeking the maidens, the true Pulcinella makes his appearance and arranges all the marriages. He himself espouses Pimpinella, with the blessing of his double (Fourbo), and the latter, in his turn, assumes the aspect of a magician.

A reading of the music does not separate too readily the share of Pergolesi from the share of Stravinsky, especially in the invention and the choice of motivs. Pergolesi, who was born in 1710, and lived but a brief twenty-six years, helped materially to set the new fashion (as it was then) of harmonically rather than contrapuntally accompanied melody. Superficially considered, the music of "Pulcinella" might have come from Pergolesi's own hand, but a closer inspection of it reveals a use of dissonance—diatonic more than chromatic—that belongs to the twentieth rather than to the eighteenth century. And if Pergolesi was chary of counterpoint, Stravinsky, outwardly imitating his manner, employs polyphonic devices freely and with a mastery that the ancient contrapuntists might envy. In orchestration Stravinsky has again attempted to be imitative in the broader sense, yet he has permitted himself to be original in detail. With true historical accuracy he eschews clarinets in his score, and restricts himself to these wind-instruments employed sparingly—two flutes, piccolo, two oboes, two bassoons, two horns, trumpet and trombone. Besides the regular string-band there is required a quartet, or rather a quintet, of soloists—two violins, viola, 'cello and bass—that is often treated as an independent choir. Here, of course, is a typically modern device, yet one that excellently lends itself to the aping of eighteenth-century slenderness and intimacy. . . . The suite as it will be played here consists of an introductory Sinfonia (or Overture), a Serenata, a Scherzino (with accessory movements) and Finale. As the Serenata is a "slow piece," the general plan befits the imagined time.

Contrasting Dohnanyi

No such artifice as Stravinsky seeks is to be found in Dohnányi's Concerto, a frank, straightforward, firm-set piece of music, written as skilfully as sincerely. Dohnányi the composer, like Dohnányi the pianist, is indifferent to the ways of the ultra-moderns. Enough for him that he write ingeniously and use the solo-violin boldly, unconventionally. His Concerto, indeed, reaches almost the proportions of a symphony. A fourth movement is added to the three usual in such pieces; while the orchestral accompaniment, calling for an English horn, contra-bassoon, three trombones and harp, is in consequence much heavier than that of the older violin concertos. The texture of the music, moreover, is of purpose symphonic. Here the Violin Concerto of Brahms is recalled and Dohnányi's devotion to that composer is also suggested in other ways. The chief theme of the last movement, for example, has a distinctly Brahmsian flavor.

The demands made upon the soloist are insistently severe. Through much of the piece his task is to furnish highly intricate [illegible] to melodies played by other instruments or groups of instruments, although occasionally the solo-violin enters the orchestral web to share in the weaving of the melodic pattern. Far more rarely than in the older concertos does it become the protagonist. Scattered through the piece, however, are extraordinarily difficult cadenzas or cadenza-like passages that give the soloist ample opportunity for the coveted "display." In choosing a new concerto, and one of such exactions, as well as one in which not a little of his labor must go unrecognized by the casual listener, Mr. Spalding has added to his stature as artist. Would that more of his fellows might follow his example, and let some of the over-driven "war-horses" rest for a time peacefully in their stalls.

W. S. S.

TRANS. DEC. 21.

SPALDING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

ALBERT SPALDING

Albert Spalding, brilliant American violinist, received a warm and well-earned reception as soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday. Playing one of Dohnanyi's difficult concertos, he was masterful at all times, and charmed the audience with his technique and tone.

The whole symphony program had an air of newness. The solo piece was played for the first time in Boston: a suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "Pulcinella," had its first hearing in America, and an overture from the Spontini opera, "La Vestale," was introduced for the first time at these concerts.

The Stravinsky number was delightful and most unusual, peculiar strains running throughout, and more bizarre orchestration marking some of the movements. Full play to the skill of Mr. Monteux was given by the number, which was keenly appreciated by the audience.

Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava," charming and melodious, was another unusual number on the program. The Spontini overture and the prelude and love-death music from "Tristan and Isolde" completed the program.

Spalding's appearance was his third as a symphony concert soloist. He renewed the old impression that he is one of the country's most accomplished and poetic artists.

ADVTSR · DEC. 23

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 2 1922

EVENTS IN MUSIC.

The gentle calm at present pervading the musical atmosphere of before-Christmas New York is scheduled to be dispelled immediately after the first of the year by a torrent of concerts, recitals, and musicales varied in kinds and arrangement. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, will give the first New York performance of two interesting scores at their second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 4, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 6. These compositions are "November Woods," by Bax, the English composer, and the First Suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet, "Pulcinella," for small orchestra, based on the theme and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The "Pulcinella" suite has its first American performance in Boston today, while the score of Bax was played in Boston last week.

N

New York City

DEC 2 3 1922

The Symphonies.

Two scores of interest will have their first performance in New York under Pierre Monteux when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall a week from next Thursday evening, January 4, and Saturday afternoon, January 6. These are "November Woods," by Bax, the English composer, and the First Suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella" for small orchestra, based on the themes and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The "Pulcinella" Suite had its first American performance in Boston yesterday, while the score of Bax was produced here last week.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 3 1922

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF TO PLAY IN BROOKLYN

Famous Pianist Will Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

Pierre Monteux has arranged a programme of interest for the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given in the Academy Friday evening, Jan. 5, at 8:15. In place of a symphony he will present the Trilogy "Wallenstein" of Vincen d' Indy, which this most eminent of living French composers wrote under the inspiration of the three dramas of Schiller, treating the exploits of this general of the Thirty Years' War.

A new score of interest by Stravinsky is being introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and will also figure on this programme, namely, the suite from the Russian composer's Ballet, "Pulcinella." The score had its first performance in Boston last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who is looked upon as the foremost living woma pianist. The beauty and brilliance of her playing find ideal expression in the concerto of Edward Grieg, in which she is to appear with the orchestra.

The evening will close with Chabrier's popular Rhapsody "Espana," based upon Spanish dance rhythms.

POWELL IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

American Composer Will Present His Own Work in Forthcoming Recital

John Powell, the celebrated American composer and pianist, will appear as soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Powell will take the piano part in two numbers, namely, his own Negro Rhapsody, which is based upon the rhythm and melody of the music of the American negro, and has been given successfully in a number of American and European cities; also a Prelude and Fugue by Daniel Gregory Mason.

AMER. DEC. 23.

JOHN POWELL, SOLOIST

John Powell, the celebrated American composer and pianist, will appear as soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 29 and 30.

Mr. Powell will take the piano part in two numbers, namely, his own Negro Rhapsody, which is based upon the rhythm and melody of the music of the American negro; also a Prelude and Fugue by Daniel Gregory Mason. Pierre Monteux will open the program with the 12th Symphony of Haydn in B flat, and also conduct the Ballet Suite "Namouna" by Lalo.

TRAV. DEC. 23.

At the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening John Powell, the pianist of nervous energies, will assist the orchestra and bring with him two pieces new to Boston. One, written by Daniel Gregory Mason, is a Prelude and Fugue for Piano and Orchestra to be played, if recollection is not at fault, for the first times anywhere. The other is Mr. Powell's own "Negro Rhapsody," likewise scored for piano and orchestra—music that harks back to the blacks as African savages. Yet Mr. Powell's Southern birth, blood and youth play part in the piece. A Symphony by Haydn will begin the concerts. A Suite from Lalo's ballet, "Namouna," unheard since Dr. Muck's day, will end them. Perhaps Mr. Monteux has chosen it to recall the hundredth anniversary of Lalo's birth. Quite as probably he recalls the rhythm and color the fancy and skill, of a ballet-music far above the usual quality.

TRANS - DEC. 23

Novelties on Program of Boston Symphony

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Spontini—Overture to "La Vestale."
Stravinsky—Suite No. 1 from the Ballet, "Pulcinella," after Pergolesi.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem "Vltava."
Dohnányi—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Albert Spalding was the soloist.

The overture to Spontini's "Vestale," performed for the first time in 1807, was played yesterday for the first time at these concerts. Thus it waited for over 100 years to come to performance here and there is no reason to doubt that it may wait another hundred before another performance. It was interesting merely as a curiosity. It is in a style long since gone out of fashion, a style composed equally of bombast and triviality, partaking in not a few particulars of the character of the composer himself. Yet Spontini was considered no mean musician in his day and held majestic sway as the arbiter of things operatic. Mr. Monteux has oftentimes been more happy in his choice of pieces for revival.

Stravinsky has treated Pergolesi's music for the most part kindly. Only here and there do his extravagances in matters of orchestration crop out. In the final movement the glissandi on the trombone (more often associated with the music of the dance hall) and the passages for a solo double bass seem out of keeping with the gentle, unaffected character of Pergolesi's music. So, too, is the shriek of the piccolo in the opening measures of the Scherzino. Otherwise the music is not too modernized. The use of solo stringed instruments, contrasted with the larger group (a device familiar to students of Corelli's concerti grossi and similar works) is a happy revival of a time honored procedure. This suite was played for the first time in America.

Dohnányi's Concerto was given its first performance in Boston. Its four movements contain much that is effective, much that is novel, yet there is no striving for new things; the music is natural, unlabored, expressive. Only in the opening cadenzas and passage work for the solo violin at the beginning of the first and last movements does the music seem somewhat purposeless and long drawn out. The playing of both soloist and orchestra was deserving of the highest praise and the concerto was a welcome relief from the over-familiar pieces which violinists usually choose for the display of their talents.

Wagner and Smetana contributed the right amount of well-known music to this novel program, that those doubtful and even suspicious of the untried might have some musical comfort during the afternoon. To be sure the concerto was received with some favor, but the applause for Spontini and Stravinsky was sparingly accorded. Regardless of the musical appeal of these compositions, of which opinions may vary, the remarkably fine playing of the orchestra and the skill of the conductor were worthy of greater encouragement.

S. M.

MONTR - DEC. 23

JOHN POWELL, who will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.

Powell To Play At Symphony Concerts

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening John Powell, the celebrated American pianist and composer, will appear as soloist at the Symphony concerts, playing the piano part in his own composition, "The Negro Rhapsody." He will also play with the orchestra a new work by Daniel Gregory Mason.

Pierre Monteux will open the program with the Haydn B-flat symphony and revive the Ballet Suite "Namouna," by Lalo.

ADVTSR - DEC 2[illegible]

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

Pierre Monteux has arranged a programme of interest for the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given in the Academy of Music a week from Friday evening, January 5, at 8:15. In place of a symphony he will present the Trilogy "Wallenstein" of Vincen d'Indy, which this most eminent of living French composers wrote under the inspiration of the three dramas of Schiller, treating the exploits of this general of the Thirty Years' War. A new score of interest by Stravinsky is being introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and will also figure on this programme, namely, the suite from the Russian composer's ballet "Pulcinella." This music is based upon the themes and style of Pergolesi, the Renaissance Italian composer. The score had its first performance in Boston last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the charm of the music, in which the daring Russian skillfully retains its antique flavor, assured a favorable reception. The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who is looked upon as the foremost living woman pianist. The poetic beauty and astounding brilliance of her playing find ideal expression in the concerto of Edward Grieg, in which she is to appear with the Orchestra. The evening will close with Chabrier's popular rhapsody "Espana," based upon Spanish dance rhythms.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

Concerts in Brooklyn

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be January 5, at 8:15 p. m., with Olga Samaroff as soloist in the Grieg pianoforte concerto. Mr. Monteux's other numbers will be the "Wallenstein" trilogy of Vincent d'Indy, Stravinsky's suite from his ballet "Pulcinella" and Chabrier's "Espana." January concerts at the Academy under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences include Reinald's Werrenrath's song recital on the evening of Monday, the 8th; the second concert of the Flonzaley Quartet on Sunday afternoon, the 21st; a recital by Alfredo Oswald, pianist, and Ethyl Hayden, soprano, the evening of the 25th, and the annual appearance of Fritz Kreisler on Wednesday evening, the 31st.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

tion.

Harmonically bolder was the Honegger sonata (played by Mr. Tinlot and Carlos Salzedo), and yet scarcely true blue "futuristic." It proved not so startling as the same composer's "Horace Victorieux," a mimed symphony recently played by the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall under Mr. Monteux's direction. The Honegger sonata is touched by the influence of Cesar Franck and is held fairly well together by the outlines of sonata form. But, with its vague and aimless meanderings, it is not a work apt to inspire desire for second hearing. Honegger's musical ideas and invention in this work (composed during the years 1916-18), yet rest one foot upon the soil of established conventional harmonic, rhythmic, melodic and thematic formulas. Throughout, however, the composer's talent is obviously straining at the leash of restriction and rule, of law and order.

Dane Rudhyar's piano pieces,

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

TO PLAY NEW MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second pair of concerts in New York this season, on Jan. 4 and 6, in Carnegie Hall, will present for the first time in this city "November Woods," by the English composer, Bax, and a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella," based on the themes and the style of Pergolesi.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

The Boston Orchestra has had Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, first given last Spring; Arnold Bax's new tone poem "November Woods," recently played in Chicago, and Chadwick's "Anniversary Overture," new [illegible] Boston.

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 3 1922

MONTEUX TO FEATURE NEW MUSIC

Kochanski and Casals to Play Double Concerto at New York Symphony Concert.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plans to present some modernist novelties at his next visit to New York. One of these new pieces is to be a suite by Igor Stravinsky, one of two which he has made from his ballet, "Pulcinella." The music is based on actual melodies of Pergolesi and the rest of it is in the same style. This will be played at the concert in Carnegie Hall on January 6.

The second novelty is to be the Britisher Arnold Bax's "November Woods." This is one of his more recent works and will be played at the Thursday evening concert on January 4. Bax, in such of his music as has already been heard here, has shown himself to be one of the most interesting of the younger Englishmen.

N. Y.
WORLD
ISSUE OF
DEC ~~23~~ 1922
24

New Scores to Be Introduced by the Boston Symphony Here.

At the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season, to be given a week from Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 4 and 6, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux will play for the first time in this city "November Woods," by the English composer Bax, and the First Suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The latter work had its first American performance by this orchestra in Boston last Friday and the score of Bax in the week previous.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

A new score of interest by Stravinsky will also figure on this program, namely, the Suite from the Russian composer's Ballet "Pulcinella." It is based upon the themes and style of Pergolesi, the Renaissance Italian composer. The score had its first performance in Boston last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the charm of the music, in which the daring Russian skillfully retains its antique flavor, assured a favorable reception.

From ~~Sun &~~ Herald
New York
DEC 2 4 1922

At the second pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 4 and 6, 1923, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux will give for the first time in this city "November Woods" by the English Composer Bax, and the First Suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes and the style of Pergolesi. The latter work had its first American performance by this orchestra in Boston last Friday and the score of Bax in the week previous.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 4 and 6. Works new to New York on Mr. Monteux's programs will be "November Woods," by Arnold Bax and the First Suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," supposed to be based on the themes and the style of Pergolesi.

At the next concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, on Tuesday evening, January 2, Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer, will conduct two of [illegible] broidery to melodies played by other instruments or groups of instruments, although occasionally the solo-violin enters the orchestral web to share in the weaving of the melodic pattern. Far more rarely than in the older concertos does it become the protagonist. Scattered through the piece, however, are extraordinarily difficult cadenzas or cadenza-like passages that give the soloist ample opportunity for the coveted "display." In choosing a new concerto, and one of such exactions, as well as one in which not a little of his labor must go unrecognized by the casual listener, Mr. Spalding has added to his stature as artist. Would that more of his fellows might follow his example, and let some of the over-driven "war-horses" rest for a time peacefully in their stalls.

W. S. S.

TRANS. DEC. 31.

SPALDING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

ALBERT SPALDING

Albert Spalding, brilliant American violinist, received a warm and well-earned reception as soloist at the Symphony concert yesterday. Playing one of Dohnanyi's difficult concertos, he was masterful at all times, and charmed the audience with his technique and tone.

The whole symphony program had an air of newness. The solo piece was played for the first time in Boston: a suite from Stravinsky's Ballet, "Pulcinella," had its first hearing in America, and an overture from the Spontini opera, "La Vestale," was introduced for the first time at these concerts.

The Stravinsky number was delightful and most unusual, peculiar strains running throughout, and more bizarre orchestration marking some of the movements. Full play to the skill of Mr. Monteux was given by the number, which was keenly appreciated by the audience.

Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava," charming and melodious, was another unusual number on the program. The Spontini overture and the prelude and love-death music from "Tristan and Isolde" completed the program.

Spalding's appearance was his third as a symphony concert soloist. He renewed the old impression that he is one of the country's most accomplished and poetic artists.

ADVTSR. DEC. 23

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 2 19

EVENTS IN MUSIC.

The gentle calm at present pervading the musical atmosphere of before-Christmas New York is scheduled to be dispelled immediately after the first of the year by a torrent of concerts, recitals, and musicales varied in kinds and arrangement. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, will give the first New York performance of two interesting scores at their second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening, Jan. 4, and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 6. These compositions are "November Woods," by Bax, the English composer, and the First Suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet, "Pulcinella," for small orchestra, based on the theme and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The "Pulcinella" suite has its first American performance in Boston today, while the score of Bax was played in Boston last week.

N

New York City

DEC 2 3 1922

The Symphonies.

Two scores of interest will have their first performance in New York under Pierre Monteux when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall a week from next Thursday evening, January 4, and Saturday afternoon, January 6. These are "November Woods," by Bax, the English composer, and the First Suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella" for small orchestra, based on the themes and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The "Pulcinella" Suite had its first American performance in Boston yesterday, while the score of Bax was produced there last week.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 3 1922

MME. OLGA SAMAROFF TO PLAY IN BROOKLYN

Famous Pianist Will Appear With Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy.

Pierre Monteux has arranged a programme of interest for the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given in the Academy Friday evening, Jan. 5, at 8:15. In place of a symphony he will present the Trilogy "Wallenstein" of Vincen d' Indy, which this most eminent of living French composers wrote under the inspiration of the three dramas of Schiller, treating the exploits of this general of the Thirty Years' War.

A new score of interest by Stravinsky is being introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and will also figure on this programme, namely, the suite from the Russian composer's Ballet, "Pulcinella." The score had its first performance in Boston last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who is looked upon as the foremost living woma pianist. The beauty and brilliance of her playing find ideal expression in the concerto of Edward Grieg, in which she is to appear with the orchestra.

The evening will close with Chabrier's popular Rhapsody "Espana," based upon Spanish dance rhythms.

POWELL IS SYMPHONY SOLOIST

American Composer Will Present His Own Work in Forthcoming Recital

John Powell, the celebrated American composer and pianist, will appear as soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Mr. Powell will take the piano part in two numbers, namely, his own Negro Rhapsody, which is based upon the rhythm and melody of the music of the American negro, and has been given successfully in a number of American and European cities; also a Prelude and Fugue by Daniel Gregory Mason.

AMER. DEC. 23.

JOHN POWELL, SOLOIST

John Powell, the celebrated American composer and pianist, will appear as soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 29 and 30.

Mr. Powell will take the piano part in two numbers, namely, his own Negro Rhapsody, which is based upon the rhythm and melody of the music of the American negro; also a Prelude and Fugue by Daniel Gregory Mason. Pierre Monteux will open the program with the 12th Symphony of Haydn in B flat, and also conduct the Ballet Suite "Namouna" by Lalo.

TRAV. DEC. 23.

AT the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening John Powell, the pianist of nervous energies, will assist the orchestra and bring with him two pieces new to Boston. One, written by Daniel Gregory Mason, is a Prelude and Fugue for Piano and Orchestra to be played, if recollection is not at fault, for the first times anywhere. The other is Mr. Powell's own "Negro Rhapsody," likewise scored for piano and orchestra—music that harks back to the blacks as African savages. Yet Mr. Powell's Southern birth, blood and youth play part in the piece. A Symphony by Haydn will begin the concerts. A Suite from Lalo's ballet, "Namouna," unheard since Dr. Muck's day, will end them. Perhaps Mr. Monteux has chosen it to recall the hundredth anniversary of Lalo's birth. Quite as probably he recalls the rhythm and color the fancy and skill, of a ballet-music far above the usual quality.

TRANS-DEC. 23

[45]

Novelties on Program of Boston Symphony

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Spontini—Overture to "La Vestale."
Stravinsky—Suite No. 1 from the Ballet, "Pulcinella," after Pergolesi.
Smetana—Symphonic Poem "Vitava."
Dohnányi—Concerto for Violin and Orchestra.
Wagner—Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde."

Albert Spalding was the soloist.

The overture to Spontini's "Vestale," performed for the first time in 1807, was played yesterday for the first time at these concerts. Thus it waited for over 100 years to come to performance here and there is no reason to doubt that it may wait another hundred before another performance. It was interesting merely as a curiosity. It is in a style long since gone out of fashion, a style composed equally of bombast and triviality, partaking in not a few particulars of the character of the composer himself. Yet Spontini was considered no mean musician in his day and held majestic sway as the arbiter of things operatic. Mr. Monteux has oftentimes been more happy in his choice of pieces for revival.

Stravinsky has treated Pergolesi's music for the most part kindly. Only here and there do his extravagances in matters of orchestration crop out. In the final movement the glissandi on the trombone (more often associated with the music of the dance hall) and the passages for a solo double bass seem out of keeping with the gentle, unaffected character of Pergolesi's music. So, too, is the shriek of the piccolo in the opening measures of the Scherzino. Otherwise the music is not too modernized. The use of solo stringed instruments, contrasted with the larger group (a device familiar to students of Corelli's concerti grossi and similar works) is a happy revival of a time honored procedure. This suite was played for the first time in America.

Dohnányi's Concerto was given its first performance in Boston. Its four movements contain much that is effective, much that is novel, yet there is no striving for new things; the music is natural, unlabored, expressive. Only in the opening cadenzas and passage work for the solo violin at the beginning of the first and last movements does the music seem somewhat purposeless and long drawn out. The playing of both soloist and orchestra was deserving of the highest praise and the concerto was a welcome relief from the over-familiar pieces which violinists usually choose for the display of their talents.

Wagner and Smetana contributed the right amount of well-known music to this novel program, that those doubtful and even suspicious of the untried might have some musical comfort during the afternoon. To be sure the concerto was received with some favor, but the applause for Spontini and Stravinsky was sparingly accorded. Regardless of the musical appeal of these compositions, of which opinions may vary, the remarkably fine playing of the orchestra and the skill of the conductor were worthy of greater encouragement.

S. M.

MONITR. DEC. 23

JOHN POWELL, who will be the soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.

Powell To Play At Symphony Concerts

NEXT Friday afternoon and Saturday evening John Powell, the celebrated American pianist and composer, will appear as soloist at the Symphony concerts, playing the piano part in his own composition, "The Negro Rhapsody." He will also play with the orchestra a new work by Daniel Gregory Mason.

Pierre Monteux will open the program with the Haydn B-flat symphony and revive the Ballet Suite, "Namouna," by Lalo.

ADVTSR-DEC 2

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

Pierre Monteux has arranged a programme of interest for the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given in the Academy of Music a week from Friday evening, January 5, at 8:15. In place of a symphony he will present the Trilogy "Wallenstein" of Vincen d'Indy, which this most eminent of living French composers wrote under the inspiration of the three dramas of Schiller, treating the exploits of this general of the Thirty Years' War. A new score of interest by Stravinsky is being introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and will also figure on this programme, namely, the suite from the Russian composer's ballet "Pulcinella." This music is based upon the themes and style of Pergolesi, the Renaissance Italian composer. The score had its first performance in Boston last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the charm of the music, in which the daring Russian skillfully retains its antique flavor, assured a favorable reception. The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who is looked upon as the foremost living woman pianist. The poetic beauty and astounding brilliance of her playing find ideal expression in the concerto of Edward Grieg, in which she is to appear with the Orchestra. The evening will close with Chabrier's popular rhapsody "Espana," based upon Spanish dance rhythms.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

Concerts in Brooklyn

The second Boston Symphony concert of the season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be January 5, at 8:15 p. m., with Olga Samaroff as soloist in the Grieg pianoforte concerto. Mr. Monteux's other numbers will be the "Wallenstein" trilogy of Vincent d'Indy, Stravinsky's suite from his ballet "Pulcinella" and Chabrier's "Espana." January concerts at the Academy under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences include Reinald's Werrenrath's song recital on the evening of Monday, the 8th; the second concert of the Flonzaley Quartet on Sunday afternoon, the 21st; a recital by Alfredo Oswald, pianist, and Ethyl Hayden, soprano, the evening of the 25th, and the annual appearance of Fritz Kreisler on Wednesday evening, the 31st.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

tion.

Harmonically bolder was the Honegger sonata (played by Mr. Tinlot and Carlos Salzedo), and yet scarcely true blue "futuristic." It proved not so startling as the same composer's "Horace Victorieux," a mimed symphony recently played by the Boston Orchestra at Carnegie Hall under Mr. Monteux's direction. The Honegger sonata is touched by the influence of Cesar Franck and is held fairly well together by the outlines of sonata form. But, with its vague and aimless meanderings, it is not a work apt to inspire desire for second hearing. Honegger's musical ideas and invention in this work (composed during the years 1916-18), yet rest one foot upon the soil of established conventional harmonic, rhythmic, melodic and thematic formulas. Throughout, however, the composer's talent is obviously straining at the leash of restriction and rule, of law and order.

Dane Rudhyar's piano pieces,

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF 2 4 1922

TO PLAY NEW MUSIC.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's second pair of concerts in New York this season, on Jan. 4 and 6, in Carnegie Hall, will present for the first time in this city "November Woods," by the English composer, Bax, and a suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella," based on the themes and the style of Pergolesi.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

The Boston Orchestra has had Sibelius's Fifth Symphony, first given last Spring, Arnold Bax's new tone poem "November Woods," recently played in Chicago, and Chadwick's "Anniversary Overture," new to Boston.

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 3 1922

MONTEUX TO FEATURE NEW MUSIC

Kochanski and Casals to Play Double Concerto at New York Symphony Concert.

Pierre Monteux, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, plans to present some modernist novelties at his next visit to New York. One of these new pieces is to be a suite by Igor Stravinsky, one of two which he has made from his ballet, "Pulcinella." The music is based on actual melodies of Pergolesi and the rest of it is in the same style. This will be played at the concert in Carnegie Hall on January 6.

The second novelty is to be the Britisher Arnold Bax's "November Woods." This is one of his more recent works and will be played at the Thursday evening concert on January 4. Bax, in such of his music as has already been heard here, has shown himself to be one of the most interesting of the younger Englishmen.

N. Y.
WORLD
ISSUE OF
DEC ~~25~~ 1922
24

New Scores to Be Introduced by the Boston Symphony Here.

At the second pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New York this season, to be given a week from Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 4 and 6, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux will play for the first time in this city "November Woods," by the English composer Bax, and the First Suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The latter work had its first American performance by this orchestra in Boston last Friday and the score of Bax in the week previous

---

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
1922

A new score of interest by Stravinsky will also figure on this program, namely, the Suite from the Russian composer's Ballet "Pulcinella." It is based upon the themes and style of Pergolesi, the Renaissance Italian composer. The score had its first performance in Boston last week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the charm of the music, in which the daring Russian skillfully retains its antique flavor, assured a favorable reception.

From DEC 2 4 1922
~~Sun &~~ Herald
New York

At the second pair of New York concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra on January 4 and 6, 1923, in Carnegie Hall, Pierre Monteux will give for the first time in this city "November Woods" by the English Composer Bax, and the First Suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes and the style of Pergolesi. The latter work had its first American performance by this orchestra in Boston last Friday and the score of Bax in the week previous.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
DEC 2 4 1922

The next concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be at Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 4 and 6. Works new to New York on Mr. Monteux's programs will be "November Woods," by Arnold Bax and the First Suite from Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," supposed to be based on the themes and the style of Pergolesi.

At the next concert of the Philadelphia Orchestra, on Tuesday evening, January 2, Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer, will conduct two of his own compositions.

Powell to Be Soloist at Symphony Concerts

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec 29 and 30, in Symphony Hall, John Powell, the celebrated American pianist and composer, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking the piano part in his own composition, "The Negro Rhapsody," which utilizes the characteristic negro melodies and rhythms and has been highly praised in the cities of America and Europe where the score has been performed.

Mr Powell will also play with the orchestra a new work by Daniel Gregory Mason, Prelude and Fugue.

Pierre Monteux will open the program with the 12th Symphony of Haydn in B flat and revive the Ballet Suite of Lalo, "Namouna."

GLOBE-DEC 24.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall, John Powell, pianist and composer, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking the piano part in his "Negro Rhapsody," which utilizes characteristic negro melodies and rhythms. The rhapsody has been highly praised in the cities of America and Europe where it has been performed. Mr. Powell will also play with the orchestra a new work by Daniel G. Mason, Prelude and Fugue. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Haydn's Symphony in B flat (B. & H. No. 12) and revive Lalo's Ballet Suite, "Namouna."

HERALD-DEC. 24.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

SPORTS AND PASTIMES OF THE WEEK-END

Stravinsky Neapolitan and Dohnanyi Technician—A Decoration for Mr. Laurent — The Burgin Quartet Reborn — D'Harcourt's New Symphony Gets Nowhere

OF the two novel pieces, played afresh at the Symphony Concert of last Saturday, Stravinsky's Suite from "Pulcinella" gained, while Dohnanyi's Concerto for Violin lost, by such repetition. Neapolitan humors, eighteenth-century or twentieth, are not too choice. Presumably Stravinsky, Dyaghilev, Miassin, concocting their ballet, kept the flavor—polissonerie, the French call it. Hence the composer's trumpets chortling over his trombones; hence his double-basses mumbling in the background; hence in general the bouncing, trouncing orchestra of Stravinsky's Finale, ending as though it had received a quick slap across the mouth. Humors neither pretty nor polite—not at all the humors into which Pergolesi's light fingers were likely to [illegible]—the "rough stuff" of music in a fashion growing upon Stravinsky in recent years. [illegible] good "rough stuff," and being high-honored, why not? It is known to letters; it is known to painting. Music, heavenly maid! may also tuck up her skirts; set arms akimbo; even bawl a little. Of course Stravinsky can do much finer work and in "Pulcinella" does it also. Neapolitan voices are reedy; Neapolitans playing instruments must fetch out a twang. Ostensibly the composer keeps a straight face when he is manipulating Pergolesi's Serenade; but tweaking in, as it were, will come this reediness. Then [illegible]ors as well as instruments, for the in[illegible] pipe. Even into the grave little overture must come the nasal oboe. Setting his strings pizzicati, Stravinsky again remembers those wiry echoes of Naples. The very twists and turns of his Scherzo, all bustle, again murmuring a tune, a voice through a crowd, are redolent of Naples. Hear the Suite from "Pulcinella," as eighteenth-century pages re[illegible] and revived—and the listener wonders. Hear it as "Echoes of Naples," as old titles used to go—and hear also Stravinsky as pungent of the soil as in his Russian days.

Repeated between rounds of applause for music and violinist, Dohnányi's Concerto, in spite of the occasional Brahmsian [illegible] seemed to hark back to the model of Beethoven when he obliged his friend Clementi with such a piece. In it that excellent violinist presumably ran the gamut of his prowess. In abilities, Mr. Spalding probably lags not a whit behind; while the contriving Dohnanyi has omitted nothing to extend and test them from the sharpest leap of a cadenza to the softenest euphony with clarinet or horn. Superlative tennis, "transcendental" billiards of the violin. For a century and more Beethoven's game has tempted every fiddler. The lion's paw will close and unclose even upon a virtuoso-piece. Not quite the same are Dohnányi's fingers, spinning his quiet little melodies, twining his lace-work of artifice around them. No wonder he took thought now and then (as in the Scherzo) a saving, spicing Hungarian rhythm. H. T. P.

TRANS-DEC. 26.

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

An Inning for Americans—Mr. Powell's "Negro Rhapsody," Mr. Mason's "Prelude and Fugue" for Novel Numbers from the Symphony Orchestra — Mme. Gauthier to Return Well Stocked—Wagner and Mr. Mollenhauer

AS soloist at the Symphony Concerts of this week John Powell proffers two pieces new to Boston—his own "Negro Rhadsody" and Daniel Gregory Mason's Prelude and Fugue, both for piano and orchestra. Few titles seem more self-explanatory than that prefixed by Mr. Powell to this, the first of his larger compositions to [illegible]

[illegible] Richard Brookwell, has prepared a lengthy analysis, reproduced in the programme-book of the Philharmonic Society of New York on the occasion of its performance of the Rhapsody. According to Mr. Brookwell, Mr. Powell is here concerned not with the mere writing of a fantasy on negro tunes, but rather with the expression in music of the dominant traits and characteristics of the black man, before civilization had touched and changed him—his terror in the face of mysterious and incomprehensible forces, his spontaneous, almost child-like humor, and his religious instinct that ranges from faith to frenzy.

The Rhapsody begins with a cry, the wailing utterances of an oppressed people. After these lamenting measures the piano introduces a dance-motive that is to reappear in prominence in the Finale. The second section, of more lyrical mood, is based on the familiar "spiritual" "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" and a tune of similar origin, "I Want To Be Ready," is employed in the final division of the piece. Mr. Brookwell's explanation and analysis is far too long for full quotation here, yet for the light it throws on Mr. Powell's intentions the last of it may well bear reprinting.

> The fundamental motive of this tune ("I Want to Be Ready") is used to develop in the orchestra a powerful climax, at the height of which the piano announces the full theme. The theme is developed by the different choirs of the orchestra, the rhythms getting wilder and the harmony more suggestive, until the music culminates in the frenetic and barbarous announcement of the dance-motive on the piano, revealing the fanatic frenzy of the Voodoo orgy, which degenerates into a maniac licentiousness. The flood of madness is interrupted for a moment by the "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" theme, which is, however, incapable of maintaining itself and is overwhelmed in a flood of primal sensuality. The Rhapsody closes with a shriek from the brass, accompanied by a tempestuous glissando streaming up the full range of the piano.

For the Prelude and Fugue Mr. Mason may best be his own herald through the following note that he contributed a year ago to the programme-book of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra:

> A detailed thematic analysis is hardly necessary to anyone disposed to listen sympathetically; but my reason for choosing the time-honored form of the prelude and fugue may be of interest. While nothing is more deadly than a fugue treated in a purely academic spirit, it has always seemed to me that in itself the fugue is one of the most moving and beautiful of all forms, since it is in its very essence melody, all melody, and nothing but melody. Therefore, caring as little as I do for pictorial suggestion in music, and much for intensity of subjective emotion and for plastic beauty, the impossibility of associating any kind of "programme" with such a form attracted rather than repelled me, while its rich suggestiveness to the purely musical imagination tempted me to try its application to a modern idiom.
>
> The Prelude and Fugue were begun at Pittsfield in the summer of 1919 and were finished at Norfolk, Conn., a year later. The Prelude opens with a broad theme hovering in tonality between A minor and B flat major, and played in octaves by strings and low woodwind. This theme dominates both sections of the piece. It serves as framework for the main subject of the Fugue, "exposed" by the piano, and at the end it is triumphantly asserted by the brass against elaborate counterpoint in the rest of the orchestra. The mood of the Prelude is predominantly dignified, almost sombre; the Fugue, essentially free in construction, passes through episodes of contrasting character, and the end is animated. Throughout the piece the piano is treated less as a solo instrument in the accepted sense than as an integral part of the orchestra. Definitely this Prelude and Fugue, though difficult enough for the pianist, may not be called a "virtuoso-piece." W. S. S.

When Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra go to New York next week, he is setting on his programmes the two novel pieces that have lately interested audiences at home—Bax's tone-poem, "November Woods," and the Suite, played last week, from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella."

TRANS. DEC. 28.

The reactionaries in the audiences of the Boston symphony concerts will rejoice this week in the fact that a symphony by Haydn will be played, and the younger generation, irreverent toward "old fogies," may find pleasure in the honest and refreshing music written by Haydn for London. A charming suite from Lalo's ballet "Noumana" will be played. This has indirectly a local interest. When the ballet was produced in Paris (1882) the chief dancer was Rita Sangalli.

Mlle. Sangalli came to the United States to dance in "The Black Crook" when it was produced at Niblo's Garden, New York, Sept. 12, 1866. In 1868 she danced at the Olympic, New York, when "Humpty Dumpty" was produced with George L. Fox, clown. She danced in Boston (1867-68) in a revival of "The Black Crook" at the Continental Theatre, also in "Cinderella" and "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Here and in New York she was thought to be a "superbly voluptuous" dancer, but in the late '70's, when she was leading dancer at the Paris Opera, she was described as "a vigorous and intrepid ballerina, accurate and forcible, but somewhat lacking in charm." She died in 1909.

Two pieces on the program will be heard here for the first time, although they have been performed in other cities: D. G. Mason's Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra and John Powell's "Negro Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra. Mr. Powell of Richmond, Va., who has given recitals in Boston, will be the pianist.

HERALD-DEC. 28

N[illegible] York and other cities [illegible] When it resumes concerts at home on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 12 and 13, Marcel Dupré, the noted organist from Notre Dame de Paris, will be the "assisting artist," playing the solo part in a Concerto of Bach and an arrangement for orchestra of Franck's Second Chorale. The other items of the programme are Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes."

TRANS-DEC. 29.

POWELL PLEASES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Plays Own Rhapsody and D. G. Mason's Fugue

John Powell chose to play as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert two American compositions not previously heard here, his own "Negro Rhapsody" and Daniel Gregory Mason's Prelude and Fugue, both written for solo pianoforte and orchestra. His performance was creditable if not brilliant. What was lacking in it was delicacy and beauty of tone. The applause was, as too often at these concerts, more polite than cordial.

Mr Powell's rhapsody makes vivid and effective use of negro tunes and rhythms. The finesse of Ravel and Rimsky Korsakov is lacking, but one felt in this music more emotional honesty and directness than one commonly feels in their work. This piece ought to prove popular with audiences, since it is at once good and easily intelligible music.

Mr Mason's fugue has an original if not especially distinctive subject, which is foreshadowed in the prelude and handled throughout with what seemed to a cursory listener considerable ingenuity. What is more, parts of the music had an emotional power, which compelled respect and attention from one too apt to let his mind wander while new American music is being performed.

Either of these American pieces seemed distinctly superior in every way to the excerpts from Lalo's ballet "Namouna," which Mr Monteux tried to resurrect. This music was avowedly hack work, which did not in its day achieve any particular success even as such in Paris. It would be unfair to judge the composer of the "Symphonie Espagnole" and "Le Roi d'Ys" by it. The themes are laboriously trivial, the instrumentation clumsy, the total effect inept. A brilliant performance was warmly applauded.

Haydn's symphony in B flat (B and H No. 12) seemed to a listener with a weakness for the 18th century the freshest and most charming music played yesterday. The first allegro was played too fast, and the finale a bit too slow but otherwise the performance was commendably tactful and superficially brilliant.

This music suggested the general reflection on almost everything composed since Schubert that it is strange that those who cannot achieve what Beethoven and Bach and Wagner achieved will so seldom even attempt to write simple, tuneful imaginative light music, sprightlty without being vulgar, like Haydn.

There are no Symphony concerts next week. Jan 12 and 13, Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, in Paris, will play a Bach concerto and Franck's B minor chorale. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" are the other numbers announced.

GLOBE-DEC 30.

Symphony Plays Two Novel Works

John Powell, pianist, was soloist at yesterday's Symphony Concert. He played a piece of his own composition and also a piece by Daniel Gregory Mason. Mr. Mason's "Prelude and Fugue" was played for the first time in Boston. It is extremely modern in manner. The Powell piece was also given for the first time here. The two pieces are strongly contrasting, the rather quiet beauty of the Mason work against the wild tenor of Powell's "Rhapsodie Negre."

Lalo's suite from the ballet "Namouna," played by the full orchestra, is a piece of remarkable charm. In one movement there is a piquant flute solo, which was played admirably by Georges Laurent.

Haydn's Symphony in B-flat completes the program, which will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-DEC. 30

10TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Works of Two American Composers on Program with Haydn and Lalo

JOHN POWELL PLAYS HIS OWN PIANO PIECE

By PHILIP HALE

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, B flat major (B. & H., No. 12); D. G. Mason, prelude and fugue [illegible] the ballet "Namouna"; [illegible] Rhapsodie Negre, for [illegible] and piano (first time); John Powell was the pianist.

The names of two Americans were on the program. Mr. Mason was born in Brookline; Mr. Powell was born at Richmond, Va. Mr. Mason's prelude and fugue were performed at Chicago on March 4, 1921. Mr. Powell's rhapsody was first played in New York on March 23, 1918. Mr. Mason, composer, writer about music and musicians, is a professor at Columbia University. Mr. Powell, composer, a man of varied interests, leads the life of a wandering virtuoso.

There is no need of a Plutarchian comparison, even if it were possible; as composers, the men of the pieces played yesterday are disparates.

Mr. Mason has said that a fugue treated in a purely academic spirit is deadly; but the fugue, "one of the most moving and beautiful of all forms, since it is in its very essence melody, all melody, and nothing but melody," this form, richly suggestive to the purely musical imagination, tempted him to try its application to a modern idiom.

The success of a praise-worth endeavor in this field depends on the presence or lack of imagination in the composer. Mr. Mason says he cares "little for pictorial suggestion in music and much for intensity of subjective emotion and for plastic beauty."

With the best will in the world, w[illegible] found little or no imagination, intensi[illegible] of subjective emotion or plastic beau[illegible] in this prelude and fugue; no objective emotion; no obvious beauty of the sort that makes an appeal for the moment and is quickly forgotten. We have heard music by Mr. Mason in which the qualities he named were much more in evidence. Therefore, the greater the disappointment yesterday. Perhaps this disappointment was only another instance of imperfect sympathy. Mr. Powell evidently enjoyed the music. He applauded Mr. Mason; Mr. Mason applauded him and the orchestra; Mr. Monteaux stood by smiling. So everything was for the best in the best of possible worlds.

The program book published a rhapsodic explanation of Mr. Powell's composition. The author, Mr. Brockwell, succeeded in getting "tuskless, clawless man," "mysterious, incomprehensible physical forces," "tragic protest against fate" and "pathetic resignation to the inevitable" all in one sentence. Some years ago, when western statesmen wore leg-boots, the test of oratory among their constituents was the ability to get "eagle" and "bugle" in the final sentence of the peroration. It would appear from Mr. Brockwell's argument that Mr. Powell has attempted "to synthetize" all the negro's characteristics and "present them in a form of organic unity." Mr. Brockwell also says that towards the close the "Sweet Chariot" theme is "overwhelmed in a flood of primal sensuality." An old Frenchman exclaimed: "How many things there are in a minuet!" It seems then that Mr. Powell's rhapsodie is ethonological, chronological, sociological, and all the other "icals." We regret to say we found it only interesting music, now plaintive, now wildly and pleasingly barbaric; music showing no foreign influence, music that has decided individuality.

How beautifully Hadyn's symphony was played! The opening largo and the adagio were most euphonious, while in the rapid movements there was remarkable delicacy in the lighter measures and in the sturdier a sonority that was never forced. It was a pleasure to hear Lalo's ballet music again, with the famous flute solo played so nimbly and skilfully, always with rich tonal quality, by the admirable Mr. Laurent. And to think that this music was flouted when it was first heard! Yes there were brave Frenchmen before Debussy, Ravel, Florent, Schmitt, and "The Six" (now "The Five").

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. The program for Jan. 12-13 is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Bach, Concerto, D minor, for strings and organ; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Franck-Goodrich, organ Chorale No. 2, B minor; Liszt, "The Preludes." Marcel Dupre will be the organist.

HERALD. DEC. 30

PLAYS OWN WORK WITH SYMPHONY

Powell Also Soloist in Mason's Prelude and Fugue

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, had several features of uncommon interest, not the least of which were two compositions for piano and orchestra not known in Boston, and performed with the assistance of John Powell, pianist and composer of his own "Rhapsody Negre," which concluded the concert.

CALL FOR COMPOSER

Daniel Gregory Mason's Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra was also [illegible]

[illegible] composed in [illegible] occasion.

It is very hard to put [illegible] past when it comes to the con[illegible] of what are evidently masterpieces. It is difficult, for example, to understand how any audience, least of all a French audience, could have found fault with and covered with mud the composer of the music for "Namouna." It is French music to the last note, to the smallest detail, and it is so well done that the most ordinary and casual phrase becomes distinctive. The score has a delicate exoticism which never bores the hearer and the orchestration is as simple as it is individual and enchanting.

Too Seldom Played

This music followed the symph[illegible] Haydn and the new work of Mas[illegible] some reason the Haydn symph[illegible] yesterday is too seldom pl[illegible] movement is merely conven[illegible] excepts the occasional blari[illegible] the opening allegro, and these are [illegible] than recompensed for by the sudd[illegible] and ingenious modulations, the constant happy strokes of humor in wh[illegible] the movement abounds.

There is now and again a Beetho[illegible] vigor, a sharp conciseness of sta[illegible] with which Haydn is not always [illegible]ited. The slow movement is [illegible] melodic inspiration and of the [illegible] perfect style. The minuet delights one by its wit, by the felicitous instrumentation and the unexpected turns given certain phrases, and the finale laughs—how it laughs—at the whole world.

Mr. Powell's Rhapsody—why a work by an American should carry the French title of "Rhapsodie Negre" we fail to discern—this Rhapsody is a most exciting and colorful composition. It may be virtuotistic, coloristic, realistic, any other "istic." It lives. There is in the lowering introduction the savor of the jungle, there is mounting, delirious frenzy. The orchestration becomes deliberately noisy and shrill. The glockenspiel, muted horns and what not enhance the effect of emotion which is exceedingly unrefined and primal in character.

Contrasted with this mood is that of the tenderness and pathos of certain "spirituals" which Mr. Powell uses without direct quotation, in a manner of his own. In them is wistfulness, melancholy, an age-long regret. Moreover, they are cunningly placed. They establish needed points of repose, and it may here be said that although Mr. Powell has written a whirlwind of a finale, it never runs away with the composer and it never ran away with the pianist. He rode surely and confidently the storm.

True to the Negro

This music, of which Mr. Powell gave a superb performance, serves to us genuinely Negroid—the Negro as seen and known by an American with Southern blood in his veins. In certain places there is felt tropical grace and languor. And this much is certain: however one's estimate of the value of the music is in the future revised, up or down, a superb virtuoso piece for piano and orchestra has been added to the repertory. And what a pleasure to encounter one of the very few American composers who can write without unction or in the pontifical manner!

Both Warmly Applauded

Both Mr. Powell and Mr. Mason—particularly Mr. Mason—were very warmly applauded. As a reviewer expected to state as honestly and clearly as possible his personal reactions, and as one who has never felt particularly sympathetic to Mr. Mason's music, we can only state our realization of moments of grave beauty in the prelude, and emotional intention as well as firmly knit structure in his fugue. But this is all we can honestly say about it. With all its ingenuity the fugue does not feel to us organic. The thought may be continuous, the feeling does not seem to be so, at least at first hearing. And then—why a piano? Is the piano a tone-color required by this score? Much of the time it is doubling the orchestral voices, and when it is doing counterpoint this counterpoint might just as well be given to other instruments.

The reader and listener will decide these things for himself. Impressions, and compositions too, depend a tremendous lot on temperament. Mr. Mason, who was present, rose to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

POST-DEC. 30

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall will be Marcel Dupre, the French organist and composer, who is visiting America for the first time. These concerts will be given a week from next Friday and Saturday, as the orchestra is to be on tour the coming week.

AMER. DEC 30

Powell to Be Soloist at Symphony Concerts

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec 29 and 30, in Symphony Hall, John Powell, the celebrated American pianist and composer, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking the piano part in his own composition, "The Negro Rhapsody," which utilizes the characteristic negro melodies and rhythms and has been highly praised in the cities of America and Europe where the score has been performed.

Mr Powell will also play with the orchestra a new work by Daniel Gregory Mason, Prelude and Fugue.

Pierre Monteux will open the program with the 12th Symphony of Haydn in B flat and revive the Ballet Suite of Lalo, "Namouna."

GLOBE-DEC 24

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony hall, John Powell, pianist and composer, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, taking the piano part in his "Negro Rhapsody," which utilizes characteristic negro melodies and rhythms. The rhapsody has been highly praised in the cities of America and Europe where it has been performed. Mr. Powell will also play with the orchestra a new work by Daniel G. Mason, Prelude and Fugue. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Haydn's Symphony in B flat (B. & H. No. 12) and revive Lalo's Ballet Suite, "Namouna."

HERALD•DEC 24

CONCERT - CHRONICLE

SPORTS AND PASTIMES OF THE WEEK-END

Stravinsky Neapolitan and Dohnanyi Technician—A Decoration for Mr. Laurent — The Burgin Quartet Reborn — D'Harcourt's New Symphony Gets Nowhere

OF the two novel pieces, played afresh at the Symphony Concert of last Saturday, Stravinsky's Suite from "Pulcinella" gained, while Dohnanyi's Concerto for Violin lost, by such repetition. Neapolitan humors, eighteenth-century or twentieth, are not so choice. Presumably Stravinsky, Dyaghilev, Miassin, concocting their ballet, kept the flavor—polissonerie, the French call it. Hence the composer's trumpets chortling over his trombones; hence his double-basses mumbling in the background; hence in general the bouncing, trouncing orchestra of Stravinsky's Finale, ending as though it had received a quick slap across the mouth. Humors neither pretty nor polite—not at all the humors into which Pergolesi's light fingers were likely to [illegible]—the "rough stuff" of music in a fashion growing upon Stravinsky in recent years. [illegible] good "rough stuff," and being high-humored, why not? It is known to letters; [illegible] known to painting. Music, heavenly maid! may also tuck up her skirts; set arms akimbo; even bawl a little.

Of course Stravinsky can do much finer work and in "Pulcinella" does it also. Neapolitan voices are reedy; Neapolitans playing instruments must fetch out a twang. Ostensibly the composer keeps a straight face when he is manipulating Pergolesi's Serenade; but tweaking in, as it were, will come this reediness. Then humors as well as instruments, for the in[illegible] pipe. Even into the grave little overture must come the nasal oboe. Setting his strings pizzicati, Stravinsky again remembers those wiry echoes of Naples. The very twists and turns of his Scherzo, [illegible] all bustle, again murmuring a tune, like a voice through a crowd, are redolent of Naples. Hear the Suite from "Pulcinella," as eighteenth-century pages re[illegible] and revived—and the listener wonders. Hear it as "Echoes of Naples," as old titles used to go—and hear also Stravinsky as pungent of the soil as in his Russian days.

Repeated between rounds of applause for music and violinist, Dohnányi's Concerto, in spite of the occasional Brahmsian [illegible] seemed to hark back to the model of Beethoven when he obliged his friend Clementi with such a piece. In it that excellent violinist presumably ran the gamut of his prowess. In abilities, Mr. Spalding probably lags not a whit behind; while the contriving Dohnányi has omitted nothing to extend and test them from the sharpest leap of a cadenza to the softenest euphony with clarinet or horn. Superlative tennis, "transcendental" billiards of the violin. For a century and more Beethoven's game has tempted every fiddler. The lion's paw will close and unclose, even upon a virtuoso-piece. Not quite the same are Dohnányi's fingers, spinning his quiet little melodies, twining his lace-work of artifice around them. No wonder he took thought now and then (as in the Scherzo) a saving, spicing Hungarian rhythm. H. T. P.

TRANS-DEC [illegible]

CONCERT-CHRONICLE

An Inning for Americans—Mr. Powell's "Negro Rhapsody," Mr. Mason's "Prelude and Fugue" for Novel Numbers from the Symphony Orchestra — Mme. Gauthier to Return Well Stocked—Wagner and Mr. Mollenhauer

AS soloist at the Symphony Concerts of this week John Powell proffers two pieces new to Boston—his own "Negro Rhadsody" and Daniel Gregory Mason's Prelude and Fugue, both for piano and orchestra. Few titles seem more self-explanatory than that prefixed by Mr. Powell to this, the first of his larger compositions to be heard here. Yet in the piece is ample [illegible] for the [illegible] commentator, and [illegible] poser's friend, Richard Brookwell, has prepared a lengthy analysis, reproduced in the programme-book of the Philharmonic Society of New York on the occasion of its performance of the Rhapsody. According to Mr. Brookwell, Mr. Powell is here concerned not with the mere writing of a fantasy on negro tunes, but rather with the expression in music of the dominant traits and characteristics of the black man, before civilization had touched and changed him—his terror in the face of mysterious and incomprehensible forces, his spontaneous, almost child-like humor, and his religious instinct that ranges from faith to frenzy.

The Rhapsody begins with a cry, the wailing utterances of an oppressed people. After these lamenting measures the piano introduces a dance-motive that is to reappear in prominence in the Finale. The second section, of more lyrical mood, is based on the familiar "spiritual" "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" and a tune of similar origin, "I Want To Be Ready," is employed in the final division of the piece. Mr. Brookwell's explanation and analysis is far too long for full quotation here, yet for the light it throws on Mr. Powell's intentions the last of it may well bear reprinting.

> The fundamental motive of this tune ("I Want to Be Ready") is used to develop in the orchestra a powerful climax, at the height of which the piano announces the full theme. The theme is developed by the different choirs of the orchestra, the rhythms getting wilder and the harmony more suggestive, until the music culminates in the frenetic and barbarous announcement of the dance-motive on the piano, revealing the fanatic frenzy of the Voodoo orgy, which degenerates into a maniac licentiousness. The flood of madness is interrupted for a moment by the "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot" theme, which is, however, incapable of maintaining itself and is overwhelmed in a flood of primal sensuality. The Rhapsody closes with a shriek from the brass, accompanied by a tempestuous glissando streaming up the full range of the piano.

For the Prelude and Fugue Mr. Mason may best be his own herald through the following note that he contributed a year ago to the programme-book of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra:

> A detailed thematic analysis is hardly necessary to anyone disposed to listen sympathetically; but my reason for choosing the time-honored form of the prelude and fugue may be of interest. "While nothing is more deadly than a fugue treated in a purely academic spirit, it has always seemed to me that in itself the fugue is one of the most moving and beautiful of all forms, since it is in its very essence melody, all melody, and nothing but melody. Therefore, caring as little as I do for pictorial suggestion in music, and much for intensity of subjective emotion and for plastic beauty, the impossibility of associating any kind of "programme" with such a form attracted rather than repelled me, while its rich suggestiveness to the purely musical imagination tempted me to try its application to a modern idiom.

The Prelude and Fugue were begun at Pittsfield in the summer of 1919 and were finished at Norfolk, Conn., a year later. The Prelude opens with a broad theme hovering in tonality between A minor and B flat major, and played in octaves by strings and low woodwind. This theme dominates both sections of the piece. It serves as framework for the main subject of the Fugue, "exposed" by the piano, and at the end it is triumphantly asserted by the brass against elaborate counterpoint in the rest of the orchestra. The mood of the Prelude is predominantly dignified, almost sombre; the Fugue, essentially free in construction, passes through episodes of contrasting character, and the end is animated. Throughout the piece the piano is treated less as a solo instrument in the accepted sense than as an integral part of the orchestra. Definitely this Prelude and Fugue, though difficult enough for the pianist, may not be called a "virtuoso-piece." W. S. S.

When Mr. Monteux and the Symphony Orchestra go to New York next week, he is setting on his programmes the two novel pieces that have lately interested audiences at home—Bax's tone-poem, "November Woods," and the Suite, played last week, from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella."

TRANS. DEC. 28.

The reactionaries in the audiences of the Boston symphony concerts will rejoice this week in the fact that a symphony by Haydn will be played, and the younger generation, irreverent toward "old fogies," may find pleasure in the honest and refreshing music written by Haydn for London. A charming suite from Lalo's ballet "Noumana" will be played. This has indirectly a local interest. When the ballet was produced in Paris (1882) the chief dancer was Rita Sangalli.

Mlle. Sangalli came to the United States to dance in "The Black Crook" when it was produced at Niblo's Garden, New York, Sept. 12, 1866. In 1868 she danced at the Olympic, New York, when "Humpty Dumpty" was produced with George L. Fox, clown. She danced in Boston (1867-68) in a revival of "The Black Crook" at the Continental Theatre, also in "Cinderella" and "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Here and in New York she was thought to be a "superbly voluptuous" dancer, but in the late '70's, when she was leading dancer at the Paris Opera, she was described as "a vigorous and intrepid ballerina, accurate and forcible, but somewhat lacking in charm." She died in 1909.

Two pieces on the program will be heard here for the first time, although they have been performed in other cities: D. G. Mason's Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra and John Powell's "Negro Rhapsody" for piano and orchestra. Mr. Powell of Richmond, Va., who has given recitals in Boston, will be the pianist.

HERALD-DEC. 28

N[illegible] will make its month[illegible] York and other cities southward. When it resumes concerts at home on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 12 and 13, Marcel Dupré, the noted organist from Notre Dame de Paris, will be the "assisting artist," playing the solo-part in a Concerto of Bach and an arrangement for orchestra of Franck's Second Chorale. The other items of the programme are Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes."

TRANS-DEC. 29.

POWELL PLEASES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Plays Own Rhapsody and D. G. Mason's Fugue

John Powell chose to play as soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert two American compositions not previously heard here, his own "Negro Rhapsody" and Daniel Gregory Mason's Prelude and Fugue, both written for solo pianoforte and orchestra. His performance was creditable if not brilliant. What was lacking in it was delicacy and beauty of tone. The applause was, as too often at these concerts, more polite than cordial.

Mr Powell's rhapsody makes vivid and effective use of negro tunes and rhythms. The finesse of Ravel and Rimsky Korsakov is lacking, but one felt in this music more emotional honesty and directness than one commonly feels in their work. This piece ought to prove popular with audiences, since it is at once good and easily intelligible music.

Mr Mason's fugue has an original if not especially distinctive subject, which is foreshadowed in the prelude and handled throughout with what seemed to a cursory listener considerable ingenuity. What is more, parts of the music had an emotional power, which compelled respect and attention from one too apt to let his mind wander while new American music is being performed.

Either of these American pieces seemed distinctly superior in every way to the excerpts from Lalo's ballet "Namouna," which Mr Monteux tried to resurrect. This music was avowedly hack work, which did not in its day achieve any particular success even as such in Paris. It would be unfair to judge the composer of the "Symphonie Espagnole" and "Le Roi d'Ys" by it. The themes are laboriously trivial, the instrumentation clumsy, the total effect inept. A brilliant performance was warmly applauded.

Haydn's symphony in B flat (B and H No. 12) seemed to a listener with a weakness for the 18th century the freshest and most charming music played yesterday. The first allegro was played too fast, and the finale a bit too slow but otherwise the performance was commendably tactful and superficially brilliant.

This music suggested the general reflection on almost everything composed since Schubert that it is strange that those who cannot achieve what Beethoven and Bach and Wagner achieved will so seldom even attempt to write simple, tuneful imaginative light music, sprightlty without being vulgar, like Haydn.

There are no Symphony concerts next week. Jan 12 and 13, Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, in Paris, will play a Bach concerto and Franck's B minor chorale. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" are the other numbers announced.

GLOBE-DEC 30.

Symphony Plays Two Novel Works

John Powell, pianist, was soloist at yesterday's Symphony Concert. He played a piece of his own composition and also a piece by Daniel Gregory Mason. Mr. Mason's "Prelude and Fugue" was played for the first time in Boston. It is extremely modern in manner. The Powell piece was also given for the first time here. The two pieces are strongly contrasting, the rather quiet beauty of the Mason work against the wild tenor of Powell's "Rhapsodie Negre."

Lalo's suite from the ballet "Namouna," played by the full orchestra, is a piece of remarkable charm. In one movement there is a piquant flute solo, which was played admirably by Georges Laurent.

Haydn's Symphony in B-flat completes the program, which will be repeated tonight.

ADVTSR-DEC. 30

10TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Works of Two American Composers on Program with Haydn and Lalo

JOHN POWELL PLAYS HIS OWN PIANO PIECE

By PHILIP HALE

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony, B flat major (B. & H., No. 12); D. G. Mason, prelude and fugue for piano and orchestra (first time [illegible]) [illegible] from the ballet "Numouna"; Powell, Rhapsodie Negre, for orchestra and piano (first time); John Powell was the pianist.

The names of two Americans were on the program. Mr. Mason was born in Brookline; Mr. Powell was born at Richmond, Va. Mr. Mason's prelude and fugue were performed at Chicago on March 4, 1921. Mr. Powell's rhapsody was first played in New York on March 23, 1918. Mr. Mason, composer, writer about music and musicians, is a professor at Columbia University. Mr. Powell, composer, a man of varied interests, leads the life of a wandering virtuoso.

There is no need of a Plutarchian comparison, even if it were possible; as composers, the men of the pieces played yesterday are disparates.

Mr. Mason has said that a fugue treated in a purely academic spirit is deadly; but the fugue, "one of the most moving and beautiful of all forms, since it is in its very essence melody, all melody, and nothing but melody," this form, richly suggestive to the purely musical imagination, tempted him to try its application to a modern idiom.

The success of a praise-worth endeavor in this field depends on the presence or lack of imagination in the composer. Mr. Mason says he cares "little for pictorial suggestion in music and much for intensity of subjective emotion and for plastic beauty."

With the best will in the world, we found little or no imagination, intensity of subjective emotion or plastic beauty in this prelude and fugue; no objective emotion; no obvious beauty of the sort that makes an appeal for the moment and is quickly forgotten. We have heard music by Mr. Mason in which the qualities he named were much more in evidence. Therefore, the greater the disappointment yesterday. Perhaps this disappointment was only another instance of imperfect sympathy. Mr. Powell evidently enjoyed the music. He applauded Mr. Mason; Mr. Mason applauded him and the orchestra; Mr. Monteaux stood by smiling. So everything was for the best in the best of possible worlds.

The program book published a rhapsodic explanation of Mr. Powell's composition. The author, Mr. Brockwell, succeeded in getting "tuskless, clawless man," "mysterious, incomprehensible physical forces," "tragic protest against fate" and "pathetic resignation to the inevitable" all in one sentence. Some years ago, when western statesmen wore leg-boots, the test of oratory among their constituents was the ability to get "eagle" and "bugle" in the final sentence of the peroration. It would appear from Mr. Brockwell's argument that Mr. Powell has attempted "to synthetize" all the negro's characteristics and "present them in a form of organic unity." Mr. Brockwell also says that towards the close the "Sweet Chariot" theme is "overwhelmed in a flood of primal sensuality." An old Frenchman exclaimed: "How many things there are in a minuet!" It seems then that Mr. Powell's rhapsodie is ethonological, chronological, sociological, and all the other "icals." We regret to say we found it only interesting music, now plaintive, now wildly and pleasingly barbaric; music showing no foreign influence, music that has decided individuality.

How beautifully Hadyn's symphony was played! The opening largo and the adagio were most euphonious, while in the rapid movements there was remarkable delicacy in the lighter measures and in the sturdier a sonority that was never forced. It was a pleasure to hear Lalo's ballet music again, with the famous flute solo played so nimbly and skilfully, always with rich tonal quality, by the admirable Mr. Laurent. And to think that this music was flouted when it was first heard! Yes there were brave Frenchmen before Debussy, Ravel, Florent, Schmitt, and "The Six" (now "The Five").

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. The program for Jan. 12-13 is as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Bach, Concerto, D minor, for strings and organ; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Franck-Goodrich, organ Chorale No. 2, B minor; Liszt, "The Preludes." Marcel Dupre will be the organist.

HERALD. DEC. 30

PLAYS OWN WORK WITH SYMPHONY

Powell Also Soloist in Mason's Prelude and Fugue

BY OLIN DOWNES

The programme of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, had several features of uncommon interest, not the least of which were two compositions for piano and orchestra not known in Boston, and performed with the assistance of John Powell, pianist and composer of his own "Rhapsody Negre," which concluded the concert.

CALL FOR COMPOSER

Daniel Gregory Mason's Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra was also performed here for the first time, when the composer was called to his feet by the audience [illegible] Lalo's delight[illegible] [illegible] and Haydn's [illegible] N. No 12), a work [illegible]inality and inspiration, [illegible] composed in 1793 or 1795, completed the occasion.

It is very hard to put oneself into the past when it comes to the contemplation of what are evidently masterpieces. It is difficult, for example, to understand how any audience, least of all a French audience, could have found fault with and covered with mud the composer of the music for "Namouna." It is French music to the last note, to the smallest detail, and it is so well done that the most ordinary and casual phrase becomes distinctive. The score has a delicate exoticism which never bores the hearer and the orchestration is as simple as it is individual and enchanting.

Too Seldom Played

This music followed the symphony of Haydn and the new work of Mason. For some reason the Haydn symphony heard yesterday is too seldom played. [illegible] movement is merely conventional [illegible] excepts the occasional blaring tuttis of the opening allegro, and these are more than recompensed for by the sudden and ingenious modulations, the constant happy strokes of humor in which the movement abounds.

There is now and again a Beethovenish vigor, a sharp [illegible] of statement with which Haydn is not always credited. The slow movement is a gem of melodic inspiration and of the most perfect style. The minuet delights one by its wit, by the felicitous instrumentation and the unexpected turns given certain phrases, and the finale laughs—how it laughs—at the whole world.

Mr. Powell's Rhapsody—why a work by an American should carry the French title of "Rhapsodie Negre" we fail to discern—this Rhapsody is a most exciting and colorful composition. It may be virtuotistic, coloristic, realistic, any other "istic." It lives. There is in the lowering introduction the savor of the jungle, there is mounting, delirious frenzy. The orchestration becomes deliberately noisy and shrill. The glockenspiel, muted horns and what not enhance the effect of emotion which is exceedingly unrefined and primal in character.

Contrasted with this mood is that of the tenderness and pathos of certain "spirituals" which Mr. Powell uses without direct quotation, in a manner of his own. In them is wistfulness, melancholy, an age-long regret. Moreover, they are cunningly placed. They establish needed points of repose, and it may here be said that although Mr. Powell has written a whirlwind of a finale, it never runs away with the composer and it never ran away with the pianist. He rode surely and confidently the storm.

True to the Negro

This music, of which Mr. Powell gave a superb performance, serves to us genuinely Negroid—the Negro as seen and known by an American with Southern blood in his veins. In certain places there is felt tropical grace and languor. And this much is certain: however one's estimate of the value of the music is in the future revised, up or down, a superb virtuoso piece for piano and orchestra has been added to the repertory. And what a pleasure to encounter one of the very few American composers who can write without unction or in the pontifical manner!

Both Warmly Applauded

Both Mr. Powell and Mr. Mason—particularly Mr. Mason—were very warmly applauded. As a reviewer expected to state as honestly and clearly as possible his personal reactions, and as one who has never felt particularly sympathetic to Mr. Mason's music, we can only state our realization of moments of grave beauty in the prelude, and emotional intention as well as firmly knit structure in his fugue. But this is all we can honestly say about it. With all its ingenuity the fugue does not feel to us organic. The thought may be continuous, the feeling does not seem to be so, at least at first hearing. And then—why a piano? Is the piano a tone-color required by this score? Much of the time it is doubling the orchestral voices, and when it is doing counterpoint this counterpoint might just as well be given to other instruments.

The reader and listener will decide these things for himself. Impressions, and compositions too, depend a tremendous lot on temperament. Mr. Mason, who was present, rose to acknowledge the applause of the audience.

POS-DEC. 30

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony Hall will be Marcel Dupre, the French organist and composer, who is visiting America for the first time. These concerts will be given a week from next Friday and Saturday, as the orchestra is to be on tour the coming week.

AMER. DEC 30

ELL IN TWO ROLES AT SYMPHONY

John Powell, pianist and composer, appeared with the Symphony with great success in each of the aforementioned capacities. For the first of his two appearances with the orchestra, Mr. Powell played the Prelude and (Fugue) for pianoforte and orchestra by Daniel Gregory Mason, formerly of Brookline, and now living in New York. Mr. Mason was in the audience to share honors with Mr. Monteux and Mr Powell.

For the music, it can be said that it is decidedly academic with some very beautiful orchestration. If there had been less volume on the part of the orchestra, the music for the pianoforte would have stood out more vividly than it did.

The rhapsodie Negre for orchestra and pianoforte by John Powell was played for the first time in Boston with the composer at the piano. The rhapsodie is full of old Southern melodies, notably "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," and "I Want to Be Ready." Were it not for the fact that it is impossible to picture any one else at the piano other than Mr. Powell, it would be delightful to hear it again soon, but it is one of those things that seem essentially for the composer's own rendition. The audience was very enthusiastic over it.

Mr. Monteux chose for the symphony the Haydn in B-flat major and its four charming movements pleased the house greatly.

The suite from the Ballet "Namouna," by Lalo, completed the program. The music is tuneful and the sort that you remember with joy the next time you have an opportunity of hearing. It provided a solo for Mr. Laurent and his flute. He played as beautifully as he always does, which is superlative praise. The concert will be repeated tonight.

AMER. DEC. 30

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony hall will be Marcel Dupre, French organist and composer, who is visiting America for the first time. He will appear with the orchestra in Bach's organ concerto in D minor and the second chorale of Cesar Franck as arranged by Wallace Goodrich. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

This pair of concerts will be given a week from Friday and Saturday, since the orchestra is to be on tour the coming week.

TRAV. DEC. 30.

Symphony

SYMPHONY CONCERT

LALO, HAYDN, TWO AMERICANS AND CONTRASTS

The Suite from "Namouna" for Lasting Choiceness and Fineness—Mr. Mason's Music of the Diligent Mind—Mr. Powell's Singular Excursion in a "Negro Rhapsody"—Pianist as Well as Composer

NOT every composer bears a centenary well. Too often when the hundredth anniversary of this man's birth or that man's death outspreads his music anew, the hearer is quicker to perceive shortcomings and limitations than merits and distinctions. As an article printed elsewhere in this paper notes, Edouard Lalo was born on Jan. 27, 1823. A month hence mild and modest commemoration will be in order through France and Belgium. Mindful and forehanded, Mr. Monteux may therefore have set out the Suite from Lalo's ballet, "Namouna," for his audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Yet in itself the music altogether deserved repetition; out-[illegible] all else upon the programme. Not too often do suites of dances gain place at symphony concerts. When they do, the perdurable ancients, like Lully, Rameau, Gluck or the valiant moderns, like Ravel, Stravinsky, de Falla, usually yield them. Betwixt and between stretches a waste save only for the oases of Delibes in "Sylvia" and "Coppélia," of Massenet in "Le Cid." Halting-places are these, however, for "popular" concerts only. Nowhere, but in the "Namouna" of Lalo may a full-blown [illegible] concert rest and enjoy. Too [illegible] the opportunity. Not since [illegible] this set of dances [illegible] Berlioz, is favorite with German conductors.

Quite possibly, in or out of "Namouna," Lalo needs no other favor than his own deserts. As he assorted the Suite, he begins with a Prelude, originally linking a prologue to the full body of the ballet. A simpler music in substance it were hard to imagine. Yet upon it Lalo pours riches of rhythm, modulation, harmonic and instrumental color until it holds ear and fancy fast and fascinated. A Russian, like Rimsky, might hardly do more in such fashion; while Lalo's means seem more sensitive and adroit. Of the theatre, too, sounds the music. Hearing, the listener anticipates ballet of picture, ballet of fantasy. A Serenade ensues—the strings plucked, the harps throbbing. Lalo uses his orchestra like a single instrument; upon it he plays his music of amorous night. Illusion pulses; skill is voice to charm; the listener feels the sensibility, the choiceness intrinsic in Lalo. Here is no mere Serenade, convenience of the theatre. Rather come night-vision, night-fancy.

Yet dancers must dance, even when composers are poetising. Mademoiselle Sangalli, at the Opera in Paris, Anno Domini, 1882, was not to be deprived of her Theme and Variations. Lalo writes them, but not in the underscored rhythms, the calculated contrasts, the orchestral clatter of ballet-music à la Meyerbeer or à la Massenet. He keeps his measures in light flow; the variations pass and repass like flights of fancy; a soft chord touches the ear as upon eye may fall the feet of a dancer. Thereafter another sort of ballet-music—the inevitable tone-picturing. In "Namouna" there is a "midway," as we Americans might say—a fair of booths, side-shows and the like. An ultra-modernist, says Stravinsky, would have sought and gained the rude din, the rough coat of the commingled sounds. Lalo, being of another temperament, is more fastidious. For a little he hears rattle all about him; then he isolates a single booth—the booth of a dreamer. Out of it ascends a flute as in aerial fantasy—the more aerial yesterday for Mr. Laurent's feathery tone, shining, circling, unbroken as flight of bird. What strange, rare "show" passed and repassed to such music? Surely one altogether out of Lalo's idealizing imagination. Nay, even when he must plunge again into the fair, the whole fair and nothing but the fair, he graces the keen dance-tune, with the smoothing horns. No doubt these aristocrats of music like Lalo have limitations; but choiceness and fineness somehow endure—even through centenaries.

Beside this Frenchman, beside Haydn in a semi-familiar Symphony, the plentiful Americans of the day cut none too good figure. The first was Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason in a Prelude and Fugue for Piano and Orchestra; the second, Mr. Powell, composer as well as pianist through his own "Negro Rhapsody." By taking thought and also pains, Mr. Mason seemingly wrote his music. He devised motivs, since they give no sign of birth from meditation become emotion. He studied them, fructified them, set them to paper, developed, contrasted, mated and parted them within the chosen form. Yet nowhere does the listener share the creative impulse. Rather in his ear sounds creative calculation. Mr. Mason manipulates with care his orchestral voices; diligently and variously assorts his piano with them. Yet not a play of harmony or timbre seems instinctive, imperative, stroke of imagination. Rather, all is methodical. Similarly with modulation, transition, pace, progress—always deliberation and the rules, never fervors and freedom. The mind—and nothing but the mind—answers to such music of will and mental process. Answering, it catalogues merit and demerit, because it receives no other impetus. Warm himself, Mr. Mason has been known to warm his hearers. In this Prelude and Fugue, he sits at his study-table. Late and laborious is the hour; chilly the atmosphere.

In other case was Mr. Powell minded to make a "Negro Rhapsody" likewise for Piano and Orchestra. In the South he was born; in the South he dwells, studious of the black-folk about him. Background, as the phrase goes, he has plentifully, discriminatingly. It yields him distinctive and viable motivs from negro folk-tunes. It enables him to write music of curious insight into negro trait and instinct, to achieve a sort of psychological essay in tones that the listener hears as though it were read aloud.

Yet as music and nothing else the Rhapsody is well designed, well conducted. Aptitude devised it; intelligence shaped [illegible] skill permeates it. No more does it lack the mood, the emotion, essential to [illegible] as communicative means and force. There is no mistaking Mr. Powell whether his hymn-time ascends from camp-meeting or his dance beats shrill from Voodoo rite; whether his blacks are plaintive with melancholy or orgiastic with bestial heats. How well schemed, well accomplished says the appraising mind. What singular and effective usage of music to associate and define the ways and impulses (according to Mr. Powell) of a race closely studied.

None the less the Negro Rhapsody leaves the hearer on the side-lines. Never once does it plunge him into a game that Mr. Powell surely intended to be exciting. It was kin to his playing, alike in Mr. Mason's and in his own piece. To the very lighting of the kindling spark it went; but the flame neither brightened nor warmed. Good old father Haydn, who never suspected psychologies, even if music-making had left him time for them, may be no more than rush-light in intent. But in deed through the Symphony of yesterday he burned steady, clear and full.

H. T. P.

TRANS. DEC. 30

Music by Americans on Boston Symphony Program

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Haydn—Symphony in B flat major.
D. G. Mason—Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra, Op. 20.
Lalo—Suite from the ballet "Namouna."
Powell—Rhapsodie Nègre, for piano and orchestra.

Americans had a large share in this program, and justly so. We are accustomed to programs dominated by German, occasionally French and Italian, composers, and yesterday the Americans received only their just due. No conductor of foreign origin could be more open-minded with regard to American music. This, Mr. Monteux has repeatedly shown in the careful interpretations and the frequent performances which he has given music by native composers. And this has never been done as an act of condescension. He has apparently considered this music, as he would consider the music of a composer of any other school or country, from the point of view of its interest and availability for his programs. The fact that American composers are receiving due recognition on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is of supreme importance. That the two pieces played yesterday were not of great interest or worth is a comparatively secondary matter.

Daniel Gregory Mason's Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra is not an ingratiating work. Thickly scored, the pianist (in this case John Powell) has little opportunity to be heard; diffuse, the little which it has to say is lost in the saying; and lastly, the fugal section bears little resemblance to a fugue, save in the opening measures. If there are contrapuntal devices, they are lost in the general incoherency; if there are returns of the theme, they are not apparent, as the theme itself is of so little character. By this we would not imply that freedom of construction is incompatible with the fugal form. Sebastian Bach wrote many fugues, of which scarcely one conforms to the strict rules as laid down by the schoolmen; likewise Handel, yet in no instance are the general characteristics of fugue wanting, and on the score of emotional expressiveness, no one will have the temerity to state that they were lacking.

In Mr. Powell's Rhapsodie there is more to praise and less to condemn than in Mr. Mason's Prelude and Fugue. The opening section and the dance theme create an atmosphere, stimulate the imagination; yet Mr. Powell apparently thinks that the repetition of a phrase or figure constitutes a musical development of it. The originality of treatment of the first theme is lacking in that of the second, which is overdecorated in the style of Thalberg, or Gottschalk (of the "Last Hope"). Here, too, the pianist is often overwhelmed by the orchestra. Nevertheless, these compositions have a right to be heard, and whatever their defects may be, they evidence a serious purpose and for that reason alone they are of interest. It is not unduly chauvinistic to demand a hearing for the American composer, especially when he sets his hand to such serious tasks as these two compositions. Even Beethoven did not always succeed in producing masterpieces, much less many of his successors. It is only by the hearing of his own compositions that the American composer can hope to improve. All credit to Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then, for the encouragement which they are giving to native music.

It has become the fashion to regard Haydn's symphonies with some degree of condescension as music of a bygone time, outmoded, and hopelessly simple and childish. Let us not fall into this error. When played as was that of yesterday afternoon, his symphonies are still capable of giving pleasure even to the most advanced of musical modernists, who might well profit by the examples which they give of simplicity and directness of expression and purity of style.

Lalo's "Namouna" was interesting particularly for the opportunity which it gave Mr. Laurent, the first flute of the orchestra, of displaying his exceptional qualities as a soloist.

S. M.

MONITR - DEC. 30.

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week. Jan 12 and 13 Maral Dupre, organist of Notre Dame in Paris, will play Bach's organ concerto in D minor and Mr Goodrich's arrangement of Franck's second chorale as soloist. M Dupre is one of the most distinguished of the younger French musicians, a composer as well as an extraordinary organist. Mr Monteux has chosen Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" for the purely orchestral numbers.

GLOBE - DEC. 31

SYMP[illegible]

Marcel D[illegible] organist and composer, who is making his first visit to this country, will appear as soloist at the next Symphony concerts. Beethoven' symphony in F major, Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude [illegible] symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," will be the orchestral numbers.

AMER - DEC. 31.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Marcel Dupre, the organist of France, and likewise a composer of note, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concerts a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. The orchestra is to be on tour during the coming week. He will play with the orchestra Bach's organ concerto in D minor and the arrangement by Goodrich of Franck's second chorale. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the eighth symphony of Beethoven in F major, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's symphonic poem "The Preludes."

HERALD - DEC. 31

Symphony Programme

Marcel Dupre, the great organist of France, and likewise a composer of note, who is making his first visit to this country, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, since the orchestra is to be on tour during the coming week.

Dupre will play with the orchestra Bach's Organ Concerto in D minor and the arrangement by Wallace Goodrich of Franck's Second Chorale. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the 8th Symphony of Beethoven in F major, Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Les Preludes."

POST. DEC. 31.

Fortunes of the Ballet "Pulcinella."

The manuscript scores of Stravinsky's Ballet "Pulcinella," from which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform a suite in Carnegie Hall next Saturday, is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form. The production of the "Sacree du Printemps" at the "Concerts Monteux" was notoriously similar in effect to the first production of "Tannhauser" in the same city. Last summer, the composer explained to the conductor in detail the interpretation of "Pulcinella."

The plot of "Pulcinella," Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London in 1920.

WORLD. DEC. 31.

New Stravinsky Composition Dedicated to Mr. Monteux

The manuscript score of Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," from which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform a suite in Carnegie Hall next Saturday, is dedicated to Pierre Monteux. Stravinsky spends much of his time in Paris and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of his works, whether in ballet or concert form. Last summer the composer explained to the conductor in detail the interpretation of "Pulcinella." He unearthed the plot from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is supposed to be based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London, in 1920.

TRIBUNE DEC. 31

THAT annual or semi-annual rite—the playing of a Symphony by Haydn—has been fulfilled at the Symphony Concerts. This time it was in B-flat major—number nine, number twelve, number six, according to the divergent catalogues; but under any numeral "a nice little thing," as the lads of the studios might say. Two audiences—in the calm receptivity of Friday afternoon, in the more alert attention of Saturday evening—heard, enjoyed, applauded. Had Mr. Monteux and the orchestra been setting forth a masterpiece of Beethoven, of Brahms, of symphonic music bye and large, the listening companies could hardly have seemed more gravely pleasured. Is not Haydn a classic, one-hundred-odd years old, respected, revered, venerable—and all those catch-words on the lips and in the ears of convention?

Yet, at the risk of blasphemy, it is possible to believe that Haydn's [illegible] and audience were quite conten[illegible] [illegible] him amusing in [illegible] was well satisfied to be such. The Symphony in question was written for Salomon's concerts in London and first played there about 178[illegible]. The nobility and gentry frequented Salomon plus Haydn; probably "the commonality" also squeezed into the pit. Sir Joshua might have painted any one, two or three of the wigged, brocaded listeners. A plate of Hogarth, softened by fifty years, may serve as mirror for the rest. Hearing, did this company do more than find the slow song "of agreeable sentiment"; the finale "politely gay" in fleetness and contrast; the minuet "smiling and courtly"; the first Allegro "of a pleasant liveliness"—and so on through their eighteenth-century phrases? As they went to their coaches, did they count "Mr." Haydn more than an "excellent good," a "very pleasing," composer? Even so, by the records of the times they chattered and judged; while neither music, nor composer, nor audience, was the worse for such light tempers and tongues. In another day and another place, we, their descendants, listen as grave as owls to that self-same music; purse our mouths into solemn sentences; put to print "scholarly" paragraphs. And in the Elysian Fields—the bet is pennies to pounds—the "excellent good" Papa Haydn is smiling in his sleeve.

H. T. P.

TRANS. JAN. 2.

SYMPHONY WILL PLAY FOR CHILDREN JAN. 16, 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts at 4 o'clock on the afternoons of Jan. 16 and 18 for young persons of Greater Boston. Tickets will be under option to the public schools until Jan. 13. The custom of giving concerts for children was started three years ago and proved very successful.

HERALD - JAN. 4.

When a composer happens to be in Symphony Hall and hears his piece applauded, no doubt he is in a flutter of excitement. Will the conductor point him out, so that he will easily be identified? If the gesture is made, should he bow in three directions? Of course he should applaud the conductor for the performance. He would like to bow from the stage. If his seat is in the first gallery by leaving it before the last measures he can gain the platform in time to answer gratefully, but not obsequiously the call of the public.

HERALD JAN. 4.

The Symphony Orchestra has set its first pair of Young People's Concerts on the afternoons of Tuesday, Jan. 16, and Thursday, Jan. 18, in Symphony Hall. Until Jan. 13, tickets will be at the disposal of the public and the private schools of Boston and vicinity. At both concerts the following pieces will be played:

Overture to the Opera, "Fidelio".....Beethove
Minuet and Finale from the Symphony in E-flat .....Moza
Largo .....Händel-Helmesberge
(Solo Violin: R. Burgin)
The Animals' Carnival.....Saint-Saën
Hungarian Dances (Nos. 5 and 6).....Brahm
Rhapsody, "España" .....Chabrie

TRANS. JAN. 4.

AT the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Monsieur Marcel Dupré, the noted organist from the Church of Notre Dame in Paris will be the "assisting artist," playing the solo-part in a Concerto of Bach and an arrangement for orchestra of Franck's Second Chorale. The other items of the programme are Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes"—all familiar pieces.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge at Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, it will play d'Indy's Trilogy suggested by Schiller's plays about Wallenstein; the Suite (less the Finale) from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella;" the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's "Tristan." Mr. Schroeder of the first desk of the violoncellos will also be heard in Molique's displayful Concerto.

TRANS. JAN. 6.

DUPRE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Next Friday afternoon and evening, Jan. 12 and 13, at Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Marcel Dupre as soloist, will give its next regular pair of symphony concerts.

The celebrated organist of Notre Dame, Paris, will play with the orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and the arrangement for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich of Franck's Second Organ Chorale.

TRAV. JAN. 6.

Young People's Programme

A pair of concerts for young people will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux, its regular conductor, in Symphony Hall on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, Jan. 16 and 18, at 4 o'clock.

All tickets for these concerts will be under option to the public schools of Greater Boston until Jan. 13.

The programme will include Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's symphony in E flat, Handel's Largo, "The Animals' Carnival" by Saint-Saens, two Hungarian Dances of Brahms and Chabrier's "Espana."

Symphony Programme

At the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 12 and 13, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, the celebrated organist of Notre Dame, who is also a composer of note.

This virtuoso will play with the orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor, and Wallace Goodrich's ar-

LE IN TWO ROLES AT SYMPHONY

John Powell, pianist and composer, appeared with the Symphony with great success in each of the aforementioned capacities. For the first of his two appearances with the orchestra, Mr. Powell played the Prelude and (Fugue) for pianoforte and orchestra by Daniel Gregory Mason, formerly of Brookline, and now living in New York. Mr. Mason was in the audience to share honors with Mr. Monteux and Mr Powell.

For the music, it can be said that it is decidedly academic with some very beautiful orchestration. If there had been less volume on the part of the orchestra, the music for the pianoforte would have stood out more vividly than it did.

The rhapsodie Negre for orchestra and pianoforte by John Powell was played for the first time in Boston with the composer at the piano. The rhapsodie is full of old Southern melodies, notably "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," and "I Want to Be Ready." Were it not for the fact that it is impossible to picture any one else at the piano other than Mr. Powell, it would be delightful to hear it again soon, but it is one of those things that seem essentially for the composer's own rendition. The audience was very enthusiastic over it.

Mr. Monteux chose for the symphony the Haydn in B-flat major and its four charming movements pleased the house greatly.

The suite from the Ballet "Namouna," by Lalo, completed the program. The music is tuneful and the sort that you remember with joy the next time you have an opportunity of hearing. It provided a solo for Mr. Laurent and his flute. He played as beautifully as he always does, which is superlative praise. The concert will be repeated tonight.

AMER. DEC. 30

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The soloist at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given at Symphony hall will be Marcel Dupre, French organist and composer, who is visiting America for the first time. He will appear with the orchestra in Bach's organ concerto in D minor and the second chorale of Cesar Franck as arranged by Wallace Goodrich. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F major, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

This pair of concerts will be given a week from Friday and Saturday, since the orchestra is to be on tour the coming week.

TRAV. DEC. 30.

Symphony

SYMPHONY CONCERT

LALO, HAYDN, TWO AMERICANS AND CONTRASTS

The Suite from "Namouna" for Lasting Choiceness and Fineness—Mr. Mason's Music of the Diligent Mind—Mr. Powell's Singular Excursion in a "Negro Rhapsody"—Pianist as Well as Composer

NOT every composer bears a centenary well. Too often when the hundredth anniversary of this man's birth or that man's death outspreads his music anew, the hearer is quicker to perceive shortcomings and limitations than merits and distinctions. As an article printed elsewhere in this paper notes, Edouard Lalo was born on Jan. 27, 1823. A month hence mild and modest commemoration will be in order through France and Belgium. Mindful and forehanded, Mr. Monteux may therefore have set out the Suite from Lalo's ballet, "Namouna," for his audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Yet in itself the music altogether deserved repetition, outshining indeed all else upon the programme. Not too often do suites of dances gain place at symphony concerts. When they do, the perdurable ancients, like Lully, Rameau, Gluck or the valiant moderns, like Ravel, Stravinsky, de Falla, usually yield them. Betwixt and between stretches a waste save only for the oases of Delibes in "Sylvia" and "Coppélia," of Massenet in "Le Cid." Halting-places are these, however, for "popular" concerts only. Nowhere, but at the "Namouna" of Lalo may a full-blown symphony concert rest and enjoy. Too [illegible] comes the opportunity. Not since [illegible] day has this set of dances [illegible]—and as Frenchman like Berlioz, is favorite with German conductors.

Quite possibly, in or out of "Namouna," Lalo needs no other favor than his own deserts. As he assorted the Suite, he begins with a Prelude, originally linking a prologue to the full body of the ballet. A simpler music in substance it were hard to imagine. Yet upon it Lalo pours riches of rhythm, modulation, harmonic and instrumental color until it holds ear and fancy fast and fascinated. A Russian, like Rimsky, might hardly do more in such fashion; while Lalo's means seem more sensitive and adroit. Of the theatre, too, sounds the music. Hearing, the listener anticipates ballet of picture, ballet of fantasy. A Serenade ensues—the strings plucked, the harps throbbing. Lalo uses his orchestra like a single instrument; upon it he plays his music of amorous night. Illusion pulses; skill is voice to charm; the listener feels the sensibility, the choiceness intrinsic in Lalo. Here is no mere Serenade, convenience of the theatre. Rather come night-vision, night-fancy.

Yet dancers must dance, even when composers are poetising. Mademoiselle Sangalli, at the Opéra in Paris, Anno Domini, 1882, was not to be deprived of her Theme and Variations. Lalo writes them, but not in the underscored rhythms, the calculated contrasts, the orchestral clatter of ballet-music à la Meyerbeer or à la Massenet. He keeps his measures in light flow; the variations pass and repass like flights of fancy; a soft chord touches the ear as upon eye may fall the feet of a dancer. Thereafter another sort of ballet-music—the inevitable tone-picturing. In "Namouna" there is a "midway," as we Americans might say—a fair of booths, sideshows and the like. An ultra-modernist, says Stravinsky, would have sought and gained the rude din, the rough coat of the commingled sounds. Lalo, being of another temperament, is more fastidious. For a little he hears rattle all about him; then he isolates a single booth—the booth of a dreamer. Out of it ascends a flute as in aerial fantasy—the more aerial yesterday for Mr. Laurent's feathery tone, shining, circling, unbroken as flight of bird. What strange, rare "show" passed and repassed to such music? Surely one altogether out of Lalo's idealizing imagination. Nay, even when he must plunge again into the fair, the whole fair and nothing but the fair, he graces the keen dance-tune, with the smoothing horns. No doubt these aristocrats of music like Lalo have limitations; but choiceness and fineness somehow endure—even through centenaries.

Beside this Frenchman, beside Haydn in a semi-familiar Symphony, the plentiful Americans of the day cut none too good figure. The first was Mr. Daniel Gregory Mason in a Prelude and Fugue for Piano and Orchestra; the second, Mr. Powell, composer as well as pianist through his own "Negro Rhapsody." By taking thought and also pains, Mr. Mason seemingly wrote his music. He devised motivs, since they give no sign of birth from meditation become emotion. He studied them, fructified them, set them to paper, developed, contrasted, mated and parted them within the chosen form. Yet nowhere does the listener share the creative impulse. Rather in his ear sounds creative calculation. Mr. Mason manipulates with care his orchestral voices; diligently and variously assorts his piano with them. Yet not a play of harmony or timbre seems instinctive, imperative, stroke of imagination. Rather, all is methodical. Similarly with modulation, transition, pace, progress—always deliberation and the rules, never fervors and freedom. The mind—and nothing but the mind—answers to such music of will and mental process. Answering, it catalogues merit and demerit, because it receives no other impetus. Warm himself, Mr. Mason has been known to warm his hearers. In this Prelude and Fugue, he sits at his study-table. Late and laborious is the hour; chilly the atmosphere.

In other case was Mr. Powell minded to make a "Negro Rhapsody" likewise for Piano and Orchestra. In the South he was born; in the South he dwells, studious of the black-folk about him. Background, as the phrase goes, he has plentifully, discriminatingly. It yields him distinctive and viable motivs from negro folk-tunes. It enables him to write music of curious insight into negro trait and instinct, to achieve a sort of psychological essay in tones that the listener hears as though it were read aloud.

Yet as music and nothing else the Rhapsody is well designed, well conducted. Aptitude devised it; intelligence shaped [illegible] skill permeates it. No more does it lack the mood, the emotion, essential to music as communicative means and force. There is no mistaking Mr. Powell whether his hymn-time ascends from camp-meeting or his dance beats shrill from Voodoo rite; whether his blacks are plaintive with melancholy or orgiastic with bestial heats. How well schemed, well accomplished says the appraising mind. What singular and effective usage of music to assort and define the ways and impulses (according to Mr. Powell) of a race closely studied.

None the less the Negro Rhapsody leaves the hearer on the side-lines. Never once does it plunge him into a game that Mr. Powell surely intended to be exciting. It was kin to his playing, alike in Mr. Mason's and in his own piece. To the very lighting of the kindling spark it went; but the flame neither brightened nor warmed. Good old father Haydn, who never suspected psychologies, even if music-making had left him time for them, may be no more than rush-light in intent. But indeed through the Symphony of yesterday he burned steady, clear and full.

H. T. P.

TRANS. DEC. 30.

Music by Americans on Boston Symphony Program

The tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Haydn—Symphony in B flat major.
D. G. Mason—Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra, Op. 20.
Lalo—Suite from the ballet "Namouna."
Powell—Rhapsodie Negre for piano and orchestra.

Americans had a large share in this program, and justly so. We are accustomed to programs dominated by German, occasionally French and Italian, composers, and yesterday the Americans received only their just due. No conductor of foreign origin could be more open-minded with regard to American music. This, Mr. Monteux has repeatedly shown in the careful interpretations and the frequent performances which he has given music by native composers. And this has never been done as an act of condescension. He has apparently considered this music, as he would consider the music of a composer of any other school or country, from the point of view of its interest and availability for his programs. The fact that American composers are receiving due recognition on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is of supreme importance. That the two pieces played yesterday were not of great interest or worth is a comparatively secondary matter.

Daniel Gregory Mason's Prelude and Fugue for piano and orchestra is not an ingratiating work. Thickly scored, the pianist (in this case John Powell) has little opportunity to be heard; diffuse, the little which it has to say is lost in the saying; and lastly, the fugal section bears little resemblance to a fugue, save in the opening measures. If there are contrapuntal devices, they are lost in the general incoherency; if there are returns of the theme, they are not apparent, as the theme itself is of so little character. By this we would not imply that freedom of construction is incompatible with the fugal form. Sebastian Bach wrote many fugues, of which scarcely one conforms to the strict rules as laid down by the schoolmen; likewise Handel, yet in no instance are the general characteristics of fugue wanting, and on the score of emotional expressiveness, no one will have the temerity to state that they were lacking.

In Mr. Powell's Rhapsodie there is more to praise and less to condemn than in Mr. Mason's Prelude and Fugue. The opening section and the dance theme create an atmosphere, stimulate the imagination; yet Mr. Powell apparently thinks that the repetition of a phrase or figure constitutes a musical development of it. The originality of treatment of the first theme is lacking in that of the second, which is overdecorated in the style of Thalberg, or Gottschalk (of the "Last Hope"). Here, too, the pianist is often overwhelmed by the orchestra. Nevertheless, these compositions have a right to be heard, and whatever their defects may be, they evidence a serious purpose and for that reason alone they are of interest. It is not unduly chauvinistic to demand a hearing for the American composer, especially when he sets his hand to such serious tasks as these two compositions. Even Beethoven did not always succeed in producing masterpieces, much less many of his successors. It is only by the hearing of his own compositions that the American composer can hope to improve. All credit to Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, then, for the encouragement which they are giving to native music.

It has become the fashion to regard Haydn's symphonies with some degree of condescension as music of a bygone time, outmoded, and hopelessly simple and childish. Let us not fall into this error. When played as was that of yesterday afternoon, his symphonies are still capable of giving pleasure even to the most advanced of musical modernists, who might well profit by the examples which they give of simplicity and directness of expression and purity of style.

Lalo's "Namouna" was interesting particularly for the opportunity which it gave Mr. Laurent, the first flute of the orchestra, of displaying his exceptional qualities as a soloist.

S. M.

M[illegible]R-DEC. 30.

There are no Boston Symphony concerts this week. Jan 12 and 13 Maral Dupre, organist of Notre Dame in Paris, will play Bach's organ concerto in D minor and Mr Goodrich's arrangement of Franck's second chorale as soloist. M Dupre is one of the most distinguished of the younger French musicians, a composer as well as an extraordinary organist. Mr Monteux has chosen Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Les Preludes" for the purely orchestral numbers.

GLOBE-DEC. 31

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Marcel Dupre, organist and composer, who is making his first visit to this country, will appear as soloist at the next Symphony concerts. Beethoven' symphony in F major, Wagner's "Parsifal" prelude [illegible] symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," will be the orchestral numbers.

AMER-DEC. 31.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Marcel Dupre, the organist of France, and likewise a composer of note, will be the soloist with the Boston Symphony orchestra at the concerts a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. The orchestra is to be on tour during the coming week. He will play with the orchestra Bach's organ concerto in D minor and the arrangement by Goodrich of Franck's second chorale. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the eighth symphony of Beethoven in F major, Wagner's prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's symphonic poem "The Preludes."

HERALD-DEC. 31

Symphony Programme

Marcel Dupre, the great organist of France, and likewise a composer of note, who is making his first visit to this country, will appear as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, which will be given a week from next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, since the orchestra is to be on tour during the coming week.

Dupre will play with the orchestra Bach's Organ Concerto in D minor and the arrangement by Wallace Goodrich of Franck's Second Chorale. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the 8th Symphony of Beethoven in F major, Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's Symphonic Poem "Les Preludes."

POST. DEC. 31.

Fortunes of the Ballet "Pulcinella."

The manuscript scores of Stravinsky's Ballet "Pulcinella," from which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform a suite in Carnegie Hall next Saturday, is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form. The production of the "Sacree du Printemps" at the "Concerts Monteux" was notoriously similar in effect to the first production of "Tannhauser" in the same city. Last summer, the composer explained to the conductor in detail the interpretation of "Pulcinella."

The plot of "Pulcinella," Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London in 1920.

D. DEC. 31.

New Stravinsky Composition Dedicated to Mr. Monteux

The manuscript score of Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," from which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform a suite in Carnegie Hall next Saturday, is dedicated to Pierre Monteux. Stravinsky spends much of his time in Paris and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of his works, whether in ballet or concert form. Last summer the composer explained to the conductor in detail the interpretation of "Pulcinella." He unearthed the plot from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is supposed to be based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London, in 1920.

TRIBUNE DEC.

THAT annual or semi-annual rite—the playing of a Symphony by Haydn—has been fulfilled at the Symphony Concerts. This time it was in B-flat major—number nine, number twelve, number six, according to the divergent catalogues; but under any numeral "a nice little thing," as the lads of the studios might say. Two audiences—in the calm receptivity of Friday afternoon, in the more alert attention of Saturday evening—heard, enjoyed, applauded. Had Mr. Monteux and the orchestra been setting forth a masterpiece of Beethoven, of Brahms, of symphonic music bye and large, the listening companies could hardly have seemed more gravely pleasured. Is not Haydn a classic, one-hundred-odd years old, respected, revered, venerable—and all those catch-words on the lips and in the ears of convention?

Yet, at the risk of blasphemy, it is possible to believe that Haydn's own day and audience were quite content [illegible] him amusing in mus[illegible] he was well satisfied to be such. The Symphony in question was written for Salomon's concerts in London and first played there about 179[illegible]. The nobility and gentry frequented Salomon plus Haydn; probably "the commonality" also squeezed into the pit. Sir Joshua might have painted any one, two or three of the wigged, brocaded listeners. A plate of Hogarth, softened by fifty years, may serve as mirror for the rest. Hearing, did this company do more than find the slow song "of agreeable sentiment"; the finale "politely gay" in fleetness and contrast; the minuet "smiling and courtly"; the first Allegro "of a pleasant liveliness"—and so on through their eighteenth-century phrases? As they went to their coaches, did they count "Mr." Haydn more than an "excellent good," a "very pleasing," composer? Even so, by the records of the times they chattered and judged; while neither music, nor composer, nor audience, was the worse for such light tempers and tongues. In another day, and another place, we, their descendants, listen as grave as owls to that self-same music; purse our mouths into solemn sentences; put to print "scholarly" paragraphs. And in the Elysian Fields—the bet is pennies to pounds—the "excellent good" Papa Haydn is smiling in his sleeve.

H. T. P.

TRANS. JA

SYMPHONY WILL PLAY FOR CHILDREN JAN. 16, 18

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts at 4 o'clock on the afternoons of Jan. 16 and 18 for young persons of Greater Boston. Tickets will be under option to the public schools until Jan. 13. The custom of giving concerts for children was started three years ago and proved very successful.

HERALD-JAN.

When a composer happens to be in Symphony Hall and hears his piece applauded, no doubt he is in a flutter of excitement. Will the conductor point him out, so that he will easily be identified? If the gesture is made, should he bow in three directions? Of course he should applaud the conductor for the performance. He would like to bow from the stage. If his seat is in the first gallery by leaving it before the last measures he can gain the platform in time to answer gratefully, but not obsequiously the call of the public.

HERALD JAN. 1.

The Symphony Orchestra has set its first pair of Young People's Concerts on the afternoons of Tuesday, Jan. 16, and Thursday, Jan. 18, in Symphony Hall. Until Jan. 13, tickets will be at the disposal of the public and the private schools of Boston and vicinity. At both concerts the following pieces will be played:

Overture to the Opera, "Fidelio"	Beethove
Minuet and Finale from the Symphony in E-flat	Moza
Largo (Solo Violin: R. Burgin)	Händel-Helmesberge
The Animals' Carnival	Saint-Saën
Hungarian Dances (Nos. 5 and 6)	Brahm
Rhapsody, "España"	Chabri

TRANS.

AT the Symphony Concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Monsieur Marcel Dupré, the noted organist from the Church of Notre Dame in Paris will be the "assisting artist," playing the solo-part in a Concerto of Bach and an arrangement for orchestra of Franck's Second Chorale. The other items of the programme are Beethoven's Eighth Symphony; the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" and Liszt's tone-poem, "Preludes"—all familiar pieces.

At the concert of the Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge at Sanders Theatre next Thursday evening, it will play d'Indy's Trilogy suggested by Schiller's plays about Wallenstein; the Suite (less the Finale) from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella;" the Prelude and Closing Scene from Wagner's "Tristan." Mr. Schroeder of the first desk of the violoncellos will also be heard in Molique's displayful Concerto.

TRAN

DUPRE SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Next Friday afternoon and evening, Jan. 12 and 13, at Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Marcel Dupre as soloist, will give its next regular pair of symphony concerts.

The celebrated organist of Notre Dame, Paris, will play with the orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and the arrangement for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich of Franck's Second Organ Chorale.

TRAV-

Young People's Programme

A pair of concerts for young people will be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux, its regular conductor, in Symphony Hall on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, Jan. 16 and 18, at 4 o'clock.

All tickets for these concerts will be under option to the public schools of Greater Boston until Jan. 13.

The programme will include Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio," the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's symphony in E flat, Handel's Largo, "The Animals' Carnival" by Saint-Saens, two Hungarian Dances of Brahms and Chabrier's "Espana."

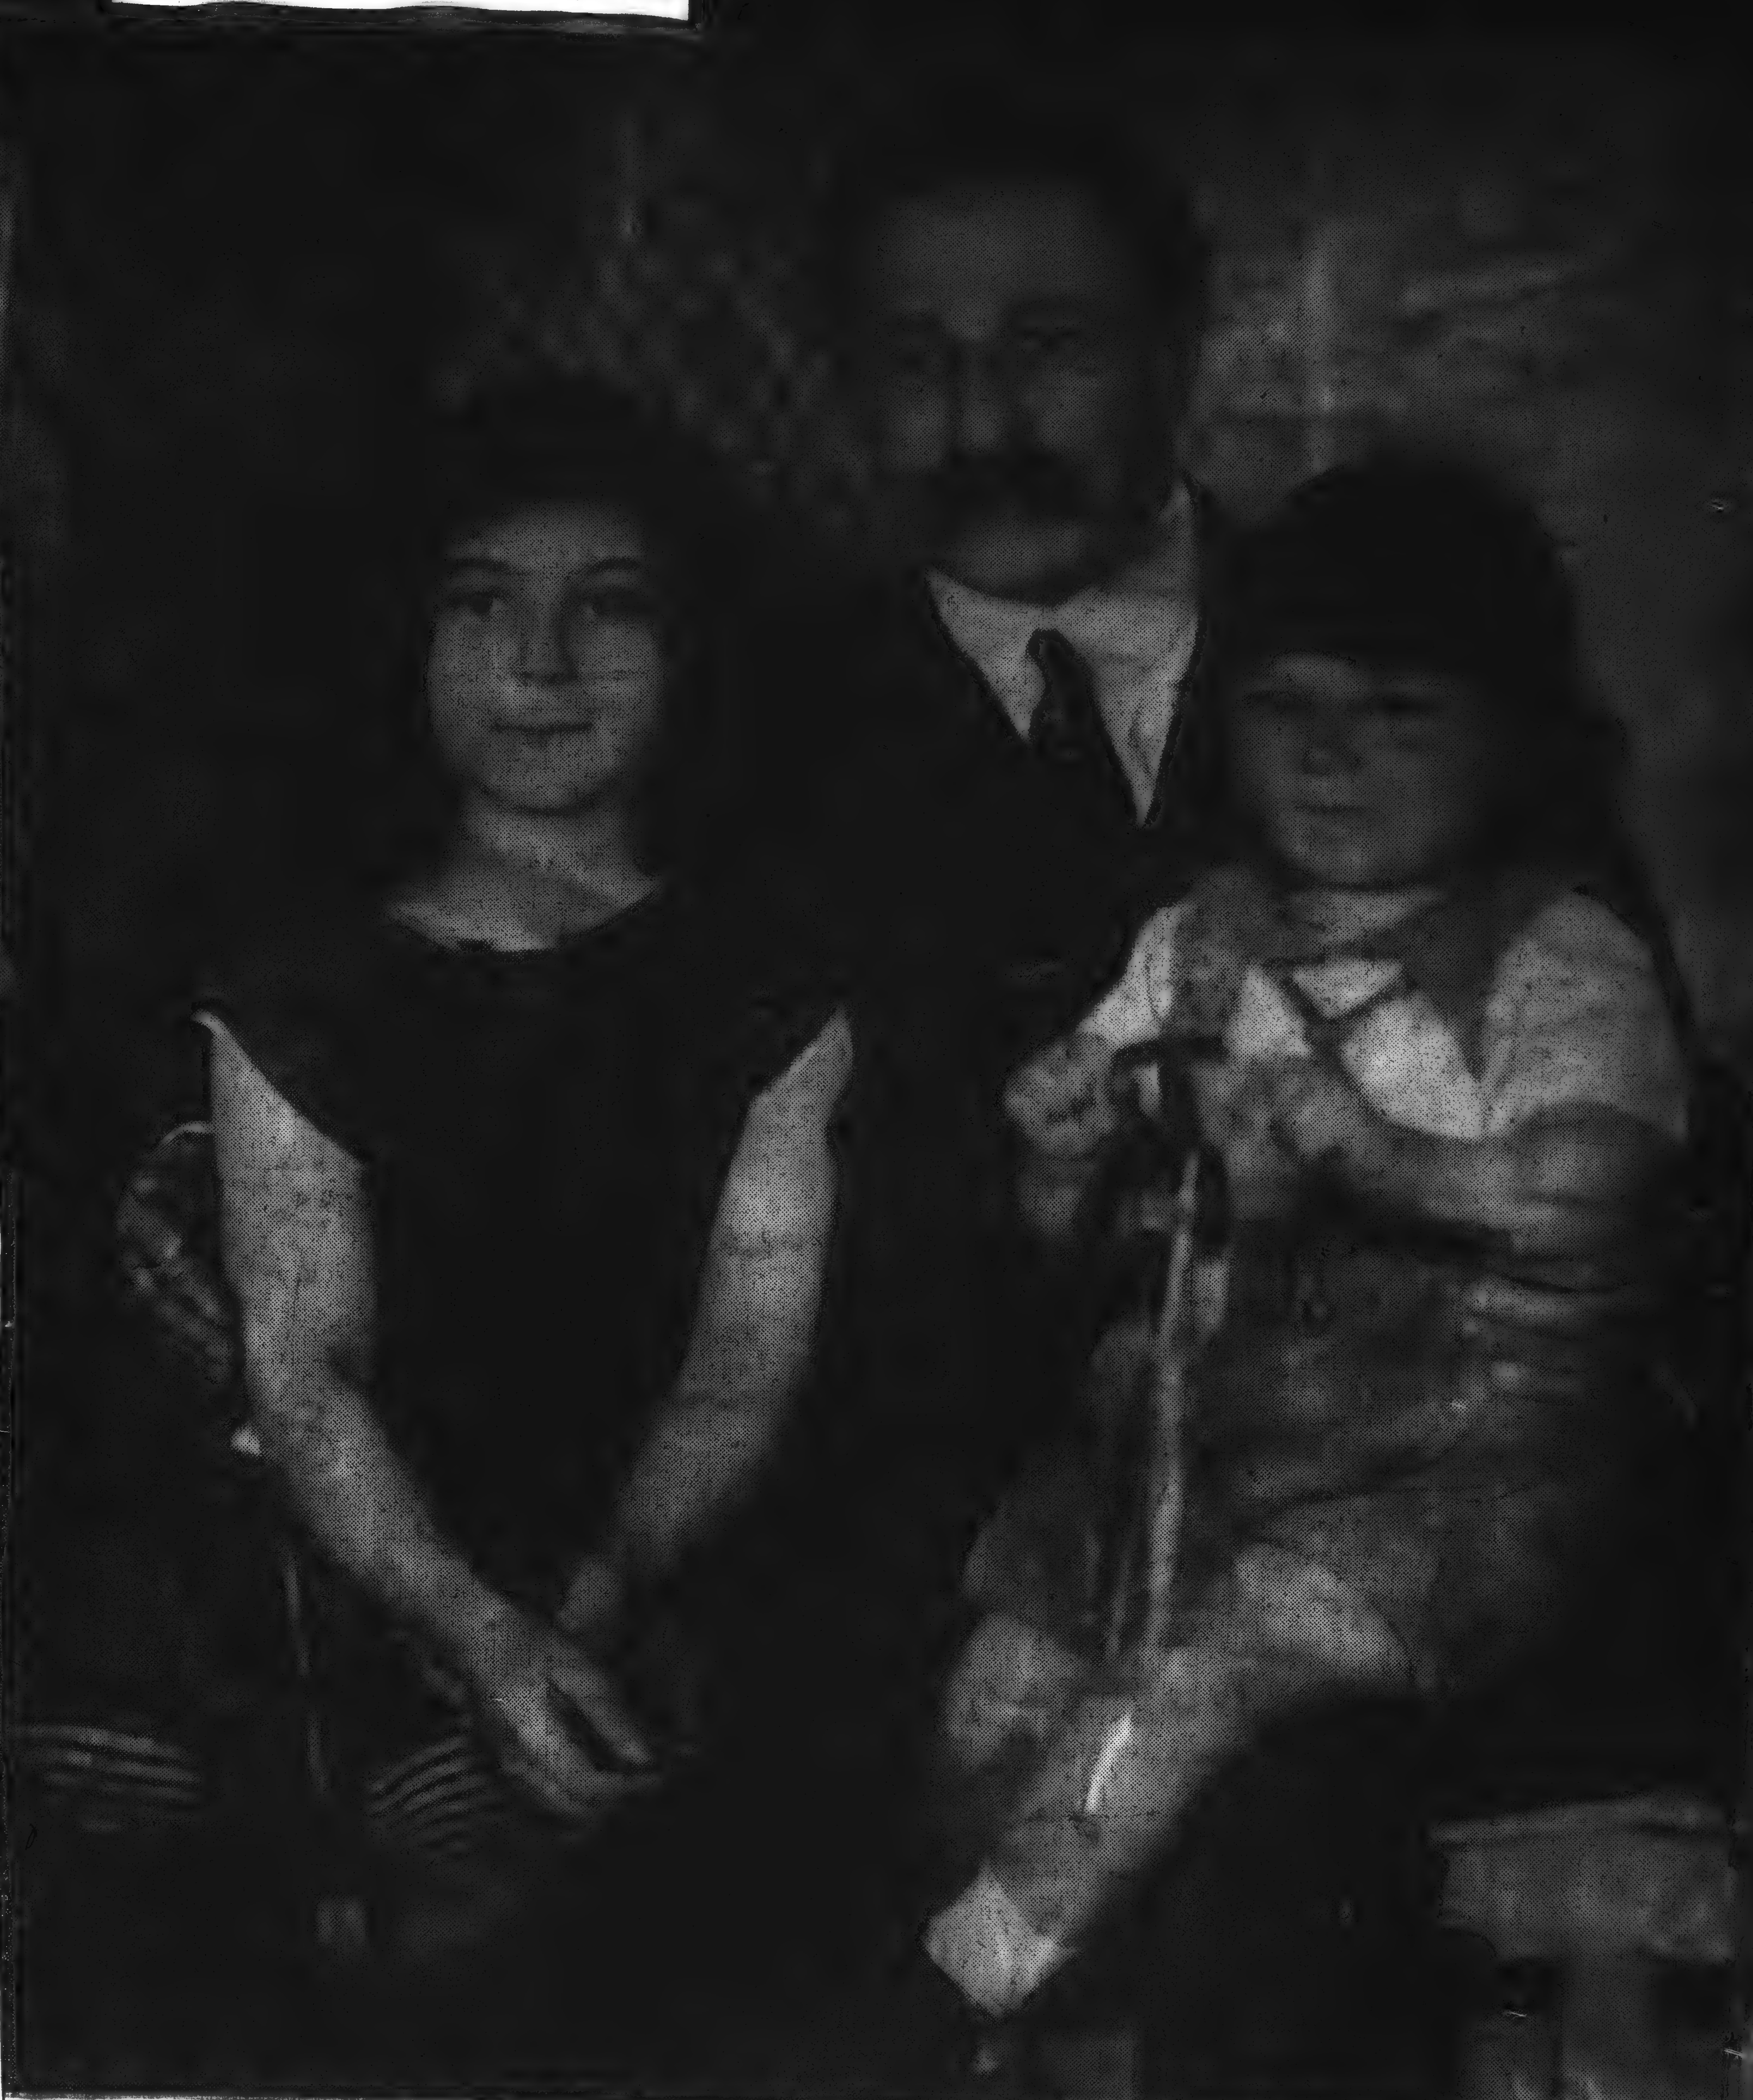
Symphony Programme

At the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 12 and 13, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, the celebrated organist of Notre Dame, who is also a composer of note.

This virtuoso will play with the orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor, and Wallace Goodrich's ar-

[47]

INFORMATION OBSCURED



Conductor Monteux and His Children (at Left)

This is the very latest picture of the well-known conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, with his children, Claude and Denise. Many of Mr. Monteux's Boston friends have supposed that the boy, Claude, was named after the famous Claude Debussy, but this is a mistake, since he was named for his grandfather. (Photo by Alfred Brown of Brookline)

...ngement for organ and orchestra of Franck's second organ chorale.
Pierre Monteux will also conduct the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven in F major, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

POST-JAN. 7.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, Paris, who is also a composer of note. He will play with orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of Franck's second organ chorale. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the eighth symphony of Beethoven, the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

AMER-JAN 7.

YOUNG PEOPLE PROGRAM

A pair of concerts for young people will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, in Symphony hall on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, Jan. 16 and 18, at 3 o'clock. All tickets for these concerts will be under option to the public schools of Greater Boston until the 13th. The program will include Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Handel's Largo, "The Animals' Carnival," by Saint-Saens, two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Chabrier's "Espana."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, and composer. This fine virtuoso will play with the orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and Goodrich's arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Second Organ Chorale. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Preludes."

HERALD-JAN 7.

AGAIN the Boston Orchestra has played in New York—at two concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of last week and again the reviewers have renewed the praise bestowed upon it a month ago. "A larger audience than was present in Carnegie Hall last evening," writes Mr. Aldrich in The Times of Friday, "was merited by the excellent performance given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. The orchestra has made great progress lately in the improvement of its tone and its technical finish in the breadth and beauty of its performances; and though one or two technical slips marred its playing last evening, this was on the whole on a high plane of excellence. . . . Mozart's sympphony [in E flat] was played with spirit and in the main with finish. Strauss's vast tone poem, ['Don Quixote'] with its cross mixture of high-erected chivalrous eloquence, its ironical mockery of the same, its fantasticalities and its stupid realisms, received an interpretation so flexible as to show an easy mastery of its once formidable complications. Bax's new piece, 'November Woods,' was played with a splendid energy by the orchestra and with what may be assumed to be a full realization of the richly elaborated orchestral fabric of the composer's imagination."

"Like-minded in degree is Mr. Henderson, reviewer for The New York Herald: "The music [Bax's tone-poem] was excellently played by the Bostonians. Mr. Monteux has brought his orchestra once more to a high level of technical proficiency and although the performance of Mozart's familiar symphonoy had no special claims to consideration it was commendable and chastely classic in style. Mr. Monteux had his customary contest with the audience about beginning. He waits for perfect silence and has much difficulty in obtaining it. In this city concert audiences do not habitually become still until after the orchestra begins. In Boston they hold their breath till the opening notes are sounded."

In turn, Mr. Taylor in The World pays Mr. Monteux a just compliment for his choice of novel music. "The conductor," he says, "has an undeniable knack of picking up interesting new music for his orchestra. Last year two of the novelties he played, Szymanowski's symphony and Loeffler's three Irish songs with orchestra, were music of the first rank. Now in Bax's 'November Woods' he introduces another new piece that, whatever its ultimate evaluation, seemed at first hearing to be far above the average in merit." Yet for reasons known only to himself and quite unjustified by Mr. Monteux's programmes at home, Mr. Sanborn avers in The Globe that "he has done little enough to further American music during the years of his conducting opera and concerts in the United States; but he has conducted for us a good deal of unfamiliar, and often new, European

TRANS-JAN. 8.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
DEC 28 1922

W.

Fortunes of the Ballet "Pulcinella"

The manuscript score of Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," from which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform a suite in Carnegie Hall next week Saturday, is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form. The production of the "Sacrée du Printemps" at the Concerts Monteux" was notoriously similar in effect to the first production of "Tannhäuser" in the same city. Last summer the composer explained to the conductor in detail the interpretation of "Pulcinella."

The plot of "Pulcinella" Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London in 1920.

POST-JAN-7.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 29 1922

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 4 and 6: For Thursday, Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, the English composer, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," in which Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the violoncello and viola parts, respectively. For the Saturday matinée, d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Franck's Symphonic Poem "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," also a new work of Stravinsky which is having its first American performances under Pierre Monteux—a suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer.

The manuscript score of this Stravinsky Ballet is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form.

The plot of "Pulcinella" Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London, in 1920.

From
EVENING MAIL
New York City
30 19

THIS WEEK'S CONCERTS

ERNEST SCHELLING will be soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Josef Stransky, at Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, playing his own fantastic suite for piano and orchestra. Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture and Tchaikowsky's Slavic march are also on the programme.

Henry Hadley will make his first appearance of the season as conductor at the Philharmonic subscription series next Saturday night, giving Humperdinck's "Koenigskinder" overture, Gilbert's Pilgrim suite and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." Toscha Seidel, violinist, will be soloist, playing Brahms's concerto.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 4 and 6.

Mozart's symphony in E flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," with Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel as soloists.

For Saturday's matinee d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein"; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," also a new work of Stravinsky.

Georges Enesco makes his American debut as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening. He will play two of his own compositions and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic [illegible]

[48]

---

tue of its lyric beauty and brilliance.

Instead of a symphony, Pierre Monteux will open the program with d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," inspired by the poem of schiller and describing Wallenstein's Camp, Max and Thekla (the Piccolomini) and the death of Wallenstein.

A novelty of considerable interest will be the suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra after the manner of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer. This score is having its first American performance under Mr. Monteux.

The evening will close with Chabrier's Rhapsody [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

rangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's second organ chorale. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven in major, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

POST-JAN. 7.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, Paris, who is also a composer of note. He will play with orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of Franck's second organ chorale. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the eighth symphony of Beethoven, the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

AMER-JAN 7.

YOUNG PEOPLE PROGRAM

A pair of concerts for young people will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, in Symphony hall on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, Jan. 16 and 18, at o'clock. All tickets for these concerts will be under option to the public schools of Greater Boston until the 13th. The program will include Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Handel's Largo, "The Animals' Carnival," by Saint-Saens, two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Chabrier's "Espana."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, and composer. This fine virtuoso will play with the orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and Goodrich's arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Second Organ Chorale. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Preludes."

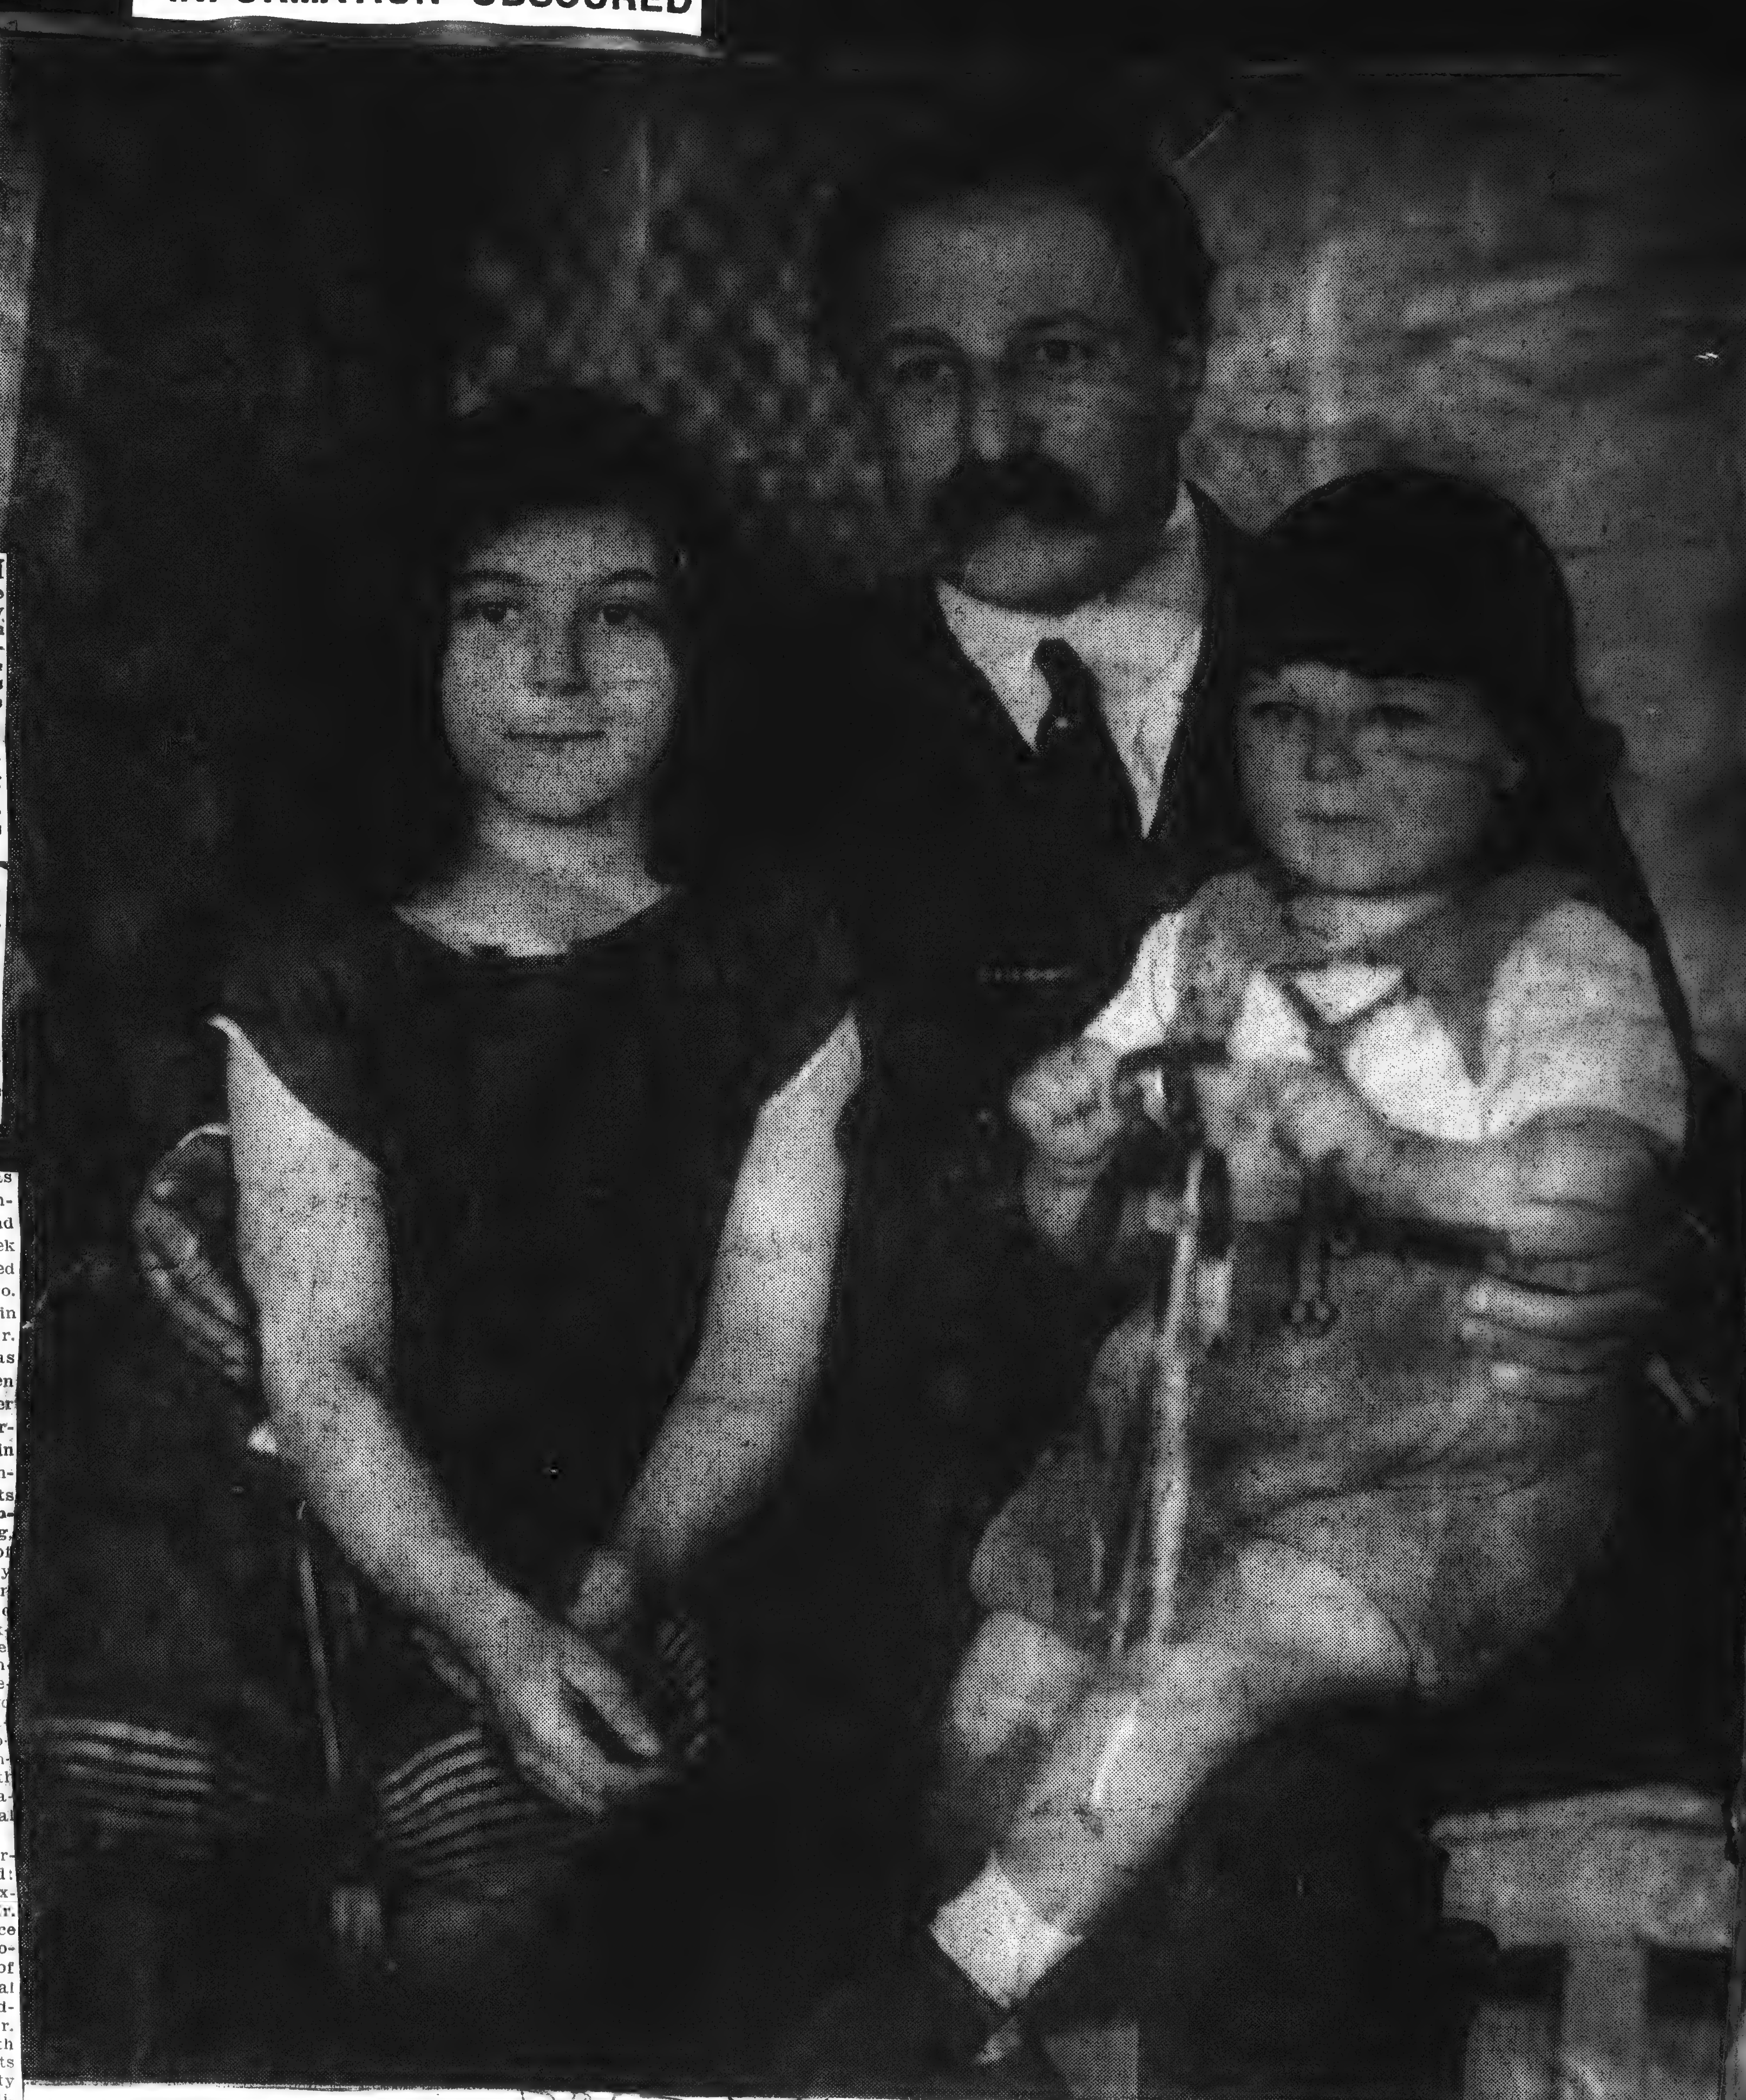
HERALD-JAN 7.

AGAIN the Boston Orchestra has played in New York—at two concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of last week and again the reviewers have renewed the praise bestowed upon it a month ago. "A larger audience than was present in Carnegie Hall last evening," writes Mr. Aldrich in The Times of Friday, "was merited by the excellent performance given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. The orchestra has made great progress lately in the improvement of its tone and its technical finish in the breadth and beauty of its performances; and though one or two technical slips marred its playing last evening, this was on the whole on a high plane of excellence. . . . Mozart's sympphony [in E flat] was played with spirit and in the main with finish. Strauss's vast tone poem, ['Don Quixote'] with its cross mixture of high-erected chivalrous eloquence its ironical mockery of the same, its fantasticalities and its stupid realisms, received an interpretation so flexible as to show an easy mastery of its once formidable complications. Bax's new piece, 'November Woods,' was played with a splendid energy by the orchestra and with what may be assumed to be a full realization of the richly elaborated orchestral fabric of the composer's imagination."

Like-minded in degree is Mr. Henderson, reviewer for The New York Herald: "The music [Bax's tone-poem] was excellently played by the Bostonians. Mr. Monteux has brought his orchestra once more to a high level of technical proficiency and although the performance of Mozart's familiar symphonoy had no special claims to consideration it was commendable and chastely classic in style. Mr. Monteux had his customary contest with the audience about beginning. He waits for perfect silence and has much difficulty in obtaining it. In this city concert audiences do not habitually become still until after the orchestra begins. In Boston they hold their breath till the opening notes are sounded."

In turn, Mr. Taylor in The World pays Mr. Monteux a just compliment for his choice of novel music. "The conductor," he says, "has an undeniable knack of picking up interesting new music for his orchestra. Last year two of the novelties he played, Szymanowski's symphony and Loeffler's three Irish songs with orchestra, were music of the first rank. Now in Bax's 'November Woods' he introduces another new piece that, whatever its ultimate evaluation, seemed at first hearing to be far above the average in merit." Yet for reasons known only to himself and quite unjustified by Mr. Monteux's programmes at home, Mr. Sanborn avers in The Globe that "he has done little enough to further American muisc during the years of his conducting opera and concerts in the United States; but he has conducted for us a good deal of unfamiliar, and often new, European music."

TRANS-JAN 5.



Conductor Monteux and His Children (at Left)

This is the very latest picture of the well-known conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, with his children, Claude and Denise. Many of Mr. Monteux's Boston friends have supposed that the boy, Claude, was named after the famous Claude Debussy, but this is a mistake, since he was named for his grandfather (Photo by Alfred Brown of Brookline)

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
DEC 28 192

W.

Fortunes of the Ballet "Pulcinella"

The manuscript score of Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," from which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform a suite in Carnegie Hall next week Saturday, is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form. The production of the "Sacrée du Printemps" at the Concerts Monteux" was notoriously similar in effect to the first production of "Tannhäuser" in the same city. Last summer the composer explained to the conductor in detail the interpretation of "Pulcinella."

The plot of "Pulcinella" Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London in 1920.

POST-JAN-7.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 29 1922

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 4 and 6: For Thursday, Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, the English composer, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," in which Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the violoncello and viola parts, respectively. For the Saturday matinée, d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Franck's Symphonic Poem "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," also a new work of Stravinsky which is having its first American performances under Pierre Monteux—a suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer.

The manuscript score of this Stravinsky Ballet is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form.

The plot of "Pulcinella" Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London, in 1920.

From
EVENING MAIL
New York City
3 0 19

THIS WEEK'S CONCERTS

ERNEST SCHELLING will be soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Josef Stransky, at Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, playing his own fantastic suite for piano and orchestra. Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture and Tchaikowsky's Slavic march [illegible] the programme. Henry [illegible] will make his first [illegible] of the season as conductor [illegible] Philharmonic subscription series next Saturday night, giving Humperdinck's "Koenigskinder" overture, Gilbert's Pilgrim suite and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." Toscha Seidel, violinist, will be soloist, playing Brahms's concerto.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 4 and 6.

Mozart's symphony in E flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," with Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel as soloists.

For Saturday's matinee d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein"; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," also a new work of Stravinsky.

Georges Enesco makes his American debut as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening. He will play two of his own compositions and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic tue of its lyric beauty and brilliance.

[48]

---

Instead of a symphony, Pierre Monteux will open the program with d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," inspired by the poem of schiller and describing Wallenstein's Camp, Max and Thekla (the Piccolomini) and the death of Wallenstein.

A novelty of considerable interest will be the suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra after the manner of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer. This score is having its first American performance under Mr. Monteux.

The evening will close with Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

rangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's second organ chorale.

Pierre Monteux will also conduct the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven in major, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

POST-JAN. 7.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, Paris, who is also a composer of note. He will play with orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of Franck's second organ chorale. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the eighth symphony of Beethoven, the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

AMER-JAN 7.

YOUNG PEOPLE PROGRAM

A pair of concerts for young people will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, in Symphony hall on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, Jan. 16 and 18, at o'clock. All tickets for these concerts will be under option to the public schools of Greater Boston until the 13th. The program will include Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Handel's Largo, "The Animals' Carnival," by Saint-Saens, two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Chabrier's "Espana."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, and composer. This fine virtuoso will play with the orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and Goodrich's arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Second Organ Chorale. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Preludes."

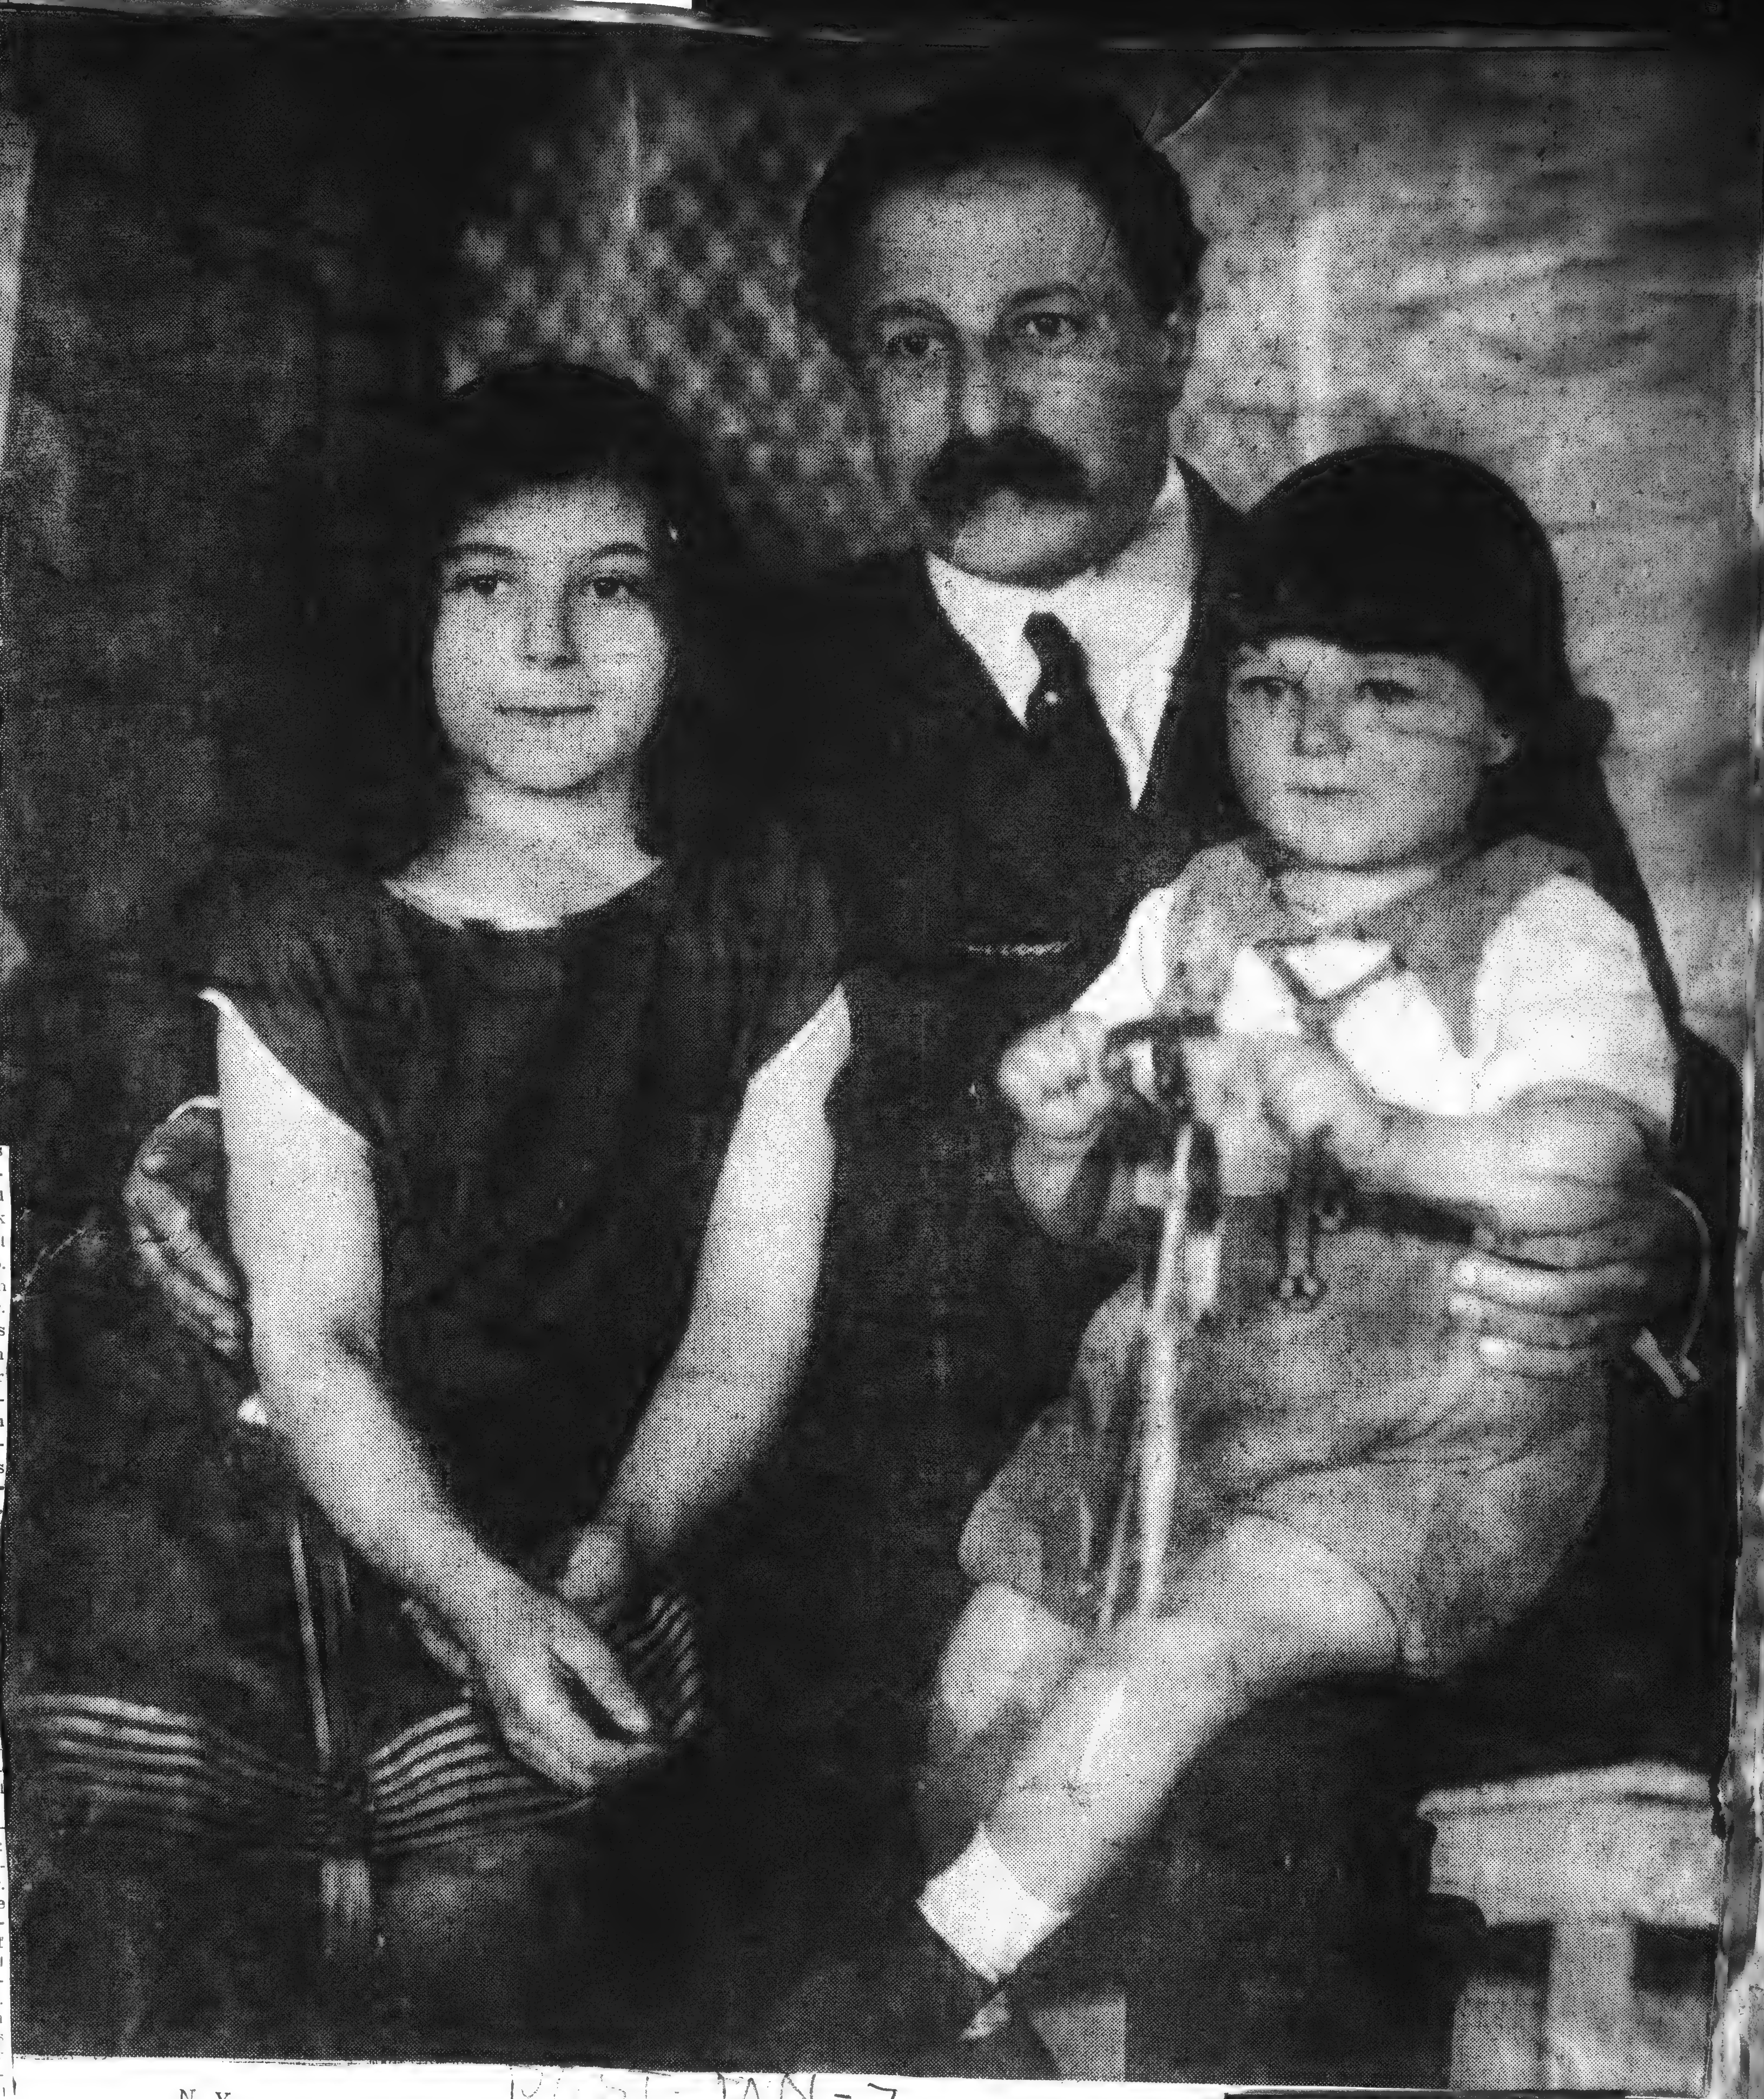
HERALD-JAN 7

AGAIN the Boston Orchestra has played in New York—at two concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of last week and again the reviewers have renewed the praise bestowed upon it a month ago. "A larger audience than was present in Carnegie Hall last evening," writes Mr. Aldrich in The Times of Friday, "was rewarded by the excellent performance given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. The orchestra has made great progress lately in the improvement of its tone and its technical finish in the breadth and beauty of its performances; and though one or two technical slips marred its playing last evening, this was on the whole on a high plane of excellence. . . . Mozart's sympphony [in E flat] was played with spirit and in the main with finish. Strauss's vast tone poem, ['Don Quixote'] with its cross mixture of high-erected chivalrous eloquence its ironical mockery of the same, its fantasticalities and its stupid realisms, received an interpretation so flexible as to show an easy mastery of its once formidable complications. Bax's new piece 'November Woods,' was played with a splendid energy by the orchestra and with what may be assumed to be a full realization of the richly elaborated orchestral fabric of the composer's imagination.'

Like-minded in degree is Mr. Henderson, reviewer for The New York Herald: "The music [Bax's tone-poem] was excellently played by the Bostonians. Mr. Monteux has brought his orchestra once more to a high level of technical proficiency and although the performance of Mozart's familiar symphony had no special claims to consideration it was commendable and chastely classic in style. Mr. Monteux had his customary contest with the audience about beginning. He waits for perfect silence and has much difficulty in obtaining it. In this city concert audiences do not habitually become still until after the orchestra begins. In Boston they hold their breath till the opening notes are sounded."

In turn, Mr. Taylor in The World pays Mr. Monteux a just compliment for his choice of novel music. "The conductor," he says, "has an undeniable knack of picking up interesting new music for his orchestra. Last year two of the novelties he played, Szymanowski's symphony and Loeffler's three Irish songs with orchestra, were music of the first rank. Now in Bax's 'November Woods' he introduces another new piece that, whatever its ultimate evaluation, seemed at first hearing to be far above the average in merit." Yet for reasons known only to himself and quite unjustified by Mr. Monteux's programmes at home, Mr. Sanborn avers in The Globe that "he has done little enough to further American muisc during the years of his conducting opera and concerts in the United States; but he has conducted for us a good deal of unfamiliar, and often new, European music."

TRANS-JAN



Conductor Monteux and His Children (at Left)

This is the very latest picture of the well-known conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, with his children, Claude and Denise. Many of Mr. Monteux's Boston friends have supposed that the boy, Claude, was named after the famous Claude Debussy, but this is a mistake, since he was named for his grandfather (Photo by Alfred Brown of Brookline)

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF

W.

Fortunes of the Ballet "Pulcinella"

The manuscript score of Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," from which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform a suite in Carnegie Hall next week Saturday, is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form. The production of the "Sacrée du Printemps" at the Concerts Monteux" was notoriously similar in effect to the first production of "Tannhäuser" in the same city. Last summer the composer explained to the conductor in detail the interpretation of "Pulcinella."

The plot of "Pulcinella" Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London in 1920.

POST-JAN-7.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 29 1922

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 4 and 6: For Thursday, Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, the English composer, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," in which Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the violoncello and viola parts, respectively. For the Saturday matinée, d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Franck's Symphonic Poem "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," also a new work of Stravinsky which is having its first American performances under Pierre Monteux—a suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer.

The manuscript score of this Stravinsky Ballet is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form.

The plot of "Pulcinella" Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London, in 1920.

From
EVENING MAIL
New York City

30 19

THIS WEEK'S CONCERTS

ERNEST SCHELLING will be soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Josef Stransky, at Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, playing his own fantastic suite for piano and orchestra. Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture [illegible] Tchaikowsky's Sl [illegible] programme [illegible] his first [illegible] conductor [illegible] subscription series [illegible] giving Humperdinck's [illegible] Kinder" overture, Gil [illegible] suite and Richard [illegible] "Don Juan." Toscha Seidel [illegible] will be soloist, playing [illegible]'s concerto.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 4 and 6.

Mozart's symphony in E flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," with Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel as soloists.

For Saturday's matinee d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein'; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," also a new work of Stravinsky.

Georges Enesco makes his American debut as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening. He will play two of his own compositions and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic tue of its lyric beauty and brilliance.

[48]

---

Instead of a symphony, Pierre Monteux will open the program with d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," inspired by the poem of schiller and describing Wallenstein's Camp, Max and Thekla (the Piccolomini) and the death of Wallenstein.

A novelty of considerable interest will be the suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra after the manner of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer. This score is having its first American performance under Mr. Monteux.

The evening will close with Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

rangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's second organ chorale. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven in major, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

POST-JAN. 7.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the Symphony concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, Paris, who is also a composer of note. He will play with orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of Franck's second organ chorale. Pierre Monteux will also conduct the eighth symphony of Beethoven, the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Preludes."

AMER-JAN 7.

YOUNG PEOPLE PROGRAM

A pair of concerts for young people will be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Monteux, in Symphony hall on Tuesday and Thursday afternoons, Jan. 16 and 18, at 2 o'clock. All tickets for these concerts will be under option to the public schools of Greater Boston until the 13th. The program will include Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio," the Minuet and Finale from Mozart's Symphony in E-flat, Handel's Largo, "The Animals' Carnival," by Saint-Saens, two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Chabrier's "Espana."

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

At the next pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, the soloist will be Marcel Dupre, organist of Notre Dame, and composer. This fine virtuoso will play with the orchestra a concerto of Bach in D minor and Goodrich's arrangement for organ and orchestra of Franck's Second Organ Chorale. Mr. Monteux will also conduct the Eighth Symphony of Beethoven, the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," and Liszt's "Preludes."

HERALD-JAN 7.

AGAIN the Boston Orchestra has played in New York—at two concerts on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon of last week and again the reviewers have renewed the praise bestowed upon it a month ago. "A larger audience than was present in Carnegie Hall last evening," writes Mr. Aldrich in The Times of Friday, "was invited by the excellent performance given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. The orchestra has made great progress lately in the improvement of its tone and its technical finish in the breadth and beauty of its performances; and though one or two technical slips marred its playing last evening, this was on the whole on a high plane of excellence. . . . Mozart's sympphony [in E flat] was played with spirit and in the main with finish. Strauss's vast tone poem, ['Don Quixote'] with its cross mixture of high-erected chivalrous eloquence its ironical mockery of the same, its fantasticalities and its stupid realisms, received an interpretation so flexible as to show an easy mastery of its once formidable complications. Bax's new piece, 'November Woods,' was played with a splendid energy by the orchestra and with what may be assumed to be a full realization of the richly elaborated orchestral fabric of the composer's imagination."

Like-minded in degree is Mr. Henderson, reviewer for The New York Herald: "The music [Bax's tone-poem] was excellently played by the Bostonians. Mr. Monteux has brought his orchestra once more to a high level of technical proficiency and although the performance of Mozart's familiar symphonoy had no special claims to consideration it was commendable and chastely classic in style. Mr. Monteux had his customary contest with the audience about beginning. He waits for perfect silence and has much difficulty in obtaining it. In this city concert audiences do not habitually become still until after the orchestra begins. In Boston they hold their breath till the opening notes are sounded."

In turn, Mr. Taylor in The World pays Mr. Monteux a just compliment for his choice of novel music. "The conductor," he says, "has an undeniable knack of picking up interesting new music for his orchestra. Last year two of the novelties he played, Szymanowski's symphony and Loeffler's three Irish songs with orchestra, were music of the first rank. Now in Bax's 'November Woods' he introduces another new piece that, whatever its ultimate evaluation, seemed at first hearing to be far above the average in merit." Yet for reasons known only to himself and quite unjustified by Mr. Monteux's programmes at home, Mr. Sanborn avers in The Globe that "he has done little enough to further American muisc during the years of his conducting opera and concerts in the United States; but he has conducted for us a good deal of unfamiliar, and often new, European music."

TRANS-JAN. 8.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
DEC 28 1922

W.

Fortunes of the Ballet "Pulcinella"

The manuscript score of Stravinsky's ballet "Pulcinella," from which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to perform a suite in Carnegie Hall next week Saturday, is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form. The production of the "Sacrée du Printemps" at the Concerts Monteux" was notoriously similar in effect to the first production of "Tannhäuser" in the same city. Last summer the composer explained to the conductor in detail the interpretation of "Pulcinella."

The plot of "Pulcinella" Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London in 1920.

POST-JAN-7.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 29 1922

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, Jan. 4 and 6: For Thursday, Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, the English composer, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," in which Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the violoncello and viola parts, respectively. For the Saturday matinée, d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Franck's Symphonic Poem "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," also a new work of Stravinsky which is having its first American performances under Pierre Monteux—a suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer.

The manuscript score of this Stravinsky Ballet is inscribed, in affectionate friendship, to Pierre Monteux. The Russian composer spends much of his time in Paris, and Mr. Monteux has first made known to that public a number of Stravinsky's works, whether in ballet or concert form.

The plot of "Pulcinella" Stravinsky unearthed from a Neapolitan manuscript dated 1700. The music is based upon the thematic and instrumental style of the composer of the same period, Pergolesi. The ballet was performed several times in London, in 1920.

From
EVENING MAIL
New York City
30 192

THIS WEEK'S CONCERTS

ERNEST SCHELLING will be soloist with the Philharmonic Orchestra, under Josef Stransky, at Carnegie Hall tomorrow afternoon, playing his own fantastic suite for piano and orchestra. Tchaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture and Tchaikowsky's Slavic march are [illegible] the programme.

Henry [illegible] will make his first [illegible] of the season as conductor [illegible] music subscription series next Saturday night, giving Humperdinck's "Koenigskinder" overture, Gilbert's Pilgrim suite and Richard Strauss's "Don Juan." Toscha Seidel, violinist, will be soloist, playing Brahms's concerto.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 4 and 6.

Mozart's symphony in E flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," with Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel as soloists.

For Saturday's matinee d'Indy's triology, "Wallenstein"; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes," also a new work of Stravinsky.

Georges Enesco makes his American debut as conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra at Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening. He will play two of his own compositions and Tschaikowsky's Pathetic [illegible]

[48]

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
DEC 30 1922

SAMAROFF AS BOSTON SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Olga Samaroff, who is said to have no equal among living women pianists, will appear as the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening, Jan. 5. This splendid artist will play with the orchestra in the pianoforte concerto of Grieg, a perennial favorite by virtue of its lyric beauty and brilliance.

Instead of a symphony, Pierre Monteux will open the program with d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," inspired by the poem of schiller and describing Wallenstein's Camp, Max and Thekla (the Piccolomini) and the death of Wallenstein.

A novelty of considerable interest will be the suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra after the manner of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer. This score is having its first American performance under Mr. Monteux.

The evening will close with Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana."

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
DEC 30 1922

Boston Symphony Programmes

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 4 and 6.

For Thursday, Mozart's symphony in E flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, the English composer, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," in which Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the violoncello and viola parts respectively.

For the Saturday matinée, d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein"; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes"; also a new work of Stravinsky, which is having its first American performances under Pierre Monteux—a suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 30 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give two concerts in Carnegie Hall next week, one on Thursday evening, Jan. 4, and another on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 6. At the former the programme will include Mozart's Symphony on E flat major; "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," when Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the 'cello and viola parts. At the matinée d'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein," Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides," Liszt's "Les Preludes," and Stravinsky's suite from his ballet "Pulcinella" will be given.

N. Y.
AMERICAN
ISSUE OF
DEC. 31 1922

The Boston Symphony announces a first performance of Bax's "November Woods" and the first suite from Strawinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella," at its concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
DEC 31 1922

Boston Symphony Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present the following programs at the second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, to be given next Thursday evening, January 4, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, January 6, at 2.30.

At the evening concert—Mosarts symphony in E-flat major, a new work; "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, the English composer, which is to have its first New York performance on this occasion, and Strauss's "Don Quixote." In this score, Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel, the leaders of the violin-cello and viola sections of the orchestra, will play the solo parts.

On Saturday there will be, instead of a symphony, d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein." A notable score, new to New York, will be Stravinsky's suite from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra in the style of porgolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer. The remaining numbers will be Franck's Symphonic Poem "Lee Eolides," and Liszt's "Las Preludes."

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
DEC 31 1922

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two scores of interest will have their first performance in New York under Pierre Monteux, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall, a week from next Thursday evening and on next Saturday afternoon. These are "November Woods," by Bax, the English composer, and the First Suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella" for small orchestra, based on the themes and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The "Pulcinella" Suite had its first American performance in Boston yesterday, while the [illegible] was produced there last

---

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 31 1922

Olga Samaroff will appear as the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. She will play the pianoforte concerto of Grieg, a perennial favorite by virtue of its lyric beauty and brilliance.

Instead of symphony, Pierre Monteux will open the programme with d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein." A novelty of considerable interest will be the suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra after the manner of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer. This score is having its first American performance under Mr. Monteux. The evening will close with Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana."

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
Dec 31 1922

FIFTEEN orchestral concerts are on the list to be set before this city in the week that starts today. They are nineteen, counting next Sunday, or more than many cities enjoy in a season, and two other centres again contribute to the musical surfeit of New York.

The Boston Symphony plays Thursday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall and Friday at the Brooklyn Academy. On Thursday's program are Mozart's symphony in E flat, Arnold Bax's "November Woods," for the first time here, and Strauss's "Don Quixote." Both Friday and Saturday there are D'Indy's "Wallenstein" and Stravinsky's new "Pulcinella" ballet, dedicated to Conductor Monteux. At the matinee, the remaining numbers will be Franck's "Les Eolides" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

From ~~Sun & Herald~~
New York
DEC 31 1922

The program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pair of concerts this week in Carnegie Hall are: Thursday evening, Mozart, symphony, E flat (K. No. 543); Bax, "November Woods," new here; Strauss, "Don Quixote." Saturday afternoon: D'Indy, "Wallenstein," Trilogy;

Continued from Page Three.

Stravinsky, Suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella," for small orchestra (after Pergolesi), new here; Franck, "Les Eolides"; Liszt, "Les Preludes."

Bkly
N. Y.
WORLD
ISSUE OF
DEC 31 1922

A program of unusual interest has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. In place of a symphony he will present the trilogy "Wallenstein" of Vincent d'Indy, which this most eminent of living French composers wrote under the inspiration of the three dramas of Schiller, treating the exploits of this General of the Thirty Years' War. A new score of interest by Stravinsky is being introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and will also figure on this program, namely, the suite from the Russian composer's ballet "Pulcinella." This music is based upon the theories and style of Pergolesi, the Renaissance Italian composer. The score had its first performance in Boston last week, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the charm of the music, in which the daring Russian skillfully retains its antique flavor, assured a favorable reception. The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who is looked upon as the foremost living woman pianist. The poetic beauty and astounding brilliance of her playing find ideal expression in the concerto of Edward Grieg, in which she is to appear with the orchestra. The evening will close with Chabrier's popular rhapsody "Espana," based upon Spanish dance rhythms.

From TELEGRAM
New York City
31 1922

Enesco and Monteux Will Conduct Here.

Leopold Stokowski will be replaced by George Enesco as director of the Philadelphia Orchestra at the concert in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, January 2, the fifth in the series. On that day Stokowski is sailing for Europe to lead the Pasdaloup Orchestra in Paris and the orchestra of the Accademia di Santa Cecilia in Rome. He will return to this country the end of January.

Enesco will make his American debut at this concert. Two of his own compositions figure on the programme, the Roumanian Rhapsody No. 2, in D major, and the Symphony in E flat. These constitute the first portion of the programme. The "Pathetique" Symphony of Tschaikowsky takes up the latter half.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

For Thursday, Mozart's Symphony in E flat major; "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, an English composer, and Strauss' "Don Quixote," in which Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the violincello and viola parts, respectively.

For the Saturday matinee D'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes;" also a new work of Stravinsky, which is having its first American performances under Pierre Monteux—a suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer.

N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
ISSUE OF
JAN 2 1923

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present the following programs in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

At the evening concert Mozart's symphony in E-flat major, a new work, "November Woods" by Arnold Bax, the English composer, which is to have its first New York performance on this occasion, and Strauss' "Don Quixote." In this score, Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel, the leaders of the violoncello and viola sections of the orchestra, will play the solo parts.

On Saturday, there will be, instead of a symphony, d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein." A notable score, new to New York, will be Stravinsky's Suite from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra in the style of Pergolesi, the early 18th century Italian composer. The remaining numbers will be Franck's Symphonic Poem "Les Eolides" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

TON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

estra Displays Fine pirit and Power in Selections.

LO SOLO BY JEAN BEDETTI

stersinger' Prelude Used s Closing Number of Program.

t evening's concert by the Bos- ymphony Orchestra at Parsons's er attracted a large and en- stic audience. It marked the stra's second appearance here eason and Mr. Sedgwick is to anked for giving two of the rts of his series in orchestral Jean Bedetti, first cellist of rchestra was the soloist of the g coming from his place to the Lalo Concerto and return- o the arduous work in the tersinger" prelude when he had wledged the hearty apprecia- of the audience for his fine play- It was a relief to have the solo [illegible] y and unostentatiously—and ed hardly to be said that the was all the better enjoyed by udience on that account.

Monteux chose the beautiful hony No. 4 of Tschaikewsky for rincipal number and the orches- laying it with splendid spirit power. In this work the com- has shown some of the finest his symphonic writing. He is gal with melodies and lovely es are tossed from choir to with consummate skill and in the briliant second move- especially.

Scherzo, which the composer should be played as rapidly as ole though he did not mark the tempo he desired, would cer- have delighted him could he heard it at the speed it was d lest evening and the staccato ng of woodwind and brass was lightful as the pizzicato of the gs. The Finale's tremendous ng chords seemed all the more after the delightful lightness of Scherzo, and there was splendid ng throughout, to the wonder- effective climax.

e orchestra was in fine form in ymphony and, in fact, in all its and Mr. Monteux was obliged and over again to acknowledge enthusiastic applause of the nce.

nri Rabaud, Mr. Monteux's diate predecessor as conductor e orchestra, was represented as oser on last evening's program is symphonic poem, "The Noc- l Procession." The work is imaginative and tonally beau-and it was given a lovely rendi-

Bedetti's choice of the Lalo gave nearly as much promi- e to the orchestra in the solo er as to the soloist. His tone t remarkable in size and there times when a certain dryness noticed but much brilliant work done with fine and clear under- ing and sure musicianship. He very pleasing player in his eace absence of affectation and in the mezzo particularly was his work fine.

e program ended with a bril- and effective reading of the stersinger prelude—always wel- in its splendid spirit and doubly hen played in such tremendous er as the orchestra showed last ing.

HARTFD-COURNT-JAN9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN VARIED PROGRAM

Large Audience Enjoys Concert at Parsons—Monteux Conductor.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in concert at Parsons' theater last evening as the third number of the Sedgwick series. The orchestra, homeward bound after a three-day stay in New York, where two concerts were given with tremendous success, played a program consisting in part of familiar numbers, which seemed to meet with the entire approbation of the exceedingly friendly audience to. Unfavorable weather conditions outside did not seriously interfere with the attendance. Mr. Monteux conducted, and Jean Bedetti, war hero, and leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, was the soloist.

The program included the Tschaikowsky's "fourth symphony," with its four movements, andante sostenuto, andantino in modo di canzona, scherzo, and the stirring finale; the symphonic poem, "The Nocturnal Procession," by Rabaud, and the Wagner prelude to "The Master singers of Nuremberg." Mr. Bedetti played the unfamiliar Lalo concerto for 'cello and orchestra, which is in three movements, prelude, with an allegro maestoso; intermezzo, and introduction and rondo.

A more satisfactory program could not possibly have been arranged. As an interpreter of the matchless Tschaikowsky Mr. Monteux has few equals and no superiors. Seldom has a more beautiful rendition of this work been heard here. There were a few isolated uncertainties in the very first part of the first movement, but these were soon completely obliterated in as poetic yet stirring and altogether a satisfactory a reading of the symphony as could possibly be imagined. The Fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky is probably not so well known as his Fifth, and it has been some years since Dr. Muck gave the last hearing of the Fourth in this city.

As a poetic genius, who always gives just as much attention to the painting of tone pictures as to the technical end of the composition at hand, Mr. Monteux will always be remembered as one of the really great conductors of this or any other day. There is none of the stolidness which is so much in evidence in the work of so many of our conductors. He is a cooperative conductor, never completely restraining, yet always permitting the orchestra to give full vent to the interpretative possibilities of the score.

In brief, last evening's concert was up to the high standard set by Muck, Fiedler, and other great conductors of the Boston players. There was little to criticise and much to praise. There was always the closest of fellowship between conductor and his musicians and there was always praiseworthy attention to detail. Mr. Monteux also always has that rare faculty of establishing an intimate relationship between orchestra and audience. Friendly and understanding fellowship was always in evidence last evening. This was shown, not only in the applause, but by the close attention which was paid throughout the entire program, lasting for nearly two hours.

One of the most interesting numbers offered was the Wagner prelude, where there was opportunity offered for an interesting comparison between the present spirit of the orchestra and the German influence which was always in evidence in past years. Here it must be said that Mr. Monteux [illegible] lyric and poetic [illegible] than the stirring [illegible] brought forth [illegible]

[illegible] Monteux pre[illegible] none the [illegible], but the difference was most marked.

Much interest was attached to the appearance of Mr. Bedetti as soloist. This artist played in the Colonne orchestra under Mr. Monteux's direction, and came to the Boston orchestra at the close of the war early in 1919. He appeared last evening in a dual role, first and lastly playing with the orchestra throughout the rest of the program as leader of the 'cello choir. He then took his place as soloist, giving a stirring and effective rendition of the Lalo concerto. His playing at all times stamped him as one of the leading 'cellists of the present day, and as a soloist he ranks high. The accompaniment given by the orchestra was always most effective and full of vital interest.

HARTFORD-TIMES. JAN. 9.

Marcel Dupre, the celebrated organist, who can play from memory all the organ works of Bach with both hands and two feet, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He will play an organ concerto of Bach which was originally a clavier concerto, an adaptation, in turn, of a violin concerto. He will also play Wallace Goodrich's excellent arrangement for orchestra and organ of a Chorale by Cesar Franck. The orchestral pieces will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 8; the prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Preludes."

We hear that Mr. Monteux has a little difficulty in arranging programs on account of the sickness of several members of the orchestra. Georges Enesco, the distinguished violinist and composer, will play Brahms's concerto and conduct his own suite next week. Holst's remarkable series of symphonic poems, "The Planets," will probably soon be performed.

HERALD JAN. 11.

FOR the Symphony Concerts in Boston last winter Mr. Monteux revived "Wallenstein," d'Indy's threefold music suggested by the likenamed trinity among Schiller's plays. It came and went without too deep impression. The conductor, however, clings to the piece and, as he returned to it last week in New York, so he repeated it last evening in Cambridge. Other matters, other manners have long since coursed through d'Indy's music and nowadays—Parisians say—he deprecates performance of this "Wallenstein" of the seventies and the eighties. Far it is from the Second Symphony or "The Poem of Sea and Shore," yet it remains excellent music in kind—the kind that Wagner, Liszt and other exemplars were inciting in countless youthful composers forty years ago. Thick and rich is the harmonic and instrumental texture; the orchestra sounds sonorously or incisively. The form is firm and spacious; motivs and melodies speak out clearly; tonal masses move to vigorous rhythms, in largely carved modulations and contrasts.

As music "Wallenstein" and all its better, more enduring kind still keep substance and savor, still give pleasure to mind and senses. Little more have changing fashions dimmed the suggestion, characterization, "tone-painting" that these pieces also sought. Graphically d'Indy mirrors into music the tumults, the dances, the sermonizing of Wallenstein's camp. Even in the seventies he neither halted nor fumbled. "He knew how" and that knowledge served the imagination that still keeps his colors bright. The Lord-General is at least a sonorous, imperious, bodeful figure in tones. Fate-crossed and piteous, striving against inevitable things, still sounds the music of the young Piccolomini, with more hint than aught else in the piece of d'Indy's mature years. Even now they might be figures to touch his idealizing imagination, his admiration of devotion. And at least Wallenstein dies awesomely; for these romanticists loved desolation—sonorous.

From more recent concerts on this side of the Charles came the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella" with his eighteenth-century partner, Pergolesi, sounding the clearer and the finer against the wooden walls of Sanders Theatre, but with the stamping, shouting Finale—Stravinsky and Naples, both at a gasp—mistakenly shorn away. Once more also, the Prelude and the Closing Scene of "Tristan" bore witness to the progress, large and deep, of Mr. Monteux as conductor in such music and of the orchestra as its voice. Here, as Wagner willed was a band singing and acting as well as playing his music. And once more Mr. Schroeder proved that if the years now and then dry his tone as violoncellist, yet does he keep his fine ear and his sensitive hand. With reason the audience bade him welcome as pleasure familiar these many years. As heartily it dismissed him, certain that the pleasure persists. The composer, Molique, gave him little aid through thin, monotonous, fragments of a wire-drawn Concerto dusty with the crumblings of the years. Yet the very thinness was as transparency to the player's virtue.

H. T. P.

TRANS. JAN. 12.

ENESCO, SOLOIST

Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violin virtuoso, will appear in his double capacity at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall. He will play with the orchestra Brahms' violin concerto in D major and, at the conclusion of the concert, will conduct his own suite for orchestra. Pierre Monteux will also present at this concert Berlioz's Overture "Benvenuto Cellini" and Debussy's Rondes de Printemps.

AMER. JAN. 13.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
DEC 30 1922

Boston Symphony Programmes

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, January 4 and 6.

For Thursday, Mozart's symphony in E flat major, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, the English composer, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," in which Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the violoncello and viola parts respectively.

For the Saturday matinée, d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein"; Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes": also a new work of Stravinsky, which is having its first American performances under Pierre Monteux—a suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
DEC 30 1922

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, will give two concerts in Carnegie Hall next week, one on Thursday evening, Jan. 4, and another on Saturday afternoon, Jan. 6. At the former the programme will include Mozart's Symphony on E flat major; "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, and Strauss's "Don Quixote," when Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the 'cello and viola parts. At the matinée d'Indy's trilogy "Wallenstein," Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides," Liszt's "Les Preludes," and Stravinsky's suite from his ballet "Pulcinella" will be given.

N. Y.
AMERICAN
ISSUE OF
DEC 31 1922

* * *

The Boston Symphony announces a first performance of Bax's "November Woods" and the first suite from Strawinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella," at its concerts in Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF

Boston Symphony Programs.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present the following programs at the second pair of concerts in Carnegie Hall, to be given next Thursday evening, January 4, at 8.15, and Saturday afternoon, January 6, at 2.30.

At the evening concert—Mozarts symphony in E-flat major, a new work; "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, the English composer, which is to have its first New York performance on this occasion, and Strauss's "Don Quixote." In this score, Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel, the leaders of the violin-cello and viola sections of the orchestra, will play the solo parts.

On Saturday there will be, instead of a symphony, d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein." A notable score, new to New York, will be Stravinsky's suite from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra in the style of porgolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer. The remaining numbers will be Franck's Symphonic Poem "Lee Eolides," and Liszt's "Las Preludes."

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
DEC 31 1922

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Two scores of interest will have their first performance in New York under Pierre Monteux, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives its second pair of concerts this season in Carnegie Hall, a week from next Thursday evening and on next Saturday afternoon. These are "November Woods," by Bax, the English composer, and the First Suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella" for small orchestra, based on the themes and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The "Pulcinella" Suite had its first American performance in Boston yesterday, while the score of Bax was produced there last

---

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
DEC 31 1922

Olga Samaroff will appear as the soloist at the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, which will be given in the Academy of Music next Friday evening. She will play the pianoforte concerto of Grieg, a perennial favorite by virtue of its lyric beauty and brilliance.

Instead of symphony, Pierre Monteux will open the programme with d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein." A novelty of considerable interest will be the suite which Stravinsky has drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra after the manner of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer. This score is having its first American performance under Mr. Monteux. The evening will close with Chabrier's Rhapsody "Espana."

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
Dec 31/22

FIFTEEN orchestral concerts are on the list to be set before this city in the week that starts today. They are nineteen, counting next Sunday, or more than many cities enjoy in a season, and two other centres again contribute to the musical surfeit of New York.

The Boston Symphony plays Thursday and Saturday in Carnegie Hall and Friday at the Brooklyn Academy. On Thursday's program are Mozart's symphony in E flat, Arnold Bax's "November Woods," for the first time here, and Strauss's "Don Quixote." Both Friday and Saturday there are D'Indy's "Wallenstein" and Stravinsky's new "Pulcinella" ballet, dedicated to Conductor Monteux. At the matinee, the remaining numbers will be Franck's "Les Eolides" and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

From ~~Sun &~~ Herald
New York
DEC 31 1922

The program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's pair of concerts this week in Carnegie Hall are: Thursday evening, Mozart, symphony, E flat (K. No. 543); Bax, "November Woods," new here; Strauss, "Don Quixote." Saturday afternoon: D'Indy, "Wallenstein," Trilogy;

Continued from Page Three.

Stravinsky, Suite from the Ballet "Pulcinella," for small orchestra (after Pergolesi), new here; Franck, "Les Eolides"; Liszt, "Les Preludes."

Bklyn
N. Y.
WORLD
ISSUE OF
DEC 31 1922

A program of unusual interest has been arranged by Pierre Monteux for the second Boston Symphony concert of the Brooklyn season, to be given at the Academy of Music next Friday evening. In place of a symphony he will present the trilogy "Wallenstein" of Vincent d'Indy, which this most eminent of living French composers wrote under the inspiration of the three dramas of Schiller, treating the exploits of this General of the Thirty Years' War. A new score of interest by Stravinsky is being introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and will also figure on this program, namely, the suite from the Russian composer's ballet "Pulcinella." This music is based upon the theories and style of Pergolesi, the Renaissance Italian composer. The score had its first performance in Boston last week, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the charm of the music, in which the daring Russian skillfully retains its antique flavor, assured a favorable reception. The soloist at this concert will be Olga Samaroff, who is looked upon as the foremost living woman pianist. The poetic beauty and astounding brilliance of her playing find ideal expression in the concerto of Edward Grieg, in which she is to appear with the orchestra. The evening will close with Chabrier's popular rhapsody "Espana," based upon Spanish dance rhythms.

From TELEGRAM 31 1922
New York City

Enesco and Monteux Will Conduct Here.

Leopold Stokowski will be replaced by George Enesco as director of the Philadelphia Orchestra at the concert in Carnegie Hall on Tuesday evening, January 2, the fifth in the series. On that day Stokowski is sailing for Europe to lead the Pasdaloup Orchestra in Paris and the orchestra of the Accademia di Santa Cecilia in Rome. He will return to this country the end of January.

Enesco will make his American début at this concert. Two of his own compositions figure on the programme, the Roumanian Rhapsody No. 2, in D major, and the Symphony in E flat. These constitute the first portion of the programme. The "Pathetique" Symphony of Tschaikowsky takes up the latter half.

Pierre Monteux will conduct the following programmes at the second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

For Thursday, Mozart's Symphony in E flat major; "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, an English composer, and Strauss' "Don Quixote," in which Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel will play the violincello and viola parts, respectively.

For the Saturday matinee D'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein," Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes;" also a new work of Stravinsky, which is having its first American performances under Pierre Monteux—a suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella," based on the themes of Pergolesi, the early eighteenth century Italian composer.

N. Y.
COMMERCIAL
ISSUE OF
JAN 2 1923

Boston Symphony at Carnegie Hall

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Pierre Monteux, will present the following programs in Carnegie Hall Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon.

At the evening concert Mozart's symphony in E-flat major, a new work, "November Woods" by Arnold Bax, the English composer, which is to have its first New York performance on this occasion, and Strauss' "Don Quixote." In this score, Jean Bedetti and Georges Fourel, the leaders of the violoncello and viola sections of the orchestra, will play the solo parts.

On Saturday, there will be, instead of a symphony, d'Indy's Trilogy "Wallenstein." A notable score, new to New York, will be Stravinsky's Suite from his ballet "Pulcinella," written for small orchestra in the style of Pergolesi, the early 18th century Italian composer. The remaining numbers will be Franck's Symphonic Poem "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

TON SYMPHONY IN FINE CONCERT

estra Displays Fine pirit and Power in Selections.

LO SOLO BY JEAN BEDETTI

stersinger' Prelude Used s Closing Number of Program.

t evening's concert by the Bos-ymphony Orchestra at Parsons's er attracted a large and enstic audience. It marked the stra's second appearance here season and Mr. Sedgwick is to anked for giving two of the rts of his series in orchestral Jean Bedetti, first cellist of rchestra was the soloist of the g coming from his place to the Lalo Concerto and return-o the arduous work in the tersinger" prelude when he had wledged the hearty appreciaf the audience for his fine play-
It was a relief to have the solo y and unostentatiously—and ed hardly to be said that the was all the better enjoyed by udience on that account.
Monteux chose the beautiful hony No. 4 of Tschaikewsky for rincipal number and the orcheslaying it with splendid spirit power. In this work the comhas shown some of the finest his symphonic writing. He is gal with melodies and lovely es are tossed from choir to with consummate skill and in the briliant second move-especially.
Scherzo, which the composer should be played as rapidly as ole though he did not mark the l tempo he desired, would cerhave delighted him could he heard it at the speed it was d lest evening and the staccato ng of woodwind and brass was lightful as the pizzicato of the gs. The Finale's tremendous ng chords seemed all the more after the delightful lightness of Scherzo, and there was splendid ng throughout, to the wonder-effective climax.
e orchestra was in fine form in ymphony and, in fact, in all its
, and Mr. Monteux was obliged and over again to acknowledge enthusiastic applause of the nce.
nri Rabaud, Mr. Monteux's diate predecessor as conductor e orchestra, was represented as oser on last evening's program is symphonic poem, "The Nocl Procession." The work is imaginative and tonally beau-

and it was given a lovely rendi-

. Bedetti's choice of the Lalo gave nearly as much promi-e to the orchestra in the solo er as to the soloist. His tone t remarkable in size and there times when a certain dryness noticed but much brilliant work done with fine and clear under-ing and sure musicianship. He very pleasing player in his eace absence of affectation and in the mezzo particularly was his work fine.
e program ended with a briland effective reading of the stersinger prelude—always welin its splendid spirit and doubly hen played in such tremendous er as the orchestra showed last ing.

HARTFD-COURNT-JAN 9.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN VARIED PROGRAM

Large Audience Enjoys Concert at Parsons—Monteux Conductor.

The Boston Symphony orchestra was heard in concert at Parsons' theater last evening as the third number of the Sedgwick series. The orchestra, homeward bound after a three-day stay in New York, where two concerts were given with tremendous success, played a program consisting in part of familiar numbers, which seemed to meet with the entire approbation of the exceedingly friendly audience to. Unfavorable weather conditions outside did not seriously interfere with the attendance. Mr. Monteux conducted, and Jean Bedetti, war hero, and leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, was the soloist.

The program included the Tschaikowsky's "fourth symphony," with its four movements, andante sostenuto, andantino in modo di canzona, scherzo, and the stirring finale; the symphonic poem, "The Nocturnal Procession," by Rabaud, and the Wagner prelude to "The Master singers of Nuremberg." Mr. Bedetti played the unfamiliar Lalo concerto for 'cello and orchestra, which is in three movements, prelude, with an allegro maestoso; intermezzo, and introduction and rondo.

A more satisfactory program could not possibly have been arranged. As an interpreter of the matchless Tschaikowsky Mr. Monteux has few equals and no superiors. Seldom has a more beautiful rendition of this work been heard here. There were a few isolated uncertainties in the very first part of the first movement, but these were soon completely obliterated in as poetic, yet stirring and altogether a satisfactory a reading of the symphony as could possibly be imagined. The Fourth symphony of Tschaikowsky is probably not so well known as his Fifth, and it has been some years since Dr. Muck gave the last hearing of the Fourth in this city.

As a poetic genius, who always gives just as much attention to the painting of tone pictures as to the technical end of the composition at hand, Mr. Monteux will always be remembered as one of the really great conductors of this or any other day. There is none of the stolidness which is so much in evidence in the work of so many of our conductors. He is a cooperative conductor, never completely restraining, yet always permitting the orchestra to give full vent to the interpretative possibilities of the score.

In brief, last evening's concert was up to the high standard set by Muck, Fiedler, and other great conductors of the Boston players. There was little to criticise and much to praise. There was always the closest of fellowship between conductor and his musicians and there was always praiseworthy attention to detail. Mr. Monteux also always has that rare faculty of establishing an intimate relationship between orchestra and audience. Friendly and understanding fellowship was always in evidence last evening. This was shown, not only in the applause, but by the close attention which was paid throughout the entire program, lasting for nearly two hours.

One of the most interesting numbers offered was the Wagner prelude, where there was opportunity offered for an interesting comparison between the present spirit of the orchestra and the German influence which was always in evidence in past years. Here it must be said that Mr. Monteux gave us a lyric and poetic interpretation rather than the stirring reflexes which brought forth admiration programs. Mr. Monteux presented none the less interesting ideas, but the difference was most marked.

---

Much interest was attached to the appearance of Mr. Bedetti as soloist. This artist played in the Colonne orchestra under Mr. Monteux's direction, and came to the Boston orchestra at the close of the war early in 1919. He appeared last evening in a dual role, first and lastly playing with the orchestra throughout the rest of the program as leader of the 'cello choir. He then took his place as soloist, giving a stirring and effective rendition of the Lalo concerto. His playing at all times stamped him as one of the leading 'cellists of the present day, and as a soloist he ranks high. The accompaniment given by the orchestra was always most effective and full of vital interest.

HARTFORD-TIMES-JAN. 9.

Marcel Dupre, the celebrated organist, who can play from memory all the organ works of Bach with both hands and two feet, will be the soloist at the Symphony concerts this week. He will play an organ concerto of Bach which was originally a clavier concerto, an adaptation, in turn, of a violin concerto. He will also play Wallace Goodrich's excellent arrangement for orchestra and organ of a Chorale by Cesar Franck. The orchestral pieces will be Beethoven's Symphony No. 8; the prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Preludes."

We hear that Mr. Monteux has a little difficulty in arranging programs on account of the sickness of several members of the orchestra. Georges Enesco, the distinguished violinist and composer, will play Brahms's concerto and conduct his own suite next week. Holst's remarkable series of symphonic poems, "The Planets," will probably soon be performed.

RALD JAN.

FOR the Symphony Concerts in Boston last winter Mr. Monteux revived "Wallenstein," d'Indy's threefold music suggested by the like-named trinity among Schiller's plays. It came and went without too deep impression. The conductor, however, clings to the piece and, as he returned to it last week in New York, so he repeated it last evening in Cambridge. Other matters, other manners have long since coursed through d'Indy's music and nowadays—Parisians say—he deprecates performance of this "Wallenstein" of the seventies and the eighties. Far it is from the Second Symphony or "The Poem of Sea and Shore," yet it remains excellent music in kind—the kind that Wagner, Liszt and other exemplars were inciting in countless youthful composers forty years ago. Thick and rich is the harmonic and instrumental texture; the orchestra sounds sonorously or incisively. The form is firm and spacious; motivs and melodies speak out clearly; tonal masses move to vigorous rhythms, in largely carved modulations and contrasts.

As music "Wallenstein" and all its better, more enduring kind still keep substance and savor, still give pleasure to mind and senses. Little more have changing fashions dimmed the suggestion, characterization, "tone-painting" that these pieces also sought. Graphically d'Indy mirrors into music the tumults, the dances, the sermonizing of Wallenstein's camp. Even in the seventies he neither halted nor fumbled. "He knew how" and that knowledge served the imagination that still keeps his colors bright. The Lord-General is at least a sonorous, imperious, bodeful figure in tones. Fate-crossed and piteous striving against inevitable things, still sounds the music of the young Piccolomini, with more hint than aught else in the piece of d'Indy's mature years. Even now they might be figures to touch his idealizing imagination, his admiration of devotion. And at least Wallenstein dies awesomely; for these romanticists loved desolation—sonorous.

From more recent concerts on this side of the Charles came the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "Pulcinella" with his eighteenth-century partner, Pergolesi, sounding the clearer and the finer against the wooden walls of Sanders Theatre, but with the stamping, shouting Finale—Stravinsky and Naples, both at a gasp—mistakenly shorn away. Once more also the Prelude and the Closing Scene of "Tristan" bore witness to the progress, large and deep, of Mr. Monteux as conductor in such music and of the orchestra as its voice. Here, as Wagner willed was a band singing and acting as well as playing his music. And once more Mr. Schroeder proved that if the years now and then dry his tone as violoncellist, yet does he keep his fine ear and his sensitive hand. With reason the audience bade him welcome as pleasure familiar these many years. As heartily it dismissed him, certain that the pleasure persists. The composer, Molique, gave him little aid through thin, monotonous, fragments of a wire-drawn Concerto dusty with the crumblings of the years. Yet the very thinness was as transparency to the player's virtue.

H. T. P.

TRAN-JAN. 12.

ENESCO, SOLOIST

Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer and violin virtuoso, will appear in his double capacity at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall. He will play with the orchestra Brahms' violin concerto in D major and, at the conclusion of the concert, will conduct his own suite for orchestra. Pierre Monteux will also present at this concert Berlioz's Overture "Benvenuto Cellini" and Debussy's Rondes de Printemps.

AMER-JAN. 13.

11TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Program Includes Pieces by Beethoven, Bach, Wagner, Franck and Liszt

MARCEL DUPRE OF PARIS IS ORGANIST

Boston Herald Jan 9

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8; Bach, Concerto, D minor, for organ and strings (first time at these concerts, if not in Boston); Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Franck, Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes." Marcel Dupre of Paris was the organist. He played here for the first time in public.

Bach's "organ" concerto reminds one of a genealogical table in the Old Testament. The concerto is one for clavier and strings. It was in all probability derived from a violin concerto; perhaps a development rather than an arrangement. At the first performance of a cantata by Bach in Leipsic the whole of the concerto was transferred, as an introduction, to the organ of St. Thomas's Church, to display the improvements made on that instrument; but as this cantata is now known to us, there is no introduction. Bach, however, used two movements of the concerto at the beginning of another cantata: the first as an overture for two oboes, obboe di caccia, strings and organ; to the second movement an Adagio for strings and organ, he added independent voice parts.

The history of this concerto is its one interesting feature. Bach could be as dull as any other great composer; dull, except to those who roll their eyes skyward at the mere mention of his name, and believe in his plenary inspiration. The two Allegros are endless in their insignificant chatter. They might have been continued, each for 10 to 15 minutes, or been cut in half, without diminishing or enlarging their musical value. Notes, notes, notes. The Adagio does not redeem the composition. It sounds as if an organist were rambling with one finger, and without purpose, over the keys of a manual, while the strings were wondering in hushed speech what he was about.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Dupre, a most distinguished organist, chose this concerto for his first appearance at a Symphony concert. As he is a famous player of Bach's magnificent preludes and fugues, also Bach's Trios for the organ, the audience would have heard him gladly. A concerto by Handel would have been welcomed.

Mr. Goodrich's skilful transcription of Franck's Chorale was more to the purpose, although it gives little opportunity for virtuoso display. Here the

UPRE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Jan 13

French Organist Heard in Bach and Franck Numbers

Mr Monteux chose for the purely orchestral part of yesterday's Symphony concert, familiar repertory numbers, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." The soloist was Marcel Dupre, organist of the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris, who played with the orchestra the Concerto in D minor for strings and organ of Bach and Mr Goodrich's arrangement for orchestra and organ of the second of Franck's three Chorales.

Bach's concerto, originally written, it would seem, for clavier, is distinctly a minor work. The first and third movements are good routine Bach. The slow movement is dull. Mr Dupre was hampered not a little in this piece by the nervousness incident upon a first appearance at the Symphony concerts. His playing, though accurate, was constrained.

In Franck's chorale, however, he proved himself an organist of the very first order. He is not only completely master of the technique of his instrument, but also able to convey the emotional power latent in the music to his hearers. He has an extraordinary sense of rhythm, and the skill to graduate minute pauses so as to secure the effect of initial stress from an instrument not really capable of stress.

Mr Monteux's conducting of Beethoven and Wagner is too often unsatisfactory, as it was yesterday. One gets the impression that when he studies a score the conductor thinks not of the whole composition as it was in the composer's mind but of the possible effects to be made by the orchestra on each separate page. If this is not true, why does Mr Monteux repeatedly alter the tempo and indulge in other incoherent, superficial and unwarranted tricks of interpretation when he is leading works in the grand style, where the total effect depends upon large outlines powerfuly and cleanly drawn?

Masterpieces demand more rather than fewer rehearsals than novelties, more intense study. In Liszt's "Les Preludes," too, the extraordinary, if flashy, brilliance put there last season by Mengelberg and the New York Philharmonic was mostly wanting.

A conductor capable of such thoroughly admirable work as the performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" at the Gericke benefit concert ought to do better work than Mr Monteux did yesterday in the aforesaid repertory pieces. Fatigue from the recent tour may partially account for yesterday's comparative failures.

[illegible] nesco, the Rumanian violinist and composer, will be the assisting artist, playing the Brahms concerto and conducting his own suite, opus 9. Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" are the other numbers announced.

French Organist Symphony Star

MARCEL DUPRE

One of France's most distinguished musicians, Marcel Dupre, organist at the famous Notre Dame cathedral in Paris, is soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.

He was enthusiastically acclaimed at the matinee concert yesterday after his solo performance of a Bach concerto, and his work in Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of Cesar Franck's second chorale, for organ and orchestra. It was an unusual treat, which was keenly enjoyed.

Outside of this the program, which will be repeated tonight, is familiar. It includes Beethoven's eighth symphony, the "Parsifal" prelude—one of Wagner's choicest compositions—and "Les Preludes," Liszt's most brilliant tone poem. Pierre Monteux and the orchestra shared honors in these delightful numbers.

ADVTSR- JAN. 13.

ORGAN HAS PART WITH SYMPHONY

Marcel Dupre, Soloist, in Poor Choice of Works

BY OLIN DOWNES

The distinguished French organist, Marcel Dupre, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He played as concerto for organ and orchestra the Bach clavier concerto in D minor, and Wallace Goodrich's version for organ and orchestra of the Cesar Franck B minor choral. The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's eighth symphony; the prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

BACH TIRESOME

For us the feature of a concert was the performance of the "Parsifal" Prelude. For two reasons: Mr. Dupre could not do himself justice because he chose for his first performance the inane and boresome concerto of Bach. We did not know Bach could be so dull. The piece is an interminable stretch of platitudes—evidently an irksome job to the composer, who must have nodded late into the night over his manuscripts.

In the Franck chorale the organ is one of many instruments, and so Mr. Dupre, who played with the most admirable understanding and mastery of his instrument, could not make the impression which he, and we too, had a right to expect from his playing. He is an admirable artist, and should be heard under more favorable conditions.

Tonal Beauty in "Parsifal"

Secondly, the reading of the "Parsifal" Prelude was the best we have heard in many years. We prefer it, for instance, to Dr. Muck's treatment of the same music. By the side of it Dr. Muck was remote but not mystical, cold rather than contemplative, and dull in the coloring he gained from Wagner's score. With Mr. Monteux, on the other hand, there was truer feeling, much more tonal beauty, particularly in inner parts, and a full perception of the dramatic value of the pauses of silence which occur, when properly felt, with such impressive effect at certain points.

The audience felt the sincerity and also the fine sculpturesque quality of this performance, which fully revealed the beauty and strength of the musical form, as well as the sensitiveness of spirit of the Prelude. The orchestra was called to its feet with the conductor, in response to long continued applause.

Safe and Sane Reading

Beethoven's symphony was given a safe and sane reading. The finale was jocose enough, and no more so. In the third movement Mr. Monteux, confronted with the much mooted question of a fast or a slow tempo in the movement which is or is not an old fashioned minuet, as you happen to look at it, decided on [illegible] We personally prefer [illegible] mpo, thinking it better as a [illegible] to the movements which precede and follow, and more in character with the inner sensation of the music. But that is a matter of opinion and the symphony is a glorious work of art.

POST-JAN. 13.

ENESCO SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Georges Enesco, the Russian composer and violin virtuoso, will appear in his double capacity at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. He will play with the orchestra Brahms' violin concerto in D major, and, at the conclusion of the concert, will conduct his own suite for orchestra.

TRAV. JAN. 13.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NOT TOO RICH OR STIMULATING AN AFTERNOON

The Conductor's Burden — Organist and Organ-Pieces Scarcely for the Plain Man —Lisztian Commonplaces — Beethoven and Wagner in Hardly Blameless Performance

THERE have been conductors who, sought for the Symphony Orchestra, doubted their ability—or their disposition—to bear the burden of twenty-four concerts distributed through seven months in Boston. Learning also that they must visit other cities and there lead in fifty concerts more, even though every piece had been previously played at home, they threw up their hands in mingled disgust and despair. The hundred-odd concerts of the Symphony Orchestra from every October through every April, as far north as Montreal, as far west as Toronto, as far south as Washington or Richmond—ten in New York, a varying allotment up and down New England—are "a large order." Taxed are the body, mind, the whole responsive and communicating power of the conductor. If his summer holiday seem long, in his working months there is naught for him but work. Usually, in recent years, he has come bravely and devotedly through them; while, in the perversity or the persistence of human nature, he has ended each year riper and better-reputed in his calling. So went Dr. Muck of old; so now goes Mr. Monteux.

Yet with both befell weeks in which they seemed to set a dull programme at Symphony Hall—and usually at mid-season when the pressure of concerts elsewhere and of the journeys to and fro was highest. Perhaps they were weary and not too clear or sensitively minded; perhaps they had odds and ends to assemble from arrears among projected pieces; perhaps the necessities—or the exigencies—of the "assisting artist" made an inspiriting progamme hard to frame. Once and again in a season, far less often than did Dr. Muck, Mr. Monteux so slips—and with reason is straightway forgiven. His programme a week ago containing Mr. Mason's Prelude and Fugue, Mr. Powell's Negro Rhapsody and a Symphony by Haydn was not too exhilarating. No more was that of yesterday with a Concerto for Organ from Bach, a second organ-piece—from Franck—and Liszt's time-worn, band-battered, "Preludes," all pinned to it. For a fortnight last year such a dull fit came upon Mr. Monteux and quickly passed. With Mr. Enesco and "The Planets" in near prospect, it bids fair to vanish speedily. Fallible is Mr. Monteux being human; yet the programmes of no conductor within the longest memory have so sustained the interest and the standards of the Symphony Concerts.

Perhaps Monsieur Marcel Dupré and his organ-pieces were most at fault in the scheme of things. None may question his renown in his profession. Organists high-placed and in prime, organists of all descending degrees, students, amateurs, connoisseurs, marvel at the range, the fullness and the fineness of his technical skill. There is no other, some of them say, now to be compared with it in precision and abundance, in power or delicacy, in all the gradients between. In their ears Monsieur Dupré is the born and inspired organist, as sympathetic with his instrument, as intuitive toward it as Kreisler and the violin or Pachmann and the piano. Yet to the lay listener the technique of organ-playing, though it be as miracle, is hidden, elusive, baffling; while Monsieur Dupré, by temperament and practice, is not wont to underscore his prowess. Doubtless it was wonder-working through Mr. Goodrich's arrangement for organ and orchestra of the Second Chorale of Franck. Spotless was it in purity, flawless in plasticity over the nearly endless levels of the long Concerto of Bach. Yet as through a glass darkly, the listener perceived—or rather suspected.

For lack of other interest, minds wandered to the music, with Bach exceedingly monotonous, with Franck exceedingly intricate. Or else they turned to the organist as man and began to speculate why a virtuoso and a musician of such abilities and repute was not more salient and animated figure, say as Monsieur Bonnet used to be. Now and then, of course, the composer happily intruded. A gentle, pellucid loveliness, clear and soft in Monsieur Dupré's tone and song, haunts Bach's slow movement. High and clear sometimes beat the exaltations of Franck. Yet somehow the notion would persist that Monsieur Dupré is an organists' organist, choosing and achieving his pieces accordingly—lacking quite the displayful quality that is half the battle in such case with the miscellaneous company before him. An organ mates not well with an orchestra; few composers have written for both; fewer still have so quickened imagination or emotion—in themselves or in hearers. Duprés and Bonnets there are for the greater glory of the organ and organ-music. Yet should they be infrequent [illegible]ers to symphony concerts. Theirs is music of another place; with them should know, feel and answer an audience of devotees and of connoisseurs well mixed. Symphony concerts do not yield it.

Possibly to the sophisticated and the superior, Liszt's "Preludes" were at fault. Yet in kind, upon the ears of the audience and at the hands of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, they were unquestionably "a good show" in tones. Not a page in the Lisztian commonplace-book went unturned—the "mysterious beginning" in shadowed harmonies and modulations; the "sonorous close," every choir going full tilt at a thunderous music; the tender musing song, the clanging martial measures, well set between. Not a trick of the Lisztian music-making went unused—the proclaimed motiv soon losing frankness in fusion; the candied song; the underscored rhythm; the writhings and upswellings into magniloquent climax. Fustian and fever and also felicity threaded in and out of the music—all according to the fashion of a romantic day. Everything Lisztian runs in "Preludes"—except the imagination, the emotion, the keenness of mind and the fire of spirit that flood through the "Faust Symphony" or the Sonata in B minor; that are no mean tides in "Tasso," "Mazeppa," "Orpheus" and other of the tone-poems. "Preludes" resound with Liszt's workaday. Elsewhere is finer chime and deeper clang.

Shall Beethoven of the Eighth Symphony or Wagner of the Prelude to "Parsifal" be the culprit, guilty in this particular afternoon to the charge of dullness. The high heavens of music forbid, for there dwell both composers as classics and from their laps shine both pieces. Quickly then be the blame shifted to mere mortals. Did Mr. Monteux take the Eighth Symphony with too heavy, urgent, unelastic hand? Maybe; yet the music is not the "little" piece that Beethoven was once pleased to call it. The racing, changeful Finale is indeed akin to such movements of Haydn or Mozart; but with all the speed and modulation, how much bolder the contour, fuller the body and richer the texture! In the highest of spirits Beethoven flings about in the first division and not exactly gossamer was he even at gambolling. He is merry with a happy fancy in the Allegretto of the ceaseless tick and click, but a substantial orchestra he invites to share the merriment. As for the minuet-like third movement, here goes Beethoven not a whit less "dignified and stately" than Gilbert's Duke of Plaza-Toro and with humor likewise peeking forth. No; Mr. Monteux was not altogether at fault. The "little" Eighth Symphony is hardly miniature.

With the Prelude to "Parsifal," the conductor may not go as free. He cut the music into angular paragraphs; made it sound as in sections of anguish, bliss and exaltation left too many sharp edges; abounded over-much in rhetorical pauses; with over-exacting pains dried and thinned, what he would intensify. His way to make has Mr. Monteux with this piercing and plangent music. He may yet clothe it with the beauty of sound, the passion, the pang, the full-throated glory of his present version of the Prelude and the Finale of "Tristan." From worse beginnings therewith he has so risen. Moreover, there is always Wagner to prevail. Him the audience heard and would not be done with clapping until they had brought his spokesmen—the orchestra—to its feet. . . . After all in the reviewer, may be, was the dulness. H. T. P.

His Hemisphere

Marcel Dupre, Organist at the Symphony Concerts, Seated Before the Wanamaker Organ in New York

TRANS. JAN 13.

[50] to the soloist.

enne or-direction, hestra at 1919. He dual role,
e orches-
program.
He then g a stir the Lalo ll times e leading and as a accompan-e was alf vital in-

JAN. 9.

ed organ-emory all with both the soloist
this week.
concerto of a clavier turn of a play Wal-rrangement a Chorale al pieces ony No. 8;
and Liszt's

teux has a g programs
f several Georges violinist and s's concerto
next week.
f symphonic will probably ncerts in Bos-Monteux red'Indy's three-ed by the like-ler's plays. It o deep impresever, clings to rned to it last repeated it last

Other matters.
since coursed nowadays—Pa-performance of seventies and om the Second of Sea and cellent music in ner, Liszt and ing in countless ears ago. Thick nd instrumental ques sonorously rm and spa-s speak out to vigorous ed modulations and all its still keep sub-ve pleasure to ore have chang-uggestion, charg" that these phically d'Indy its, the dances,

nstein's camp.
neither halted
how" and that nation that still e Lord-General perious, bodeful
ed and piteous,
e things, still ng Piccolomini, else in the piece
Even now they his idealizing
n of devotion.
ies awesomely;
ed desolation—

rts on this side uite from Strala" with his Pergolesi, he finer against ers Theatre, but g Finale—Stra-t a gasp—mis-more also, the ere of "Tristan" ress, large and onductor in such tra as its voice.
was a band sing-
laying his music.
eder proved that dry his tone as keep his fine ear
With reason the ome as pleasure
rs. As heartily that the pleasure
Molique, gave him, monotonous, Concerto dusty e years. Yet the nsparency to the
H. T. P.

12,

Rumanian
rtuoso, will acity at the Boston Sym-given next d Saturday Hall. He will tra Brahms' major and, at concert, will for orchestra.
so present at z's "Overture and Debussy's

N. 13.

11TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Program Includes Pieces by Beethoven, Bach, Wagner, Franck and Liszt

MARCEL DUPRE OF PARIS IS ORGANIST

Boston Herald Jan 13

By PHILIP HALE

The 11th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Symphony No. 8. Bach, Concerto, D minor, for organ and strings (first time at these concerts, if not in Boston); Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Franck, Organ Chorale No. 2, B minor, arranged for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich; Liszt, Symphonic Poem, "The Preludes." Marcel Dupre of Paris was the organist. He played here for the first time in public.

Bach's "organ" concerto reminds one of a genealogical table in the Old Testament. The concerto is one for clavier and strings. It was in all probability derived from a violin concerto; perhaps a development rather than an arrangement. At the first performance of a cantata by Bach in Leipsic the whole of the concerto was transferred, as an introduction, to the organ of St. Thomas's Church, to display the improvements made on that instrument; but as this cantata is now known to us, there is no introduction. Bach, however, used two movements of the concerto at the beginning of another cantata: the first as an overture for two oboes, obboe di caccia, strings and organ; to the second movement an Adagio for strings and organ, he added independent voice parts.

The history of this concerto is its one interesting feature. Bach could be as dull as any other great composer; dull, except to those who roll their eyes skyward at the mere mention of his name, and believe in his plenary inspiration. The two Allegros are endless in their insignificant chatter. They might have been continued, each [illegible] to its [illegible], or been cut in half, without diminishing or enlarging their musical value, [illegible] notes, notes. The Adagio does not redeem the [illegible]; it sounds as if an organist [illegible] with one finger, and [illegible] phrase over the keys of a [illegible] the strings [illegible] wondering [illegible] what [illegible] was about.

It is to be regretted that Mr. Dupre, a most distinguished organist, chose this concerto for his first appearance at a Symphony concert. [illegible] a famous player [illegible] preludes and fugues [illegible] Bach's Trios for the organ, the audience would have heard him gladly [illegible] Handel would have [illegible].

Mr. Goodrich [illegible] of Franck's Chorale was [illegible] purpose, although it [illegible] opportunity for virtuoso display.

UPRE SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Jan 13

rench Organist Heard in ach and Franck Numbers

Mr Monteux chose for the purely orchestral part of yesterday's Symphony concert, familiar repertory numbers, Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, Wagner's Prelude to "Parsifal" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." The soloist was Marcel Dupre, organist of the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris, who played with the orchestra the Concerto in D minor for strings and organ of Bach and Mr Goodrich's arrangement for orchestra and organ of the second of Franck's three Chorales.

Bach's concerto, originally written, it would seem, for clavier, is distinctly a minor work. The first and third movements are good routine Bach. The slow movement is dull. Mr Dupre was hampered not a little in this piece by the nervousness incident to a first appearance at the Symphony concerts. His playing, though accurate, was constrained.

In Franck's chorale, however, he proved himself an organist of the very first order. He is not only completely master of the technique of his instrument, but also able to convey the emotional power latent in the music to his hearers. He has an extraordinary sense of rhythm, and the skill to graduate minute pauses so as to secure the effect of initial stress from an instrument not really capable of stress.

Mr Monteux's conducting of Beethoven and Wagner is too often unsatisfactory, as it was yesterday. One gets the impression that when he studies a score the conductor thinks not of the whole composition as it was in the composer's mind but of the possible effects to be made by the orchestra on each separate page. If this is not true, why does Mr Monteux repeatedly alter the tempo and indulge in other incoherent, superficial and unwarranted tricks of interpretation when he is leading works in the grand style, where the total effect depends upon large outlines powerfully and cleanly drawn?

Masterpieces demand more rather than fewer rehearsals than novelties, more intense study. In Liszt's "Les Preludes," too, the extraordinary, if flashy, brilliance put there last season by Mengelberg and the New York Philharmonic was mostly wanting.

A conductor capable of such thoroughly admirable work as the performance of Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" at the Gericke benefit concert ought to do better work than Mr Monteux did yesterday in the aforesaid repertory pieces. Fatigue from the recent tour may partially account for yesterday's comparative failures.

[illegible] Georges Enesco, the Rumanian violinist and composer, will be the assisting artist, playing the Brahms concerto and conducting his own suite, opus 9. Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini," and Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps" are the other numbers announced.

French Organist Symphony Star

MARCEL DUPRE

One of France's most distinguished musicians, Marcel Dupre, organist at the famous Notre Dame cathedral in Paris, is soloist at this week's Symphony concerts.

He was enthusiastically acclaimed at the matinee concert yesterday after his solo performance of a Bach concerto, and his work in Wallace Goodrich's arrangement of Cesar Franck's second chorale, for organ and orchestra. It was an unusual treat, which was keenly enjoyed.

Outside of this the program, which will be repeated tonight, is familiar. It includes Beethoven's eighth symphony, the "Parsifal" prelude—one of Wagner's choicest compositions—and "Les Preludes," Liszt's most brilliant tone poem. Pierre Monteux and the orchestra shared honors in these delightful numbers.

ORGAN HAS PART WITH SYMPHONY

Marcel Dupre, Soloist, in Poor Choice of Works

BY OLIN DOWNES

The distinguished French organist, Marcel Dupre, was soloist at the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. He played as a concerto for organ and orchestra the Bach clavier concerto in D minor, and Wallace Goodrich's version for organ and orchestra of the Cesar Franck B minor choral. The orchestral pieces were Beethoven's eighth symphony; the prelude to "Parsifal," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

BACH TIRESOME

For us the feature of a concert was the performance of the "Parsifal" Prelude. For two reasons: Mr. Dupre could not do himself justice because he chose for his first performance the inane and boresome concerto of Bach. We did not know Bach could be so dull. The piece is an interminable stretch of platitudes—evidently an irksome job to the composer, who must have nodded late into the night over his manuscripts.

In the Franck chorale the organ is one of many instruments, and so Mr. Dupre, who played with the most admirable understanding and mastery of his instrument, could not make the impression which he, and we too, had a right to expect from his playing. He is an admirable artist, and should be heard under more favorable conditions.

Tonal Beauty in "Parsifal"

Secondly, the reading of the "Parsifal" Prelude was the best we have heard in many years. We prefer it, for instance, to Dr. Muck's treatment of the same music. By the side of it Dr. Muck was remote but not mystical, cold rather than contemplative, and dull in the coloring he gained from Wagner's score. With Mr. Monteux, on the other hand, there was truer feeling, much more tonal beauty, particularly in inner parts, and a full perception of the dramatic value of the pauses of silence which occur, when properly felt, with such impressive effect at certain points.

The audience felt the sincerity and also the fine sculpturesque quality of this performance, which fully revealed the beauty and strength of the musical form, as well as the sensitiveness of spirit of the Prelude. The orchestra was called to its feet with the conductor, in response to long continued applause.

Safe and Sane Reading

Beethoven's symphony was given a safe and sane reading. The finale was jocose enough, and no more so. In the third movement Mr. Monteux, confronted with the much mooted question of a fast or a slow tempo in the movement which is or is not an old fashioned minuet, as you happen to look at it, decided on [illegible] pace. We personally prefer a slower tempo, thinking it better as a contrast to the movements which precede and follow, and more in character with the inner sensation of the music. But that is a matter of opinion and the symphony is a glorious work of art.

POST-JAN. 13.

ENESCO SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Georges Enesco, the Russian composer and violin virtuoso, will appear in his double capacity at the next regular pair of Boston Symphony concerts, to be given next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall. He will play with the orchestra Brahms' violin concerto in D major, and, at the conclusion of the concert, will conduct his own suite for orchestra.

[illegible] JAN. 1

SYMPHONY CONCERT

NOT TOO RICH OR STIMULATING AN AFTERNOON

The Conductor's Burden — Organist and Organ-Pieces Scarcely for the Plain Man —Lisztian Commonplaces — Beethoven and Wagner in Hardly Blameless Performance

THERE have been conductors who, sought for the Symphony Orchestra, doubted their ability—or their disposition—to bear the burden of twenty-four concerts distributed through seven months in Boston. Learning also that they must visit other cities and there lead in fifty concerts more, even though every piece had been previously played at home, they threw up their hands in mingled disgust and despair. The hundred-odd concerts of the Symphony Orchestra from every October through every April, as far north as Montreal, as far west as Toronto, as far south as Washington or Richmond—ten in New York, a varying allotment up and down New England—are "a large order." Taxed are the body, mind, the whole responsive and communicating power of the conductor. If his summer holiday seem long, in his working months there is naught for him but work. Usually, in recent years, he has come bravely and devotedly through them; while, in the perversity or the persistence of human nature, he has ended each year riper and better-reputed in his calling. So went Dr. Muck of old; so now goes Mr. Monteux.

Yet with both befell weeks in which they seemed to set a dull programme at Symphony Hall—and usually at mid-season when the pressure of concerts elsewhere and of the journeys to and fro was highest. Perhaps they were weary and not too clear or sensitively minded; perhaps they had odds and ends to assemble from arrears among projected pieces; perhaps the necessities—or the exigencies—of the "assisting artist" made an inspiriting progamme hard to frame. Once and again in a season, far less often than did Dr. Muck, Mr. Monteux so slips—and with reason is straightway forgiven. His programme a week ago containing Mr. Mason's Prelude and Fugue, Mr. Powell's Negro Rhapsody and a Symphony by Haydn was not too exhilarating. No more was that of yesterday with a Concerto for Organ from Bach, a second organ-piece—from Franck—and Liszt's time-worn, band-battered, "Preludes," all pinned to it. For a fortnight last year such a dull fit came upon Mr. Monteux and quickly passed. With Mr. Enesco and "The Planets" in near prospect, it bids fair to vanish speedily. Fallible is Mr. Monteux being human; yet the programmes of no conductor within the longest memory have so sustained the interest and the standards of the Symphony Concerts.

Perhaps Monsieur Marcel Dupré and his organ-pieces were most at fault in the scheme of things. None may question his renown in his profession. Organists high-placed and in prime, organists of all descending degrees, students, amateurs, connoisseurs, marvel at the range, the fullness and the fineness of his technical skill. There is no other, some of them say, now to be compared with it in precision and abundance, in power or delicacy, in all the gradients between. In their ears Monsieur Dupré is the born and inspired organist, as sympathetic with his instrument, as intuitive toward it as Kreisler and the violin or Pachmann and the piano. Yet to the lay listener the technique of organ-playing, though it be as miracle, is hidden, elusive, baffling; while Monsieur Dupré, by temperament and practice, is not wont to underscore his prowess. Doubtless it was wonder-working through Mr. Goodrich's arrangement for organ and orchestra of the Second Chorale of Franck. Spotless was it in purity, flawless in plasticity over the nearly endless levels of the long Concerto of Bach. Yet as through a glass darkly, the listener perceived—or rather suspected.

For lack of other interest, minds wandered to the music, with Bach exceedingly monotonous, with Franck exceedingly intricate. Or else they turned to the organist as man and began to speculate why a virtuoso and a musician of such abilities and repute was not more salient and animated figure, say as Monsieur Bonnet used to be. Now and then, of course, the composer happily intruded. A gentle, pellucid loveliness, clear and soft in Monsieur Dupré's tone and song, haunts Bach's slow movement. High and clear sometimes beat the exaltations of Franck. Yet somehow the notion would persist that Monsieur Dupré is an organists' organist, choosing and achieving his pieces accordingly—lacking quite the displayful quality that is half the battle in such case with the miscellaneous company before him. An organ mates not well with an orchestra; few composers have written for both; fewer still have so quickened imagination or emotion—in themselves or in hearers. Duprés and Bonnets there are for the greater glory of the organ and organ-music. Yet should they be infrequent comers to symphony concerts. Theirs is music of another place; with them should know, feel and answer an audience of devotees and of connoisseurs well mixed. Symphony concerts do not yield it.

Possibly to the sophisticated and the superior, Liszt's "Preludes" were at fault. Yet in kind, upon the ears of the audience and at the hands of Mr. Monteux and the orchestra, they were unquestionably "a good show" in tones. Not a page in the Lisztian commonplace-book went unturned—the "mysterious beginning" in shadowed harmonies and modulations; the "sonorous close," every choir going full tilt at a thunderous music; the tender musing song, the clanging martial measures, well set between. Not a trick of the Lisztian music-making went unused—the proclaimed motiv soon losing frankness in fusion; the candied song; the underscored rhythm; the writhings and upswellings into magniloquent climax. Fustian and fever and also felicity threaded in and out of the music—all according to the fashion of a romantic day. Everything Lisztian runs in "Preludes"—except the imagination, the emotion, the keenness of mind and the fire of spirit that flood through the "Faust Symphony" or the Sonata in B minor; that are no mean tides in "Tasso," "Mazeppa," "Orpheus" and other of the tone-poems. "Preludes" resound with Liszt's workaday. Elsewhere is finer chime and deeper clang.

Shall Beethoven of the Eighth Symphony or Wagner of the Prelude to "Parsifal" be the culprit, guilty in this particular afternoon to the charge of dullness. The high heavens of music forbid, for there dwell both composers as classics and from their laps shine both pieces. Quickly then be the blame shifted to mere mortals. Did Mr. Monteux take the Eighth Symphony with too heavy, urgent, unelastic hand? Maybe; yet the music is not the "little" piece that Beethoven was once pleased to call it. The racing, changeful Finale is indeed akin to such movements of Haydn or Mozart; but with all the speed and modulation, how much bolder the contour, fuller the body and richer the texture! In the highest of spirits Beethoven flings about in the first division and not exactly gossamer was he even at gambolling. He is merry with a happy fancy in the Allegretto of the ceaseless tick and click, but a substantial orchestra he invites to share the merriment. As for the minuet-like third movement, here goes Beethoven not a whit less "dignified and stately" than Gilbert's Duke of Plaza-Toro and with humor likewise peeking forth. No; Mr. Monteux was not altogether at fault. The "little" Eighth Symphony is hardly miniature.

With the Prelude to "Parsifal," the conductor may not go as free. He cut the music into angular paragraphs; made it sound as in sections of anguish, bliss and exaltation left too many sharp edges; abounded over-much in rhetorical pauses; with over-exacting pains dried and thinned, what he would intensify. His way to make has Mr. Monteux with this piercing and plangent music. He may yet clothe it with the beauty of sound, the passion, the pang, the full-throated glory of his present version of the Prelude and the Finale of "Tristan." From worse beginnings therewith he has so risen. Moreover, there is always Wagner to prevail. Him the audience heard and would not be done with clapping until they had brought his spokesmen—the orchestra—to its feet. . . . After all in the reviewer, may be, was the dulness. H. T. P.

His Hemisphere

Marcel Dupre, Organist at the Symphony Concerts, Seated Before the Wanamaker Organ in New York

TRANS. JAN 13.

[50]

GEORGES ENESCO, Roumanian composer, conductor and violinist, whose music has often been heard in Boston, will be the guest of the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts next week. His Suite will represent him as composer and in it he will conduct. As violinist, he will play the solo-part in Brahms's Concerto. The other numbers upon the programme are the overture to Berlioz's opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," and Debussy's "Springtime Rounds," at last and deservingly taken from the shelves.

For Tuesday and Thursday afternoons next in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra has set its first pair this year of concerts for young people. Each will begin at four o'clock; each will continue through one hour; and at each Mr. Monteux will conduct and the orchestra play in these pieces: Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio"; two movements of Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Händel's Largo; Saint-Saëns's humorsome "Carnival of Animals"; two Hungarian Dances of Brahms; and Chabrier's racing and glowing Rhapsody, "España." Most of the tickets have already been distributed among public and private schools.

Monday evening, Jan. 29, in Symphony Hall, the second of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, enlisting the full orchestra, led by Mr. Monteux and traversing a programme of familiar or semi-familiar pieces, with an "assisting artist" for gilding. So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who care not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music. The programme runs through Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony with the Scherzo of plucked strings; Lalo's Overture to his opera, "The King of Ys"; Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia," and Bruch's Concerto for Violin in G minor, with Mme. Chémiet, violinist of practised abilities and clear personal quality, to play the solo-part.

TRANS. JAN. 13

Marcel Dupré Soloist With Boston Symphony

The program of the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8 in F major.
Bach—Concerto in D minor for organ and strings.
Wagner—Prelude to "Parsifal."
Franck—Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor, arranged for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich.
Liszt—Les Préludes."

The soloist was Marcel Dupré.

Mr. Monteux's remarkable gift for putting together interesting and novel programs for once deserted him. That of yesterday afternoon was uncomfortably long, and although the separate items were well enough in themselves, together they lacked contrast. The concerto by Bach is dull and the prelude to "Parsifal" and the chorale by Franck played in succession prolonged a mood unduly. Mr. Dupré's choice of the Bach Concerto in D minor (it is the familiar one usually played on the piano) is difficult to explain on any grounds. It gave him little opportunity for the display of virtuosity, and its musical interest, particularly when played on the organ, is slight. On the harpsichord or piano, as a piece of chamber music with a small number of strings to play the accompaniment, it might give pleasure; but as given yesterday it was tiresome. There was but little occasion for variety in registration. In the slow movement the organist employed flute and clarinet stops, which caused the hearer to reflect on how much better the music would have sounded if a real clarinet and flute had been used. The first and last movements consist mainly of seemingly endless pattern weaving. The sequence is a most useful device, but even Bach at times used it to conceal poverty of melodic invention.

Mr. Goodrich's arrangement of the Franck chorale has been skillfully and reverentially made (it was played here last season) and on the whole was more interesting, but despite its many qualities it gives little opportunity to the organist. There is no dearth of music for organ and orchestra. If we are not mistaken there exists a symphony by Widor which has never been heard at these concerts. There is also Boëllmann's "Fantasie Dialoguée" and Guilmant's more familiar arrangement of his D minor sonata. Then, too, there are the concertos of Handel, which were written for just such occasions. Mr. Dupré is by repute a remarkable player. Doubtless this reputation is well deserved. Yesterday there was little opportunity given to judge of his powers. Beethoven's Symphony was beautifully played and so too was Wagner's prelude. S. M.

MONTR. JAN. 13

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 12th regular pair of concerts, with Georges Enesco, the Roumanian-Parisian composer and violinist, as soloist. Besides playing the concerto of Brahms, Mr. Enesco will conduct his suite for orchestra, which has become an established and admired part of every symphonic repertory. Mr. Monteux will also include upon the program Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini" and Debussy's Rondes de Printemps, the last of his three "Images" for orchestra.

JUVENILE PROGRAM

Next Tuesday and Thursday, at 4 [illegible] in Symphony hall, the Boston [illegible]chestra will give concerts [illegible] of Greater Boston. [illegible]ct at both con- [illegible] to "Fi-symphony in E-flat major, Handel's largo, arranged by Helmesberger; The Animal's Carnival, by Saint-Saens, two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Chabrier's "Espana."

---

MONDAY SYMPHONY

A program of much beauty has been arranged by Mr. Monteux for the second concert of the extra Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall on Monday, Jan. 29. The soloist will be Renee Chemet, a French violinist, who is visiting America for the first time, and of whom excellent reports come from Europe. She will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony in F major and also conduct Lalo's Overture to "King of Ys" and 'Finlandia,' by Sibelius.

HERALD-JAN. 14

Young People's Programme

Next Tuesday and Thursday, Jan. 16 and 18, at 4 o'clock in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pair of concerts for the young people of Greater Boston.

Mr. Monteux will conduct the following programme at both concerts:

Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio"; Minuet and Finale from Mozart's Symphony in E flat major; Handel's "Largo," arranged by Helmesberger; "The Animals' Carnival" by Saint-Saens; two "Hungarian Dances" of Brahms, and Chabrier's "Espana."

Symphony Programme

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 12th regular pair of concerts this season, with Georges Enesco, the famous Roumanian composer and violin virtuoso, who is visiting America for the first time, as soloist. Besides playing with the orchestra the violin concerto of Brahms in D major, Enesco will appear as guest conductor at the close of the programme, conducting his own suite for orchestra, which has become an established and admired part of every symphonic repertory.

Mr. Monteux will also include upon the programme Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," and Debussy's Rondes de Printemps, which is the last of his three "Images" for orchestra.

POST-JAN. 14.

Jean Bedetti

Solo Cellist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 23.

Symphony Programme for Next Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes for its third concert on Tuesday evening Jan. 23, at Infantry Hall, Mr. Monteux having arranged a programme of varied interest. It will include Schubert's ever popular masterpiece, the "Unfinished Symphony," and Richard Strauss's humorous and fantastic tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

A notable novelty will be the suite drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet "Pulcinella." This score is in reality an arrangement by the distinguished Russian of the music of Pergolesi, the early 18th century Italian composer. Mr. Monteux has given the score its first American performances in Boston and New York. Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana" will be the closing number.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the violoncello section of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He will play two numbers, the opening movement of Dvorak's concerto for violoncello, and Bruch's celebrated "Kol Nidrei."

PROV. JOURNAL. JAN. 14

GIVES CONCERT FOR CHILDREN

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Program Is Blend of Rhythm and Humor

GREATER APPEAL MADE BY LATTER

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Monteux and the Symphony orchestra gave the first young people's concert of this season. This was the program:

Beethoven Overture to "Fidelio."
Mozart, Minuet and Finale from the Symphony in E-flat major.
Handel ....Largo
(Arranged by Hellmesberger)
Solo violin, Richard Burgin; harp, organ and strings.
Saint-Saens......"The Animals' Carnival"
Brahms...........Two Hungarian Dances
Chabrier.............Rhapsody, "Espana"

Perhaps middle-aged people who are neither fond parents nor Mr. Angelo Patri are too prone to regard children, before they are old enough to have acquired civilization, as not essentially different from small savages. In one respect they are wrong, for savages, by all accounts, are keenly sensitive to rhythm, whereas children, apparently, are not. At yesterday's concert, at all events, music of sharply defined rhythm, such as the movements from the symphony, made no appeal whatever to the audience at large, and even the Hungarian dances and the "Espana," which set the blood of old stagers present to coursing mighty fast, stirred the young but little. No wonder, then, that teachers have to slave with thumps and stamps to beat time, let ryhthm alone, into the heads of their small charges. So, if these concerts have an educational aim, it is much to be hoped that Mr. Monteux will continue to show his audiences what rhythm means, in the hope that in time they will come to recognize and relish it.

Humor in music, yesterday, seemed to please above all else. Saint Saens's clucking hens got warm applause, and so did the donkeys, not to forget the cuckoo, which bird, oddly enough, struck the audience as deliciously funny. Sentiment, however, pleased almost as well. Hellmesberger's bombastic distortion of Handel's lovely tune held the attention closely, and Mr. Bedetti's playing of the Swan movement from the carnival brought the heartiest applause of the afternoon.

The "Fidelio" overture left the company as cold as did the Mozart pieces. If the classics are wise at concerts of this sort, might not music of more real warmth, suit better? Mozart minuets and finales today appeal only to a special public; can young people, presumably inexperienced, be expected to enjoy them? It would be interesting to watch the reaction of an audience like yesterday's to the first three movements of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

In the delightful Saint Saens suite Mr de Voto and Mr. Richard E. Stevens, pianists, lent excellent assistance. Mr. Kunze, Mr. Laurent and Mr. Bendetti played the solos charmingly. This concert will be repeated Thursday afternoon. On the afternoons of Feb. 13 and 14, there will be a second pair of young peoples' concerts. The large audience of yesterday shows they are appreciated. R. R. G.

HERALD-JAN. 17.

SCHOOL CHILDREN HEAR SYMPHONY

Hundreds of school children from Greater Boston yesterday afternoon attended the concert arranged especially for them by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Groups from all over the city came with their teachers to enjoy the concert, which was of one hour's duration and included all those numbers which would appeal especially to their youthful minds.

POST-JAN. 17.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS FOR CHILDREN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon another of the concerts for young people that have proved so successful in the past two seasons. A very large audience of school children from public and private schools in the city and suburbs heard an attractive program lasting about an hour. The music, all chosen from the repertory of the Symphony concerts, was easily likable as well as good.

Saint Saens' musical skit, "The Animals' Carnival," most of which is frankly humorous in character, particularly delighted the audience. Handel's "Largo," so-called, was the most familiar number. The minuet and finale from Mozart's E flat major symphony, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, Chabrier's sonorous "Espana," and two of Brahms' Hungarian dances were the other numbers. Mr Monteux conducted. This program will be repeated Thursday at 4 in Symphony Hall. Tickets have been distributed through the schools without public sale. Adults unaccompanied by children are not admitted.

GLOBE-JAN. 17.

CHILDREN ARE DELIGHTED BY SYMPHONY

By ZOE FABER.

Donkeys brayed, lions roared, birds sang, cocks crowed, cuckoos called and altogether it was a lively spot in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when the first of the Young Peoples' Concerts of the season took place.

It was a burning question from start to finish whether Mr. Monteux and his men were or were not having a better time than the children.

The stroke of genius that caused Mr. Monteux to place upon his program the Saint-Eaens "Anmal Carnival" that was played at the regular concerts a short time ago, proved to be sheer inspiration and nothing less.

The children's eyes danced out of their heads and they giggled when the donkeys brayed and they nudged each other in the ribs when the cuckoo called—but when the swan sang, a guarded hush fell over the hall and not a sound could be heard but the full-throated song of the swan as Mr. Bedetti's bow drew out the melody.

The children adored it—and said so vigorously. Can greater praise be given? The concert will be repeated on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

AMER. JAN. 17.

Georges Enesco, the Roumanian-Parisian violinist and composer, will play Brahms's concerto and conduct his Orchestral Suite at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. He was born in 1881; he studied at the Vienna Conservatory where he took the first violin prize, also one in harmony, when he was 11 years old. In 1899 at the Paris Conservatory he took a first prize for violin playing. One of his Symphonies, his Suite, Roumanian, Poem, a Roumanian Rhapsody, and a few lesser works have been played in Boston. Music by Berlioz and Debussy will also be performed at these Symphony concerts.

HERALD-JAN. 8.

Incidents and Prospects

Evidently Mr. Monteux dreads not the visit of the Chicago Opera Company as distraction or preoccupation to the public of the Symphony Concerts. Or else he would administer a counter-irritant of his own. For a year and more, curiosity and anticipation have run high over "The Planets," Symphonic Suite by the Englishman, Holst, accounted one of the masterpieces of the younger Britons, acclaimed in many quarters as a remarkable music.

And next Friday and Saturday, in the full tide of the fortnight of opera, "The Planets" will be played for the first times in Boston—played also through all the seven movements: "Mars, Bringer of War; Venus, Bringer of Peace; Mercury, Winged Messenger; Jupiter, Bringer of Jollity; Saturn, Bringer of Old Age; Uranus, the Magician; Neptune, the Mystic. A full afternoon or evening with no more than MacDowell's "Indian Suite" for rounding number. As opportunity serves, more about "The Planets" will be printed in this place.

TRANS. JAN 18.

ENESCO SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Heard as Violinist and Conducts His Own Suite

Georges Enesco, the Rumanian violinist and composer, several of whose orchestral works have been familiar to Boston Symphony audiences for a decade or more, was warmly applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert, both for his playing of Brahms' violin concerto and for his conducting of his own Suite, opus 9. Mr Enesco since his recent arrival in this country has already conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York and in Philadelphia, replacing Mr Stokowski, who is visiting Europe.

Mr Enesco's playing of Brahms' concerto proved that he is an excellent violinist, interested in employing the technical resources of his instrument to their utmost potentialities. His interpretation was of the sort loosely dubbed "romantic," with rubato and vibrato effects freely employed. His tone is small, but sweet.

He has a vigorous and subtle sense of rhythm, including under that vague generic term both graduation of stress, or accent, and phraseology. This gift stood him in good stead in composing and interpreting his own suite, music which but for its structural clarity would suggest Whitman's "barbaric yawp." He is not a great conductor, if yesterday's performance offered a fair test of his ability.

Mr Monteux supplied a rather sloppy and slipshod interpretation of the accompaniment to Brahms' concerto. He also led what sounded through the doors of the hall to a late comer like a brilliant performance of Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The other number on a curiously ill assorted program, in the making of which, as too often of late, the customary symphony was omitted, was Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," the third of his "Images." This music could be made more delicate, more insinuating, less bluntly gay than it seemed yesterday if the conductor would follow the lead of M. Laloy's rapturous comment, reprinted in the programs, and conceive the piece as a musical setting of Corot's paintings.

Next week Holst's "The Planets" and MacDowell's "Indian Suite" will fill the program.

GLOBE-JAN. 20

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The thirteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will have only two numbers—Holst's "The Planets" and MacDowell's "Indian" Suite.

The first of these scores which Pierre Monteux is to introduce to Boston for the first time, has been heard in New York and other cities and has brought the name of Holst into the highest esteem as one of the foremost living English creative musicians.

Pierre Monteaux will play MacDowell's suite in accordance with the memorial celebration of the American composer, which is being held next week.

AMER-JAN 20

SOLOIST WIELDS BATON AT SYMPHONY

By ZOE FABER.

Georges Enesco, Roumanian violinist, was soloist at the twelfth Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, playing the Brahms Concerto in D major. Mr. Enesco easily convinced his audience that he is a violinist of virtuosity.

The concerto gives the artist every opportunity that he could possibly ask, both to display the length and breadth of his technical equipment and also to interpret according to his own ideas, music that is inherently great.

Later Mr. Enesco took the baton and conducted the orchestra through the mazes of his Suite for Orchestra, Op. 9. There are four movements, but not until the final one, was interest thoroughly aroused. The preceding movements of the suite lack clarity and originality of theme.

Mr. Monteux opened the program with the Overture "Benvenuto Cellini." This was particularly well played.

The Debussy "Rondes de Printemps" fitted in well with the almost Spring-like feeling of the air. It is music of the most charming kind—sketchy sort of thing with atmosphere the predominating note.

The concert will be repeated to-night.

AMER-JAN. 20.

Enesco Here as Symphony Star

Georges Enesco, famous Roumanian musician, made his first Boston appearance at yesterday's Symphony concert in the dual role of soloist and guest conductor. A brilliant artist in every respect, he made a profound impression, giving this mid-season matinee extraordinary distinction.

Skilful and sympathetic in the extreme was his performance of the solo part in the Brahms D major concerto for violin and orchestra. His own suite for orchestra gave him an opportunity to display his rare power and magnetism as a conductor. The audience was indeed enthusiastic over him.

~~Amer~~

Tribune Jan 5

Boston Orchestra Plays Arnold Bax's "November Woods"

Modernism of Debussy Is Suggested by Composition Well Received at Carnegie Hall Concert

Few of Mr. Monteux's programs are without their modern seasoning, sometimes of an aggressively latter-day type, as in the strange conglomeration of sounds entitled "Horace Victorieux," or sometimes mildly modern in construction and atmosphere, and thus it was with Arnold Bax's "November Woods," which followed Mozart's E flat major symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert of the season yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was a work that could be called modern or impressionistic, but these familiar adjectives are widely and loosely used. Mr. Bax's modernism suggested Debussy far more than Darius Milhaud or Arthur Honegger, with a prevailing atmosphere of quite melodious melancholy. On the whole it succeeded in conveying the impression implied in its title, autumn winds, falling leaves and a sense of regret for the declining year, though it was an impression rather prolonged with comparatively little variety.

The winds were suggested in the opening rushes of muted strings, punctuated by muted trumpets; winds that blew through most of the composition, while a rather doleful but melodious theme emerged on the horns. This theme, or its variants in various combinations, with the wind suggesting rising and falling passages, now stronger, with outbursts of brass, now sinking to a calm around the bulk of the piece, while once there was a hint of a more cheerful mood. While hearing Mr. Bax's music, it was not hard to imagine autumn woods, and the work was well received, though not with wild applause.

The Mozart symphony, thoroughly delightful to hear, as usual, was smoothly and agreeably played, though not with all the brightness it could have had. The last and the longest number was Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," with the Knight of La Mancha and Sancho Panza conversing through Mr. Bedetti's violoncello and Mr. Fourel's viola, both good performances, especially the former.

The many "fantastic variations on a knightly theme" describing their adventures were played with finish and gusto by Mr. Monteux and his musicians, proving enjoyable at least for those who had and could follow the book of directions. For others "Don Quixote" may well have been a little long.

[51]

GEORGES ENESCO, Roumanian composer, conductor and violinist, whose music has often been heard in Boston, will be the guest of the Symphony Orchestra at its concerts next week. His Suite will represent him as composer and in it he will conduct. As violinist, he will play the solo-part in Brahms's Concerto. The other numbers upon the programme are the overture to Berlioz's opera, "Benvenuto Cellini," and Debussy's "Springtime Rounds," at last and deservingly taken from the shelves.

For Tuesday and Thursday afternoons next in Symphony Hall, the Symphony Orchestra has set its first pair—this year—of concerts for young people. Each will begin at four o'clock; each will continue through one hour; and at each Mr. Monteux will conduct and the orchestra play in these pieces: Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio"; two movements of Mozart's Symphony in E flat; Händel's Largo; Saint-Saëns's humorsome "Carnival of Animals"; two Hungarian Dances of Brahms; and Chabrier's racing and glowing Rhapsody "España." Most of the tickets have already been distributed among public and private schools.

[illegible]day, evening, Jan. 29, in Symphony Hall, the second of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, enlisting the full orchestra, led by Mr. Monteux and traversing a programme of familiar or semi-familiar pieces, with an "assisting artist" for gilding. So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who care not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music. The programme runs through Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony with the Scherzo of plucked strings; Lalo's Overture to his opera, "The King of Ys"; Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia," and Bruch's Concerto for Violin in G minor, with Mme. Chémiet, violinist of practised abilities and clear personal quality, to play the solo-part.

TRANS. JAN. 13

Marcel Dupré Soloist With Boston Symphony

The program of the eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was as follows:

Beethoven—Symphony No. 8 in F major.
Bach—Concerto in D minor for organ and strings.
Wagner—Prelude to "Parsifal."
Franck—Organ Chorale No. 2 in B minor, arranged for organ and orchestra by Wallace Goodrich.
Liszt—Les Préludes."

The soloist was Marcel Dupré.

Mr. Monteux's remarkable gift for putting together interesting and novel programs for once deserted him. That of yesterday afternoon was uncomfortably long, and although the separate items were well enough in themselves, together they lacked contrast. The concerto by Bach is dull and the prelude to "Parsifal" and the chorale by Franck played in succession prolonged a mood unduly. Mr. Dupré's choice of the Bach Concerto in D minor (it is the familiar one usually played on the piano) is difficult to explain on any grounds. It gave him little opportunity for the display of virtuosity, and its musical interest, particularly when played on the organ, is slight. On the harpsichord or piano, as a piece of chamber music with a small number of strings to play the accompaniment, it might give pleasure; but as given yesterday it was tiresome. There was but little occasion for variety in registration. In the slow movement the organist employed flute and clarinet stops, which caused the hearer to reflect on how much better the music would have sounded if a real clarinet and flute had been used. The first and last movements consist mainly of seemingly endless pattern weaving. The sequence is a most useful device, but even Bach at times used it to conceal poverty of melodic invention.

Mr. Goodrich's arrangement of the Franck chorale has been skillfully and reverentially made (it was played here last season) and on the whole was more interesting, but despite its many qualities it gives little opportunity to the organist. There is no dearth of music for organ and orchestra. If we are not mistaken there exists a symphony by Widor which has never been heard at these concerts. There is also Boëllmann's "Fantasie Dialoguée" and Guilmant's more familiar arrangement of his D minor sonata. Then, too, there are the concertos of Handel, which were written for just such occasions. Mr. Dupré is by repute a remarkable player. Doubtless this reputation is well deserved. Yesterday there was little opportunity given to judge of his powers. Beethoven's Symphony was beautifully played and so too was Wagner's prelude. S. M.

MONITR. JAN. 13

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 12th regular pair of concerts, with Georges Enesco, the Roumanian-Parisian composer and violinist, as soloist. Besides playing the concerto of Brahms, Mr. Enesco will conduct his suite for orchestra, which has become an established and admired part of every symphonic repertory. Mr. Monteux will also include upon the program Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini" and Debussy's Rondes de Printemps, the last of his three "Images" for orchestra.

JUVENILE PROGRAM

Next Tuesday and Thursday, at 4 o'clock in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts people of Greater Boston. conduct at both con- overture to "Fi-symphony in E-flat major, Handel's largo, arranged by Helmesberger; The Animal's Carnival, by Saint-Saens, two Hungarian dances of Brahms and Chabrier's "Espana."

MONDAY SYMPHONY

A program of much beauty has been arranged by Mr. Monteux for the second concert of the extra Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall on Monday, Jan. 29. The soloist will be Renee Chemet, a French violinist, who is visiting America for the first time, and of whom excellent reports come from Europe. She will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor. Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony in F major and also conduct Lalo's Overture to the "King of Ys" and "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

HERALD-JAN. 14

Young People's Programme

Next Tuesday and Thursday, Jan. 16 and 18, at 4 o'clock in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a pair of concerts for the young people of Greater Boston.

Mr. Monteux will conduct the following programme at both concerts:

Beethoven's Overture to "Fidelio"; Minuet and Finale from Mozart's Symphony in E flat major; Handel's "Largo," arranged by Helmesberger; "The Animals' Carnival" by Saint-Saens; two "Hungarian Dances" of Brahms, and Chabrier's "Espana."

Symphony Programme

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 12th regular pair of concerts this season, with Georges Enesco, the famous Roumanian composer and violin virtuoso, who is visiting America for the first time, as soloist. Besides playing with the orchestra the violin concerto of Brahms in D major, Enesco will appear as guest conductor at the close of the programme, conducting his own suite for orchestra, which has become an established and admired part of every symphonic repertory.

Mr. Monteux will also include upon the programme Berlioz's Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," and Debussy's Rondes de Printemps, which is the last of his three "Images" for orchestra.

POST-JAN. 14.

Jean Bedetti
Solo Cellist with Boston Symphony Orchestra, Jan. 23.

Symphony Programme for Next Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes for its third concert on Tuesday evening Jan. 23, at Infantry Hall, Mr. Monteux having arranged a programme of varied interest. It will include Schubert's ever popular masterpiece, the "Unfinished Symphony," and Richard Strauss's humorous and fantastic tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

A notable novelty will be the suite drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet "Pulcinella." This score is in reality an arrangement by the distinguished Russian of the music of Pergolesi, the early 18th century Italian composer. Mr. Monteux has given the score its first American performances in Boston and New York. Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana" will be the closing number.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the violoncello section of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He will play two numbers, the opening movement of Dvorak's concerto for violoncello, and Bruch's celebrated "Kol Nidrei."

PROV. JOURNAL. JAN. 14

GIVES CONCERT FOR CHILDREN

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Program Is Blend of Rhythm and Humor

GREATER APPEAL MADE BY LATTER

Yesterday afternoon Mr. Monteux and the Symphony orchestra gave the first young people's concert of this season. This was the program:

Beethoven Overture to "Fidelio."
Mozart, Minuet and Finale from the Symphony in E-flat major.
Handel ....Largo
(Arranged by Hellmesberger)
Solo violin, Richard Burgin; harp, organ and strings.
Saint-Saens...."The Animals' Carnival"
Brahms..........Two Hungarian Dances
Chabrier..............Rhapsody, "Espana"

Perhaps middle-aged people who are neither fond parents nor Mr. Angelo Patri are too prone to regard children, before they are old enough to have acquired civilization, as not essentially different from small savages. In one respect they are wrong, for savages, by all accounts, are keenly sensitive to rhythm, whereas children, apparently, are not. At yesterday's concert, at all events, music of sharply defined rhythm, such as the movements from the symphony, made no appeal whatever to the audience at large, and even the Hungarian dances and the "Espana," which set the blood of old stagers present to coursing mighty fast, stirred the young but little. No wonder, then, that teachers have to slave with thumps and stamps to beat time, let ryhthm alone, into the heads of their small charges. So, if these concerts have an educational aim, it is much to be hoped that Mr. Monteux will continue to show his audiences what rhythm means, in the hope that in time they will come to recognize and relish it.

Humor in music, yesterday, seemed to please above all else. Saint Saens's clucking hens got warm applause, and so did the donkeys, not to forget the cuckoo, which bird, oddly enough, struck the audience as deliciously funny. Sentiment, however, pleased almost as well. Hellmesberger's bombastic distortion of Handel's lovely tune held the attention closely, and Mr. Bedetti's playing of the Swan movement from the carnival brought the heartiest applause of the afternoon.

The "Fidelio" overture left the company as cold as did the Mozart pieces. If the classics are wise at concerts of this sort, might not music of more real warmth, suit better? Mozart minuets and finales today appeal only to a special public; can young people, presumably inexperienced, be expected to enjoy them? It would be interesting to watch the reaction of an audience like yesterday's to the first three movements of Beethoven's seventh symphony.

In the delightful Saint Saens suite Mr de Voto and Mr. Richard E. Stevens, pianists, lent excellent assistance. Mr. Kunze, Mr. Laurent and Mr. Bendetti played the solos charmingly. This concert will be repeated Thursday afternoon. On the afternoons of Feb. 13 and 14, there will be a second pair of young peoples' concerts. The large audience of yesterday shows they are appreciated. R. R. G.

HERALD JAN. 17.

SCHOOL CHILDREN HEAR SYMPHONY

Hundreds of school children from Greater Boston yesterday afternoon attended the concert arranged especially for them by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall.

Groups from all over the city came with their teachers to enjoy the concert, which was of one hour's duration and included all those numbers which would appeal especially to their youthful minds.

POST-JAN. 17.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS FOR CHILDREN

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave yesterday afternoon another of the concerts for young people that have proved so successful in the past two seasons. A very large audience of school children from public and private schools in the city and suburbs heard an attractive program lasting about an hour. The music, all chosen from the repertory of the Symphony concerts, was easily likable as well as good.

Saint Saens' musical skit, "The Animals' Carnival," most of which is frankly humorous in character, particularly delighted the audience. Handel's "Largo," so-called, was the most familiar number. The minuet and finale from Mozart's E flat major symphony, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, Chabrier's sonorous "Espana." and two of Brahms' Hungarian dances were the other numbers. Mr Monteux conducted. This program will be repeated Thursday at 4 in Symphony Hall. Tickets have been distributed through the schools without public sale. Adults unaccompanied by children are not admitted.

GLOBE-JAN. 17.

CHILDREN ARE DELIGHTED BY SYMPHONY

By ZOE FABER.

Donkeys brayed, lions roared, birds sang, cocks crowed, cuckoos called and altogether it was a lively spot in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon when the first of the Young Peoples' Concerts of the season took place.

It was a burning question from start to finish whether Mr. Monteux and his men were or were not having a better time than the children.

The stroke of genius that caused Mr. Monteux to place upon his program the Saint-Saens "Animal Carnival" that was played at the regular concerts a short time ago, proved to be sheer inspiration and nothing less.

The children's eyes danced out of their heads and they giggled when the donkeys brayed and they nudged each other in the ribs when the cuckoo called—but when the swan sang, a guarded hush fell over the hall and not a sound could be heard but the full-throated song of the swan as Mr. Bedetti's bow drew out the melody.

The children adored it—and said so vigorously. Can greater praise be given? The concert will be repeated on Thursday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

AMER. JAN. 17

Georges Enesco, the Roumanian-Parisian violinist and composer, will play Brahms's concerto and conduct his Orchestral Suite at the Symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening. He was born in 1881; he studied at the Vienna Conservatory where he took the first violin prize, also one in harmony, when he was 11 years old. In 1899 at the Paris Conservatory he took a first prize for violin playing. One of his Symphonies, his Suite, Roumanian, Poem, a Roumanian Rhapsody, and a few lesser works have been played in Boston. Music by Berlioz and Debussy will also be performed at these Symphony concerts.

HERALD JAN. 2

Incidents and Prospects

Evidently Mr. Monteux dreads not the visit of the Chicago Opera Company as distraction or preoccupation to the public of the Symphony Concerts. Or else he would administer a counter-irritant of his own. For a year and more, curiosity and anticipation have run high over "The Planets," Symphonic Suite by the Englishman, Holst, accounted one of the masterpieces of the younger Britons, acclaimed in many quarters as a remarkable music.

And next Friday and Saturday, in the full tide of the fortnight of opera, "The Planets" will be played for the first times in Boston—played also through all the seven movements: "Mars, Bringer of War; Venus, Bringer of Peace; Mercury, Winged Messenger; Jupiter, Bringer of Jollity; Saturn, Bringer of Old Age; Uranus, the Magician; Neptune, the Mystic. A full afternoon or evening with no more than MacDowell's "Indian Suite" for rounding number. As opportunity serves, more about "The Planets" will be printed in this place.

TRANS. JAN 13.

ENESCO SOLOIST AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Heard as Violinist and Conducts His Own Suite

Georges Enesco, the Rumanian violinist and composer, several of whose orchestral works have been familiar to Boston Symphony audiences for a decade or more, was warmly applauded at yesterday's Symphony concert, both for his playing of Brahms' violin concerto and for his conducting of his own Suite, opus 9. Mr Enesco since his recent arrival in this country has already conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra in New York and in Philadelphia, replacing Mr Stokowski, who is visiting Europe.

Mr Enesco's playing of Brahms' concerto proved that he is an excellent violinist, interested in employing the technical resources of his instrument to their utmost potentialities. His interpretation was of the sort loosely dubbed "romantic," with rubato and vibrato effects freely employed. His tone is small, but sweet.

He has a vigorous and subtle sense of rhythm, including under that vague generic term both graduation of stress, or accent, and phraseology. This gift stood him in good stead in composing and interpreting his own suite, music which but for its structural clarity would suggest Whitman's "barbaric yawp." He is not a great conductor, if yesterday's performance offered a fair test of his ability.

Mr Monteux supplied a rather sloppy and slipshod interpretation of the accompaniment to Brahms' concerto. He also led what sounded through the doors of the hall to a late comer like a brilliant performance of Berlioz' overture to "Benvenuto Cellini."

The other number on a curiously ill assorted program, in the making of which, as too often of late, the customary symphony was omitted, was Debussy's "Rondes de Printemps," the third of his "Images." This music could be made more delicate, more insinuating, less bluntly gay than it seemed yesterday if the conductor would follow the lead of M. Laloy's rapturous comment, reprinted in the programs, and conceive the piece as a musical setting of Corot's paintings.

Next week Holst's "The Planets" and MacDowell's "Indian Suite" will fill the program.

GLOBE-JAN. 20

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The thirteenth program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will have only two numbers—Holst's "The Planets" and MacDowell's "Indian" Suite.

The first of these scores which Pierre Monteux is to introduce to Boston for the first time, has been heard in New York and other cities and has brought the name of Holst into the highest esteem as one of the foremost living English creative musicians.

Pierre Monteaux will play MacDowell's suite in accordance with the memorial celebration of the American composer, which is being held next week.

AMER-JAN 20

SOLOIST WIELDS BATON AT SYMPHONY

By ZOE FABER.

Georges Enesco, Roumanian violinist, was soloist at the twelfth Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, playing the Brahms Concerto in D major. Mr. Enesco easily convinced his audience that he is a violinist of virtuosity.

The concerto gives the artist every opportunity that he could possibly ask, both to display the length and breadth of his technical equipment and also to interpret according to his own ideas, music that is inherently great.

Later Mr. Enesco took the baton and conducted the orchestra through the mazes of his Suite for Orchestra, Op. 9. There are four movements, but not until the final one, was interest thoroughly aroused. The preceding movements of the suite lack clarity and originality of theme.

Mr. Monteux opened the program with the Overture "Benvenuto Cellini." This was particularly well played.

The Debussy "Rondes de Printemps" fitted in well with the almost Spring-like feeling of the air. It is music of the most charming kind—sketchy sort of thing with atmosphere the predominating note.

The concert will be repeated to-night.

AMER-JAN.

Enesco Here as Symphony Star

Georges Enesco, famous Roumanian musician, made his first Boston appearance at yesterday's Symphony concert in the dual role of soloist and guest conductor. A brilliant artist in every respect, he made a profound impression, giving this mid-season matinee extraordinary distinction.

Skilful and sympathetic in the extreme was his performance of the solo part in the Brahms D major concerto for violin and orchestra. His own suite for orchestra gave him an opportunity to display his rare power and magnetism as a conductor. The audience was indeed enthusiastic over him.

~~Amer~~

Tribune Jan 5

Boston Orchestra Plays Arnold Bax's "November Woods"

Modernism of Debussy Is Suggested by Composition Well Received at Carnegie Hall Concert

Few of Mr. Monteux's programs are without their modern seasoning, sometimes of an aggressively latter-day type, as in the strange conglomeration of sounds entitled "Horace Victorieux," or sometimes mildly modern in construction and atmosphere, and thus it was with Arnold Bax's "November Woods," which followed Mozart's E flat major symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert of the season yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was a work that could be called modern or impressionistic, but these familiar adjectives are widely and loosely used. Mr. Bax's modernism suggested Debussy far more than Darius Milhaud or Arthur Honegger, with a prevailing atmosphere of quite melodious melancholy. On the whole it succeeded in conveying the impression implied in its title, autumn winds, falling leaves and a sense of regret for the declining year, though it was an impression rather prolonged with comparatively little variety.

The winds were suggested in the opening rushes of muted strings, punctuated by muted trumpets; winds that blew through most of the composition, while a rather doleful but melodious theme emerged on the horns. This theme, or its variants in various combinations, with the wind suggesting rising and falling passages, now stronger, with outbursts of brass, now sinking to a calm around the bulk of the piece, while once there was a hint of a more cheerful mood. While hearing Mr. Bax's music, it was not hard to imagine autumn woods, and the work was well received, though not with wild applause.

The Mozart symphony, thoroughly delightful to hear, as usual, was smoothly and agreeably played, though not with all the brightness it could have had. The last and the longest number was Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," with the Knight of La Mancha and Sancho Panza conversing through Mr. Bedetti's violoncello and Mr. Fourel's viola, both good performances, especially the former.

The many "fantastic variations on a knightly theme" describing their adventures were played with finish and gusto by Mr. Monteux and his musicians, proving enjoyable at least for those who had and could follow the book of directions. For others "Don Quixote" may well have been a little long.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Guest of The Symphony Orchestra

Georges Enesco, Composer, Conductor, Violinist, and All in a Single Concert

OMEONE has said that the boastful assertion of the heroine in Bernard Shaw's "Arms and the Man," that her [illegible] ly visited Bucharest annually to at[illegible] the opera, is probably the only reference in our literature to the musical life [illegible] oumania. The statement [illegible] no doubt [illegible] ficiently qualified. It is true, however, that Roumania has not cut much of [illegible] ure in the art-music of Europe; for [illegible] ief contribution to the music of the [illegible] is to be sought in the folk-tunes of [illegible] ople. But forty-one years ago Roumania made a contribution of another kind [illegible] the music of our time when she bore [illegible] Enesco and sent him at the age [illegible] even, from his father's farm, near the [illegible] of Cordaremi, to study the way of [illegible] ticated European music at the Vienna Conservatory. Though Hellmesberger [illegible] over his spectacles at the little [illegible] t-boy and remarked tartly that the [illegible] nian Conservatory was "not a cradle," [illegible] ally consented to admit young [illegible] s—not only to the Conservatory, but [illegible] own household. Four years later, [illegible] even-year-old Enesco walked off with [illegible] irst prizes for violin and harmony.

[illegible] esco has told us something of his early [illegible] and of his subsequent career; and [illegible] who believe that much may be [illegible] ned of the essential character of a [illegible] and an artist by a knowledge of his [illegible] es, will find Enesco's self-analysis, as [illegible] municated to an American visitor who [illegible] ed with him some years ago in Paris, [illegible] of interest and enlightenment.

People have been puzzled and an[illegible] yed because they have been unable [illegible] catalogue and classify me in the [illegible] al way. They could not decide ex[illegible] ly what type of music mine was. [illegible] was not French after the manner of [illegible] bussy, it was not exactly German, [illegible] ey declared. In short, while it did [illegible] t sound outlandish, it did not closely [illegible] semble anything familiar, and people are annoyed when they cannot readily classify one. That, I feel sure, comes from the fact that my musical education was not confined to one environment. I was born in Roumania, but when I was seven years old I was studying in Vienna, and, incidentally, composing sonatas, rondos, and a good many other things. I learned harmony and counterpoint with Fuchs, and I studied the violin with the younger Hellmesberger. I took up the piano, the organ, and the violoncello and went on steadily with my composition. The father of Hellmesberger took a deep interest in me. I became violinist in one of the large orchestras in Vienna, and when Hellmesberger conducted for a large choral society which sang all the great masses, I used to sit among the singers studying the scores.

In those days I became deeply imbued with Wagner and Brahms, and it seems to me that even today my music shows a combination of their influence. No: there is nothing so strange about that. Wagner and Brahms were not as antithetical as people have made them out to be. They were opposed to each other much more by reason of policy than musically. Musically they have many things in common. . . . The aim of both was for the highest and noblest. The main difference between the two consists in the fact that Brahms lacked the sensuous element which one finds in the music of Wagner.

After years of study in Vienna I came to Paris, and, after some trouble, because I was young and a foreigner, succeeded in entering the Conservatory, where I had Massenet for one of my teachers in composition. At the Conservatory, I naturally absorbed French influences to a certain extent, which, combined with the German, gave a further character to my writings.

Mr. Enesco did not remind his hearer that at the Conservatory where he had Fauré as well as Massenet for a teacher of composition and Marsick as violin-master, he won a second accessit for counterpoint and fugue in 1897 and a first prize for violin-playing two years later, when he was still under twenty. Edouard Colonne, who had heard and liked some of the young Roumanian's early chamber-music at a concert in June, 1897, produced Enesco's first orchestral work, the "Roumanian Poem," Op. 1, at a Châtelet concert in February, 1898, thereby putting him on the Parisian map and preparing the way for his career as violin virtuoso and composer. This fortunate career, begun conspicuously almost a quarter-century ago, when he toured Europe in 1889-90, led him happily to the steps of Carmen Sylva's throne, for Enesco became Court-Violinist to the Queen of Roumania.

Enesco lived for many years in Paris. When the war broke out he returned at once to Roumania, where he endured with the rest of his countrymen the afflictions of the succeeding years. Since the war he has been active in the musical life of Bucharest, as conductor, as organizer of concerts of modern music, as stimulator of public interest in the work of young Roumanian composers, as "honorary president of the artistic committee" of the Bucharest Philharmonic. He is known in Europe as one of the most versatile of contemporary musicians, for he is not only a composer, a violinist and a conductor, but a pianist, a violinist, a 'cellist and an organist. "I have played," he remarked somewhat wearily as long ago as 1912, "at an enormous number of concerts, and have also done considerable conducting. Naturally, I prefer composition to interpretation. . . . In most of my pieces I have leaned strongly on the classic forms. There is indeed much of the classicist in me. I do not think that my works need ever be called bizarre. . . . I never strive consciously to be ultra-modern. . . . It still seems to me that to this very day the underlying spirit of my work (I do not here refer to the specific ideas) is that of Wagner and Brahms."

Reminded that he had been identified by many with the French school as represented by Debussy, Enesco declared that he did "not admire it unreservedly. . . . Yet I object to the imputation that Debussy lacks human appeal. . . . But better than Debussy I like Dukas, who is more substantial and generally stronger, and whose music is far more perfect and solid in structure than Debussy's. . . . One of the supremely great men of the present, one who is truly modern and original, one who has warmth and emotion, is Florent Schmitt. He is a true

TRANS. JAN 19.

[illegible] Monday evening, [illegible] in Symphony Hall, the second of [illegible] lementary series of Symphony [illegible], enlisting the full orchestra, led by Mr. Monteux and traversing a programme of familiar or semi-familiar pieces, with an "assisting artist" for gilding. So may those hear the Symphony Orchestra who care not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music. The programme runs through Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony with the Scherzo of plucked strings; Mendelssohn's Overture, "Ruy Blas"; Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia," and Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," with Mme. Chémet, violinist of practised abilities and clear personal quality, to play the solo-part.

EVIDENTLY Mr. Monteux dreads not the visit of the Chicago Opera Company as distraction or preoccupation to the public of the Symphony Concerts. Or else he would administer a counter-irritant of his own. For a year and more, curiosity and anticipation have run high over "The Planets." Symphonic Suite by the Englishman, Holst, accounted one of the masterpieces of the younger Britons, acclaimed in many quarters as a remarkable music. And next Friday and Saturday, in the full tide of the fortnight of opera. "The Planets' will be played for the first times in Boston—played also through all the seven movements: "Mars, Bringer of War; Venus, Bringer of Peace; Mercury, Winged Messenger; Jupiter, Bringer of Jollity; Saturn, Bringer of Old Age; Uranus, the Magician: Neptune, the Mystic. A full afternoon or evening with no more than MacDowell's "Indian Suite" for rounding number. As opportunity serves, more about "The Planets" will be printed in this place.

TRANS - JAN 20.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 13th program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 26 and 27, will have only two numbers—Holst's "The Planets" and MacDowell's "Indian" Suite.

The first of these scores, which Pierre Monteux is to introduce to Boston for the first time, has been heard in New York and other cities and has brought the name of Holst into the highest esteem.

Pierre Monteux will play MacDowell's suite in accordance with the memorial celebration of the American composer, which is being held next week.

TRAV. JAN. 20.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Renee Chemet, French violinist, will appear as soloist at the second concert of the extra Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Monday, January 29. She will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor. The Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Lalo's overture to the "King of Ys," and "Finlandia," by Sibelius, will also be performed.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the Symphony Orchestra will give the first performance in Boston of Holst's "Planets." The other number will be MacDowell's celebrated "Indian" Suite.

ADVTSR - JAN 21.

Symphony Programme

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 13th pair of regular concerts of the season, to be followed by a trip to New York and other cities, which will occupy the ensuing week. Pierre Monteux will fill the larger part of this programme by the first performance in Boston of Holst's "The Planets," a score which has been heard in New York and other cities, and by virtue of which this living English composer is regarded as one of the finest in that country. This work is divided into seven movements, in which the seven planets are characterized as follows: Mars, the Bringer of War; Venus, the Bringer of Peace; Mercury, the Winged Messenger; Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity; Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age; Uranus, the Magician; Neptune, the Mystic.

The other number upon this programme will be MacDowell's celebrated "Indian" Suite, which Pierre Monteux is to perform in accordance with the memorial celebration of the American composer to be held during this week. The Indian Suite includes—Legend; Love-song; In War Time; Dirge; Village Festival.

POST - JAN - 21.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the soloist of the concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, came from France four years ago to take his present position. In his native land and in other countries on the continent he is held in the highest esteem as a virtuoso on his instrument, and since coming to this country has taken his place among the leaders. He will be heard Tuesday in two numbers, Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and Dvorak's Allegro from his 'cello concerto.

A descriptive review of the numbers to be played by Mr. Monteux is given elsewhere. The programme is headed by Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B-minor, one of the most popular of all orchestral works and one that ranks among the highest in simple melodic beauty. There will also be Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," humorous and descriptive, and Igor Stravinsky's suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella" and written for small orchestra after the manner of Pergolesi, the early 18th century Italian composer.

World Jan 5

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Pierre Monteux has an undeniable knack of picking up interesting new music for his orchestra. Last year two of the novelties he played, the Szymanowski symphony and Loeffler's three Irish songs with orchestra, were works of the first rank. At last night's concert, in Carnegie Hall, he introduced another new piece that, whatever its ultimate evaluation, seemed at first hearing to be far above the average in merit.

It is Arnold Bax's "November Woods," a tone poem for orchestra. Bax is one of the younger generation of British composers, and has written much chamber and orchestral music, some of which has been heard here in other seasons.

There is a gratifying directness and solidity about this new work. It has atmosphere, and plenty of it—shimmering muted strings, quivering woodwind leaves, and a fitful chromatic gale that occasionally rocks the orchestra to its very bass. But the instrumental coloring is incidental. The composer has introduced themes, and actually developed them, using his orchestration as a background rather than a smoke screen.

We do not know exactly what program Mr. Bax had in mind. The Boston people have never got around to sending us Philip Hale's program notes, and a brother reviewer whose copy we tried to borrow refused on the ridiculous grounds that we would probably not return it. So we were obliged to rely upon the music itself for our idea of it.

Perhaps that is the best way. At all events we received a vivid impression of a man walking through a forest in a biting autumn gale. The feeling of motion was there, and the cold, and the pathetic beauty of dying things. For a little time the traveller set his feet upon a path that had already been well trodden—the dry leaves bore the hoof prints of Debussy's faun.

But it was not for long. Bax turned resolutely back from this trail that has lured so many young victims to their undoing, and plodded up the steep and tangled way marked, "Be Yourself." He succeeded, for the most part, admirably. "November Woods" may or may not be a work of great viability, but it is the work of an honest craftsman who has pleasant and sometimes beautiful things to say.

Mozart—the E flat symphony—began the evening, and Strauss—"Don Quixote"—brought it to a close. Jean Bedetti played the solo cello part with ample tone and evident understanding, and Mr. Monteux provided him a colorful and perfectly proportioned accompaniment.

[52]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Guest of The Symphony Orchestra

Georges Enesco, Composer, Conductor, Violinist, and All in a Single Concert

OMEONE has said that the boastful assertion of the heroine in Bernard Shaw's "Arms and the Man," that her [illegible]ly visited Bucharest annually to at[illegible] the opera, is probably the only reference in our literature to the musical life [illegible] Roumania. The statement [illegible] no doubt [illegible]ficiently qualified. It is true, how[illegible] that Roumania has not cut much of [illegible]ure in the art-music of Europe; for [illegible] chief contribution to the music of the [illegible] is to be sought in the folk-tunes of [illegible]ople. But forty-one years ago Rou[illegible] made a contribution of another kind [illegible] the music of our time when she bore [illegible] Enesco and sent him at the age [illegible]en, from his father's farm, near the [illegible] of Cordaremi, to study the way of [illegible]ticated European music at the Vien[illegible] Conservatory. Though Hellmesberger [illegible] over his spectacles at the little [illegible]t-boy and remarked tartly that the [illegible]nian Conservatory was "not a cradle," [illegible]nally consented to admit young [illegible]s—not only to the Conservatory, but [illegible] own household. Four years later, [illegible]even-year-old Enesco walked off with [illegible]rst prizes for violin and harmony.

[illegible]esco has told us something of his early [illegible] and of his subsequent career; and [illegible]e who believe that much may be [illegible]ned of the essential character of a [illegible]n and an artist by a knowledge of his [illegible]es, will find Enesco's self-analysis, as [illegible]municated to an American visitor who [illegible]ed with him some years ago in Paris, [illegible] of interest and enlightenment.

People have been puzzled and an[illegible]yed because they have been unable [illegible] catalogue and classify me in the [illegible]al way. They could not decide ex[illegible]ly what type of music mine was. [illegible] was not French after the manner of [illegible]bussy, it was not exactly German, [illegible]ey declared. In short, while it did [illegible]t sound outlandish, it did not closely [illegible]semble anything familiar, and people are annoyed when they cannot readily classify one. That, I feel sure, comes from the fact that my musical education was not confined to one environment. I was born in Roumania, but when I was seven years old I was studying in Vienna, and, incidentally, composing sonatas, rondos, and a good many other things. I learned harmony and counterpoint with Fuchs, and I studied the violin with the younger Hellmesberger. I took up the piano, the organ, and the violoncello and went on steadily with my composition. The father of Hellmesberger took a deep interest in me. I became violinist in one of the large orchestras in Vienna, and when Hellmesberger conducted for a large choral society which sang all the great masses, I used to sit among the singers studying the scores.

In those days I became deeply imbued with Wagner and Brahms, and it seems to me that even today my music shows a combination of their influence. No: there is nothing so strange about that. Wagner and Brahms were not as antithetical as people have made them out to be. They were opposed to each other much more by reason of policy than musically. Musically they have many things in common. . . . The aim of both was for the highest and noblest. The main difference between the two consists in the fact that Brahms lacked the sensuous element which one finds in the music of Wagner.

After years of study in Vienna I came to Paris, and, after some trouble, because I was young and a foreigner, succeeded in entering the Conservatory, where I had Massenet for one of my teachers in composition. At the Conservatory, I naturally absorbed French influences to a certain extent, which, combined with the German, gave a further character to my writings.

Mr. Enesco did not remind his hearer that at the Conservatory where he had Fauré as well as Massenet for a teacher of composition and Marsick as violin-master, he won a second accessit for counterpoint and fugue in 1897 and a first prize for violin-playing two years later, when he was still under twenty. Edouard Colonne, who had heard and liked some of the young Roumanian's early chamber-music at a concert in June, 1897, produced Enesco's first orchestral work, the "Roumanian Poem," Op. 1, at a Châtelet concert in February, 1898, thereby putting him on the Parisian map and preparing the way for his career as violin virtuoso and composer. This fortunate career, begun conspicuously almost a quarter-century ago, when he toured Europe in 1889-90, led him happily to the steps of Carmen Sylva's throne, for Enesco became Court-Violinist to the Queen of Roumania.

Enesco lived for many years in Paris. When the war broke out he returned at once to Roumania, where he endured with the rest of his countrymen the afflictions of the succeeding years. Since the war he has been active in the musical life of Bucharest, as conductor, as organizer of concerts of modern music, as stimulator of public interest in the work of young Roumanian composers, as "honorary president of the artistic committee" of the Bucharest Philharmonic. He is known in Europe as one of the most versatile of contemporary musicians, for he is not only a composer, a violinist and a conductor, but a pianist, a violinist, a 'cellist and an organist. "I have played," he remarked somewhat wearily as long ago as 1912, "at an enormous number of concerts, and have also done considerable conducting. Naturally, I prefer composition to interpretation. . . . In most of my pieces I have leaned strongly on the classic forms. There is indeed much of the classicist in me. I do not think that my works need ever be called bizarre. . . . I never strive consciously to be ultra-modern. . . . It still seems to me that to this very day the underlying spirit of my work (I do not here refer to the specific ideas) is that of Wagner and Brahms."

Reminded that he had been identified by many with the French school as represented by Debussy, Enesco declared that he did "not admire it unreservedly. . . . Yet I object to the imputation that Debussy lacks human appeal. . . . But better than Debussy I like Dukas, who is more substantial and generally stronger, and whose music is far more perfect and solid in structure than Debussy's. . . . One of the supremely great men of the present, one who is truly modern and original, one who has warmth and emotion, is Florent Schmitt. He is a true —

TRAN. JAN 19.

Monday evening, J[illegible], in Symphony Hall, the second of the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts, enlisting the full orchestra, led by Mr. Monteux and traversing a programme of familiar or semi-familiar pieces, with an "assisting artist" for gilding. So may these hear the Symphony Orchestra who care not for its long succession of "regular concerts" or for its excursions into untried music. The programme runs through Chaikovsky's Fourth Symphony with the Scherzo of plucked strings; Mendelssohn's Overture, "Ruy Blas"; Sibelius's tone-poem, "Finlandia," and Lalo's "Spanish Symphony," with Mme. Chémet, violinist of practised abilities and clear personal quality, to play the solo-part.

EVIDENTLY Mr. Monteux dreads not the visit of the Chicago Opera Company as distraction or preoccupation to the public of the Symphony Concerts. Or else he would administer a counter-irritant of his own. For a year and more, curiosity and anticipation have run high over "The Planets." Symphonic Suite by the Englishman, Holst, accounted one of the masterpieces of the younger Britons, acclaimed in many quarters as a remarkable music. And next Friday and Saturday, in the full tide of the fortnight of opera, "The Planets' will be played for the first times in Boston—played also through all the seven movements: "Mars, Bringer of War; Venus, Bringer of Peace; Mercury, Winged Messenger; Jupiter, Bringer of Jollity; Saturn, Bringer of Old Age; Uranus, the Magician; Neptune, the Mystic. A full afternoon or evening with no more than MacDowell's "Indian Suite" for rounding number. As opportunity serves, more about "The Planets" will be printed in this place.

TRANS-JAN 20.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The 13th program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Jan. 26 and 27, will have only two numbers—Holst's "The Planets" and MacDowell's "Indian" Suite.

The first of these scores, which Pierre Monteux is to introduce to Boston for the first time, has been heard in New York and other cities and has brought the name of Holst into the highest esteem.

Pierre Monteux will play MacDowell's suite in accordance with the memorial celebration of the American composer, which is being held next week.

TRAV. JAN. 20

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Renee Chemet, French violinist, will appear as soloist at the second concert of the extra Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall on Monday, January 29. She will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor. The Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky. Lalo's overture to the "King of Ys," and "Finlandia," by Sibelius, will also be performed.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the Symphony Orchestra will give the first performance in Boston of Holst's "Planets." The other number will be MacDowell's celebrated "Indian" Suite.

ADVTSR-JAN 21.

Symphony Programme

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its 13th pair of regular concerts of the season, to be followed by a trip to New York and other cities, which will occupy the ensuing week. Pierre Monteux will fill the larger part of this programme by the first performance in Boston of Holst's "The Planets," a score which has been heard in New York and other cities, and by virtue of which this living English composer is regarded as one of the finest in that country. This work is divided into seven movements, in which the seven planets are characterized as follows: Mars, the Bringer of War; Venus, the Bringer of Peace; Mercury, the Winged Messenger; Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity; Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age; Uranus, the Magician; Neptune, the Mystic.

The other number upon this programme will be MacDowell's celebrated "Indian" Suite, which Pierre Monteux is to perform in accordance with the memorial celebration of the American composer to be held during this week. The Indian Suite includes—Legend; Love-song; In War Time; Dirge; Village Festival.

POST-JAN-21.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the soloist of the concert in Infantry Hall next Tuesday night, came from France four years ago to take his present position. In his native land and in other countries on the continent he is held in the highest esteem as a virtuoso on his instrument, and since coming to this country has taken his place among the leaders. He will be heard Tuesday in two numbers, Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and Dvorak's Allegro from his 'cello concerto.

A descriptive review of the numbers to be played by Mr. Monteux is given elsewhere. The programme is headed by Schubert's Unfinished Symphony in B-minor, one of the most popular of all orchestral works and one that ranks among the highest in simple melodic beauty. There will also be Strauss's tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," humorous and descriptive, and Igor Stravinsky's suite drawn from his ballet "Pulcinella" and written for small orchestra after the manner of Pergolesi, the early 18th century Italian composer.

PROV-JOURNAL-JAN 21.

World Jan 5

MUSIC
By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Pierre Monteux has an undeniable knack of picking up interesting new music for his orchestra. Last year two of the novelties he played, the Szymanowski symphony and Loeffler's three Irish songs with orchestra, were works of the first rank. At last night's concert, in Carnegie Hall, he introduced another new piece that, whatever its ultimate evaluation, seemed at first hearing to be far above the average in merit.

It is Arnold Bax's "November Woods," a tone poem for orchestra. Bax is one of the younger generation of British composers, and has written much chamber and orchestral music, some of which has been heard here in other seasons.

There is a gratifying directness and solidity about this new work. It has atmosphere, and plenty of it—shimmering muted strings, quivering woodwind leaves, and a fitful chromatic gale that occasionally rocks the orchestra to its very bass. But the instrumental coloring is incidental. The composer has introduced themes, and actually developed them, using his orchestration as a background rather than a smoke screen.

We do not know exactly what program Mr. Bax had in mind. The Boston people have never got around to sending us Philip Hale's program notes, and a brother reviewer whose copy we tried to borrow refused on the ridiculous grounds that we would probably not return it. So we were obliged to rely upon the music itself for our idea of it.

Perhaps that is the best way. At all events we received a vivid impression of a man walking through a forest in a biting autumn gale. The feeling of motion was there, and the cold, and the pathetic beauty of dying things. For a little time the traveller set his feet upon a path that had already been well trodden—the dry leaves bore the hoof prints of Debussy's faun.

But it was not for long. Bax turned resolutely back from this trail that has lured so many young victims to their undoing, and plodded up the steep and tangled way marked, "Be Yourself." He succeeded, for the most part, admirably. "November Woods" may or may not be a work of great viability, but it is the work of an honest craftsman who has pleasant and sometimes beautiful things to say.

Mozart—the E flat symphony—began the evening, and Strauss—"Don Quixote"—brought it to a close. Jean Bedetti played the solo cello part with ample tone and evident understanding, and Mr. Monteux provided him a colorful and perfectly proportioned accompaniment.

Brilliant Numbers in Boston Symphony Orchestra Programme for This Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Of the Faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music.

Six numbers instead of the customary four make the programme chosen by Mr. Monteux for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Infantry Hall next Tuesday evening, and thereby it offers widely ranging musical pleasures. First on the list stands the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert, most celebrated of all musical fragments, its own existing movements outweighing in importance all but a few whole symphonies of other composers. It was last played in Providence by the orchestra five seasons ago under the direction of M. Rabaud.

In 1822 Schubert, then 25 years old, was elected an honorary member of the Musical Society of Graz, in Austria. By way of acknowledgment of the compliment he immediately set to work in Vienna upon the composition of a symphony, of which he finished two movements and nine measures of a third. For what reason the piece was never completed will in all likelihood remain a mystery. We do know, however, that Schubert himself never heard this marvellous music, and that the score barely escaped being lost. Long after Schubert's death the conductor Johann Herbeck obtained the manuscript from Schubert's friend, Anselm Huttenbrenner, and the symphony was first played under Herbeck's direction at Vienna in 1865. Since that time it has ever held a peculiar place in the popular esteem, if not the greatest, it is at least the best loved of symphonies.

Much of the music of Schubert breathes a certain gentle melancholy, and Sir George Grove has characterized the first movement of the "Unfinished" Symphony as "sadly full of agitation and distress." Schubert's was not an altogether happy life, and perhaps this symphony may be regarded as a "personal document." Beginning gravely, in 'cellos and double-basses, the first movement proceeds with increasing intensity and added sonority to a climax of almost tragic power. Though he never succeeded as a writer of opera, Schubert had a strong dramatic feeling, and it was never better exemplified than here.

To the prevailing sadness of the movement the second theme, one of the composer's most charming melodies, brings a note of consolation. In the Andante Schubert forsakes the sombre key of B minor for the rich and satisfying tonality of E major, and this serene movement, with its limpid modulations, its exquisitely euphonious instrumentation, is pure song—from the first bar to the last, unbroken melody. It is not beyond probability that Schubert felt himself incapable of writing a third movement that could worthily follow this Andante and so, rather than mar the effect of that which he had already achieved, he suffered the two movements to stand alone.

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" is the fourth in Strauss's monumental series of symphonic poems that began with "Macbeth" and, for the present ends with the "Alpine Symphony"—a work that signifies a lamentable decline in the composer's powers. These powers are, however, seen at their fullest in "Till Eulenspiegel," by many considered the greatest of his tone poems. This work will be new to many Providence hearers, for, somewhat surprisingly, it has not been played here by the Boston orchestra since Jan. 2, 1912, under Fiedler as conductor. "A Rondo After the Old-Fashioned, Roguish Manner"—freely to translate Strauss's sub-title—"Till Eulenspiegel" describes various adventures in the life of Tyl Owlglass, a half-legendary German clown who lived probably in the first half of the 14th century and became celebrated in song and story for his wild escapades and fooleries. This music, vividly delineative, is yet so admirable in form, so spontaneous in melodic invention, that it might almost stand as an orchestral Scherzo, without other title. Yet it would be unfair to the composer to hear the music with no knowledge of its purport. The passage, for example, in which the Judge, when Tyl is finally brought to the bar of justice, thrice thunders his accusation, to be thrice answered by a piteous squeal from the culprit, would be meaningless as absolute music, yet as tonal drama it is wholly irresistible. In this incredibly brilliant score Strauss has set in effective contrast sharply characterizing phrases and frankly charming melodies of folk-song flavor. Here he is humorist, story-teller, poet and master-composer in one.

The remaining numbers stand in no great need of anticipatory comment. For his ballet "Pulcinella," with its action based on a manuscript discovered at Naples in 1700, Stravinsky took portions of the various operas of Pergolesi, re-touched their harmonies and rewrote their instrumentation. "But sometimes," as a reviewer of the London Times remarked apropos a performance of the ballet at Covent Garden in June, 1920, "Stravinsky cannot hold himself in any longer, and, kicking Pergolesi out of his light, defeats the primary purpose by interpolating a moment or two of sheer Stravinsky." The piece has not been played in Providence before.

Dvorak's Concerto for 'cello is in his characteristic manner; in other words, it is melodious, felicitously harmonized, and ingeniously orchestrated. To many the great Bohemian is known only through his over-popular "Humoresque," and perhaps his Symphony "From the New World." Yet the list of his works is a considerable one, covering every field of composition, and though much of his music is already outmoded, not a little of it seems definitely established in the concert repertory. Mr. Bedetti's second number will be Max Bruch's transcription of the traditional Hebrew melody "Kol Nidrei." Although the melodies of Stravinsky's ballet are taken from the works of Pergolesi, who lived in the early part of the 18th century, their treatment by one of the most advanced of contemporary composers is typically modern. Both of these numbers are new on the orchestra's Providence programme.

If "Till Eulenspiegel" is the most brilliant orchestral piece from the hand of a present-day composer, so may Chabrier's "Espana," the closing number, be accounted the most brilliant composition for orchestra by any writer of the preceding generation. Chabrier did not produce a great deal during the 53 years of his life (1841-1894), and not all that he wrote is of even worth. But he was a bold and original spirit, and a veritable master of instrumentation. His "Espana," the direct result of a journey to Spain, is based on melodies heard in that country. Dazzling, scintillating, rhythmically intoxicating, melodically seductive, the "Espana" has made Chabrier immortal. And it is safe to predict that it will be known and loved when the work of some of his more prolific, more imposing contemporaries have passed into oblivion. The work was last played here by the orchestra in 1916.

PROV. JOURNAL - JAN 21.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening at Symphony hall the Boston Symphony orchestra will give its 13th pair of regular concerts of the season, to be followed by a trip to New York and other cities, which will occupy the ensuing week. Mr. Monteux will fill the larger part of this program by the first performance in Boston of Holst's "The Planets," a cycle that has been heard in New York and other cities, and by virtue of which this living English composer is regarded as one of the finest in that country. The seven planets are characterized as follows: Mars, the bringer of war; Venus, the bringer of peace; Mercury, the winged messenger; Jupiter, the bringer of jollity; Saturn, the bringer of old age; Uranus, the magician; Neptune, the mystic. The program will also include MacDowell's "Indian" suite, in accordance with the memorial celebration of the American composer to be held this week.

RENEE CHEMET

Renee Chemet, the French violinist, who is reputed in Europe to be one of the finest living, will be the soloist at the second concert of the extra Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony hall on Monday, Jan. 29. She will play Bruch's Concerto in G minor. Mr. Monteux will open the program with the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky, considered by some his masterpiece, of higher musical beauty than the "Pathetic" Symphony. Lalo's overture to the "King of Ys," a work of particular brilliance and color, and introducing a beautiful and celebrated violoncello solo, will be played; likewise the symphonic poem "Finlandia" by Sibelius, which was so exciting to the people of Finland when played there before the war that its performance had to be forbidden by the authorities representing Russia, the oppressor of Finland.

HERALD - JAN 21.

RENEE CHEMET (LEFT), VIOLINIST,

HOLST AND THE HEAVENS

MR. MONTEUX COMES AT LAST TO "THE PLANETS"

The Seven Tone-Poems, Accounted Masterpieces of Present English Music, to Be Played at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow—A Composer Who Ranks with Bax and Vaughan Williams—The Pending Suite and Other Work

AMONG the rising generation of composers it may be, as Ernest Newman is fond of pointing out, that there is not a single instance of towering individuality or even a solitary example of unquestioned genius. Nevertheless there is a vast array of interesting and promising talent. Innovation, the well-spring of art, is rife. There is a deal of wholesome investigation and experimentation, and there is a steady production of music, novel in form and content, that—if the hearer be open-minded—may make of concert-going a persistently stimulating experience. More than at any time within the last century the concert-hall is now a battle-ground of ideas, and the developments of the next decade or two will be interesting to watch; for it is the vexing question of the hour whether the future lies with the extreme radicals or with those who would build more solidly upon the old foundations. Probably both will have their place. There is room in the art for a Palestrina as well as for a Berlioz, for both a Wagner and a Brahms.

Each of the principal countries of Europe today has among its representative younger composers instances of both of these types. Italy breeds revolutionaries in Casella and Malipiero and, in Pizzetti and Respighi, the upholders of more conservative ideals. In Austria there are on the one hand Korngold and Schrecker, and on the other the pupils of Schönberg, outvying their master in "anarchy." Of the Parisians, Milhaud and Honegger have broken with the past more completely than have any of their companions. And so it goes. Even England, once reactionary, now has such men as Goossens, Lord Berners and Arthur Bliss who, though they seem to be following the lead of their Continental brethren rather than seeking out new paths for themselves have written music that throws convention to the winds.

England has also a trinity of composers who, standing squarely on the past yet hold themselves sufficiently free of academic formulas and practices readily to find a point of contact with the new movement. These men, ranged in the order of present independence in the traditional canons of their art, are Vaughan Williams, Arnold Bax and Gustav Holst. Already the names of Williams and Bax are familiar on this side of the Atlantic, and the music of these two is fast winning high place in the regard of the open-eared and discriminating listener. Thus far Holst has been known hereabouts only through two of his songs from the Sanskrit "Rig Veda" sung here last season by Mme. Gauthier. At the Symphony Concerts of this week, however, Mr. Monteux is to play Holst's orchestral suite, "The Planets" to date the most important, and probably the most thoroughly characteristic of his compositions.

Man and Music

Before setting forth the nature and content of this music, in many ways unusual, it may be of service to the prospective hearer briefly to revew the outstanding incidents of Holst's career, and to touch upon the nature of the man himself. The readily obtainable facts concerning Holst's early life are few. On his father's side the composer is of Swedish descent, though the family, which had long been settled in Russia, moved to England more than a hundred years ago, and Holst's mother was of pure British blood. Holst was born at Cheltenham, Sept. 1, 1874. He was a pupil in composition of Sir Charles Stanford at the Royal Academy of Music. He had prepared himself for the career of church-organist but, feeling the need of practical orchestral experience, he mastered the trombone, and his present great skill in instrumentation is due in large measure to the "inside" knowledge of the orchestra thus obtained. Frail in body as the result of a delicate childhood, Holst has nevertheless been an indefatigable worker, a writer of many pieces in large and small form, and exceedingly active as a teacher.

For some time past Holst has been musical director of Morley College and an illuminating account of his work in this capacity appears, together with much else of interest concerning him, in a pair of articles written by Vaughan Williams and printed in the English magazine Music and Letters during the year 1920:

> Everyone who comes to Holst must take music seriously—indeed they cannot help it—and it is his very insistence which has made the success of his musical directorship of Morley College. When he first began teaching there he found music treated as a side issue—a sort of decoy to attract students of the college. The authorities were rather alarmed when he openly rejoiced at the fact that the old type of music student began to fall off when he took over the directorship, and there was the inevitable anxious period when the old students left and the new ones had not begun to arrive. The directors looked glum and seriously thought of asking Holst to resign, but in the end he won through, the right students came flocking in—those who really wanted to learn—and now the authorities recognize the music classes at "Morley" as one of their greatest assets.

Holst is a mystic. For him the ancient Eastern philosophy has a deep significance and an absorbing fascination. That he might better set the poems of the "Rig Veda" he mastered enough Sanskit to make his own translation. But for all these Eastern leanings Holst is not an "exoticist" in his music; his one frankly Oriental composition is the symphonic suite, "Beni Mora." His tendencies towards mysticism are again observable in the "Hymn of Jesus," based on the Apochryphal Acts of St. John, and one of Holst's most significant pieces; while in the final number of "The Planets, by title "Neptune, or the Mystic," the composer is once more seen in this, his most characteristic guise. Here again Mr. Williams comments are of interest: "With all his idealism and mysticism, Holst has never allowed himself to become a mere dreamer. He is a visionary, but he never allows dreams to inhibit action. He has a strong saving sense of humor—indeed, he might, if he had chosen, have made a name for himself as a comedy actor. . . . Holst has pursued the calling of a hard working, revered and inspiring teacher, he has been a good citizen, a firm friend, a reliable helper in time of trouble. . . . We may sum up Holst's characteristics as exemplified in his life and reflected in his art as great force of character, indomitable energy, sense of thoroughness and above all, intense human sympathy."

Besides the pieces already mentioned Holst's more important compositions include a setting for soprano and orchestra of Whitman's "Mystic Trumpeter," an "Ode to Death" based upon the same poet's "President Lincoln's Funeral Hymn" and, most recent of all, a ballet, "The Perfect Fool," the music of which has been highly praised. The one example of Holst's writing already heard here, the hymn from the "Rig Veda" reveal him as a composer who seeks broad simplicity of effect; and the score of "The Planets," complex though it is in certain passages points to the same conclusion. For Mr. Williams Holst's music is wholesomely and rationally contemporaneous. Variously he says:

> In claiming for Gustav Holst that he is essentially a modern composer I am from the outset laying myself open to misconstruction. The word "modern" has been much abused, but I would point out that there is all the difference in the world between music which is modern and that which is in "the modern idiom." The "modern idiom" consists of a handful of tricks of instrumentation coupled with a harmonic texture watered down from the writings of composers who flourished twenty-five years ago. With this kind of thing Holst's music has nothing to do; he does not sum up all the harmonic tricks of the last quarter-century; he does not introduce a "major ninth" every eight bars; he is not afraid of long tunes (he has often the courage to let them stand alone or with the merest suggestion of harmony); he is not always making eight horns bellow out high D's; he owes much to Bach, to Purcell, to Byrd and Wilbye, and yet (or perhaps therefore) he is one of the few composers who can be called truly modern. . . .
>
> If Holst's music is modern it is not that he has acquired a few tricks which today are hailed with wonder and tomorrow are as flat as stale ginger-beer, but that he has a mind which is the heir of all the centuries and has found out the language in which to express that mind. He has shown his modernity equally whether he is straining our harmonic sense to breaking point . . . or writing a simple, broad melody like the middle section out of "Jupiter."
>
> Indeed, Holst's work never sounds "modern" in the narrow sense of the word (except now and then when he is exceptionally off his stroke), and the reason is that he knows what he wants to say and the way in which he means to say it. There is no attempt to tickle jaded nerves with "new effects" and thus the very strangeness of his harmonic texture escapes the notice of the curio-hunter, because it is absolutely germane to the whole conception. So it is with his masterly writing for the orchestra—so masterly that it escapes notice. . . .
>
> The mystical frame of mind naturally begets a certain austerity in Holst's later music. Austerity is sometimes a cover for artistic impotence. The composer says "I will not" when he means "I cannot." This negative austerity is not, of course, what I refer to here. Holst is never negative; his very faults are those of commission, not of omission. His austerity leads not to dulness or emptiness but to harmony which is acrid rather than luscious; melody sometimes angular but never indefinite or sugary; orchestration which is brilliant and virile but not cloying. . . . Holst's weaknesses are the defects of his qualities—occasionally his magnificent technique masters him and the end gets lost in the means.

If, as Mr. Williams asesrts, "The Planets" represents Holst at his fullest and best, we can shortly make up our own minds regarding him. This Suite was com [illegible] were heard in Londo 1918 while Holst was absent as a mem of the Salonica Expeditionary Force initial performance of the Suite as a w took place at a concert of the London S phony Orchestra, under Albert Coates November, 1920; then and at subsequ hearings the music was received with g enthusiasm—so great, in fact, that on first occasion the composer was called the stage to bow his acknowledgme while the piece was still in progress!

"The Planets"

For Holst in the writing of his S the planets themselves have their astrol cal significance rather than the conn tions suggested by the characters of deities whose names they bear. In pla tary lore Neptune, as god of uncha waters, becomes associated with mystic and Uranus, the fructifier of the earth, comes "The Magician." Saturn is but other name for old Father Time and t he is "the Bringer of Old Age." "Ma Bringer of War," is clear enough, the titles "Venus, Bringer of Peace," a "Jupiter, Bringer of Jollity," again su gest astrology rather than the more miliar mythology.

Technically the music of "The Planets may be said to consist of an elaborate o chestral presentaion of thoughts and idea essentially direct, clear-cut and explicit Holst's style is here chordal rather tha polyphonic. There is little of the complex weaving of voices in varying rhythms by reason of which the later scores of Strauss for example, make so confusing an impression upon the eye, and which, in day one by, caused them to impose so severe a ax upon the listening ear.

The first number of the Suite, "Mars, the ringer of War," runs throughout in 5-4 ime. A "pedal" tone is reiterated by the trings in an insistent, savage rhythm. Wind instruments groan, shriek, mutter nd cry in discordant rage. For contrast omes a section suggestive of military music, with trumpet-calls and the rattle f snare-drums, and thereafter the former ellish din returns intensified.

In the second division, "Venus, the Bringer of Peace," all is euphony and serenity. At the outset a single horn proclaims a placid motiv of ascending tones, while woodwinds in harmony gently answer. The middle section is broadly songful, but nowhere in the music is there any hint of the erotically sensuous. Holst has been faithful to his text.

A peculiarity of the third piece, "Mercury, the Winged Messenger," is the division of key-signatures. First violins and violas and one harp play in the key of B-flat major; the second harp, second violins and violoncellos play in A major, the rest content themselves with no signature at all. It should be noted, however, that these opposing tonalities of B-flat and A are constantly interchanged rather than combined in the fashion of polyharmony. This racing Scherzo, mercurial as its name implies, should make pleasant diversion.

Also scherzo-like, though in bluff, hearty vein, is "Jupiter, Bringer of Jollity"; the pervading key is C major. Regarding the broad melody for violins accompanied by the other strings that makes the Trio, Vaughan Williams offers the suggestion that it "ought to be the climax of some great movement which would take the place in the popular esteem of the sentimentalities of 'Finlandia.'" Toward the end there is a radiantly shimmering passage in B major, perhaps intended as a reminder of Jove's divinity.

In his musical interpretation of "Saturn, he Bringer of Old Age," Holst does not ake attractive the burden of years. This usic, wan and sluggish, suggests senesence and decay, the deterioration of all hings, spiritual and physical. Yet the end is in more hopeful vein. Uranus with his nagic brings "comic relief." Here is Scherzo number three, a cheerful, boisterous piece, with occasional hint of incantation; and in the final uproar comes a glissando for full organ!

As Strauss at the end of "Zarathustra" would suggest the riddle of the universe by a juxtaposition of opposing tonalities so Holst in the final number of his Suite ses strange clashes of key to express the mystic, Neptune. Here a chorus of women's voices is added to the score, and throughout the orchestra plays its intangible music in a veiled whisper.

It seemed for a time as though the composers of the hour had definitely abandoned the huge orchestral apparatus development through the nineteenth century. But in "The Planets" Holst speaks of cosmic forces and he must needs score his music for a vast array of instruments. The woodwinds are in groups of four, a tenor-tuba, a fifth and sixth horn and a fourth trumpet are added to the usual brass, while the percussion section, with its six kettle-drums, is a small band in itself. Yet the end the composer seeks—and seemingly gains—clarity rather than confusion, and thus does he prove his mastery.

W. S. S.

TRANS. [illegible]

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The second concert of the special evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will take place Monday evening in Symphony Hall. The soloist will be Renee Chemet, the French violinist, who is considered one of the finest living virtuosos of the violin.

AMER- [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Seven Tone-Poems by Holst, "The Planets," Bulk of Program

MacDOWELL "INDIAN SUITE" ALSO PLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program included "The Planets," a set of seven tone-poems, by Gustav Holst, and MacDowell's "Indian" Suite.

Some, reading the announcement of this concert, may have thought that the composer of "The Planets" purposed to give his hearers a fair idea of the music of the spheres. This music, by the way, has never been heard by mortal man except by Pythagoras. We do not hear it, he said, because we are accustomed to it from our birth and cannot distinguish any sound save by the silence opposed to it. According to the great philosopher, so cruelly mocked by Lucian, Saturn sounds the lowest tone; the moon, the highest. Those who wish to inquire curiously into this celestial music should read the treatise by the learned Prof. Piper, "Von der Harmonie der Sphaeren," published in 1849.

Holst, an Englishman of Swedish descent, born in 1874, and now reckoned a leader in the more advanced body of English musicians, was not so ambitious. He contented himself by composing in 1915 and 1916 seven tone-poems which should illustrate musically the astrological significance and influence of Mars, the Bringer of War; Venus, the Bringer of Peace; Mercury, the Winged Messenger; Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity; Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age; Uranus, the Magician, and Neptune, the Mystic.

The composer has said that these tone-poems are without a program; they have no connection with the deities bearing the same names; the subtitles are a sufficient guide.

It will astonish some to find Venus described as the Bringer of Peace. The common opinion is that she has stirred up foreign and domestic strife; invaded households; a goddess smiling on battle, murder and sudden death. A famous but unquotable line of Horace shows how she brought on the Trojan war. In astrology Uranus is a transformer, hence a magician, while Neptune represents the state of union with the infinite, the seeking after the ideal. I fear that those now consulting the astrologers are more concerned with fortunate days for doing business or marrying than with the sublime attributes ascribed to the planets.

Holst has certainly written uncommon music. He has fancy, if not imagination, and the two are not always easily distinguished in spite of Coleridge's long-winded definitions. He has learned thoroughly harmonic and orchestral technic, and, as his invention is fertile and he has a pronounced sense of color, this cycle contains in turn ravishing, impressive, surprising pages. Take "Mars" for example. There is the suggestion of iron and brass; defiant inexorable militarism. And here the tremendous effect is gained by comparatively simple means. In "Venus," charming as much of the music is, Holst is more sophisticated, more audacious in his harmonic scheme. "Mercury" is, appropriately, a nimble Scherzo, lightly scored for the most part. The "jollity" in "Jupiter" is inspired by ale rather than wine; it is heavy-footed and the tunes are not free from vulgarity. The composer's imagination is at its height in "Saturn" and in "Neptune." The former is music that should not accompany old age as Walt Whitman knew it: "Old age superbly rising! Ineffable grace of dying days." Here is sullen, complaining, dismal old age, but how graphic the expression! "Neptune," on the contrary, is, indeed, mystical, beautifully so, not vaguely, not gropingly.

There are drawbacks to the full enjoyment of this cycle. There is the besetting sin of many modern English composers—prolixity. Endless repetitions of unimportant themes or fragments of themes fret the nerves, no matter how ingeniously they are tossed from one group of instruments to another or proclaimed by the full orchestra. Mr. Carpenter of Chicago puts his trust in the xylophone; Mr. Holst puts his in the celesta, which is worked overtime. Mr. Holst once told a friend that he loved to write a tune. Unfortunately, some of his tunes, as in "Jupiter," are common. Strange to say, in this cycle there are few, if any, truly sensuous strains. Mercury in mythology was the god of thieves as well as the heavenly messenger. Mr. Holst did not take advantage of this fact in his "Mercury," but when the bassoons began their business early in "Uranus" we thought for a moment that Mr. Monteux was interpolating "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by one Paul [illegible]

"The Planets" is in many ways a remarkable work, one that should be heard again, and soon. The performance was brilliant.

Mr. Monteux gave a sympathetic reading of MacDowell's Suite. The noble and affecting "Dirge" is, truly, the orchestral masterpiece of the lamented composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. [illegible] of Feb. 9, 10 will be as [illegible] Symphony in B flat [illegible] "From the Garden of [illegible] suite (first time at [illegible] Concerto [illegible] Fantasticas first time in America. Toscha Seidel will be the solo violinist.

HERALD-JAN 27.

HOLST'S "PLANETS" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Suite Proves Original and Delightful Music

Mr Monteux devoted yesterday's Symphony concert to the performance of two orchestral suites, Holst's "The Planets," and MacDowell's "Indian Suite." Holst's music introduced to Boston audiences a composer seemingly more significant than any British subject since Purcell, except possibly Elgar.

"The Planets" is modern music, not modernist, yet not academic, or imitative. Mr Holst is not afraid of writing melodies that anybody can understand as such. He does not shun gay, lively human moods in his work, for fear of being thought less noble and profound than Beethoven and Wagner, or less exquisitely refined than Debussy. He seems to have escaped the baneful influence of these three great geniuses, who between them have ruined most of the lesser composers for a century past.

One sometimes wonders whether Milhaud, or Cyril Scott, or Leo Ornstein, or Malipiero could write a simple melody of the good old diatonic sort, or even of the Debussy or Strauss chromatic variety. Mr Holst can write fluent, agreeable, original melody, either diatonic or chromatic so readily that he does not need to be parsimonious of his themes, after the Richard Strauss fashion.

Having conceived his themes, in which an extraordinarily rhythmic sense is as manifest as an instinct for melody, Holst readily finds their natural harmonic and orchestral dress. He is in short a genius, not an aspiring talent like the rest of the younger British composers.

"The Planets," besides proving its composer possessed of a musical imagination too fertile to need the aid of a literary program, shows that he has the gift of saying things at length, with a natural and unlabored elaboration of form. The seven pieces, of which the titles merely suggest the mood the old astrologers associated with each planet, are all music, never unintelligent piling together of notes.

MacDowell's longer works have begun to date badly, though many of his short piano pieces, often not the ones best known to amateurs, keep their freshness. This "Indian Suite," with its themes chosen on the curious assumption that the red Indians were the only real Americans, palls upon the listener. The real American music will grow naturally out of our own popular music, unless the evolution of music in this country differs from its course everywhere else. "Jazz" and not Indian tunes will be its inspiration.

Holst's piece, played with more eloquence than accuracy, was very cordially applauded. One hopes to hear it many times in future.

There are no regular Symphony concerts next week, as the orchestra will go on tour after the Monday evening extra concert.

GLOBE-JAN 27.

Springfield
MASS.
Republican
ISSUE OF
Jan 3

YMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS HERE SUNDAY

Noted Musical Organization Under Direction of Pierre Monteux at Auditorium

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its annual appearance at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the direction of the Young Men's Christian assaciation. This is the only city in the United States in which an aggregation of musicians,

PIERRE MONTEUX

admittedly the greatest of its kind, appears year after year at at concert to which everyone, citizen or stranger, is admitted free, and as a consequence one of every 35 persons in S[illegible] expected to [illegible] in [illegible] the Audit[illegible]

It will be [illegible] at 100, and a great program will be given under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor. The concert will begin at 3 sharp. The side doors will be open shortly after 2 and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets can be obtained at the Y. M. C. A. and the leading music stores in the city.

FROM JAN 3 1923
UNION,
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

Annual Appearance at Y. M. C. A. Auditorium Service This Sunday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. This is the only city in the United States in which an aggregation of musicians, admittedly the greatest of its kind, appears year after year at a concert to which everyone, citizen or stranger, is admitted free, and as a consequence one of every 35 persons in Springfield will be in the great auditorium Sunday afternoon.

It will be the full orchestra of 100, and a great program will be given under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor. The program in detail will be published later in the week.

The concert will begin at 3 o'clock sharp. The side doors will be open shortly after 2 o'clock and the side doors at 2.45. Tickets can be obtained, (subscription or free), at the Y. M. C. A., and the leading music stores in the city.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF JAN 5 1923

Limitations of Concert Conductors

Mistakes Made by Great Leaders and Others—How Mahler Changed His Mind

Boston Orchestra Plays Mozart Symphony, Strauss's "Don Quixote," and English Novelty

By Henry T. Finck

The present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, is reported to have said that the "Indian Suite" was not good enough for his programmes. Perhaps the trouble is the other way; I cannot conceive him as able to reveal the subtle poetry of America's foremost composition. Though not one of the greatest conductors, M. Monteux has his limitations, which are apparently reflected in the greatly reduced size of the Carnegie Hall audiences of the Boston Orchestra. The orchestra itself is better than that of our other visitors, the Philadelphians, but Stokowsky's popularity helps to fill the house. There is a lesson for us in this state of affairs. The Philharmonic has twice in its history suffered great damage from unwise changes in conductorship. See the figures in Krehbiel's history of that institution.

Though still a splendid orchestra, the Boston band was not at its best last night in Mozart's E flat major symphony, which lacked the requisite lightness and polish. Then came two works in which it could show off its prowess to much better advantage; a novelty by Bax entitled "November Woods" and Strauss's artificially clever "Don Quixote," in which Georges Fourel and Jean Beditti played the viola and 'cello solos.

If compositions could be metamorphosed into oranges and squeezed, I should say that it would take a dozen "November Woods" to yield as much juice as the "Indian Suite." However, Bax's piece does not pose as Britain's best composition, so let us drop odious comparisons.

Philip Hale, who was one of the first to hail MacDowell's genius—"a real genius, not a Boston genius," as he wittily put it—gives this information regarding the composer heard last night:

"Arnold E. Trevor Bax was educated musically at the Royal Academy of Music, London, which he entered in 1900. He studied the pianoforte with Tobias Matthay; composition with Frederick Corder. His first compositions are dated 1903. Leaving the Royal Academy in 1905, he went to Ireland, where he lived in the western region of that country. Later he went to Dublin, and was associated with the writers and the artists of the 'Irish Renaissance.' In 1910 Bax visited Russia for a short time, and the pianoforte pieces 'May Night in the Ukraine,' 'Gopak,' and the remarkable 'In a Vodka Shop' were the result. Very few of his larger works [illegible] been published, but [illegible] ludes, 'The Slave Girl,' w[illegible] formed that Mme. Karsavina [illegible] it as 'one of the most brutal and savage pieces of music I have ever heard.'"

There is nothing "brutal" in the "November Woods" and its savagery is justified by the sounds of autumnal storms, cracking branches, and falling trees. The piece—like most of Strauss's compositions—is too long for its unimportant melodic ideas, but it is agreeably atmospheric and Bax handles his orchestral forces with a masterly hand. Some richly colored details make one suspect that the red American autumn leaves are not entirely unknown in England. The loveliest spots in the score are vaguely reminiscent of Wagner and Debussy.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
JAN 5 1923

Pierre Monteux has done little enough to further American music during the years of his conducting opera and concerts in the United States, but he has conducted for us a good deal of unfamiliar, and often wholly new, European music. Last night he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Carnegie Hall concert in the first local performance of "November Woods," a symphonic poem by the English composer Arnold Bax.

An English commentator has spoken of this work as inspired by "the dank and stormy ruin of nature in the autumn." An eminent local musician who was present last evening remarked that "November Woods" would have sounded out of tune if it had been played with unanimity. The latter sort of criticism has little value as far as the work itself is concerned, for doubtless Bax aimed at just some such effect. There is not much use in talking 1850 about the music of 1923.

The concert opened with Mozart's E flat major symphony; Frenchmen seem to have a mania for conducting this work. It closed with Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." The performance of that elaborate piece was careful and suave. When it did not invite to slumber it reminded the thoughtful listener of how utterly pre-Noah most of this once "daring" and even "revolutionary" composition sounds to-day. The solos for viola and 'cello were played by Georges Fourel and Jean Bedetti, respectively, and played well. An audience of only moderate size received this concert with a prevailing equanimity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give another concert in Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon, when the programme will consist of d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Stravinsky's first suite from his ballet "Pulcinella" for small orchestra (after Pergolesi), César Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes."

An admirable orchestra gives a boresome concert. P. S.

N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
JAN 5 1923

Music in Manhattan

Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "November Woods," was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Monteux's leadership, at Carnegie Hall last night. Bax is a young Britisher of forty years of age and a composer, who not only has something to say, but who knows how to say it remarkably well. There is no "programme" to the poem heard last evening other than the title. It is an "impression" of "the dank and stormy ruin of nature in late autumn." There are Debussyisms in Arnold Bax's musical matter and manner, but not enough of them to disturb the individuality of his own highly stamped personal idiom. The work received a beautiful performance.

Also upon Mr. Monteux's programme were Mozart's E flat major symphony and Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote."

To-night, in Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music, the Boston band will play Stravinsky's first suite from the ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi), Vincent d' Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy and the Grieg piano concerto, with Mme. Olga Samaroff as soloist.

JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
JAN 5 1923

ENGLISHMAN'S MUSIC PLAYED BY MONTEUX

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Performance of New Piece by Arnold Bax.

Pierre Monteux, for the second [illegible] orchestral m[illegible] Arnold Bax. This was a [illegible] called "November Woods," written some five years ago and given its first American performance two months since by Frederick Stock and the Chicago Orchestra. Both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Stock have shown considerable interest in Bax—far more so than any of our local conductors. This young Englishman (who is really a Celt) is now forty, and such of his music as has already been heard here seemed to make this interest in him quite worth while.

His "November Woods," however, seemed to be neither of a spontaneous inventive quality nor intrinsically so attractive as his "Garden of Fand," or as the string quartet played some weeks ago by the Flonzaleys. It is very much more obvious and conventional in scheme and intent and, altogether, less interesting.

Bax's Orchestral Skill.

The music, nevertheless, is the work of a first-class artisan. Its instrumentation is happy and its orchestration nicely made to fulfill the expression of what the composer had in his mind to say. The piece may be roughly divided into three large sections. The beginning of it suggests the wooded landscape of early Winter, whilst the middle part is a reflection of this external mood upon the contemplative introspection of the beholder—ruminative, drear and considerably dour. Finally, the two things are interwoven and the piece ends in a few bars remarkably expressive of a momentarily chilled heart. Here the music becomes astonishingly impersonal, as cold as a vacuum, dripping with frost. The thing is almost uncanny in its suggestion and, in its way, is a triumphant bit of orchestral skill.

It is difficult to know just how well Mr. Monteux played Mr. Bax's music. A good deal of it sounded as though it were being done as it should be, but some of it distinctly lacked something in vitality and finish. One can, indeed, imagine a much more vivid performance of it than Mr. Monteux gave it. Nor did the orchestra handle the piece with great smoothness or nicety in detail.

Last night's programme opened with Mozart's E flat symphony which was not very persuasively played, and closed with Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote."

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
JAN 5 1923

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night Mr. Monteux played a new composition by Arnold Bax called "November Woods." The woods in November are generally pretty dreary, and so was this piece. And yet it ought not to have been, for it was a sort of composite photograph of pages of the scores of Debussy, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky, Wagner and other real composers. "No sun, no moon, no warmth, no new ideas—November."

The first number was Mozart's Symphony in E flat. In the first movement Mr. Monteux, after the slow introduction, began the "Allegro" in a sort of minuet tempo; later on he hurried up to the proper tempo, and on the repeat the beginning was played in the allegro rate of speed. A curious nuance of tempo, to say the least. In the Andante the first bassoon added to the gaiety of nations by indulging in a "couac." The Minuet and Finale went better.

The last number was the "Don Quixote" variations of Richard Strauss. This was very well played; Jean Bedetti played the cello solo, representing the knight with a warm tone and good phrasing; Georges Fourel played the viola solo, "Sancho Panza," in a musicianly manner.

From JAN 5 1923
EVENING WORLD
New York City

Boston Symphony Plays a New Composition by Arnold Bax.

By Frank H. Warren.

The season's record crop of orchestral concerts is beginning to exceed the public demand, if one may deduce anything definite from last evening's attendance at the second Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Mozart's [illegible]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

13TH SYMPHONY CONCERT GIVEN

Seven Tone-Poems by Holst, "The Planets," Bulk of Program

MacDOWELL "INDIAN SUITE" ALSO PLAYED

By PHILIP HALE

The 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program included "The Planets," a set of seven tone-poems, by Gustav Holst, and MacDowell's "Indian" Suite.

Some, reading the announcement of this concert, may have thought that the composer of "The Planets" purposed to give his hearers a fair idea of the music of the spheres. This music, by the way, has never been heard by mortal man except by Pythagoras. We do not hear it, he said, because we are accustomed to it from our birth and cannot distinguish any sound save by the silence opposed to it. According to the great philosopher, so cruelly mocked by Lusian, Saturn sounds the lowest tone; the moon, the highest. Those who wish to inquire curiously into this celestial music should read the treatise by the learned Prof. Piper, "Von der Harmonie der Sphaeren," published in 1849.

Holst, an Englishman of Swedish descent, born in 1874, and now reckoned a leader in the more advanced body of English musicians, was not so ambitious. He contented himself by composing in 1915 and 1916 seven tone-poems which should illustrate musically the astrological significance and influence of Mars, the Bringer of War; Venus, the Bringer of Peace; Mercury, the Winged Messenger; Jupiter, the Bringer of Jollity; Saturn, the Bringer of Old Age; Uranus, the Magician, and Neptune, the Mystic.

The composer has said that these tone-poems are without a program; they have no connection with the deities bearing the same names; the subtitles are a sufficient guide.

It will astonish some to find Venus described as the Bringer of Peace. The common opinion is that she has stirred up foreign and domestic strife; invaded households; a goddess smiling on battle, murder and sudden death. A famous but unquotable line of Horace tells how she brought on the Trojan war. In astrology Uranus is a transformer, hence a magician, while Neptune represents the state of union with the infinite, the seeking after the ideal. I fear that those now consulting the astrologers are more concerned with fortunate days for doing business or marrying than with the sublime attributes ascribed to the planets.

Holst has certainly written uncommon music. He has fancy, if not imagination, and the two are not always easily distinguished in spite of Coleridge's long-winded definitions. He has learned thoroughly harmonic and orchestral technic, and, as his invention is fertile and he has a pronounced sense of color, this cycle contains in turn ravishing, impressive, surprising pages. Take "Mars" for example. There is the suggestion of iron and brass; defiant inexorable militarism. And here the tremendous effect is gained by comparatively simple means. In "Venus," charming as much of the music is, Holst is more sophisticated, more audacious in his harmonic scheme. "Mercury" is, appropriately, a nimble Scherzo, lightly scored for the most part. The "jollity" in "Jupiter" is inspired by ale rather than wine; it is heavy-footed and the tunes are not free from vulgarity. The composer's imagination is at its height in "Saturn" and in "Neptune." The former is music that should not accompany old age as Walt Whitman knew it: "Old age superbly rising! Ineffable grace of dying days." Here is sullen, complaining, dismal old age, but how graphic the expression! "Neptune," on the contrary, is, indeed, mystical, beautifully so, not vaguely, not gropingly.

There are drawbacks to the full enjoyment of this cycle. There is the besetting sin of many modern English composers—prolixity. Endless repetitions of unimportant themes or fragments of themes fret the nerves, no matter how ingeniously they are tossed from one group of instruments to another or proclaimed by the full orchestra. Mr. Carpenter of Chicago puts his trust in the xylophone; Mr. Holst puts his in the celesta, which is worked overtime. Mr. Holst once told a friend that he loved to write a tune. Unfortunately, some of his tunes, as in "Jupiter," are common. Strange to say, in this cycle there are few, if any, truly sensuous strains. Mercury in mythology was the god of thieves as well as the heavenly messenger. Mr. Holst did not take advantage of this fact in his "Mercury," but when the bassoons began their business early in "Uranus" we thought for a moment that Mr. Monteux was interpolating "The Sorcerer's Apprentice" by one Paul Dukas.

"The Planets" is in many ways a remarkable work, one that should be heard again, and soon. The performance was brilliant.

Mr. Monteux gave a sympathetic reading of MacDowell's Suite. The noble and affecting "Dirge" is, truly, the orchestral masterpiece of the lamented composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be away next week. The program of Feb. 9, 10 will be as follows: Chausson, Symphony in B flat major; [illegible], "From the Garden of [illegible]," orchestral suite (first time at [illegible] concerts); [illegible], Concerto for violin; Turina, Danzas Fantasticas (first time in America). Toscha Seidel will be the solo violinist.

HERALD-JAN. 27.

HOLST'S "PLANETS" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

New Suite Proves Original and Delightful Music

Mr Monteux devoted yesterday's Symphony concert to the performance of two orchestral suites, Holst's "The Planets," and MacDowell's "Indian Suite." Holst's music introduced to Boston audiences a composer seemingly more significant than any British subject since Purcell, except possibly Elgar.

"The Planets" is modern music, not modernist, yet not academic, or imitative. Mr Holst is not afraid of writing melodies that anybody can understand as such. He does not shun gay, lively human moods in his work, for fear of being thought less noble and profound than Beethoven and Wagner, or less exquisitely refined than Debussy. He seems to have escaped the baneful influence of these three great geniuses, who between them have ruined most of the lesser composers for a century past.

One sometimes wonders whether Milhaud, or Cyril Scott, or Leo Ornstein, or Malipiero could write a simple melody of the good old diatonic sort, or even of the Debussy or Strauss chromatic variety. Mr Holst can write fluent, agreeable, original melody, either diatonic or chromatic so readily that he does not need to be parsimonious of his themes, after the Richard Strauss fashion.

Having conceived his themes, in which an extraordinarily rhythmic sense is as manifest as an instinct for melody, Holst readily finds their natural harmonic and orchestral dress. He is in short a genius, not an aspiring talent like the rest of the younger British composers.

"The Planets," besides proving its composer possessed of a musical imagination too fertile to need the aid of a literary program, shows that he has the gift of saying things at length, with a natural and unlabored elaboration of form. The seven pieces, of which the titles merely suggest the mood the old astrologers associated with each planet, are all music, never unintelligent piling together of notes.

MacDowell's longer works have begun to date badly, though many of his short piano pieces, often not the ones best known to amateurs, keep their freshness. This "Indian Suite," with its themes chosen on the curious assumption that the red Indians were the only real Americans, palls upon the listener. The real American music will grow naturally out of our own popular music, unless the evolution of music in this country differs from its course everywhere else. "Jazz" and not Indian tunes will be its inspiration.

Holst's piece, played with more eloquence than accuracy, was very cordially applauded. One hopes to hear it many times in future.

There are no regular Symphony concerts next week, as the orchestra will go on tour after the Monday evening extra concert.

GLOBE-JAN. [illegible]

Springfield
MASS.
Republican
ISSUE OF

YMPHONY ORCHESTRA PLAYS HERE SUNDAY

Noted Musical Organization Under Direction of Pierre Monteux at Auditorium

The Boston Symphony orchestra will make its annual appearance at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the direction of the Young Men's Christian association. This is the only city in the United States in which an aggregation of musicians, admittedly the greatest of its kind, appears year after year at at concert to which everyone, citizen or stranger, is admitted free, and as a consequence one of every 35 persons in Springfield is expected to be in the Auditorium [illegible] afternoon.

PIERRE MONTEUX

It will be the [illegible] orchestra of 100, and a great program will be given under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor. The concert will begin at 3 sharp. The side doors will be open shortly after 2 and the front doors at 2.45. Tickets can be obtained at the Y. M. C. A. and the leading music stores in the city.

FROM JAN 3 1923
UNION,
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA COMING

Annual Appearance at Y. M. C. A. Auditorium Service This Sunday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its annual appearance at the Auditorium Sunday afternoon under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. This is the only city in the United States in which an aggregation of musicians, admittedly the greatest of its kind, appears year after year at a concert to which everyone, citizen or stranger, is admitted free, and as a consequence one of every 35 persons in Springfield will be in the great auditorium Sunday afternoon.

It will be the full orchestra of 100, and a great program will be given under the direction of Pierre Monteux, the famous conductor. The program in detail will be published later in the week.

The concert will begin at 3 o'clock sharp. The side doors will be open shortly after 2 o'clock and the side doors at 2.45. Tickets can be obtained, (subscription or free), at the Y. M. C. A., and the leading music stores in the city.

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF JAN 5 1923

Limitations of Concert Conductors

Mistakes Made by Great Leaders and Others—How Mahler Changed His Mind

Boston Orchestra Plays Mozart Symphony, Strauss's "Don Quixote," and English Novelty

By Henry T. Finck

The present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, is reported to have said that the "Indian Suite" was not good enough for his programmes. Perhaps the trouble is the other way; I cannot conceive him as able to reveal the subtle poetry of America's foremost composition. Though not one of the greatest conductors, M. Monteux has his limitations, which are apparently reflected in the greatly reduced size of the Carnegie Hall audiences of the Boston Orchestra. The orchestra itself is better than that of our other visitors, the Philadelphians, but Stokowsky's popularity helps to fill the house. There is a lesson for us in this state of affairs. The Philharmonic has twice in its history suffered great damage from unwise changes in conductorship. See the figures in Krehbiel's history of that institution.

Though still a splendid orchestra, the Boston band was not at its best last night in Mozart's E flat major symphony, which lacked the requisite lightness and polish. Then came two works in which it could show off its prowess to much better advantage: a novelty by Bax entitled "November Woods" and Strauss's artificially clever "Don Quixote," in which Georges Fourel and Jean Beditti played the viola and 'cello solos.

If compositions could be metamorphosed into oranges and squeezed, I should say that it would take a dozen "November Woods" to yield as much juice as the "Indian Suite." However, Bax's piece does not pose as Britain's best composition, so let us drop odious comparisons.

Philip Hale, who was one of the first to hail MacDowell's genius—"a real genius, not a Boston genius," as he wittily put it—gives this information regarding the composer heard last night:

"Arnold E. Trevor Bax was educated musically at the Royal Academy of Music, London, which he entered in 1900. He studied the pianoforte with Tobias Matthay; composition with Frederick Corder. His first compositions are dated 1903. Leaving the Royal Academy in 1905, he went to Ireland, where he lived in the western region of that country. Later he went to Dublin, and was associated with the writers and the artists of the 'Irish Renaissance.' In 1910 Bax visited Russia for a short time, and the pianoforte pieces 'May Night in the Ukraine,' 'Gopak,' and the remarkable 'In a Vodka Shop' were the result. Very few of his larger works have been published, but the [illegible] is now at hand."

Regarding [illegible] of his stage [illegible]ludes, "The Slave Girl," we are informed that Mme. Karsavina described it as "one of the most brutal and savage pieces of music I have ever heard."

There is nothing "brutal" in the "November Woods" and its savagery is justified by the sounds of autumnal storms, cracking branches, and falling trees. The piece—like most of Strauss's compositions—is too long for its unimportant melodic ideas, but it is agreeably atmospheric and Bax handles his orchestral forces with a masterly hand. Some richly colored details make one suspect that the red American autumn leaves are not entirely unknown in England. The loveliest spots in the score are vaguely reminiscent of Wagner and Debussy.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
JAN 5 1923

Pierre Monteux has done little enough to further American music during the years of his conducting opera and concerts in the United States, but he has conducted for us a good deal of unfamiliar, and often wholly new, European music. Last night he conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at its Carnegie Hall concert in the first local performance of "November Woods," a symphonic poem by the English composer Arnold Bax.

An English commentator has spoken of this work as inspired by "the dank and stormy ruin of nature in the autumn." An eminent local musician who was present last evening remarked that "November Woods" would have sounded out of tune if it had been played with unanimity. The latter sort of criticism has little value as far as the work itself is concerned, for doubtless Bax aimed at just some such effect. There is not much use in talking 1850 about the music of 1923.

The concert opened with Mozart's E flat major symphony; Frenchmen seem to have a mania for conducting this work. It closed with Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." The performance of that elaborate piece was careful and suave. When it did not invite to slumber it reminded the thoughtful listener of how utterly pre-Noah most of this once "daring" and even "revolutionary" composition sounds to-day. The solos for viola and 'cello were played by Georges Fourel and Jean Bedetti, respectively, and played well. An audience of only moderate size received this concert with a prevailing equanimity.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give another concert in Carnegie Hall to-morrow afternoon, when the programme will consist of d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Stravinsky's first suite from his ballet "Pulcinella" for small orchestra (after Pergolesi), César Franck's symphonic poem "Les Eolides," and Liszt's symphonic poem "Les Préludes."

An admirable orchestra gives a boresome concert. P. S.

N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
JAN 5 1923

Music in Manhattan

Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "November Woods," was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Monteux's leadership, at Carnegie Hall last night. Bax is a young Britisher of forty years of age and a composer, who not only has something to say, but who knows how to say it remarkably well. There is no "programme" to the poem heard last evening other than the title. It is an "impression" of "the dank and stormy ruin of nature in late autumn." There are Debussyisms in Arnold Bax's musical matter and manner, but not enough of them to disturb the individuality of his own highly stamped personal idiom. The work received a beautiful performance.

Also upon Mr. Monteux's programme were Mozart's E flat major symphony and Richard Strauss' "Don Quixote."

To-night, in Brooklyn, at the Academy of Music, the Boston band will play Stravinsky's first suite from the ballet "Pulcinella" (after Pergolesi), Vincent d' Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy and the Grieg piano concerto, with Mme. Olga Samaroff as soloist.

JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
JAN 5 1923

ENGLISHMAN'S MUSIC PLAYED BY MONTEUX

Boston Symphony Orchestra Gives Performance of New Piece by Arnold Bax.

Pierre Monteux, for the second visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall this Win-[illegible]

[illegible] first orchestral music by the [illegible], Arnold Bax. This was a piece called "November Woods," written some five years ago and given its first American performance two months since by Frederick Stock and the Chicago Orchestra. Both Mr. Monteux and Mr. Stock have shown considerable interest in Bax—far more so than any of our local conductors. This young Englishman (who is really a Celt) is now forty, and such of his music as has already been heard here seemed to make this interest in him quite worth while.

His "November Woods," however, seemed to be neither of a spontaneous inventive quality nor intrinsically so attractive as his "Garden of Fand," or as the string quartet played some weeks ago by the Flonzaleys. It is very much more obvious and conventional in scheme and intent and, altogether, less interesting.

Bax's Orchestral Skill.

The music, nevertheless, is the work of a first-class artisan. Its instrumentation is happy and its orchestration nicely made to fulfill the expression of what the composer had in his mind to say. The piece may be roughly divided into three large sections. The beginning of it suggests the wooded landscape of early Winter, whilst the middle part is a reflection of this external mood upon the contemplative introspection of the beholder—ruminative, drear and considerably dour. Finally, the two things are interwoven and the piece ends in a few bars remarkably expressive of a momentarily chilled heart. Here the music becomes astonishingly impersonal, as cold as a vacuum, dripping with frost. The thing is almost uncanny in its suggestion and, in its way, is a triumphant bit of orchestral skill.

It is difficult to know just how well Mr. Monteux played Mr. Bax's music. A good deal of it sounded as though it were being done as it should be, but some of it distinctly lacked something in vitality and finish. One can, indeed, imagine a much more vivid performance of it than Mr. Monteux gave it. Nor did the orchestra handle the piece with great smoothness or nicety in detail.

Last night's programme opened with Mozart's E flat symphony, which was not very persuasively played, and closed with Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote."

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
EAGLE
ISSUE OF

At the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night Mr. Monteux played a new composition by Arnold Bax called "November Woods." The woods in November are generally pretty dreary, and so was this piece. And yet it ought not to have been, for it was a sort of composite photograph of pages of the scores of Debussy, Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky, Wagner and other real composers. "No sun, no moon, no warmth, no new ideas—November."

The first number was Mozart's Symphony in E flat. In the first movement Mr. Monteux, after the slow introduction, began the "Allegro" in a sort of minuet tempo; later on he hurried up to the proper tempo, and on the repeat the beginning was played in the allegro rate of speed. A curious nuance of tempo, to say the least. In the Andante the first bassoon added to the gaiety of nations by indulging in a "couac." The Minuet and Finale went better.

The last number was the "Don Quixote" variations of Richard Strauss. This was very well played; Jean Bedetti played the cello solo, representing the knight with a warm tone and good phrasing; Georges Fourel played the viola solo, "Sancho Panza," in a musicianly manner.

From
EVENING WORLD JAN 5 1923
New York City

Boston Symphony Plays a New Composition by Arnold Bax.

By Frank H. Warren.

The season's record crop of orchestral concerts is beginning to exceed the public demand, if one may deduce anything definite from last evening's attendance at the second Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. Mozart's E-flat symphony opened the program and [illegible] ifference toward Arnold Bax, leader of the present English School, or the great Richard Strauss—who were represented respectively, by "November Woods," a symphonic poem, new here, and "Don Quixote"?

Mr. Bax, whose first composition dates from 1903, in his varied labors has cultivated the fields of orchestral, stage, chamber and choir music, with a number of concertos thrown in. His "November Woods" which, it is said, the composer regards as his best orchestral work, was composed in 1917 and had its first performance in this country in Chicago last November. It is without a definite "program," being merely an impression "of the dank and stormy ruin of nature in late autumn." We were content to accompany the composer on a portion of his journey, that lay along a well blazed trail. Surprisingly few modern barriers of tangled and impenetrable harmonic growth blocked the way nor did we get lost in a riot of autumnal dissonances. We sighed with the sighing wind, saw the swaying branches, side-stepped the swirling leaves and imagined we heard the distant shout of the November mob following a touchdown. But, after passing the fifty-yard line, we looked back longingly at our own goal. The going was getting monotonous, the play restricted. When we left Mr. Bax he was still in the woods determined to fight it out on those lines if it took all autumn. However, an interesting piece if compressed a bit.

The Mozart symphony was played with the proper light and sunny touch and Strauss's "Don Quixote" is old fare both for the Bostonians and for Pierre Monteux, their leader.

From SUN

Address New York City

JAN5 1923

Date

Boston Symphony Presents New Irish Symphonic Poem

Monteux Introduces Another Bax Work to City—Two Operas at Metropolitan.

Pierre Monteux, who just a year ago introduced to New Yorkers a symphonic poem "In the Faery Hills" of Arnold Bax, last night presented another work by the same young Irish composer, entitled "November Woods." In the biographical treasury that Philip Hale has collected for the program notes of the Boston Symphony it may be noted that Mr. Bax has concerned himself with certain definite musical forms throughout his development. From 1904 till 1908 he dwelt in the chastened halls of chamber music. For the next nine years there came a series of orchestral works of which "November Woods" is the last, and more recently he has produced ballets for the stage.

It is a pity that Mr. Bax did not turn to the footlights before he wrote the composition that the Carnegie Hall audience heard last night. His November Woods need fauns and dryads. However thickly the instruments sift through the underbrush, the wind is an insufficient protagonist. Debussy's Faun dreams happily throughout the score, the themes call him to vocal life. But the endless pages of Mr. Bax falter like the canvas flies in an old fashioned woodland set. And when he would people them with a tangible musical idea, it becomes slighter less valuable, less realized than the very blast of his driven branches.

Before presenting the novelty, the orchestra played the E flat Mozart symphony, with minor defalcations from the bassoon, and mischievous noises on the stage, but with delicacy and balance. The tempo of the Finale ran away with the ensemble for a few dangerous moments, but soon responded to the conductor's restraining baton. After the intermission came the Strauss Don Quixote Variations, with Jean Bedetti elevated to the 'cello soloist and Georges Fourel at the viola. A small audience appeared appreciative.

From JAN5 1923
~~Sun~~ & Herald
New York

Boston Orchestra Plays New Music

Arnold Bax's 'November Woods,' Symphonic Poem, Disclosed for First Time Here.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's series took place last evening in Carnegie Hall. The program consisted of Mozart's symphony in E flat, Arnold Bax's "November Woods" and Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote." This arrangement revealed estimable cunning on the part of Conductor Pierre Monteux. The time honored symphony of Mozart, the latest exhalation of the British soul in music as exemplified by Mr. Bax and the still experimental methods of Dr. Strauss in transforming the adventures of the knight of La Mancha into a series of considerable variations fell into a most intriguing sequence as naturally as the celebrated horse and woman and walnut tree.

Mr. Bax's work was heard for the first time here. It is described as a symphonic poem, was composed in 1917, introduced to the world at a Halle concert in Manchester on November 18, 1920, and was disclosed to America by the Chicago Orchestra on November 3, 1922. The composition has a distinct and potent autumnal charm, the swirl of wet winds through the streaming trees, the spongy sinking of fallen leaves under the feet and the almost tragic mood of that time.

When the rain is on the leaf and the cloud is on the stream,
When day is touched with darkness and the sun is but a dream.

The thematic material is clearly drawn, skillfully displayed and most ingeniously treated in instrumentation. Horns, trumpets, a singing solo cello, a concertino of strings and the fleeting echoes of clarinet and oboe take their turns in uttering the principal melodic ideas, all of which have character and one of which—the cantabile theme—is uncommonly beautiful. The chromatic forest gales, a necessary item in November music, are cleverly written and the entire orchestral texture is rich and varied in color. It is a good, though not extraordinary piece, but fairly justifies the praise which the enthusiastic supporters of contemporaneous British music, Edwin Evans leading by a lap, have bestowed upon it.

Above all other features of the work the invention shown by the composer in the creation of his themes is conspicuous, and in these days the ability to invent themes is something rare and precious. Mr. Bax has proved in this symphonic poem that he has good and novel melodies and that he is also an orchestral colorist who can hold his head up in the most pretentious of modern company.

The music was excellently played by the Bostonians. Mr. Monteux has brought his orchestra once more to a high level of technical proficiency, and although the performance of Mozart's familiar symphony had no special claims to consideration it was commendable and chastely classic in style. In the "Don Quixote" the important cello part was played by Jean Bedetti, the first cellist of the orchestra, and the viola solo by Georges Fourel.

Mr. Monteux had his customary contest with the audience about beginning. He waits for perfect silence and has much difficulty in obtaining it. In this commercial city concert audiences do not habitually become still until after the orchestra begins. In cultured Boston they hold their breath till the opening notes are sounded. But the New Englanders have always been a musical people ever since Antony van Corlear, the trumpeter of New Amsterdam, made his famous journey through the Connecticut villages and among the Yankee lasses, whom, as that accurate historian Diedrich Knickerbocker carefully records, "he rejoiced exceedingly with his soul stirring instrument."

From JAN5 1923
TELEGRAM
New York City

New York Suggests November Sadness

There was a pleasant mingling of the old and the new in the programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night in Carnegie Hall. Mozart's symphony in E flat major came at the start, and it was played very well. Almost super-refined is the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season under the leadership of Pierre Monteux. The downgrade movement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which started with the war has not only been stopped but Mr. Monteux has done much to bring back the old-time prestige of his organization.

A novelty of the most up-to-date pattern followed the symphony—a symphonic poem, "November Woods," by Arnold Bax, an English composer. Swaying branches, the fall of dead leaves, screaming winds, all of the sadness of autumn are pictured in this work. The mood which the composer establishes at the start of the work pictures admirably the drab loneliness of November. But the music become a little monotonous because of the sameness of the mood. There are no striking themes or rhythms. The charm of the symphonic poem depends solely on orchestral color. The instrumentation has been skilfully managed by Mr. Bax. The performance was exceptionally smooth and well balanced.

A final number was Strauss' brilliant "Don Quixote."

---

om JAN5 1923
VENING MAIL
New York City

OPERA and CONCERT

By KATHARINE SPAETH

BOSTON SYMPHONY PLAYS

THOUGH programme music gives one a righteous feeling of understanding the composer in his various moods, still it's nice to close the eyes, forget umbrellas and rubbers and just dream with free abandon.

This is so easy to do when Arnold Bax's "November Woods" is played. It is a tender, melodious piece, sufficiently modern yet not brutally so, and brings fanciful pictures of rustling treetops, peeps at wood elfs and any number of strange sounds that come when one is alone in a great forest.

Pierre Monteux and his Boston Symphony played this impressionistic work with grace and charm last night in Carnegie Hall. Mozart's E flat symphony preceded it, and the adventuring knight with a seense of humor, "Don Quixote," by Strauss, completed a flavored programme.

It is rather a shock to see this orchestra play to so many empty seats, yet those that came remained to cheer.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
JAN5 1923

Boston Orchestra Plays Arnold Bax's "November Woods"

Modernism of Debussy Is Suggested by Composition Well Received at Carnegie Hall Concert

Few of Mr. Monteux's programs are without their modern seasoning, sometimes of an aggressively latter-day type, as in the strange conglomeration of sounds entitled "Horace Victorieux," or sometimes mildly modern in construction and atmosphere, and thus it was with Arnold Bax's "November Woods" which followed Mozart's E flat major symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's second evening concert of the season yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was a work that could be called modern or impressionistic, but these familiar adjectives are widely and loosely used. Mr. Bax's modernism suggested Debussy far more than Darius Milhaud or Arthur Honegger, with a prevailing atmosphere of quite melodious melancholy. On the whole it succeeded in conveying the impression implied in its title, autumn winds, falling leaves and a sense of regret for the declining year, though it was an impression rather prolonged with comparatively little variety.

The winds were suggested in the opening rushes of muted strings, punctuated by muted trumpets; winds that blew through most of the composition, while a rather doleful but melodious theme emerged on the horns. This theme, or its variants in various combinations, with the wind suggesting rising and falling passages, now stronger, with outbursts of brass, now sinking to a calm around the bulk of the piece, while once there was a hint of a more cheerful mood. While hearing Mr. Bax's music, it was not hard to imagine autumn woods, and the work was well received, though not with wild applause.

The Mozart symphony, thoroughly delightful to hear, as usual, was smoothly and agreeably played, though not with all the brightness it could have had. The last and the longest number was Richard Strauss's "Don Quixote," with the Knight of La Mancha and Sancho Panza conversing through Mr. Bedetti's violoncello and Mr. Fourel's viola, both good performances, especially the former.

The many "fantastic variations on a knightly theme" describing their adventures were played with finish and gusto by Mr. Monteux and his musicians, proving enjoyable at least for those who had and could follow the book of directions. For others "Don Quixote" may well have been a little long.

MUSIC

By Deems Taylor

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions.)

Pierre Monteux has an undeniable knack of picking up interesting new music for his orchestra. Last year two of the novelties he played, the Szymanowski symphony and Loeffler's three Irish songs with orchestra, were works of the first rank. At last night's concert, in Carnegie Hall, he introduced another new piece that, whatever its ultimate evaluation, seemed at first hearing to be far above the average in merit.

It is Arnold Bax's "November Woods," a tone poem for orchestra. Bax is one of the younger generation of British composers, and has written much chamber and orchestral music, some of which has been heard here in other seasons.

There is a gratifying directness and solidity about this new work. It has atmosphere, and plenty of it—shimmering muted strings, quivering woodwind leaves, and a fitful chromatic gale that occasionally rocks the orchestra to its very bass. But the instrumental coloring is incidental. The composer has introduced themes, and actually developed them, using his orchestration as a background rather than a smoke screen.

We do not know exactly what program Mr. Bax had in mind. The Boston people have never got around to sending us Philip Hale's program notes, and a brother reviewer whose copy we tried to borrow refused on the ridiculous grounds that we would probably not return it. So we were obliged to rely upon the music itself for our idea of it.

Perhaps that is the best way. At all events we received a vivid impression of a man walking through a forest in a biting autumn gale. The feeling of motion was there, and the cold, and the pathetic beauty of dying things. For a little time the traveller set his feet upon a path that had already been well trodden—the dry leaves bore the hoof prints of Debussy's faun.

But it was not for long. Bax turned resolutely back from this trail that has lured so many young victims to their undoing, and plodded up the steep and tangled way marked, "Be Yourself." He succeeded, for the most part, admirably. "November Woods" may or may not be a work of great viability, but it is the work of an honest craftsman who has pleasant and sometimes beautiful things to say.

Mozart—the E flat symphony—began the evening, and Strauss—"Don Quixote"—brought it to a close. Jean Bedetti played the solo cello part with ample tone and evident understanding, and Mr. Monteux provided him a colorful and perfectly proportioned accompaniment.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
JAN5 1923

MUSIC

By RICHARD ALDRICH.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A larger audience than was present in Carnegie Hall last evening was merited by the excellent performance given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Pierre Monteux. The orchestra has made great progress lately in the improvement of its tone and its technical finish in the breadth and beauty of its performances; and though one or two technical slips marred its playing last evening, this was on the whole on a high plane of excellence.

The program included Mozart's Symphony in E Flat, Arnold Bax's symphonic poem, "November Woods," and Strauss's "Don Quixote." The several orchestral pieces by Bax that have been played here seem to indicte that he is one of the contemporary English composers most gifted with imagination and a feeling for musical beauty and with the technical skill to embody it in original and subtly expressive terms. "November Woods" has no program beyond its title; and the piece is apparently rather a portrayal of moods of a stormy autumnal and melancholy cast rather than the depiction of the actual aspects of Nature.

Whichever the composer intended it to be, he has written music of a powerfully imaginative quality, music that is based on real and valuable musical ideas and the fertile development of them in a rich and skillfully wrought orchestral tissue; darkly and strongly colored, but not in itself mere color. The spirit is tempestuous, for the most part; when it is calmed there is perhaps a glimpse of Debussy's faun in a briefly sunlit interval—but scarcely more than a glimpse.

Bax may have listened to seductive and insinuating strains from across the Channel; for few modern composers have been able to stop their ears against them entirely. But he has used them only as they have become a part of the modern material of music; and his musical thought is evolved from his own brain and is stamped with his own individuality. "November Woods" was played with a splendid energy by the orchestra and with what may be assumed to be a full realization of the richly elaborated orchestral fabric of the composer's imagination.

Mozart's symphony was played with spirit and in the main with finish. Strauss's vast tone poem, with its crass mixture of high-erected chivalrous eloquence, its ironical mockery of the same, its fantasticalities and its stupid realisms, received an interpretation so flexible as to show an easy mastery of its once formidable complications. The obbligato, 'cello and viola parts were skillfully played by Messrs. Bedetti and Faurel, first 'cello and first viola, respectively, of the orchestra.

From
H. Kaufmann
Staats Zeitung
Jan. 6th

Boſtoner Symphonie-Konzert.

Ein recht zahlreiches Publikum tat dem letzten Konzerte der Boſtoner in Carnegie Hall volle Ehre an. Herr Monteux bot darin Mozart's Es-Dur Symphonie (Koechel No. 543), Richard Strauß' „Don Quixote" und zwiſchen dieſen beiden Programmſtützen eine intereſſante Novität des engliſchen Komponiſten Arnold Bax, betitelt „November Woods".

Dieſes Werk, um mit der Novität zu beginnen, machte einen ſehr günſtigen Eindruck. Herr Bax, einer der fortgeſchrittenſten neuengliſchen Tonſetzer, verfügt vor allem über eine erfreuliche Erfindungsgabe; ſein Material iſt, wenn auch nicht gerade bedeutend, ſo doch plaſtiſch, ins Ohr fallend und brauchbar. Dazu geſellt ſich ein reiches Talent für Tonkolorit, daher ſich bei Herrn Bax Zeichnung und Farbengebung zu einem ſchönen Ganzen einen. Man hat beim Anhören dieſer trüben, gelegentlich traurigen und unheimlichen Klänge ſo etwas wie ein Gefühl von Spätherbſt, naßkaltem Regen, Nebel, chromatiſch heulendem Winde, abgeſtorbener Natur und Troſtloſigkeit im Menſchenherzen. Somit erfüllt das Tonpoem, das nur Stimmungen und Empfindungen und nicht etwa ein beſtimmtes Programm ſchildern will, ſeinen Zweck vollſtändig. Von Herrn Monteux mit wirkſamer Stimmungsmache dirigiert und vom Orcheſter mit ſeinem nobelſten Klange geſpielt, erweckte das Werk die beabſichtigten Eindrücke. Das Publikum applaudierte freundlich, wenn auch nicht gerade mit überzeugender Wärme.

Mozart's Symphonie fand eine in ihrer Wirkſamkeit etwas intermittierende Ausführung. Dem Allegro des erſten Satzes fehlte vielleicht die deutſche Sinnigkeit; dagegen entfaltete der Dirigent im herrlichen Andante Anmut und Grazie und in den [illegible] Epiſoden auch einen [illegible]

[55]

INFORMATION OBSCURED

[illegible] cher gewirkt hätte. [illegible] Finale, welches der Rondoform [illegible], und Herr Monteux Anläufe lie[illegible] gen Humors. Das Werk machte, [illegible] immer den freundlichſten Eindruck.

Die „Phantaſtiſchen Variationen über ein Thema ritterlichen Charakters", „Don Quixote" genannt, wirkten, wenn auch manche Epiſoden brillant gelangen, mit etwas ermüdender Länge, was zum Teil allerdings ein Gebrechen des Werkes iſt. Die bekannten realiſtiſchen Tonmalereien wurden von den Pultvirtuoſen des Orcheſters mit gewohnter Meiſterſchaft ausgeführt. Die beiden Soliſten, der Celliſt Herr Jean Bedetti und der Bratſchiſt Herr Georges Fourel, wirkten durch prächtigen Ton und perfekte Kantilene. Auch die Trompeten und die Tuba hielten ſich ſehr wacker. Herr Monteux ging ſeine Aufgabe mit großer Energie nach, trachtete jedoch die bekannten, etwas bedenklichen dynamiſchen Orgien vornehm abzudämpfen. H.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
JAN 6 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Olga Samaroff Appears as Soloist With the Orchestra.

Before a large and distinguished audience in the opera house of the Academy of Music, last evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Pierre Monteux, was heard in a second of a series of five Philharmonic concerts. Olga Samaroff, pianist, was the soloist of the evening, rendering several delightful selections for which she was roundly applauded.

The playing of the orchestra was up to the usual high standard of this well-known aggregation of musicians.

The programme follows:

"Wallenstein," Triology (after the dramatic poem of Schiller), Op. 12 (D'Indy); "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla (the Piccolomini), "The Death of Wallenstein;" Suite No. 1, from the ballet "Pulcinella" (Pergolesi-Stravinsky), for small orchestra; Sinfonia (Ouverture), Allegro moderato; Serenata, Larghetto; Scherzino, Allegro, Andantino, Allegro; Concerto in A minor, for pianoforte, Op 16 (Grieg), Allegro molto moderato, Adagio, Allegro moderator molte e marcato; "Espana," rhapsody for full orchestra (Chabrier).

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
JAN 6 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Olga Samaroff, Pianist, Played Grieg Concerto in A Minor.

[illegible] the Boston Symphony Orchestra plays only five concerts in Brooklyn during the winter Mr. Monteux [illegible]t have found a more attractive [illegible]ing number last night than Vin[illegible] D'Indy's seldom played "Wallenstein Trilogy." Nothing is quite [illegible]w as it seems. When Coue was [illegible]ry small boy in Nancy D'Indy [illegible] Paris had some sort of vague [illegible] of getting better as he went [illegible]g and fortunately applied it [illegible]e music he was writing. If his "Wallenstein" had all been as dull [illegible] first movement the work would [illegible]ly have received its few performances in this country.

The first movement is supposed to give a picture of the rough gayety of Wallenstein's camp made up of [illegible]ed hordes of fighters. The music [illegible] is noisy and mixed with no par[illegible] point of coherence or unity. [illegible]usly enough Mr. Monteux sent [illegible] audience home with Charbrier's [illegible]ing "Spanish Rhapsody," which [illegible]wed exactly what is the matter [illegible] D'Indy's camp. The Rhapsody is also noisy, but it holds together while D'Indy's picture of camp life hold apart and so fail to capture the imagination.

But fortunately all dull things must end. The second movement of the Trilogy has melody and it evokes an authentic mood of romantic sadness, due in part last night to the rare beauty of the tone [illegible] the orchestra and the extreme [illegible] of the performance. The [illegible] movement, too, has the [illegible] of a dominating and [illegible] ended [illegible] old jok[illegible] "isn't so b[illegible]"

Then followed one of the Russian ballets of Stravinsky, "Pulcinella." A ballet is written primarily to be seen rather than heard, and this music loses a good deal when one has to imagine the movements of the dancers which some of these rhythms so vividly suggest. The source of the story is early Italian and Stravinsky undertook to treat it in the manner of Pergolia. He stuck to his idea nobly and his imitation of eighteenth century Italian is melodious and interesting. Once or twice the unadulterated Russian breaks through and that too was interesting, piquant and snappy—again thanks to Mr. Monteux and his men who played it almost magically.

Then came the real treat of the evening, the not unusually exciting Grieg Concerto in A minor, superbly played by Olgo Samaroff. If Mme. Samaroff lacks any quality of a great pianist it is strong emotional appeal. But she has so much style, her sense of rhythm is so unfailing, her gradations of tone in the softer passages are so delicate and her welding of the piano and orchestral parts is so perfect that one becomes lost in admiration as he listens to a transfigured, or at least not typical, Grieg. There is one bit of the more usual Grieg in the orchestral introduction to the slow movement, dominated by the strings. This melody was especially welcome becaause those lovely fiddles had been called on to make so many queer noises in the course of the evening.

Charbrier's Rhapsody is an excellent piece with which to send an audience a favorite nightcap with many conductors and it was welcome last night, although it was cruel to throw its simple spot light upon the murky corners of D'Indy.

H. O.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
JAN 6 1923

The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, last night gave the second of its five annual Brooklyn concerts under institute auspices at the Academy of Music. The audience was large.

The evening's programme opened with Vincent d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," after the triple dramatic poem of Schiller and descriptive of "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla" (the Piccolonuini., and "Wallenstein's Death." In the first of his three symphonic movements d'Indy has not attempted transcendental flights as is his wont in later works in the large forms. He has been content with realistic objective scene painting wherein the experienced hand of a master is shown in the orchestration but without any inspirational heights being reached. Pretty, melodic writing enters the second movement, but again no seemingly great depth of emotion is registered. In the finale, the composer, who is perhaps the greatest living exponent of the modern (not "futuristic") French school, comes into his and presents in expressionistic style and with some "ultra" harmonization, many delightful and varied-colored subjective moods.

The work as a whole, however, is not highly impressive; neither does it add great glory to the reputation of its composer. It was written in 1881.

The old tried and true "war horse" piano concerto of Grieg was trotted out as third number of the programme, and proved a mighty fine work in the hands of Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianiste and soloist of the evening. It must be said that she rode it fearlessly and to a victorious finish. The player's technique was not always flawless, neither did she fully plumb the heights and depths of the work. But despite a touch not at all times of best quality, noticeably in chord passages and melodic outline, Mme. Samaroff nevertheless gave an acceptable reading which made amends in clarity of form and graceful blending of lights and shades. She also used experienced judgment in attack and in the matter of rhythmic balance. Musically it was the most satisfactory number of the evening.

Other numbers played were the Suite No. 1 from the ballet "Pulcinella," a Stravinsky re-score of a Pergolesi theme for small orchestra, and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody.

After the eruptions and revolutions that nearly tore asunder and disrupted the Boston Symphony during the close of Col. Higginson's regime, and later when many players resigned because of internal dissatisfaction, many pessemistic souls averred loudly that the organization would never "come back" to its earlier prestige or artistic standing. But it can now be said without fear of contradiction, that "day by day" (paraphrasing Coue) in every way the playing of the Boston Symphony is growing finer and finer."

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
JAN 7 1923

MONTEUX LEADS GREAT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Fine Matinee Audience at Carnegie Hall.

HADLEY HEADS PHILHARMONIC

Harold Bauer Thrills Big Audience of Followers With Piano Recital at Aeolian.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra again with a program of surpassing interest, appeared at a matinee concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday before a large and intensely observant audience which evinced complete satisfaction with the performance. Totally different from the Thursday evening program and without the aid of soloists, Conductor Monteux derived an even more brilliant orchestral success from yesterday's concert, for his players gave a brilliant display of their organized versatility and almost note-perfect familiarity with their seemingly endless repertoire. Pierre Monteux's insatiate musical inquisitiveness and his penchant for research among the almost forgotten literature of symphony music, have come to be one of the unfailing attractions of these occasional and always welcome visits of the great Bostonian, and it is in this great variety of offerings, as well as in the superior discipline and mutuality of the organization, that we must look for the cause of the loyal and undiminished patronage which New York invariably yields to the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Monteux.

Yesterday's concert began with a thrilling delivery of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, followed by Stravinsky's Suite (No. 1) from Ballet "Pulincella." Two Symphonic Poems, "Les Eolides," by Caesar Franck, and "Les Prelndes," by Frank Liszt, completed the well-balanced and beautifully played program.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
JAN 7 1923

Monteux Plays Ballet Music Of 'Pulcinella'

Stravinsky Suite Agreeable Novelty on Matinee Program at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony

Philharmonic in Evening

Henry Hadley Conducts and Repeats Gilbert's Pilgrim Tercentenry Composition

No Boston Symphony program is complete without its novelty, and a Stravinsky suite was the novel item of the second afternoon concert under Mr. Monteux yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was the first suite from the Russian composer's ballet, "Pulcinella," announced as "after Pergolesi," and not so far after at that. The ballet, according to Philip Hale's informative program notes, is based on a Neapolitan manuscript found in 1700 and was first presented by Serge de Diaghileff's forces in Paris in May, 1920, and in London in 1920 and 1921, where "The Daily Telegraph" found it a "very fine" ballet, but in need of cutting. "The Times" considered Stravinsky's work on the music to be clever, only at times it became sheer Stravinsky with confusing results.

Mr. Monteux could not, however, bring a ballet to Carnegie Hall, and the music, considered apart, sounded thin, not quite able to stand alone. But it was light and agreeable, preserving, on the whole, the original flavor of Pergolesi to a considerable extent. There was a sinfonia, or overture, a lively movement that might have been any eighteenth-century composer seen through slightly colored glasses; a serenata shading into a third movement of constantly changing pace, with a sudden short outburst (rude laughter, perhaps?) at the end. This was Stravinsky; the rest was mostly Pergolesi, with Stravinsky perceptible in the background.

"Wallenstein" Triology Given

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, which began the concert, had much that was melodious, much that [illegible]

[illegible] trilogy seemed rather too large a d[illegible] for a single meal, leaving a certain se[illegible] of length and heaviness, probably [illegible] noticeable, if at all, in a single movement taken apart. There were a few lapses from grace in the performance, but, on the whole, it was well played in a sonorous and impressive performance that reaped due applause for Mr. Monteux.

There were feeling and charm in the Cesar Franck symphonic poem which followed, "Les Eolides," but again, in spite of its suave melody, a certain monotony. Franck here had been drinking from the Wagnerian spring. At least, there was a strong relationship to music being played but a mile further south, the principal motif of "Tristan und Isolde." The familiar strains of Liszt's "Les Preludes" brought a bravura finish and ample enthusiasm for conductor and musicians.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
JAN 7 1923

From far and near, says The Boston Transcript, contributions still come to Symphony Hall to swell the fund for the relief of Mr. Gericke, old conductor of the Boston Orchestra, now living as best he may in destitute Vienna. Even in California there are those who take thought of him. The fund, based upon the proceeds of the recent concert arranged by Mr. Monteux, now amounts to $5,800.50. Remittances have already been sent to Mr. Gericke.

N. Y.
WORLD
ISSUE OF
JAN 7 1923

otherwise commonplace production.

* * *

The visiting Boston Symphony gave a not overcrowded house another "first hearing" yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, in the shape of Stravinsky's adaptation of Pergolesi's "Pulcinella" music. The suite was preceded by d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, with its re-echoes of "Walkuere" and "Tristan," played with a fine sonorousness and majesty of tone. Especially lovely was the solo for woodwinds and harp accompaniment in the last section, "Wallenstein's Death."

The novelty suite is very much Pergolesi and very little Igor Stravinsky as generally known in these parts. In most places the Russian's contribution is merely rescoring, making a slight change of dramatic values here and there. There is a miniature overture to start the sequence, Watteauesque and formal, yet somehow fresh, a little cheeky, and as perennially youthful as the Dresden figurines which adorn many a mantelpiece. The second bit is a graceful largetto serenade, followed without break by four brisk movements, almost fragmentary in form. Here and there the cloven hoof of Stravinsky peeps out from beneath the rustic Pergolese hem, generally in the interludes which string the Italian bits together. But it's quite a harmless Stravinsky. The coda is typical—a brief chortle from the horns, after a moment's pause, for all the world like the Russian's laughing equivalent for the famous Barrymore words: "That's all there is!" The audience liked it hugely.

The remainder of the programme consisted of Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Aeolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

~~Sun~~ & Herald JAN 7 1923
New York

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS NEW MUSIC OF STRAVINSKY

Ballet Suite From 'Pulcinella' Has Humor and Character—D'Indy, Franck and Liszt Also on the Program at Carnegie.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The program of the second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday consisted of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Stravinsky's ballet suite from "Pulcinella," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." The Stravinsky music was the novelty. It had been heard first in Paris on May 15, 1920, and its first American hearing was in Boston on December 22, 1922. The suite is arranged from a stage play given in Paris on the date just mentioned. The work is called a "ballet with song in one act."

Stravinsky fitted new versions of Pergolesi music to an old Italian story and used singing when he needed it to make his purpose clear. His scheme was generally pronounced good musically and both weak and confusing dramatically. The suite heard yesterday consists of the overture, a serenata and [illegible] of the early eighteenth century. [illegible] Stravinsky's treatment [illegible]

He has used a small orchestra and called for solo voices of all kinds from violin to trombone, and also concertino combinations of small groups with accompaniment of the rest and sometimes wilful outbreaks of quite modern utterance. The music has humor and character and without doubt the ballet would be well worth a performance. But who is going to give it?

The restoration of D'Indy's trilogy to the land of the living was doubtless due to M. Monteux's devotion to the music of his own country. And perhaps it is fitting that at this time when musicians are striving to honor the memory of Cesar Franck that the music of his distinguished pupil should be brought forward. M. Monteux conducted the composition [illegible] asm, and [illegible]

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
JAN 8 1923

Two orchestral concerts were given on Saturday. The Boston Symphony played a programme, the crowning glory of which was Liszt's "Les Preludes," which was stormily applauded. The preceding numbers were too much alike: D'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony, Cesar Franck's dainty "Les Eolides," and Stravinsky's first suite from his "Pulcinella." Stravinsky like D'Indy and France? Yes—I am not joking. For this is not Stravinsky himself, but simply a harmless arrangement of melodies by the old Italian Pergolesi; a charming work altogether.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
JAN 8 1923

evening.

Saturday's Music.

A new piece by Stravinsky was the feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. It is a suite from his ballet "Pulcinella," which is based on themes by Pergolesi. The instrumentation proved to be very characteristic and interesting. The rest of the programme consisted of d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy (done here by the Boston people only a few years ago under the leadership of Henri Rabaud), César Franck's "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Préludes."

The concert record of the day included also Harold Bauer's first Aeolian Hall recital of the season, familiar piano music by Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Ravel, and Liszt, played in the old familiar way, and a Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall in the evening with Toscha Seidel as solo violinist.

At the Metropolitan there was a matinée of "Tristan und Isolde," in which Miss Marion Telva sang with credit a first Brangäne. Others in the cast were Mrs. Matzenauer, Mr. Taucher, Mr. Whitehill, and Mr. Bender. In the evening there was a special performance of "Roméo et Juliette" with the usual cast, including Mr. Gigli and Miss Bori in the name parts.

INFORMATION OBSCURED

Das Menuett hätte [illegible] ger erklingen können, wenn dann die von Herrn Monteux ſchön betonte Zartheit [illegible] Koketterie des Trios noch kontraſtreicher gewirkt hätte. Für das ſchöne inale, welches der Rondo-Form enträt, und Herr Monteux Anläufe liebenswürdigen Humors. Das Werk machte, wie immer, den freundlichſten Eindruck.

Die „Phantaſtiſchen Variationen über ein Thema ritterlichen Charakters“, „Don Quixote“ genannt, wirkten, wenn auch manche Epiſoden brillant gelangen, mit etwas ermüdender Länge, was zum Teil allerdings ein Gebrechen des Werkes iſt. Die bekannten realiſtiſchen Tonmalereien wurden von den Pultvirtuoſen des Orcheſters mit gewohnter Meiſterſchaft ausgeführt. Die beiden Soliſten, der Celliſt Herr Jean Bedetti und der Bratſchiſt Herr Georges Fourel, wirkten durch prächtigen Ton und perfekte Kantilene. Auch die Trompeten und die Tuba hielten ſich ſehr wacker. Herr Monteux ging ſeine Aufgabe mit großer Energie nach, trachtete jedoch die bekannten, etwas bedenklichen dynamiſchen Orgien vornehm abzudämpfen. H.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
CITIZEN
ISSUE OF
JAN 6 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Olga Samaroff Appears as Soloist With the Orchestra.

Before a large and distinguished audice in the opera house of the Academy Music, last evening, the Boston mphony Orchestra, under the direcon of Pierre Monteux, was heard in e second of a series of five Philharonic concerts. Olga Samaroff, pianit, was the soloist of the evening, rendering several delightful selections for which she was roundly applauded.

The playing of the orchestra was up the usual high standard of this wellnewn aggregation of musicians.

The programme follows:

"Wallenstein," Triology (after the dramatic poem of Schiller), Op. 12 'Indy); "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla (the Piccolomini), "The Death of Wallenstein;" Suite No. 1, from the ballet "Pulcinella" (Pergolesi-Stravinsky), for small orchestra; Sinfonia (Ouverture), Allegro moderato; Serenata, Larghetto; Scherzino, Allegro, Andantino, Allegro; Concerto in A minor, for pianoforte, Op 16 (Grieg), Allegro molto moderato, Adagio, Allegro moderator molto e marcato; "Espana," rhapsody for full orchestra (Chabrier).

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
JAN 6 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Olga Samaroff, Pianist, Played Grieg Concerto in A Minor.

As the Boston Symphony Orchesa plays only five concerts in Brookn during the winter Mr. Monteux ght have found a more attractive ing number last night than Vin D'Indy's seldom played "Walein Trilogy." Nothing is quite ew as it seems. When Coue was ry small boy in Nancy D'Indy Paris had some sort of vague of getting better as he went long and fortunately applied it the music he was writing. If his Wallenstein" had all been as dull s its first movement the work would ardly have received its few perrmances in this country.

The first movement is supposed to give a picture of the rough gayety of Wallenstein's camp made up of ixed hordes of fighters. The music so is noisy and mixed with no parcular point of coherence or unity. riously enough Mr. Monteux sent audience home with Charbrier's ing "Spanish Rhapsody," which ved exactly what is the matter D'Indy's camp. The Rhapsody s also noisy, but it holds together while D'Indy's picture of camp life hold apart and so fail to capture e imagination.

But fortunately all dull things ust end. The second movement the Trilogy has melody and it kes an authentic mood of roantic sadness, due in part last ght to the rare beauty of the tone the orchestra and the extreme elicacy of the performance. The ird movement, too, has the ame quality of a dominating and npressive motive, interrupted freuen with contrasting passages of ety. When the Trilogy ended on [illegible] of an old joke and decided that D'Indy "isn't so bad as he sounds."

Then followed one of the Russian ballets of Stravinsky, "Pulcinella." A ballet is written primarily to be seen rather than heard, and this music loses a good deal when one has to imagine the movements of the dancers which some of these rhythms so vividly suggest. The source of the story is early Italian and Stravinsky undertook to treat it in the manner of Pergolia. He stuck to his idea nobly and his imitation of eighteenth century Italian is melodious and interesting. Once or twice the unadulterated Russian breaks through and that too was interesting, piquant and snappy—again thanks to Mr. Monteux and his men who played it almost magically.

Then came the real treat of the evening, the not unusually exciting Grieg Concerto in A minor, superbly played by Olgo Samaroff. If Mme. Samaroff lacks any quality of a great pianist it is strong emotional appeal. But she has so much style, her sense of rhythm is so unfailing, her gradations of tone in the softer passages are so delicate and her welding of the piano and orchestral parts is so perfect that one becomes lost in admiration as he listens to a transfigured, or at least not typical, Grieg. There is one bit of the more usual Grieg in the orchestral introduction to the slow movement, dominated by the strings. This melody was especially welcome becaause those lovely fiddles had been called on to make so many queer noises in the course of the evening.

Charbrier's Rhapsody is an excellent piece with which to send an audience a favorite nightcap with many conductors and it was welcome last night, although it was cruel to throw its simple spot light upon the murky corners of D'Indy.

H. O.

BROOKLYN
N. Y.
STANDARD UNION
ISSUE OF
JAN 6 1923

The Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conducting, last night gave the second of its five annual Brooklyn concerts under institute auspices at the Academy of Music. The audience was large.

The evening's programme opened with Vincent d'Indy's trilogy, "Wallenstein," after the triple dramatic poem of Schiller and descriptive of "Wallenstein's Camp," "Max and Thekla" (the Piccolomini., and "Wallenstein's Death." In the first of his three symphonic movements d'Indy has not attempted transcendental flights as is his wont in later works in the large forms. He has been content with realistic objective scene painting wherein the experienced hand of a master is shown in the orchestration but without any inspirational heights being reached. Pretty, melodic writing enters the second movement, but again no seemingly great depth of emotion is registered. In the finale, the composer, who is perhaps the greatest living exponent of the modern (not "futuristic") French school, comes into his and presents in expressionihtic style and with some "ultra" harmonization, many delightful and varied-colored subjective moods.

The work as a whole, however, is not highly impressive; neither does it add great glory to the reputation of its composer. It was written in 1881.

The old tried and true "war horse" piano concerto of Grieg was trotted out as third number of the programme, and proved a mighty fine work in the hands of Mme. Olga Samaroff, pianiste and soloist of the evening. It must be said that she rode it fearlessly and to a victorious finish. The player's technique was not always flawless, neither did she fully plumb the heights and depths of the work. But despite a touch not at all times of best quality, noticeably in chord passages and melodic outline, Mme. Samaroff nevertheless gave an acceptable reading which made amends in clarity of form and graceful blending of lights and shades. She also used experienced judgment in attack and in the matter of rhythmic balance. Musically it was the most satisfactory number of the evening.

Other numbers played were the Suite No. 1 from the ballet "Pulcinella," a Stravinsky re-score of a Pergolesi theme for small orchestra, and Chabrier's "Espana" rhapsody.

After the eruptions and revolutions that nearly tore asunder and disrupted the Boston Symphony during the close of Col. Higginson's regime, and later when many players resigned because of internal dissatisfaction, many pessemistic souls averred loudly that the organization would never "come back" to its earlier prestige or artistic standing. But it can now be said without fear of contradiction, that "day by day" (paraphrasing Coue) in every way the playing of the Boston Symphony is growing finer and finer."

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
JAN 7 1923

MONTEUX LEADS GREAT CONCERT

Boston Symphony Orchestra Pleases Fine Matinee Audience at Carnegie Hall.

HADLEY HEADS PHILHARMONIC

Harold Bauer Thrills Big Audience of Followers With Piano Recital at Aeolian.

By JOHN H. RAFTERY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, again with a program of surpassing interest, appeared at a matinee concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday before a large and intensely observant audience which evinced complete satisfaction with the performance. Totally different from the Thursday evening program and without the aid of soloists, Conductor Monteux derived an even more brilliant orchestral success from yesterday's concert, for his players gave a brilliant display of their organized versatility and almost note-perfect familiarity with their seemingly endless repertoire. Pierre Monteux's insatiate musical inquisitiveness and his penchant for research among the almost forgotten literature of symphony music, have come to be one of the unfailing attractions of these occasional and always welcome visits of the great Bostonian, and it is in this great variety of offerings, as well as in the superior discipline and mutuality of the organization, that we must look for the cause of the loyal and undiminished patronage which New York invariably yields to the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Monteux.

Yesterday's concert began with a thrilling delivery of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" Trilogy, followed by Stravinsky's Suite (No. 1) from Ballet "Pulincella." Two Symphonic Poems, "Les Eolides," by Caesar Franck, and "Les Preludes," by Frank Liszt, completed the well-balanced and beautifully played program.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
JAN 7 1923

Monteux Plays Ballet Music Of 'Pulcinella'

Stravinsky Suite Agreeable Novelty on Matinee Program at Carnegie Hall by the Boston Symphony

Philharmonic in Evening

Henry Hadley Conducts and Repeats Gilbert's Pilgrim Tercentenry Composition

No Boston Symphony program is complete without its novelty, and a Stravinsky suite was the novel item of the second afternoon concert under Mr. Monteux yesterday at Carnegie Hall. It was the first suite from the Russian composer's ballet, "Pulcinella," announced as "after Pergolesi," and not so far after at that. The ballet, according to Philip Hale's informative program notes, is based on a Neapolitan manuscript found in 1700 and was first presented by Serge de Diaghileff's forces in Paris in May, 1920, and in London in 1920 and 1921, where "The Daily Telegraph" found it a "very fine" ballet, but in need of cutting. "The Times" considered Stravinsky's work on the music to be clever, only at times it became sheer Stravinsky with confusing results.

Mr. Monteux could not, however, bring a ballet to Carnegie Hall, and the music, considered apart, sounded thin, not quite able to stand alone. But it was light and agreeable, preserving, on the whole, the original flavor of Pergolesi to a considerable extent. There was a sinfonia, or overture, a lively movement that might have been any eighteenth-century composer seen through slightly colored glasses; a serenata shading into a third movement of constantly changing pace, with a sudden short outburst (rude laughter, perhaps?) at the end. This was Stravinsky; the rest was mostly Pergolesi, with Stravinsky perceptible in the background.

"Wallenstein" Triology Given

D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, which began the concert, had much that was melodious, much that was vivid and impressive, and these elements were brought out in its execution with the boisterous humor of the camp [illegible] the lyric quality of [illegible] lomini [illegible] and solemn passa[illegible] in the last three. But, altogether, the trilogy seemed rather too large a dish for a single meal, leaving a certain sense of length and heaviness, probably less noticeable, if at all, in a single movement taken apart. There were a few lapses from grace in the performance but, on the whole, it was well played in a sonorous and impressive performance that reaped due applause for Mr. Monteux.

There were feeling and charm in the Cesar Franck symphonic poem which followed, "Les Eolides," but again, in spite of its suave melody, a certain monotony. Franck here had been drinking from the Wagnerian spring. At least, there was a strong relationship to music being played but a mile further south, the principal motif of "Tristan und Isolde." The familiar strains of Liszt's "Les Preludes" brought a bravura finish and ample enthusiasm for conductor and musicians.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
JAN 7 1923

From far and near, says The Boston Transcript, contributions still come to Symphony Hall to swell the fund for the relief of Mr. Gericke, old conductor of the Boston Orchestra, now living as best he may in destitute Vienna. Even in California there are those who take thought of him. The fund, based upon the proceeds of the recent concert arranged by Mr. Monteux, now amounts to $5,800.50. Remittances have already been sent to Mr. [illegible]ericke.

N. Y.
WORLD
ISSUE OF
JAN 7 1923

otherwise commonplace production.

* * *

The visiting Boston Symphony gave a not overcrowded house another "first hearing" yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall, in the shape of Stravinsky's adaptation of Pergolesi's "Pulcinella" music. The suite was preceded by d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, with its re-echoes of "Walkuere" and "Tristan," played with a fine sonorousness and majesty of tone. Especially lovely was the solo for woodwinds and harp accompaniment in the last section, "Wallenstein's Death."

The novelty suite is very much Pergolesi and very little Igor Stravinsky as generally known in these parts. In most places the Russian's contribution is merely rescoring, making a slight change of dramatic values here and there. There is a miniature overture to start the sequence, Watteauesque and formal, yet somehow fresh, a little cheeky, and as perennially youthful as the Dresden figurines which adorn many a mantelpiece. The second bit is a graceful largetto serenade, followed without break by four brisk movements, almost fragmentary in form. Here and there the cloven hoof of Stravinsky peeps out from beneath the rustic Pergolese hem, generally in the interludes which string the Italian bits together. But it's quite a harmless Stravinsky. The coda is typical —a brief chortle from the horns, after a moment's pause, for all the world like the Russian's laughing equivalent for the famous Barrymore words: "That's all there is!" The audience liked it hugely.

The remainder of the programme consisted of Franck's symphonic poem, "Les Aeolides," and Liszt's "Les Preludes."

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
JAN 8 1923

Two orchestral concerts were given on Saturday. The Boston Symphony played a programme, the crowning glory of which was Liszt's "Les Preludes," which was stormily applauded. The preceding numbers were too much alike: D'Indy's "Wallenstein" symphony, Cesar Franck's dainty "Les Eolides," and Stravinsky's first suite from his "Pulcinella." Stravinsky like D'Indy and France? Yes—I am not joking. For this is not Stravinsky himself, but simply a harmless arrangement of melodies by the old Italian Pergolesi; a charming work altogether.

N. Y.
EVENING GLOBE
ISSUE OF
JAN 8 1923

evening.

Saturday's Music.

A new piece by Stravinsky was the feature of the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. It is a suite from his ballet "Pulcinella," which is based on themes by Pergolesi. The instrumentation proved to be very characteristic and interesting. The rest of the programme consisted of d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy (done here by the Boston people only a few years ago under the leadership of Henri Rabaud), César Franck's "Les Eolides," and Liszt's "Les Préludes."

The concert record of the day included also Harold Bauer's first Aeolian Hall recital of the season, familiar piano music by Bach, Beethoven, Schumann, Chopin, Ravel, and Liszt, played in the old familiar way, and a Philharmonic concert in Carnegie Hall in the evening with Toscha Seidel as solo violinist.

At the Metropolitan there was a matinée of "Tristan und Isolde," in which Miss Marion Telva sang with credit a first Brangäne. Others in the cast were Mrs. Matzenauer, Mr. Taucher, Mr. Whitehill, and Mr. Bender. In the evening there was a special performance of "Roméo et Juliette" with the usual cast, including Mr. Gigli and Miss Bori in the name parts.

~~Sun~~ & Herald JAN 7 1923
New York

BOSTON ORCHESTRA PLAYS NEW MUSIC OF STRAVINSKY

Ballet Suite From 'Pulcinella' Has Humor and Character—D'Indy, Franck and Liszt Also on the Program at Carnegie.

By W. J. HENDERSON.

The program of the second matinee concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday consisted of D'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy, Stravinsky's ballet suite from "Pulcinella," Cesar Franck's "Les Eolides" and Liszt's "Les Preludes." The Stravinsky music was the novelty. It had been heard first in Paris on May 15, 1920, and its first American hearing was in Boston on December 22, 1922. The suite is arranged from a stage play given in Paris on the date just mentioned. The work is called a "ballet with song in one act."

Stravinsky fitted new versions of Pergolesi music to an old Italian story and used singing when he needed it to make his purpose clear. His scheme was generally pronounced good musically and both weak and confusing dramatically. The suite heard yesterday consists of the overture, a serenata and four brief dance movements closely connected. The presence of Pergolesi is manifested mostly in the thematic material which has the simple candor of the early eighteenth century. But Stravinsky's treatment [illegible]

He has used a small orchestra and called for solo voices of all kinds from violin to trombone, and also concertino combinations of small groups with accompaniment of the rest and sometimes wilful outbreaks of quite modern utterance. The music has humor and character and without doubt the ballet would be well worth a performance. But who is going to give it?

The restoration of D'Indy's trilogy to the land of the living was doubtless due to M. Monteux's devotion to the music of his own country. And perhaps it is fitting that at this time when musicians are striving to honor the memory of Cesar Franck that the music of his distinguished pupil should be brought forward. M. Monteux conducted the composition with enthusiasm, and if it did not enthrall the audience, it at least interested and commanded respect. Anyhow Wallenstein died hard, as he doubtless deserved to. The other two works are not in need of commentary.

FROM JAN 8 192
REPUBLICAN,
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN GREAT CONCERT

Splendid Performance is Given by Big Orchestra—Auditorium is Packed to Its Capacity of 4000

~~By Francis Regal~~

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, gave a splendid concert, chiefly of modern music, yesterday afternoon in the Auditorium in the Young Men's Christian association course, of which for a number of years this annual concert has been the star attraction. As always, it was greeted by a vast audience, limited only by the available space and as usual Mr Monteux chose a program suitable for an audience of 4000 people, many of whom hear fewer orchestral concerts than they would like, and naturally desire to make as much as possible of so rare a treat.

It is a good occasion to make ample use of the full resources of the modern orchestra, and the entire 100 players of the Boston organization were present and gave a program that gave full scope for numerical strength. This is a wise policy, for while an equally good concert may be given by 60 or 70 musicians, with ample volume of tone for even so large a space, there are many modern works which for their full effect require an enlarged orchestra, and the public is naturally anxious for a chance to hear the novel technical effect which so great a force makes possible.

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony

The classical part of the program, for which a much smaller body of players would serve, was judiciously cut down to Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the two extant movements of which require less than half an hour. It was beautifully played, with suavity and charm, but not with absolute precision, especially in the second movement, the soft undulations of which were at times slightly uneven. Of precision Mr Monteux does not make a fetich, but, on the other hand, he never gives a merely routine performance even of so well-worn a work as this favorite symphony, and the playing as well as the conducting was fresh and full of animation.

The reconstructed Boston Symphony orchestra has now found itself and plays with an agreeable ease, freedom and lack of constraint, and the quality of its tone, which for a time was impaired, has become rarely beautiful. For the display of this there could hardly be a better chance than in this symphony of unsurpassed melodic beauty.

Rich Modernity in "Don Juan"

Tonal splendor characterized the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," which followed, and which while not so extreme in its technical devices as some of the composer's later works, is musically one of the finest of them and a notable example of the modern orchestral style. Here the 100 players were none too many nor too much and while in the climaxes the effect was gorgeous, the tone was never strident and overpowering like that of a military band in an inclosed space.

The modern music, it should be observed, needs a great force of players, not so much for a greater volume of tone as for the greater variety of tone which the modern composer gets not merely by adding new instruments, but by splitting up tone masses which the classical composers treated as units. The technic is almost as different as the painting methods of the old masters and the impressionists, and in the case of music the use of a vast number of spots of color requires greatly-increased instrumental resources.

English Composer's Fantasia

This was illustrated in a different way in the highly-interesting work by the English composer, Ralph Vaughan Williams, which came next, a fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-stringed orchestra. Tallis was an English composer of the 16th century, who in 1567 wrote eight tunes (among them "Veni Creator") for Archbishop Parker's "Metrical Psalter," he is sometimes called "the father of English cathedral music." The tune used is a fine one, stately in its pace, and a good take-off for higher flights. Mr Vaughan Williams has shown much ingenuity and skill in its treatment, developing it in the spirit of the cathedral organ while using the beautiful effects of shading and accent, of which strings above all other instruments are capable. But to realize the composer's intention a large force of strings is required and the 60-odd yesterday were none too many.

The second orchestra is composed of four violins, two violas, two 'cellos and one B bass (to be taken from the third desk of each group, carefully specifies the composer, but in the Boston Symphony orchestra any desk would do) and put apart at the back of the stage. The effect is often like that of an alternation between the manuals of a great organ and further variety is secured by the free use of [illegible], all of which were ex- [illegible]. The work is a strik- [illegible] giving; it [illegible]

Cesar Franck and Liszt

It was fitting so soon after the widely-observed centenary of the great French composer, Cesar Franck (born at Liege, December 10, 1822), to include one of his works, and "Les Aeolides" (children of Aeolus, god of the winds), while not one of his greatest works, is perhaps more popular in character than some of these, and fitted well into the program. This work was an innovation for its composer, who wrote it in 1876, when the symphonic poem was a novel heresy; his own austere genius developed on other lines, but the beauty of many passages in "Les Aeolides" suggests what he might have achieved in [illegible] direction if he had whole-heartedly taken up the "program music" which Berlioz, Liszt, Saint-Saens, Richard Strauss and others developed with such success.

The program closed with one of the most famous and popular examples of this 19th century invasion of music by literature, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," based on a poem by Lamartin, or rather on a rhetorical prose version which contains little of the poem, but gives an emotional perspective of human life which is ideally suited to Liszt's grandiose and magniloquent manner. "What is our life but a series of preludes?" Lamartine asks, and the same may be asked of much of Liszt's tentative, slowly-developing, powerfully emotional music. In the unfinished melody that gets nowhere yet breathes vague romance he surpasses even Wagner—his song, "The Loreley," suggests this habitual trait, sometimes a weakness, but potent in this mournful and impressive picture of the unrest of the human spirit and the call to action with which the work ends in a blare of brass which gave yesterday's concert a superb climax.

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
JAN 8 1923

RUSSIAN MUSIC PLAYED BY MONTEUX

Some new music by Igor Stravinsky—or, in any case, music in which he has a hand—was given its first local performance by Pierre Monteux at the Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The piece was a suite put together from the ballet "Pulcinella," the whole of which (a "ballet with song") was produced at the Paris Opera a year ago last May by the indefatigable Serge de Diaghileff and his Russian company. New York rarely has a chance of hearing any of these things except in the concert hall which, however, in the present instance happens to serve very well, although the pantomime ought to be as amusing as the music by itself is delightful.

Stravinsky, or Diaghileff, is supposed to have come upon some unpublished manuscript by Pergolesi, that early eighteenth century genius who died at the age of twenty-six, while one or the other of them was in Naples. This, with other music from some of Pergolesi's known comic operas and intermezzi and very likely from some of his instrumental sonatas, is presumably the basis of Stravinsky's pasticcio. Yet it would not surprise one to learn that the whole thing was a bit of hoax and that the prince of modern cacophonists was merely having his little joke to show that, when he put his mind to it, he could be as lambishly diatonic and gracefully naif as the very eighteenth century itself.

A Musical JAPE?

The point of the joke, if joke it be (and Stravinsky is quite capable of something like it), is nevertheless the authentic eighteenth century character of the music. The Russian is frank enough about sponsoring the orchestration, and this, with the exception of an ineluctable quirk here and there, is strikingly of a piece with the melodic material itself. If the latter be indeed the genuine Italian, it is remarkably fine Pergolesi, and if it be only the Russian masquerading, it is still better. The suite consists of a sinfonia or overture, a serenade in the old style, and a finale in four brief movements of contrasting spirit, and it is all charming to sit and listen to quite irrespective of the stage action that goes with it.

The piece is scored for a comparatively small orchestra, relying chiefly on solo instruments, including a quintet of strings. It was [illegible] as much grace or pointed touch as it required and the solo parts were not always adeptly accounted for, particularly those for the strings.

Preceding the Stravinsky suite, Mr. Monteux played Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy—all of it to the last drop—and this probably was a service to the listener, who almost never has a chance to hear more than a third of it; the service being that he could make up his mind definitively that he need never listen to it again. Otherwise the programme held Franck's "Les eolides" and Litz's "Les preludes."

FROM JAN 8 1923
~~UNION,~~ News
Springfield, Mass.

MONDAY, JANUARY [illegible]

Boston Symphony Presents Program That Delights Great Throng at the Auditorium

Springfield once more had the pleasure of hearing the greatest orchestra in America at the Auditorium yesterday, when the Boston Symphony, under the baton of Pierre Monteux, appeared under the auspices of the local Young Men's Christian Association. Just a year ago today the great hall was crowded to its utmost capacity to hear this some orchestra, and yesterday, despite the cold and the bitter wind that swept up from the river, thousands of people waited patiently on the steps and plaza of the Auditorium until the doors swung open to admit them to a very wonderful concert.

The program chosen by Mr Monteaux could hardly have been selected with better judgment as to the demands of yesterday's audience. It is not, of course, the custom of the Boston Symphony to swerve from what is best in music, but yesterday's concert was admirably selected with a view toward pleasing a heterogeneous audience who perhaps would have been impatient with a program of the more academic classical music. The Schubert "Unfinished" symphony was the opening selection, chosen perhaps as a tribute to the more biase of music-lovers, who, no matter what their degere of sophistication, must have found in it yesterday new delights, for Mr Monteux's reading was unstilted and fresh, and the symphony itself rich in color. The facts surrounding this work and the title, which through its popularity has come to sound a bit banal, have given the romantically inclined many a sentimental debauch; nevertheless, there is real poignancy, and beauty of that soul-reaching type that goes home like a shrewd stroke at the heart, in this "Unfinished" symphony. Did Schubert envision his end when he was writing it? Did he feel the first coldness of death approaching? The sentimentalists would have it so, and in truth there are passages that spring out at one from the rich and somberly colored whole like a prophetic voice crying in the night. There were times in the performance yesterday when one would have wished that the rhythms were more regular; Mr Monteux allowed considerable liberty in this regard; but then he is by no means a purist, nor has he ever been guilty of hide-bound conventionality in his readings.

The Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan," was pure delight. Here was an example of what we ought to call "popular music." What do the great mass of people seek in music? If it is sumptuousness of coloring, infinite variety of figure and rhythm, if it is, as is said, the sensuous and not the intellectually appealing type of music, "Don Juan" furnishes it in the superlative degree. Here are richest harmonies, and yet comparatively simple ones: here is grace and symmetry of structure, here musical voluptuousness, and pure delight to the senses that cannot easily be equaled. The Boston Symphony seems to take special delight in playing this work; even those most professional of professional musicians seem to be somewhat carried away with the music, but never to the point of losing that artistic restraint that makes the abandonment of the composer's mood the most keenly sensed.

A sharp and pleasing contrast was the theme for double-stringed orchestra, by Thomas Tallis, who lived in England in the middle of the 16th century, and has been called the "father of English cathedral music." There is a medieval atmosphere in the structure and harmonies of the piece, that have been admirably preserved by Ralph Vaughan Williams, who composed the fantasia on the theme. The word fantasia makes many of us think instinctively of a somewhat frivolous and formless extravaganza having littel to do with the original theme—an idea growing out of the barbarous "Variations" so often perpetrated for the delectation and the despair of the piano tyro. Anyone at the Auditorium yesterday who had that idea must have been disabused of it. The piece was splendidly played, with understanding and as the logical sequence, with true feeling. It would be difficult to find a technical flaw in the work of the symphony and a review of its concerts is always in peril of degenerating into a praise service.

Cesar Frnnck's "Ies Eolides" (The Aeolidae) was the modern contribution to yesterdaq's program. It was also the most unsatisfactory—not through any shortcoming on the part of conductor or orchestra, but because while the theme certainly should give a composer of Franck's qualifications an opportunity for a great work, he failed to make the best use of it. The piece is supposed to have been inspired by Leconte de Lisle's poem, but the score makes no mention of this inspiration, and certainly the work does not show it. The following number, Liszt's "Les Preludes," was a fitting climax and conclusion, paradoxical as that may seem, to an afternoon of great music. Though sad, it brought delight, and it is to be hoped that the passage from Lamartine, that appears in Philip Hale's program notes, was well scanned by the music-lovers in the audience. In spite of Hale to the contrary, the music and the lines are mutually suggestive; this music must have been written in one of those magic moments that, more than all the dogma, all the so patly proven philosophy, and all the sophistical reasoning of sefl-appointed and self-styled sages, are intimations of immortality; moments when man is more than a higher animal, and knows that he is; moments when he looks down the long and darksome vista of past and again of future years, and brings to bear upon them that power of intellect that stamps him with the stamp of divinity. It is magical, this music, and so profound a mood as that in which it leaves the hearer ought not to be intruded upon by banal applause. It had the hand of genius, in its fashioning, in its great reading by Mr Monteaux, and its splendid execution by his musicians. It was a noble climax to the concert, and sent the vast audience ay to think, "perhaps to dream," and at the worst, conscious of having experienced a little of one of the few really worth-while things of life.

ESTABLISHED [illegible] 9 1923
FROM UNION,
Springfield, Mass.

EARLY-LEAVERS SCORED.

Reader Criticizes Alleged Discourtesy at Symphony Concert.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: The following refers only to certain persons; others will not take offense, I'm sure.

Near the end of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon, in fact, just before the last number was about to begin, different persons all over the house rose from their seats and started to put on their outer wraps; some even left their seats and moved toward the exits. This was a mark of gross disrespect not only to M. Pierre Monteux, who so ably conducted a magnificent orchestra through a magnificent program, but to the real music lovers, who wished to witness that program to its completion. M. Monteux let it be known in a very quiet way that such a disturbance existed when he held his audience waiting for the final number until those in ignorance of real courtesy should have quieted down.

To be sure, it is not very pleasant to be in an afternoon performance jam, but that is preferable to infringing upon the rights of others by causing a commotion, or to be disrespectful to the performers. It would teach that sort of person a lesson should a concert be terminated at the finish of the number before the last and the performers leave the platform. The feelings of the audience can hardly be imagined should such an affair occur.

There are people at every public performance who do the same thing, and who should be publicly reprimanded. Even at a motion picture performance just before the hero takes "Dearie" in his arms there are those who think that they know what the end is going to be and arise from their seats and oblige others to do the same that they might pass; and by the time they reach the exit and turn for a final look at the picture their notice is called to the fact that the picture is not finished at all, but that another ending is in progress, and that their guess was all wrong.

This note will, I hope, not raise a storm of protests of this nature from the different Forumites. I believe that the less said about an unpleasant subject the better, and perhaps I have already said too much. However, it would be a boon to the entertainment-going public if this practise were stopped.

MUSIC LOVER.
Springfield, Jan. 8, 1922.

From ~~Sun~~ & Herald
New York
JAN 8 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY PLAY WITH GLEE CLUB

Orchestra Invites Harvard to Joint Concert Here.

Special Dispatch to THE NEW YORK HERALD.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 8.—Boston Symphony Orchestra to-day extended an invitation to the Harvard Glee Club to give a joint concert with it in New York, March 17. The Harvard club is believed to be the first organization of its kind to receive such recognition from a symphony orchestra. The glee club during the last two seasons has played with the Boston musicians in Symphony Hall, and two years ago made a concert tour of France and European countries.

N
New York City
JAN 9 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY PLAY WITH GLEE CLUB

Orchestra Invites Harvard to Joint Concert Here.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 9.—Boston Symphony Orchestra has extended an invitation to the Harvard Glee Club to give a joint concert with it in New York, March 17. The Harvard club is believed to be the first organization of its kind to receive such recognition from a symphony orchestra. The glee club during the last two seasons has played with the Boston musicians in Symphony Hall, and two years ago made a concert tour of France and European countries.

FROM NEWS,
Providence, R. I.

THIRD BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux has compiled the programme for the third Boston Symphony concert of the Providence season, to be given in Infantry hall a week from Tuesday evening, Jan. 23. It will open with Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony in B-Minor," one of the most popular of all smyphonic works by virtue of its simple but ineffable melodic inspiration. The fantastic and humorous tone poem of Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which is one of the modern German composer's best-liked works, is also to be played.

The soloist of the evening will be Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the violoncella section of the orschestra, who will be heard in two numbers—Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," and the first movement from Dvorak's concerto for the instrument.

Mr. Monteux will close the concert with Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana."

R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 1

NOVEL FEATURES INCLUDED IN BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORE

Soloist for Jan. 23 at Infantry Hall Will Be Jean Bedetti.

The programme for the third concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony has been arranged by Pierre Monteux and will be given at Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, Jan. 23. The soloist of the evening will be Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, who will be heard in two numbers, Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and the first movement from Dvorak's concerto for that instrument.

The opening number will be Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in B-minor, which is one of the most popular of all symphonic works. The fantastic and humorous tone poems of Strauss, "Ill Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," will also be played. There will be a novelty of interest in Stravinsky's arrangement of the themes of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer, into a ballet suite, "Pulcinella." This score by the radical Russian composer has been introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at recent concerts in New York and Boston, where it has been received with general praise. Mr. Monteux will close the concert with Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

[57]

FROM JAN 8 192
REPUBLICAN,
Springfield, Mass.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IN GREAT CONCERT

Splendid Performance is Given by Big Orchestra—Auditorium is Packed to Its Capacity of 4000

By Francis Regal

The Boston Symphony orchestra, conducted by Pierre Monteux, gave a splendid concert, chiefly of modern music, yesterday afternoon in the Auditorium in the Young Men's Christian association course, of which for a number of years this annual concert has been the star attraction. As always, it was greeted by a vast audience, limited only by the available space and as usual Mr Monteux chose a program suitable for an audience of 4000 people, many of whom hear fewer orchestral concerts than they would like, and naturally desire to make as much as possible of so rare a treat.

It is a good occasion to make ample use of the full resources of the modern orchestra, and the entire 100 players of the Boston organization were present and gave a program that gave full scope for numerical strength. This is a wise policy, for while an equally good concert may be given by 60 or 70 musicians, with ample volume of tone for even so large a space, there are many modern works which for their full effect require an enlarged orchestra, and the public is naturally anxious for a chance to hear the novel technical effect which so great a force makes possible.

Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony

The classical part of the program, for which a much smaller body of players would serve, was judiciously cut down to Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, the two extant movements of which require less than half an hour. It was beautifully played, with suavity and charm, but not with absolute precision, especially in the second movement, the soft undulations of which were at times slightly uneven. Of precision Mr Monteux does not make a fetich, but, on the other hand, he never gives a merely routine performance even of so well-worn a work as this favorite symphony, and the playing as well as the conducting was fresh and full of animation.

The reconstructed Boston Symphony orchestra has now found itself and plays with an agreeable ease, freedom and lack of constraint, and the quality of its tone, which for a time was impaired, has become rarely beautiful. For the display of this there could hardly be a better chance than in this symphony of unsurpassed melodic beauty.

Rich Modernity in "Don Juan"

Tonal splendor characterized the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," which followed, and which while not so extreme in its technical devices as some of the composer's later works, is musically one of the finest of them and a notable example of the modern orchestral style. Here the 100 players were none too many nor too much and while in the climaxes the effect was gorgeous, the tone was never strident and overpowering like that of a military band in an inclosed space.

The modern music, it should be observed, needs a great force of players, not so much for a greater volume of tone as for the greater variety of tone which the modern composer gets not merely by adding new instruments, but by splitting up tone masses which the classical composers treated as units. The technic is as different as the painting methods of the old masters and the impressionists, and in the case of music the use of a vast number of spots of color requires greatly-increased instrumental resources.

English Composer's Fantasia

This was illustrated in a different way in the highly-interesting work by the English composer, Ralph Vaughan Williams, which came next, a fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis for double-stringed orchestra. Tallis was an English composer of the 16th century, who in 1567 wrote eight tunes (among them "Veni Creator") for Archbishop Parker's "Metrical Psalter," he is sometimes called "the father of English cathedral music." The tune used is a fine one, stately in its pace, and a good take-off for higher flights. Mr Vaughan Williams has shown much ingenuity and skill in its treatment, developing it in the spirit of the cathedral organ while using the beautiful effects of shading and accent, of which strings above all other instruments are capable. But to realize the composer's intention a large force of strings is required and the 60-odd yesterday were none too many.

The second orchestra is composed of four violins, two violas, two 'cellos and one B bass (to be taken from the third desk of each group, carefully specifies the composer, but in the Boston Symphony orchestra any desk would do) and put apart at the back of the stage. The effect is often like that of an alternation between the manuals of a great organ and further variety is secured by the free use of solo passages, all of which were ex- [illegible] played. The work is a strik- [illegible] well worth giving; it

Cesar Franck and Liszt

It was fitting so soon after the widely-observed centenary of the great French composer, Cesar Franck (born at Liege, December 10, 1822), to include one of his works, and "Les Aeolides" (children of Aeolus, god of the winds), while not one of his greatest works, is perhaps more popular in character than some of these, and fitted well into the program. This work was an innovation for its composer, who wrote it in 1876, when the symphonic poem was a novel heresy; his own austere genius developed on other lines, but the beauty of many passages in "Les Aeolides" suggests what he might have achieved in [illegible] direction if he had whole-heartedly taken up the "program music" which Berlioz, Liszt, Saint-Saens, Richard Strauss and others developed with such success.

The program closed with one of the most famous and popular examples of this 19th century invasion of music by literature, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," based on a poem by Lamartin, or rather on a rhetorical prose version which contains little of the poem, but gives an emotional perspective of human life which is ideally suited to Liszt's grandiose and magniloquent manner. "What is our life but a series of preludes?" Lamartine asks, and the same may be asked of much of Liszt's tentative, slowly-developing, powerfully emotional music. In the unfinished melody that gets nowhere yet breathes vague romance he surpasses even Wagner—his song, "The Loreley," suggests this habitual trait, sometimes a weakness, but potent in this mournful and impressive picture of the unrest of the human spirit and the call to action with which the work ends in a blare of brass which gave yesterday's concert a superb climax.

N. Y.
JOURNAL
ISSUE OF
JAN 8 1923

RUSSIAN MUSIC PLAYED BY MONTEUX

Some new music by Igor Stravinsky—or, in any case, music in which he has a hand—was given its first local performance by Pierre Monteux at the Saturday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall. The piece was a suite put together from the ballet "Pulcinella," the whole of which (a "ballet with song") was produced at the Paris Opera a year ago last May by the indefatigable Serge de Diaghileff and his Russian company. New York rarely has a chance of hearing any of these things except in the concert hall which, however, in the present instance happens to serve very well, although the pantomime ought to be as amusing as the music by itself is delightful.

Stravinsky, or Diaghileff, is supposed to have come upon some unpublished manuscript by Pergolesi, that early eighteenth century genius who died at the age of twenty-six, while one or the other of them was in Naples. This, with other music from some of Pergolesi's known comic operas and intermezzi and very likely from some of his instrumental sonatas, is presumably the basis of Stravinsky's pasticcio. Yet it would not surprise one to learn that the whole thing was a bit of hoax and that the prince of modern cacophonists was merely having his little joke to show that, when he put his mind to it, he could be as lambishly diatonic and gracefully naif as the very eighteenth century itself.

A Musical JAPE?

The point of the joke, if joke it be (and Stravinsky is quite capable of something like it), is nevertheless the authentic eighteenth century character of the music. The Russian is frank enough about sponsoring the orchestration, and this, with the exception of an ineluctable quirk here and there, is strikingly of a piece with the melodic material itself. If the latter be indeed the genuine Italian, it is remarkably fine Pergolesi, and if it be only the Russian masquerading, it is still better. The suite consists of a sinfonia or overture, a serenade in the old style, and a finale in four brief movements of contrasting spirit, and it is all charming to sit and listen to quite irrespective of the stage action that goes with it.

The piece is scored for a comparatively small orchestra, relying chiefly on solo instruments, including a quintet of strings. It was [illegible] as much grace or pointed touch as it required and the solo parts were not always adeptly accounted for, particularly those for the strings.

Preceding the Stravinsky suite, Mr. Monteux played Vincent d'Indy's "Wallenstein" trilogy—all of it to the last drop—and this probably was a service to the listener, who almost never has a chance to hear more than a third of it; the service being that he could make up his mind definitively that he need never listen to it again. Otherwise the programme held Franck's "Les eolides" and Litz's "Les preludes."

FROM JAN 8 1923
UNION,
Springfield, Mass.

MONDAY, JANUARY 8,

Boston Symphony Presents Program That Delights Great Throng at the Auditorium

Springfield once more had the pleasure of hearing the greatest orchestra in America at the Auditorium yesterday, when the Boston Symphony, under the baton of Pierre Monteux, appeared under the auspices of the local Young Men's Christian Association. Just a year ago today the great hall was crowded to its utmost capacity to hear this some orchestra, and yesterday, despite the cold and the bitter wind that swept up from the river, thousands of people waited patiently on the steps and plaza of the Auditorium until the doors swung open to admit them to a very wonderful concert.

The program chosen by Mr Monteaux could hardly have been selected with better judgment as to the demands of yesterday's audience. It is not, of course, the custom of the Boston Symphony to swerve from what is best in music, but yesterday's concert was admirably selected with a view toward pleasing a heterogeneous audience who perhaps would have been impatient with a program of the more academic classical music. The Schubert "Unfinished" symphony was the opening selection, chosen perhaps as a tribute to the more biase of music-lovers, who, no matter what their degere of sophistication, must have found in it yesterday new delights, for Mr Monteux's reading was unstilted and fresh, and the symphony itself rich in color. The facts surrounding this work and the title, which through its popularity has come to sound a bit banal, have given the romantically inclined many a sentimental debauch; nevertheless, there is real poignancy, and beauty of that soul-reaching type that goes home like a shrewd stroke at the heart, in this "Unfinished" symphony. Did Schubert envision his end when he was writing it? Did he feel the first coldness of death approaching? The sentimentalists would have it so, and in truth there are passages that spring out at one from the rich and somberly colored whole like a prophetic voice crying in the night. There were times in the performance yesterday when one would have wished that the rhythms were more regular; Mr Monteux allowed considerable liberty in this regard; but then he is by no means a purist, nor has he ever been guilty of hide-bound conventionality in his readings.

The Strauss tone-poem, "Don Juan," was pure delight. Here was an example of what we ought to call "popular music." What do the great mass of people seek in music? If it is sumptuousness of coloring, infinite variety of figure and rhythm, if it is, as is said, the sensuous and not the intellectually appealing type of music, "Don Juan" furnishes it in the superlative degree. Here are richest harmonies, and yet comparatively simple ones: here is grace and symmetry of structure, here musical voluptuousness, and pure delight to the senses that cannot easily be equaled. The Boston Symphony seems to take special delight in playing this work; even those most professional of professional musicians seem to be somewhat carried away with the music, but never to the point of losing that artistic restraint that makes the abandonment of the composer's mood the most keenly sensed.

A sharp and pleasing contrast was the theme for double-stringed orchestra, by Thomas Tallis, who lived in England in the middle of the 16th century, and has been called the "father of English cathedral music." There is a medieval atmosphere in the structure and harmonies of the piece, that have been admirably preserved by Ralph Vaughan Williams, who composed the fantasia on the theme. The word fantasia makes many of us think instinctively of a somewhat frivolous and formless extravaganza having littel to do with the original theme—an idea growing out of the barbarous "Variations" so often perpetrated for the delectation and the despair of the piano tyro. Anyone at the Auditorium yesterday who had that idea must have been disabused of it. The piece was splendidly played, with understanding and as the logical sequence, with true feeling. It would be difficult to find a technical flaw in the work of the symphony and a review of its concerts is always in peril of degenerating into a praise service.

Cesar Frnnck's "Ies Eolides" (The Aeolidae) was the modern contribution to yesterdaq's program. It was also the most unsatisfactory—not through any shortcoming on the part of conductor or orchestra, but because while the theme certainly should give a composer of Franck's qualifications an opportunity for a great work, he failed to make the best use of it. The piece is supposed to have been inspired by Leconte de Lisle's poem, but the score makes no mention of this inspiration, and certainly the work does not show it. The following number, Liszt's "Les Preludes," was a fitting climax and conclusion, paradoxical as that may seem, to an afternoon of great music. Though sad, it brought delight, and it is to be hoped that the passage from Lamartine, that appears in Philip Hale's program notes, was well scanned by the music-lovers in the audience. In spite of Hale to the contrary, the music and the lines are mutually suggestive; this music must have been written in one of those magic moments that, more than all the dogma, all the so patly proven philosophy, and all the sophistical reasoning of sefl-appointed and self-styled sages, are intimations of immortality; moments when man is more than a higher animal, and knows that he is; moments when he looks down the long and darksome vista of past and again of future years, and brings to bear upon them that power of intellect that stamps him with the stamp of divinity. It is magical, this music, and so profound a mood as that in which it leaves the hearer ought not to be intruded upon by banal applause. It had the hand of genius, in its fashioning, in its great reading by Mr Monteaux, and its splendid execution by his musicians. It was a noble climax to the concert, and sent the vast audience ay to think, "perhaps to dream," and at the worst, conscious of having experienced a little of one of the few really worth-while things of life.

ESTABLISHED 1861 1923
FROM UNION,
Springfield, Mass.

EARLY-LEAVERS SCORED.

Reader Criticizes Alleged Discourtesy at Symphony Concert.

To the Editor of The Union.

Sir: The following refers only to certain persons; others will not take offense, I'm sure.

Near the end of the concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Sunday afternoon, in fact, just before the last number was about to begin, different persons all over the house rose from their seats and started to put on their outer wraps; some even left their seats and moved toward the exits. This was a mark of gross disrespect not only to M. Pierre Monteux, who so ably conducted a magnificent orchestra through a magnificent program, but to the real music lovers, who wished to witness that program to its completion. M. Monteux let it be known in a very quiet way that such a disturbance existed when he held his audience waiting for the final number until those in ignorance of real courtesy should have quieted down.

To be sure, it is not very pleasant to be in an afternoon performance jam, but that is preferable to infringing upon the rights of others by causing a commotion, or to be disrespectful to the performers. It would teach that sort of person a lesson should a concert be terminated at the finish of the number before the last and the performers leave the platform. The feelings of the audience can hardly be imagined should such an affair occur.

There are people at every public performance who do the same thing, and who should be publicly reprimanded. Even at a motion picture performance just before the hero takes "Dearie" in his arms there are those who think that they know what the end is going to be and arise from their seats and oblige others to do the same that they might pass; and by the time they reach the exit and turn for a final look at the picture their notice is called to the fact that the picture is not finished at all, but that another ending is in progress, and that their guess was all wrong.

This note will, I hope, not raise a storm of protests of this nature from the different Forumites. I believe that the less said about an unpleasant subject the better, and perhaps I have already said too much. However, it would be a boon to the entertainment-going public if this practise were stopped.

MUSIC LOVER.

Springfield, Jan. 8, 1922.

From
~~Sun~~ & Herald
New York

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY PLAY WITH GLEE CLUB

Orchestra Invites Harvard to Joint Concert Here.

Special Dispatch to THE NEW YORK HERALD.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 8.—Boston Symphony Orchestra to-day extended an invitation to the Harvard Glee Club to give a joint concert with it in New York, March 17. The Harvard club is believed to be the first organization of its kind to receive such recognition from a symphony orchestra. The glee club during the last two seasons has played with the Boston musicians in Symphony Hall, and two years ago made a concert tour of France and European countries.

N

New York City
JAN 9 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY MAY PLAY WITH GLEE CLUB

Orchestra Invites Harvard to Joint Concert Here.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Jan. 9.—Boston Symphony Orchestra has extended an invitation to the Harvard Glee Club to give a joint concert with it in New York, March 17. The Harvard club is believed to be the first organization of its kind to receive such recognition from a symphony orchestra. The glee club during the last two seasons has played with the Boston musicians in Symphony Hall, and two years ago made a concert tour of France and European countries.

FROM NEWS,
Providence, R. I.

THIRD BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Pierre Monteux has compiled the programme for the third Boston Symphony concert of the Providence season, to be given in Infantry hall a week from Tuesday evening, Jan. 23. It will open with Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony in B-Minor," one of the most popular of all smyphonic works by virtue of its simple but ineffable melodic inspiration. The fantastic and humorous tone poem of Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," which is one of the modern German composer's best-liked works, is also to be played.

The soloist of the evening will be Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the violoncella section of the orschestra, who will be heard in two numbers—Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," and the first movement from Dvorak's concerto for the instrument.

Mr. Monteux will close the concert with Chabrier's Rhapsody, "Espana."

R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 1

NOVEL FEATURES INCLUDED IN BOSTON SYMPHONY SCORE

Soloist for Jan. 23 at Infantry Hall Will Be Jean Bedetti.

The programme for the third concert of the Providence season by the Boston Symphony has been arranged by Pierre Monteux and will be given at Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, Jan. 23. The soloist of the evening will be Jean Bedetti, leader of the 'cello section of the orchestra, who will be heard in two numbers, Bruch's "Kol Nidrei" and the first movement from Dvorak's concerto for that instrument.

The opening number will be Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" in B-minor, which is one of the most popular of all symphonic works. The fantastic and humorous tone poems of Strauss, "Ill Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," will also be played. There will be a novelty of interest in Stravinsky's arrangement of the themes of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer, into a ballet suite, "Pulcinella." This score by the radical Russian composer has been introduced to America by Mr. Monteux and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at recent concerts in New York and Boston, where it has been received with general praise. Mr. Monteux will close the concert with Chabrier's rhapsody, "Espana."

[57]

R. I.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
JAN 24 1923

JEAN BEDETTI

First 'Cellist Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
JAN 24 1923

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAM.

Jean Bedetti, the illustrious leader of the violoncello section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will appear as soloist at the third Providence concert of the season, which is to take place in Infantry Hall Tuesday evening, Jan. 23.

Pierre Monteux will open the program with Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, a masterpiece of lyric beauty, which remains through many years the most popular of symphonic works. There will also be played Richard Strauss's humorous tone poem "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

A novelty of particular interest, which has been introduced to America by Pierre Monteux and his orchestra in recent concerts in Boston and New York, is Stravinsky's ballet suite "Pulcinella," which is based on the themes and style of Pergolesi, the early Italian composer. The daring Russian musician has received only praise for his vital and sympathetic treatment of the music of centuries past.

Mr. Bedetti will appear in two numbers with the orchestra: Bruch's "Kol Nidrei," and the first movement from Dvorak's concerto for the 'cello.

The evening will close with Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana" based on the characteristic Spanish dance rhythms gleaned from Spain by the French composer and worked into this remarkable, striking and colorful score.

PROVIDENCE
R. I.
JOURNAL

* * *

Symphony Programme for Next Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra comes for its third concert on Tuesday evening, Jan. 23, at Infantry Hall, Mr. Monteux having arranged a programme of varied interest. It will include Schubert's ever popular masterpiece, the "Unfinished Symphony," and Richard Strauss's humorous and fantastic tone poem, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

A notable novelty will be the suite drawn by Stravinsky from his ballet "Pulcinella." This score is in reality an arrangement by the distinguished Russian of the music of Pergolesi, the early 18th century Italian composer. Mr. Monteux has given the score its first American performances in Boston and New York. Chabrier's rhapsody "Espana" will be the closing number.

Jean Bedetti, leader of the violoncello section of the orchestra, will be the soloist. He will play two numbers, the opening movement of Dvorak's concerto for violoncello, and Bruch's celebrated "Kol Nidrei."

JAN 22 1923

In Orchestral Waters

Novelties by the Boston Symphony, the coming of Albert Coates to lead the New York Symphony until March, and concerts by the New York Philharmonic under the leadership of Henry Hadley at which American compositions were played, have been ripples on orchestral waters.

The novelties brought forward by the Bostonians, under the baton of Pierre Monteux, were Arnold Bax's "November Woods" and a suite from the ballet, "Pulcinella," which the Russian modernist, Stravinksy, evolved from fragments of melody taken from old Italian operas by Pergolesi. Of these, the Bax work seemed of much more import. At first hearing it impressed as one of the sturdiest and one of the most representative compositions of the younger British school. Though not altogether free of imputations of French impressionism, its material had a genuine Celtic flavor. The work is a mood-picture of dreary and storm-swept nature in the late autumn and is tone-painting in its truest sense.

The "Pulcinella" suite suggested that the ballet from which it was drawn might be distinctly pleasurable in stage form, but as music of the concert hall it was neither very good Pergolesi nor representative Stravinsky. The melodies borrowed from the older master were not individually striking, and the scoring, although it did no violence to these old airs, included combinations and clang-tints that were foreign to their spirit.

For the first of his ventures in American music, Mr. Hadley selected

---

N. Y.
EVE. POST
ISSUE OF
JAN 27 1923

Enesco With Boston Symphony

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon, February 1 and 3. At the evening concert Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer now visiting America for the first time, will appear as violin soloist with the orchestra in the Concerto of Brahms. Pierre Monteux will also conduct "Berlioz," "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Franck's Symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole," and Smétana's symphonic poem "The Moldau."

The matinée programme will consist entirely of the music of Richard Wagner as follows: Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "The Mastersingers," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan," and excerpts from "The Valkyrie," Siegfried," and "The Dusk of the Gods." Clarence Whitehill will sing Wotan's Farewell from "The Valkyrie."

SUN
ess New York City
JAN 27 1923

The Symphonies.

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening (February 1) and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer, now visiting America for the first time, will appear as violin soloist with the orchestra in the concerto of Brahms. Pierre Monteux will also conduct Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Franck's symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit" ("The Wild Huntsman"), Ravel's rapsodie espagnole and Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau."

The matinee will consist entirely of the music of Richard Wagner, as follows: Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "The Mastersingers," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan" and excerpts from "The Valkyrie," "Siegfried" and "The Dusk of the Gods." Clarence Whitehill will sing Wotan's Farewell from "The Valkyrie."

N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
ISSUE OF
JAN 28 1923

Enesco With Boston Symphony.

Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer, who is also a celebrated violin virtuoso, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert to be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening. He will play with the orchestra the violin concerto of Brahms. Pierre Monteaux will also conduct Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Franck's symphonic poem, "The Wild Huntsman," Ravel's "Rhapsodie Espagnole" and Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau."

The program for next Saturday afternoon will consist entirely of excerpts from the music dramas of Richard Wagner and will include the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg," the prelude and love death from "Tristan" and portions of "The Valkyrie," "Siegfried" and "The Dusk of the Gods." Clarence Whitehill will sing in Wotan's Farewell from "The Valkyrie."

From TELEGRAM
New York City
JAN 28 1923

The third pair of Boston Symphony concerts will be given in Carnegie Hall next Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon. At the evening concert Georges Enesco, the Roumanian composer, now visiting America for the first time, will appear as violin soloist with the orchestra in the concerto of Brahms. Pierre Monteux will conduct Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Frank's symphonic poem "Le Chasseur Maudit," Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole" and Smetana's symphonic poem "The Moldau."

The matinee will consist entirely of the music of Richard Wagner, as follows:—Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin," "The Mastersingers," Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan" and excerpts from "The Valkyrie," "Siegfried" and "The Dusk of the Gods." Clarence Whitehill will sing Wotan's Farewell from "The Valkyrie."

EXTRA SYMPHONY

The second concert of the Monday evening series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux conductor, will take place next Monday, Jan. 29, at 8:15 in Symphony hall. The distinguished soloist will be Renee Chemet, the French violinist. She will be heard in the Spanish Symphony of Lalo. Pierre Monteux will open the program with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor and will also conduct Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas."

TRAV. JAN 27

Boston Symphony Plays Holst's "The Planets"

Yesterday afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, played Holst's suite, "The Planets," and MacDowell's "Indian" suite. "The Planets" was played for the first time in Boston. For this suite Holst employs an extremely large orchestra. As a matter of curiosity, its composition is worth quoting. It consists of four flutes (two of them interchangeable with piccolos and one with a bass flute), three oboes (one interchangeable with a bass oboe), English horn, three clarinets, bass clarinet, three bassoons, double bassoon, six horns, four trumpets, two tenor trombones, bass trombone, bass tuba, tenor tuba, six kettledrums, bass drum, side drum, cymbals, bells, triangle, tambourine, Glockenspiel, celesta, xylophone, tam-tam, two harps, organ, and strings. In the last movement, "Neptune," a choir of women's voices is added; but this requirement is evidently ad libitum, as there were no singers in yesterday's performance.

With this immense array of sound-producing material at his command it is hardly necessary to state that the composer is enabled to produce many novel effects, not by means of the volume of sound alone but by unusual combinations of timbres. However, this suite must not be regarded in the light of its unusual orchestration alone. In spite of its importance in the general scheme of the work, the thematic material and its development never suffer because of it. The subject is always clearly stated and tinkered in consequence, as did Mendelssohn before him. Nevertheless, there are certain pages of this suite, notably the "Dirge," which have been rarely equaled and certainly not surpassed by any other American composer.

The performance of Holst's suite was a feat of virtuosity on the part of conductor and orchestra. The mere reading of so complicated a score calls for no small amount of musicianship and when the difficulties of performance are added it becomes a task little short of stupendous. Mr. Monteux's reading of the "Indian" suite was sympathetic, particularly in the "Dirge" and "Love Song." The music of war and festival might have been given more rhythmical vigor.

S. M.

MONTR JAN 27

Renee Chemet, soloist at tomorrow's extra Symphony concert, is, if New York and European comment is to be trusted, one of the foremost living violinists, surpassed by no player of her sex. It is a pity she has chosen one of Bruch's empty show pieces for her Boston debut, instead of a really great concerto.

GLOBE-JAN. 28.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
JAN 28 1923

At a recent concert of the Apollo Club, in Boston, Mr. Wendler, first horn of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played a horn concerto written by Franz Strauss, father of Richard, and himself a distinguished virtuoso on the instrument. The Boston Transcript calls it "soundly made music, avoiding mere dryness as well as boldness and distinction," and hence "agreeable to hear," as well as an excellent vehicle for the display of the player's art.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra next month will play for the first time in America Turina's "Danzas Fantasticas." Ballantine's suite, "From the Garden of Hellas," will also be heard.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
JAN 28 1923

At its concert in New York on Saturday afternoon, Feb. 3, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has invited the Harvard Glee Club to assist. It is the first time that a college glee club has been asked to take part in an orchestral concert of this class. But it must be remembered that the Harvard Glee Club is no longer the traditional college glee club, but is devoted to music of the highest brow.

N. Y.
TIMES
ISSUE OF
JAN 28 1923

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Georges Enesco, the Rumanian composer, appears with the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Pierre Monteux next Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall in this program:

Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Concerto in D for violin with orchestra, Op. 77..........Brahms
Mr. Enesco.
Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit." Franck
"Rhapsodie Espagnole"..........Ravel
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau"..Smetana

Mr. Monteux on Saturday afternoon will present a program entirely from Wagner, including the overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "The Master Singers," the prelude and finale from "Tristan" and portions of "The Valkyrie," "Siegfried" and "The Dusk of the Gods," with "Wotan's Farewell," sung by Clarence Whitehill.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF 8 1923

Saturday

Carnegie Hall, 2:30 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; soloist, Clarence Whitehill:

Wagner Program
Overture to "Der Fliegende Hollaender"
Prelude to "Lohengrin"
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"
Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan und Isolde"
Wotan's Farewell and Magic Fire Music, from "Die Walkuere"
Mr. Whitehill
Siegfried's Ascent, from "Siegfried"; Morning Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, and Finale from "Goetterdaemmerung."

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF 8 1923

Thursday

Carnegie Hall, 8:15 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; soloist, Georges Enesco:

Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini"...Berlioz
Concerto for violin in D major....Brahms
Mr. Enesco
Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit"..........Franck
Rhapsodie Espagnole..........Ravel
Symphonic Poem, "Vltava" ("The Moldau")..........Smetana

N. Y.
WORLD Bklyn
ISSUE OF
JAN 28 1923

ENESCO TO BE HEARD.

Georges Enesco, Roumanian violinist and composer, who is visiting America for the first time, will appear with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concert to be given next Friday night at the Academy of Music under Brooklyn Institute auspices. Pierre Monteux will open the program with the eighth symphony of Beethoven. He will also conduct the symphonic poem, "The Moldau," by Smetana, the Bohemian composer, and will close with excerpts from Wagner's "Ring." Siegfried's ascent to Brunnhilde's rock, from "Siegfried;" "Dawn," Siegfried's Rhine journey, and the close of "The Dusk of the Gods."

N. Y.
HERALD
JAN 28 1923

Georges Enesco, Rumanian composer and violinist, will be the soloist at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on Thursday evening. He will play Brahms's violin concerto. The orchestral numbers in the list are: Berlioz, the "Benvenuto Cellini" overture; Ravel, "Spanish Rhapsody"; Franck, "The Accursed Huntsman"; Smetana, poem, "The Moldau." The orchestra's program for its concert on Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall is all Wagner, as follows: Overtures to "The Flying Dutchman," "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," the prelude and love death from "Tristan and Isolde," and excerpts from "The Valkyrie," "Siegfried" and "The Dusk of the Gods." In Wotan's Farewell, which will be taken from "The Valkyrie," Clarence Whitehill will sing.

N. Y.
TRIBUNE
ISSUE OF
JAN 28 1923

Brooklyn Academy of Music, 8:15 p. m. Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra; soloist, Georges Enesco:

Symphony in F major, No. 8...Beethoven
Symphonic Poem, "Vltava" ("The Moldau")..........Smetana
Concerto for Violin in D major...Brahms
Mr. Enesco
Siegfried's Ascent, from "Siegfried"; Morning Dawn, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, and Finale, from "Goetterdaemmerung"..........Wagner

---

N. Y.
EAGLE
ISSUE OF
JAN 28 1923

A program of particular beauty and interest, with Georges Enesco, the distinguished Roumanian composer, as soloist, will make notable the third Boston Symphony concert to be given in Brooklyn next Friday evening, February 2, in the Academy of Music, at 8:15. Enesco will play the Brahms Violin Concerto. Beethoven's Eighth Symphony will be on the program, which will close with selections from Wagner's "Ring."

MONDAY SYMPHONY

Tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give the second concert of the Monday evening series. The soloist on this occasion will be Renee Chemet, violinist, who will be heard with the orchestra in Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, Overture, "Ruy Blas," and the symphonic poem, "Finlandia" by Sibelius are also on the bill.

ADVTSR-JAN 28

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

Following the New York trip by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will occupy this week, the next concerts in Symphony hall will be on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Feb. 9 and 10. Mr. Monteux will conduct Chausson's Symphony in B flat and two numbers new to these concerts—Ballantine's Suite "From the Garden of Hellas," and the Danzas Fantasticas by the Spanish composer Turina. The latter have never been heard in America. The soloist will be Toscha Seidel, the celebrated Russian violinist, who will play Mendelssohn's concerto.

EXTRA SYMPHONY

Tomorrow evening in Symphony hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Monteux, conductor, will give the second concert of the Monday evening series. The soloist will be Renee Chemet, the French violinist, who has just come to America from Europe, where she holds a pre-eminent reputation as a virtuoso. She will play Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole." Mr. Monteux will open the concert with Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony in F minor, a work of impressive brilliance and haunting beauty. The remaining numbers will be Mendelssohn's Overture "Ruy Blas," and "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

HERALD-JAN.28

Symphony Concert Tomorrow

Tomorrow evening in Symphony Hall, at 8:15, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Pierre Monteux, conductor, will give the second concert of the Monday evening series. The soloist on this occasion will be Renee Chemet, the French violinist, who has just come to America from Europe, where she holds a pre-eminent reputation as virtuoso. She will be heard with the orchestra in Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole."

Pierre Monteux will open the concert with Tchaikowsky's Fourth Symphony in F-minor, a work of impressive brilliance and haunting melodic beauty, particularly known by the theme of "Fate," given out by the brass in the first and last movements, the songful Andantino, the Scherzo, in which the entire string orchestra play pizzicato, and the finale, in which eloquent use is made of the characteristic folk song.

The remaining numbers will be Mendelssohn's Overture, "Ruy Blas," and the symphonic poem "Finlandia," by Sibelius.

POST-JAN.28

Incidents and Prospects

For the first time in all its visits to New York the Boston Orchestra will undertake there next Saturday afternoon a "Wagner Concert." No music but his will be played through a programme ranging from overtures and preludes to the closing scene of "Die Walküre"—with Mr. Whitehill for Wotan's speech—and excerpts from the end of "Siegfried" and the beginning of Götterdämmerung." Usually a public in New York responds to such "Wagner Concerts"; but hardly the public usual to the Boston Orchestra.

TRANS-JAN 2

17

[58]

HOLST AND MACDOWELL

A SECOND HEARING FOR THE NEW "PLANETS"

The Demurrers to the Composer's Method and a Word About His Right to Choice—"Mars" for the New Power, Which Is Rhythm and "Venus" for the New Beauty Which Is Luminous Transparency—"Jupiter" and "Uranus" for a Sturdy British Music — The Withering Years Upon "The Indian Suite"

SECOND hearing of the tone-poems that Holst assembles as "The Planets," both confirmed and diversified the impressions of the first; while the performance at the Symphony Concert of Saturday evening was more secure, elastic and generally ardent than that of Friday. Possibly, too, the second audience was less haunted than the first with the notion that it was to sit before the unrolling in tones of a huge cosmic panorama; whereas it had only to listen to fancies in music suggested, according to the astrologers, by seven great stars. Even so, it was easy to understand the disappointment in many a professional musician over the pieces. Holst has chosen to write them with little or no polyphony, with little or none even of the polytony that is present substitute. That is to say, first, that he almost abjures counterpoint; that, within each tone-poem, he does not develop, diversify, plait and part the generating motivs. Not often, either, in the fashion of polytony, does he lay and work them one upon another. So written, his music through "The Planets," goes neither up nor down, except as it marches at need and will to climax. Rather, it lays measure beside measure, period beside period, paragraph beside paragraph, relying for diversity, interest and significance upon chordal design, and progress, upon play of rhythm, harmony and timbres. Therewith Holst would prove his invention and skill, convey his fancies, gain beauty, touch power. Quite certainly he chose his own procedure; since upon many a page in many another piece he has written counterpoint. Quite certainly, setting hand to "The Planets," he had clear right to this choice. For us listeners there is only to ask how far did this means accomplish his ends, so far as we may discover them.

On this score, it is easy to believe that "the lay vote" (as they say in Episcopalian conventions) would lean to Holst's side. To listen to "Mars" unmoved is surely to be deaf to the power of rhythm, reiterated until it grinds; to strident tonal mass masterfully martialled, to the power of music, "savaged" as it were. In Holst's mind, there could have been no other way with "The Bringer of War" and beyond doubter, the composer gains his end. Listen a second time to the tone-poem of Saturn as "Bringer of Old Age." Not only is it often a sluggish, a neutral music, redolent of inertia and decay; but when it mounts and quickens, insistence speaks from it, as of old age inevitable portion, sparing not. In "Saturn" as in "Mars," discover what seems to be the composer's design and either seems resistless. For, throughout "The Planets," Holst is writing no absolute, self-contained music, but music to convey a prescribed, a labelled, mood.

It is true that in the lighter tone-poems, like "Venus" or "Mercury," Holst is loth to have done. He must turn and re-turn the crystal of his tones, even if it reflect somewhat similar images. Yet in "Venus" he seems close to one of the goals that the younger composers the world over steadily pursue and in the pursuit purify music and the pleasure of music. Tonal luxuriance, tonal length, breadth and thickness are going out of the fashion. The new day is the day of limpidity, clear, fine line, textures as fine and gleaming, lucent harmonies, thinned instrumental voices weblike. The ear listens to "Venus"; but the eye sees the calm transparencies, the long bright vistas of Italian pictures past the naivetés of "the primitives," but not yet within the opulence of the Renaissance. Akin, in the handwork of the younger composers, is the plastic precision of "Mercury." Here goes rhythmic motion unceasing, here the choirs and the instruments therein are ever bandying scraps and phrases. Yet exact is all this fluidity; while Holst uses voice after voice so that the ear shall hear it individualized. The romantic generation used the orchestra largely, collectively. The present generation hears it almost instrument by instrument—sometimes with a Mendelssohnian fineness of perception and usage.

Two more of the tone-poems, "Jupiter" for "jollity," Uranus for "magic," should bring comfort to the brethren in London and in Manchester in recurring dispute over what is or is not British music. No Frenchman is likely to write so hearty a music of "jollity"; no Italian a music with so heavy a footfall; a Berliner would sentimentalize it; a Viennese would be more scintillant and less candid; the Russians would sow in a fitful melancholy; the Scandinavians make no such red-cheeked measures; the Americans are much too nervous for Holst's genial expansions slow-moulded. In fine, through this sturdy, honest, frank, large-fibred, full-voiced, broadly songful music, quite unhastened, never self-conscious, with a tune of the soil and the folk, goes a true English spirit in clear English voice.

In degree, both seem discoverable in "Uranus the Magician." No doubt certain rhythms, certain modulations recall the Scherzo in which the Frenchman, Dukas, set into tones the sorcery of Goethe's German ballad. Only here indeed, in all the seven tone-poems has Holst "remembered"—no doubt unconsciously. Yet elsewhere for Uranus he writes a bouncing, [illegible]ding, hearty-humored, cajoling music [illegible] well nigh turns him into magician [illegible] side-show. And—toward the [illegible] veiled measures that it is [illegible] "mysterious." What [illegible] quite un[illegible] in words or tones? Has not the Latin for ages been sure that the Anglo-Saxon cannot be logical—with exceptions enough to prove the rule.

Mystical, however, the Anglo-Saxon surely can be, especially if other northern bloods mix in him as in Holst. The wraiths of tone winding through "Neptune," the drifting keys, the broken harmonies, the pale instrumental voices whitening and whispering into silence, the wisp-like line into nothing finally vanishing—here again is music of imagination to stand beside the tone-poem of "Saturn" or of "Mars." Not one or two hearings may quite unbosom "The Planets." Maybe also Holst—the foolish fellow!—presumed imagination in his hearers.

Possibly it was a deaf ear; possibly it was a dull wit or an unsympathetic mood; but somehow MacDowell's "Indian Suite"—the other number of the concert—sounded remote from this kindling, searching, stirring music of our immediate time; yet not far enough away or vital and rich enough to wear the dignity and the permanance of a classic. True, MacDowell wrote few orchestral pieces; yet all the others, even to the "Woodland Suite," have gradually vanished from active repertories; while not too often—with Loeffler, Carpenter, Griffes, Gilbert or Chadwick (of the best years) waiting on the American shelf—do conductors nowadays take down even this "Indian Suite." (Did Mr. Monteux choose it because of spiteful gossip in New York that he thought but poorly of MacDowell?) Truth to tell, alike on Friday and Saturday, it seemed a tame, conventionalized music, willed by the composer rather than outflowing from him, made according to formulas and manners that the years are fast withering.

